√100558

100558

THE Nation

A LIBERAL WEEKLY DEVOTED TO

POLITICS, ECONOMICS, SCIENCE, FOREIGN AFFAIRS, LITERATURE, DRAMA AND THE ARTS

FOUNDED, 1865

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

VOLUME 161

JULY 7, 1945, to DECEMBER 29, 1945

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

THE NATION ASSOCIATES, INC.
20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK 7

100558

INDEX TO VOLUME 161

JULY 7, 1945, to DECEMBER 29, 1945

The following letters are used to indicate the type of article:

A	Art
Arc	Architecture
C	Correspondence
CH	Chart
Ct	Cartoon
D	Drama
E	Editorial Article
EP	Editorial Paragraph
M	Music
MP	Moving Pictures
P	Poetry
S	Signed Article

Book reviews and reviewers are indexed separately in the Book Review Section.

Pages		Pages
1- 20	July 7	325-352	October 6
21- 48	July 14	353-388	October 13
49- 68	July 21	389-416	October 20
69- 96	July 28	417-444	October 27
97-116	August 4	445-480	November 3
117-144	August 11	481-508	November 10
145-164	August 18	509-536	November 17
165-192	August 25	537-564	November 24
193-212	September 1	565-608	December 1
213-240	September 8	609-644	December 8
241-268	September 15	645-672	December 15
269-296	September 22	673-720	December 22
297-324	September 29	721-748	December 29

A

PAGE

- A. F. of L. See American federation of labor
- AMA. See American medical association
- AMG. See Allied military government
- Acheson, Dean G. See United States—State department
- Actors' equity
  - Fay, F., asks expulsion of five members for participation in Spanish rally. L. Fernsworth; S........426; see also C........ 671
- Adams, Mildred
  - Mistral, Gabriela; S.................... 739
- Aeronautics. See Aviation
- Agee, James
  - Reviews of motion pictures:
    - Anchors aweigh 141
    - And then there were none.............. 441
    - Bell for Adano, a...................... 67
    - Bewitched 189
    - Blithe spirit 441
    - Blood on the sun....................... 67
    - Captain Eddie 141
    - Christmas in Connecticut............... 67
    - Confidential agent 506
    - Conflict 141
    - Duffy's tavern 441
    - Fleet that came to stay, the.......... 141
    - Girl number 217........................ 385
    - Her highness and the bell-boy.......... 321
    - House on 92nd street, the.............. 385
    - Incendiary blonde 141
    - Isle of the dead....................... 321
    - Jealousy 141
    - Kiss and tell.......................... 441
    - Last chance, the....................... 562
    - Lost weekend, the...................... 697
    - Love letters 321
    - Medal for Benny, a..................... 141
    - Mildred Pierce......385; see also...... 405
    - Murder, he says........................ 67
    - My name is Julia Ross.................. 562
    - Our vines have tender grapes........... 321
    - Over 21 189
    - Paris underground 441
    - Pillow to post 67
    - Pride of the marines................... 321
    - Rhapsody in blue....................... 67
    - San Pietro 67
    - Spellbound 506
    - State fair 321
    - Story of G. I. Joe..................... 264
    - That's the spirit 141
    - Those endearing young charms........... 141
    - True glory, the 321
    - Uncle Harry 189
    - Way ahead, the......................... 67
    - We accuse 67
    - Where do we go from here?.............. 141
    - Wonder man 141
- Agencies, governmental. See United States; names of agencies
- Air power. See Aviation
- Akins, L. C., and white justice in Dallas. G. C. Edwards; S................253; see also EP....243; EP....301; EP.... 327

PAGE

- Alemán, Miguel. See Mexico
- Alien property custodian
  - Fails to check cartel arrangements of the German and American Bosch companies; EP 119
- Aliens
  - Enabled to avoid taxes on capital gains through loophole in American tax laws; EP 60
  - Filipino baiting in California; EP......71; correction 194
- Allen, Edward S.
  - Comments on "The plight of the Jews" by I. F. Stone; C......322; see also...... 124
- Allen, Henry V. D.
  - Comments on "Will America go left?" by I. F. Stone; C......322; see also...... 124
- Allied military government
  - In Germany. S. K. Padover; S......276, 331, 362; see also 180; C........322; EP............326; C ....351; C ....479; C............535; 682
  - Fumbles in Germany and Austria. P. Jordan; S....36, 204; see also EP.... 242
  - How it administers justice in Italy. D. Downes; S.......37; see also C....... 746
  - Russian administration in Germany, the J. Joesten; S.......................... 77
- Alvarez del Vayo, Julio
  - To write a weekly signed page for The Nation; EP 392
  - Articles on:
  - Europe nationalizes industry; S.......... 689
  - Fascism in Paraguay; S................. 738
  - Guadalupe celebration and the clerical offensive in Mexico; S.................. 660
  - Latin American coups; S................ 457
  - Left trends in Canada; S............... 524
  - Mexico's coming presidential election; S.. 621
  - Negrín versus Prieto; S...............552, 575
  - Negrin's fight for Spanish republican unity; S ......122, 150; see also EP......166; EP...........194; E............329; 552
  - Negrín's plan for Spain; S............54; see also EP.......................... 70
  - New Spanish cabinet, the; S..........227; see also 218; C......266; E......329; 552
  - People's war goes on, the; S............ 403
  - Trujillo's record as dictator of the Dominican Republic; S...................... 738
  - Vatican in world politics, the; S......497; see also 660
  - World federation of trade unions, the; S.. 432
- America. See United States
- American federation of labor
  - Green, W., warns that American labor may be driven left; EP.................... 647
- American friends of the Hebrew university in Jerusalem
  - Solicits music and books for the university; C 699
- American legion
  - Hollywood post's stand on Japanese Americans; the W. Kent incident. C. McWilliams; S 251
  - Looks at labor. C. McWilliams; S........ 309
- American medical association
  - Annual convention condemns the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill; supports voluntary hospitalization insurance; EP............ 71
- American veterans' committee
  - Asks investigation of new nationalist veterans' organizations; EP............... 271
  - Its views on veterans' job rights. C. G. Bolté; S......104; see also EP...... 51
  - Launches a campaign to obtain housing for veterans. F. D. Roosevelt, Jr.; S........ 486
  - Should be publicized by liberals. M. Silberstein; C 443
- Amery, John. See Great Britain
- Anchors aweigh. J. Agee; MP............... 141
- And then there were none. J. Agee; MP.... 441
- Anschuetz, Dr. Gerhard. See Germany
- Anti-Semitism. See Jews
- Anti-trust laws. See Monopolies
- Appleby, John T.
  - Comments on Anglo-American trade relations; C 443
- Aprista party. See Peru
- Arab league. See Pan-Arab league
- Arabs
  - Oppose a Jewish Palestine. E. Ben-Horin; S......399, 424; See also C......535; 540; 543; 615; C.................... 746
- Architecture
  - Rebuilding our cities. F. Fisher; S...... 130
  - Tomorrow's small house. D. Haskell...... 91
- Are you with it? J. W. Krutch; D........ 604
- Arendt, Hannah
  - Christianity and revolution; S............ 288
- Argentina
  - American State department decides not to conclude hemispheric defense treaty with Argentina as a signatory; Rio conference called off; EP.......................... 354
  - Braden, S., American ambassador, denounces the dictatorship; EP..............193; see also EP........214; EP.......... 271
  - Braden, S., American ambassador, target of government campaign of vilification; EP.. 100
  - Cooke, J. I., foreign minister, resigns; EP. 271
  - Fall of Perón is seen as imminent; EP.214; see also EP.......................... 300
  - Government announces free elections, but imposes regulations restricting political parties' freedom; EP................... 146
  - Latin American conference should be called to break relations with present regime and apply economic sanctions; EP...... 611
  - Perón, J., arrested; his collaborators are ousted from the government; EP........ 391
  - Perón enters the presidential race. M. Seoane; S......654; see also EP...... 611
  - Perón returns to power forty-eight hours after his ouster; EP....419; see also.... 457
  - Perón seeks to split the Radical party, the most powerful political organization; EP 193
  - Perón sees civil war as the only solution to the present situation; EP............ 146
  - United States should break relations with the Perón government; EP............ 193
  - Wave of arrests follows popular demonstration against Perón; six universities closed; E 329
  - Will not benefit from lifting of American export controls; EP.................... 271
- Armour, Norman. See United States — And Spain
- Army, United States. See United States—Army
- Arnold, General H. H. See United States—Army
- Art (articles by C. Greenberg)
  - Exhibitions:
    - Davis, Stuart 533
    - Fresnaye, Roger de la.................. 533
    - Kollwitz, Käthe 669
    - Landscape show of the Brooklyn museum 669
    - Portrait of America.................... 605
    - Whitney annual, the 669
- Arze, José Antonio
  - Terror in Bolivia; S.................... 519
- Associated press
  - Complies with federal court ruling on membership; EP 611
- Atcheson, George. See United States—State department
- Atomic bomb. See Science
- Austria
  - Fischer, E., communist leader, interprets Austrian catholic history. E. K. Winter; C 47
  - With the occupation authorities. Service man; C........351; see also C........ 443
- Aviation
  - Arnold, General H. H., reports on the operations of the army air forces; EP...........509; see also........... 546
  - Great Britain nationalizes its air-transport service and airports; EP.............. 482
  - International air transport association sets up regional traffic conferences covering international routes; EP................ 419
  - Pan-American airways' announcement of reduced trans-Atlantic fare starts a rate battle. K. Hutchison; S................ 688
  - Senate committee rejects the McCarran bill for a single American airline for transoceanic traffic; EP.................... 22
- Aydelotte, Frank; named to Anglo-American committee of inquiry on Palestine. I. F. Stone; S 678

B

- Babando, Joseph A.
  - Steinbeck's paisanos; C................. 144
- Balanchine, George, choreographies. B. H. Haggin; S 413
- Balkan states
  - Allied maneuvers and "free elections". F. Kirchwey; S....197; see also E.... 327
  - See also names of countries
- Ball-Burton-Hatch-bill. See Labor
- Ballet russe de Monte Carlo. B. H. Haggin; S 413, 442
- Barnum, Thomas J.
  - Veblen versus Grew; C................... 266
- Barrett, Jack
  - Crossword puzzles........48, 96, 144, 192, 240, 268, 296, 324, 352, 388, 416, 444, 480, 508, 536, 564, 608, 644, 672, 700, 748
- Barth, Alan
  - Fuel, food, and freedom; S.............. 128
  - Strategic bombing—an autopsy; S......546; see also EP.......................... 509
  - Tideland oil controversy, the; S.......... 458

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIB

PAGE

- Baruch, Bernard M.
  - Statement on loans to foreign countries. K. Hutchison; S....................523; see also 551
  - Submits report on problems of readjustment of war veterans to civilian life; E...... 243
- Belgium
  - King Leopold resists demands for his abdication; EP 70
  - Leopold III: traitor or patriot? J. E. Grosfils; S 108
- Bell for Adano, a. J. Agee; MP.......... 67
- Ben-Horin, Eliahu
  - Have the Arabs a case in Palestine? S..........399; see also C........535; 543
  - Palestine and grand strategy; S.......... 424
- Benton, William. See United States—State department
- Bernal, J. D.
  - Everybody's atom; S...201; see also Ct... 202
- Betancourt, Romulo. See Venezuela
- Bewitched. J. Agee; MP 189
- Bilbo, Theodore G.
  - Spokesman for racism must be retired from public life; EP.....2; see also EP..... 101
- Birdwell, Russell
  - Promotes the sale of N. Bruff's "The Manatee"; EP 675
- Bisson, T. A.
  - China on the brink; S................222; see also ....172; E.P........... 214
  - What program for Japan? S..........28; see also E...........23; C........... 416
- Blithe spirit. J. Agee; MP................. 441
- Blood on the sun. J. Agee; MP............ 67
- Bloom, Leonard
  - Fair play for the Nisei; S.............. 521
- Boddy, Manchester, seen as possible Democratic nominee for Congress from California. C. McWilliams; S.............. 199
- Bolivia
  - Terror under the Villarroel regime. J. A. Arze; S 519
- Bolté, Charles G.
  - Labor, veterans, and jobs; S..........104; see also EP..........................51; 309
  - Pacific, the: the last war front; S........ 175
  - Post-atomic national defense; S............ 303
  - Trouble ahead for veterans; S........... 728
  - Veteran's view of atomic control, a; S.... 715
- Bondy, Malcolm
  - Comments on "Is 'Freedom road' true?" by C. Rosenberger; C....116; see also.... 39
- Books
  - Massachusetts supreme court rules that "Strange fruit" is obscene. M. Marshall; S 464
  - Of 1945 633
- Bosch company. See Monopolies
- Bowles, Chester A. See Price control, office of
- Boyle, Kay
  - Austrian maquis, the; C..............443; see also C 351
- Braden, Spruille. See Argentina; United States—State department
- Bradley, General Omar. See Veterans, war
- Brant, Irving
  - Fight over Jackson Hole, the; S.......... 13
- Brazil
  - Dutra, E. P., establishes early lead over E. Gomes in presidential election; EP.. 646
  - Vargas ousted in coup in which Goes Monteiro played prominent role; EP........ 482
- Bretton Woods monetary agreements. See Finance, public
- Britain. See Great Britain
- British empire. See Great Britain
- British intelligence officer
  - American soldiers in Europe; C.......... 507
- Broadcasting. See Radio
- Brooke, Edgar
  - Driver was a nice guy, the; S........337; see also C........................... 478
- Brown, Walter. See United States—State department
- Brownell, Herbert, Jr. See Republican party
- Broz, Josip (Tito). See Yugoslavia
- Bruff, Nancy; uses a publicity agent, R. Birdwell to promote the sale of her book, "The Manatee"; EP.................. 675
- Buchanan, John
  - "Fan her head!"; C.................... 443
  - Wonderland, 1945; C...................... 699
- Budget, public. See Finance, public
- Bulgaria
  - Elections postponed following warning by Bevins and Byrnes on democratic procedure. F. Kirchwey; S.............197; see also E........................... 327
  - Victory for the Fatherland front. P. Jordan; S 686
- Burgess, David S.
  - How to treat the Japanese; C........351; see also EP.......................... 213
  - Save the Delmo labor homes; C........... 164
- Burma
  - British army continues to advance toward Thailand; EP 50
  - Objective, freedom. A. Roth; S.......... 544

PAGE

- Burning the letters. R. Jarrell; P.......... 372
- Business
  - America's post-war trade. R. Chandler; S.81, 106
  - American wool trade seeks new import barriers. K. Hutchison; S................. 659
  - Britain's colonial squeeze. A. Roth; S..617; see also EP......................... 646
  - FEA announces the lifting of export restrictions; EP 271
  - Prices:
    - Bowles, C. A. calls for continuation of price control beyond June, 1946; EP.. 647
    - Government must provide an adequate wage-price formula for reconversion period; E......328; see also......483; 496
    - Manufacturers hold up production to force higher price ceilings; EP........... 674
    - OPA under pressure from big business groups which demand the removal of controls; EP 194
    - Price-controls on housing lifted; E..... 302
  - Statement by B. M. Baruch on foreign loans and exports. K. Hutchison; S..523; see also 551
  - Trade and the Bretton Woods agreements; E 72
  - Trade agreements. See Trade agreements
- Bustamante, José Luis. See Peru
- Buxton, Frank W.; named to Anglo-American committee of inquiry on Palestine. I. F. Stone; S 678
- Byrnes, James F. See United States—State department

C

- C.C.F. See Canada
- C.E.D. See Committee for economic development
- C.P.
  - Comments on "The driver was a nice guy" by E. Brooke; C..................478; see also 337
- Cables and wireless, limited
  - British communications company nationalized by the government; EP........... 482
- Caldwell, William J.
  - Guadalcanal pays off; S.................. 11
- California
  - Circuit court of appeals curbs anti-union activities of the Merchants and manufacturers association of Los Angeles; EP.... 272
  - Fight over the proposed bills for state compulsory health insurance, the; EP...... 71
  - 1946 state election, the. C. McWilliams; S ....199; see also........... 577
  - Returns to Filipino baiting; EP.......71; correction 194
- Campbell, Bernard; pardoned after serving forty months in New York prison for crime he did not commit; EP.......... 215
- Camus, Albert. See France
- Canada
  - Education program for war veterans. L. Roberts; S 401
  - King, W. L. M., urges world government to guarantee security in the atomic era; EP 722
  - Left trends; the C.C.F. experiment in Saskatchewan. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.. 524
  - Trestrail campaign against the C.C.F., the. G. Duncan; C........................ 116
- Captain Eddie. J. Agee; MP............. 141
- Captain X
  - End of Hukbalahap, the; S............85; see also 73
  - Who bosses the Philippines? S........255; see also EP..........241; C.......... 672
- Cárdenas, Lázaro. See Mexico
- Carey, James
  - Atomic energy for the benefit of all; S.... 711
- Carlson, Colonel Evans Fordyce, may run for Congress in California. C. McWilliams; S 199, 577
- Cartels. See Monopolies
- Cartoons
  - "Baby play with nice ball?" Low.......... 202
  - Day after. Low 78
  - Difficult courtship. Low.................. 570
  - Dreamland. Low 3
  - Look things in the face. Low............ 623
  - Nuremberg. Low 653
  - Oi! Take it easy! Low.................. 249
  - On the higher level. Low................ 31
  - Ssh! It's secret! Low.................. 459
  - Star turn in the city. Low.............. 174
  - "Tell your future, dearie?" Low.......... 681
  - Unrest in India. Low 404
  - "We are doing our best". Low............ 278
  - "You're not the only one who can raise a family". Low 308
- Catholic church. See Roman catholic church
- Censorship
  - And American reporters in Italy. D. Downes; S. 37
  - Massachusetts supreme court rules that "Strange fruit" is obscene literature. M. Marshall; S....................... 464

PAGE

- Chandler, Robert
  - America's post-war trade; S..........81, 106
- Chase, Stuart
  - Industrial uses of atomic energy; S...... 709
  - Mr. Wallace and the wise boys; S........ 313
- Chatham house
  - Issues report on the interests of the British commonwealth in the Middle east. I. F. Stone; S 726
- Chennault, General Claire L.
  - Resigns as commander of the American air force in China; EP.................69, 70
- Chicago
  - Is the first city to adopt a municipal fair-employment ordinance; EP............ 215
  - Kelly-Green collaboration brings broad civic improvements. R. Runnion; S.......... 61
  - Roosevelt college. C. McWilliams; S...... 684
- Chile
  - Mistral, G., wins Nobel prize for poetry. M. Adams; S.......................... 379
- China
  - American troops to garrison several important cities; EP..................... 270
  - Chennault, General C. L., resigns as commander of the American air force; EP 69, 70
  - Chungking-Yenan negotiations expected to end in a partial accord; EP........300; see also EP......21; E......148; 172; EP.....214; 222; EP.....300; E..... 357
  - Disputes British claim to Hongkong; EP.. 165
  - Hurley, Ambassador P. J., makes a foray into Chinese politics. M. S. Stewart; S........172; see also EP........214; 222
  - Hurley, P. J., may resign as American ambassador; EP....300; see also EP.... 418
  - Role of P. J. Hurley, the. M.S. Stewart; S.........489; see also E.........483; EP...........538; 614; EP........... 646
  - Russo-Chinese pact, the: E.....195; see also EP......21; E......148; EP......214; 222
  - Truman names General G. C. Marshall as special envoy. M. S. Stewart; S....614; see also EP.......................... 722
  - Truman's statement on American policy; EP.........673; see also EP......... 722
  - Wedemeyer, General A. C., offers to fly Kuomingtang troops to north China in American planes; EP..............270; see also E....357; EP....418; EP.... 722
  - Will there be civil war? M. S. Stewart; S.........172; see also 222; E......... 357
  - Withdraw the American troops! E....483; see also EP.......................... 538
- Christmas in Connecticut. J. Agee; MP...... 67
- Church, Roman catholic. See Roman catholic church
- Churchill, Winston. See Great Britain
- Ciano, Galeazzo, diary reveals Franco regime's role in the war; EP............ 673
- Civil rights
  - Conscientious objectors: second-class citizens. V. H. Whitney; S................ 735
- Clark, Michael
  - Portents in Egypt; S.................... 485
- Coal
  - British government proposes to nationalize its mines. K. Hutchison; S............ 737
  - Lack of, in Europe paralyzes industry and transportation. A. Bath; S.............. 128
- Cohen, Benjamin V. See United States—State department
- Coldwell, M. J.
  - Atomic energy, the heritage of all; S.... 706
- Commerce. See Business
- Committee for economic development
  - Offers a plan for full employment. K. Hutchison; S 431
- Committee on un-American activities
  - Requests scripts of eight liberal radio commentators; Representative Patterson files resolution asking abolishment of the committee; EP 446
  - Committee for radio freedom formed in Los Angeles; EP 539
- Communist party
  - Newspapers inject communist issue into the New York waterfront strike; E......... 421
- Confidential agent. J. Agee; MP............ 506
- Conflict. J. Agee; MP..................... 141
- Congress
  - Adjourns for vacation with major reconversion problems untouched; E.......... 119
  - And the President's message. I. F. Stone; S 246
  - President acts to cut the number of congressional tours abroad; EP........... 119
- Connolly, Cyril
  - Britain: the middle kingdom; S.......... 367
- Conscientious objectors. See Civil rights; Doss, Desmond C.; United States—Army
- Conscription. See United States—Army
- Cooke, Juan Isaac. See Argentina
- Cooperative commonwealth federation. See Canada
- Corbett, Percy E.
  - New world league evaluated, the; S....7; see also 5; C....................... 116

PAGE

- Corbin, Elwin J.
  - Comments on "Detroit plans for chaos" by I. Richter; C........................ 190
- Corson, John
  - Can UNRRA stop famine? S..........57; see also E........................53; 128
- Couvaras, C. G.
  - Comments on "Greece in purgatory" by P. Jordan; C.......747; see also....... 624
- Crossword puzzles. See Barrett, Jack
- Czechoslovakia
  - Prepares to deport the Sudeten Germans. R. Parker; S.....307; see also EP..... 50

D

- D.A.R. See Daughters of the American revolution
- Dance, the
  - Balanchine's ballets. B. H. Haggin; S.... 413
  - Ballet russe de Monte Carlo. B. H. Haggin; S 413, 442
  - Graham, Martha. B. H. Haggin; S....... 94
  - Massine group performs at stadium concert. B. H. Haggin; S........................ 94
  - Tudor's "Dim luster". C. Greenberg; S.... 476
- Daughters of the American revolution
  - Rebuked by Judge P. Forman for restricting the use of Washington hall against Negroes; EP 539
  - Refuse to rent Washington auditorium to H. Scott, Negro pianist; EP............ 419
- Davis, Stuart, exhibition. C. Greenberg; A... 533
- Davis, William H.
  - Dismissed by President Truman as director of economic stabilization; E......... 302
- Dead wingman, the. R. Jarrell; P.......... 232
- Deep are the roots. J. W. Krutch; D........ 384
- De Gaulle, Charles. See France
- Del Vayo, Julio Alvarez. See Alvarez del Vayo, Julio
- Detroit
  - Jeffries, E. J. Jr., defeats R. Frankensteen in mayoralty election; EP.............. 510
- Deutsch, Albert
  - Danger! Venereal disease; S............ 284
- Dewey, John, and N. Thomas
  - Unsolved murder of Carlo Tresca, the; C.. 671
- Dewey, Thomas E.
  - And the case of B. Campbell; EP........ 215
  - His views on the St. Lawrence seaway. B. J. Atlas; S....224; see also EP.... 354
- Dodd, William E.; receives back pay owing since dismissal from government service on charges brought by the Dies committee; EP 539
- Dominican Republic
  - Trujillo dictatorship, the. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S 738
- Dooman, Eugene Hoffman. See United States —State department
- Doss, Desmond C.
  - Conscientious objector receives the Congressional medal of honor; EP............ 391
- Douglas, Helen Gahagan
  - Weapons of peace, the; S................ 705
- Downes, Donald
  - Censors or reporters? S................37; see also C............................ 746
- Draft, the. See United States—Army
- Drama. See Krutch, J. W., for reviews
- Duffy's tavern. J. Agee; MP................ 441
- Duncan, George
  - Comments on "Canada stands pat" by M. Cohen; C........................ 116
- Dunn, James Clement. See United States—State department
- Dutch East Indies. See Indonesia
- Dutra, Eurico Gaspar. See Brazil

E

- Eames, Emma. B. H. Haggin; M........... 264
- East, far, middle, and near. See names of countries
- Eastland, James O.
  - Missouri serviceman replies to his statement about the failure of Negro soldiers in war; C 164
- Economic stabilization, director of
  - President dismisses W. H. Davis; E...... 302
- Edman, Irwin
  - Harvard ponders education; S............ 258
- Education
  - Chicago's Roosevelt college. C. McWilliams; S 684
  - For Canada's war veterans. L. Roberts; S.. 401
  - Report of the Harvard committee. I. Edman; S 258
- Edwards, George Clifton
  - Akins, L. C., and white justice in Dallas; S ....253; see also EP........243; EP .... 301; EP 327
- Egypt
  - Anti-Jewish riots, the. M. Clark; S........ 485
- Einstein, Albert
  - Offers a proposal for control of atomic energy; EP 445
- Eisenhower, General Dwight D. See United States—Army

PAGE

- Employment. See Labor
- England. See Great Britain
- Epstein, Benjamin R.
  - Comments on letter by G. Williams; C..746; see also C............................ 643
- Espionage
  - Three of the "The Six" cleared of charges of disclosing confidential State department information; EP 146
- European war. See War, European
- Evatt, Herbert Vere
  - Atom control and the UNO; S........... 720
- Everybody's business (articles by K. Hutchison) 431, 456, 496, 523, 551, 576, 620, 659, 688, 737
- Excess profits tax. See Finance, public

F

- FAO. See Food and agriculture organization
- FCC. See Federal communications commission
- FEA. See Foreign economic administration
- FEPC. See Fair employment practice committee
- FSA. See Farm security administration
- Fair employment practices committee
  - And T. G. Bilbo; EP...2; see also EP... 101
  - Chicago is the first city to adopt a municipal fair-employment ordinance; EP..... 215
- Far east. See names of countries
- Farbenindustrie I. G.
  - And German post-war industrial revival. I. F. Stone; S........................ 6
- Farm security administration
  - Is urged to save the Delmo labor homes. D. S. Burgess; C...................... 164
- Fay, Frank. See Actors' equity
- Federal communications commission
  - Retards the development of FM broadcasting; E 613
- Fern hill. D. Thomas; P................... 664
- Fernsworth, Lawrence
  - On criticizing the Vatican; S........426; see also C.......................... 671
- Ferry, Madame Abel
  - Winter in Saint-Dié; C................ 478
- Films. See Agee, J., for reviews
- Finance, public
  - Baruch, B. M., suggests that foreign loans be used as an ideological weapon. K. Hutchison; S.......523; see also....... 551
  - Bretton Woods monetary agreement:
    - Approved by Great Britain; EP....674; see also 679
    - Approved by the United States Senate; E 72
  - British and American taxes compared. K. Hutchison; S 456
  - House adopts a tax bill granting substantial relief in upper income brackets; EP..392; see also E...........328; E........... 356
  - Loophole in tax laws enables aliens to avoid taxes on capital gains; EP............ 70
  - Manufacturers hold up production in anticipation of removal of the excess-profits tax; EP........674; see also E........ 356
  - Morgenthau report urges more effective centralization of federal budget machinery; EP 147
  - Senate committee's tax bills cuts some of the benefits to upper-income groups; EP..... 418
  - Vinson, F. M., becomes secretary of the treasury; E 23
- Finletter, Thomas K.
  - No middle ground; S.................. 712
- Fischer, Ernst. See Austria
- Fisher, Frank
  - Rebuilding our cities; S................ 130
- Fitzgerald, F. Scott. L. Trilling; S.......... 182
- Fleet that came to stay, the. J. Agee; MP.... 141
- Food
  - American plenty and European starvation; EP 242
  - Can UNRRA stop famine? J. Corson; S.....57; see also E.....24; E.....53; 128
  - Lehman, H. H., predicts a catastrophe in Europe unless food shipments are increased; E 53
  - Shortage of, in Europe aggravated by coal shortage which immobilizes transportation. A. Barth; S 128
    - See also United nations relief and rehabilitation administration
- Food and agriculture organization
  - Adopts a charter; EP.................... 481
  - Orr, Sir J. B., chosen director general for two years; EP........................ 481
- Foot, Michael
  - British labor sets its course; S........... 221
- Foreign economic administration
  - Lifts export restrictions; EP............. 271
- Foreign ministers' conference. See World war—Foreign ministers' conference
- Forman, Philip
  - Rebukes the DAR for restricting the use of its Washington hall against Negroes; EP 539

PAGE

- Formiggini, Angelo Fortunato. See Italy
- Forrestal, James V. See United States—Navy
- France
  - American troops reported burning surplus material and food before leaving their French camps; EP..................... 147
  - And Great Britain:
    - Power politics in the Levant. F. Kirchwey; S 52
  - And Indo-China. See Indo-China
  - And Spain:
    - France may break relations with Franco; EP 166
    - France proposes Anglo-American-French conference on relations with Franco; EP 673
  - And the United States. See Franco-American relations
  - And the western bloc. Low; Ct.......... 308
  - Assembly chooses General de Gaulle as interim president of the republic; EP..... 537
  - Attack from the left 38
  - Background of collaboration. C. A. Micaud; S..........127; see also EP.......... 117
  - Brittany goes to the polls. I. Treat; S.... 429
  - Camus, A., replies to F. Mauriac's thesis, "The year of reconciliation." M. Marshall; S 158
  - Constitutional debate and the coming elections. F. Pottecher; S................. 280
  - De Gaulle's plan for international control of the Ruhr. A. Vallance; S......285; see also E..........513; EP.......... 645
  - Leahy-Pétain correspondence, the; EP..... 114
  - Nationalizes banks and credit. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.......................... 689
  - New cabinet, the; EP................566; see also EP.......................537, 538
  - Pétain, H. P., on trial; EP..........99; see also EP.....114; EP.....117; 152; 179
  - Pétain reprieved by General de Gaulle; EP 166
  - Results of the referendum and general election. O. Rosenfeld; S..............453; see also EP......................... 417
  - Return from a German prison camp. A. R.; C 95
  - Socialist party wins victory in cantonal elections. O. Rosenfeld: S................ 361
  - Socialists reject proposals for organic duty with the Communists; EP.............. 166
  - Winter in Saint-Dié. Mme. A. Ferry; C.. 478
- Franco, Francisco. See Spain
- Franco-American relations
  - American troops reported burning surplus material and food before leaving their French camps; EP..................... 147
  - Leahy-Pétain correspondence, the; EP...... 114
- Frankensteen, Richard. See Detroit
- Freeman, Joseph
  - America's homesick army; S......427; 460; see also C........................... 643
- Fresnaye, Roger de la, exhibition. C. Greenberg; A 533
- Friendly, Alfred
  - Labor-management conference, the; S..514; see also E..........448; EP.......... 610
- Friends of the Spanish republic
  - Urge that Spain be placed on the agenda of the Moscow conference of foreign ministers; EP 645

G

- Gardner, O. Max; named to Anglo-American committee of inquiry on Palestine. I. F. Stone; S 678
- Gasperi, Alcide de. See Italy
- Gaulle, Charles de. See France
- General motors corporation
  - Issues in the auto workers' strike; E..567; see also 620; E...648; EP...674; E... 724
  - Will probably reject auto workers' demand for a wage increase; E......448; see also 496
- Germany
  - AMG fumbles the ball. P. Jordan; S...... 36
  - AMG—innocents abroad. S. K. Padover; S..............276, 331, 362, 397, 682; see also EP........242; C........322; EP ....326; C ....351; C ....479; C ....535; E....... 675
  - AMG the Soviet way. J. Joesten; S...... 77
  - Anschuetz, Dr. G., comments on weaknesses of the Weimar constitution; EP.........119; see also C.......... 239
  - Byrnes, J. F., issues a statement on economic policy; E 675
  - Can it fight again? Kilgore hearings on secret German plans for industrial revival. I. F. Stone; S........................ 6
  - De Gaulle's plan for international control of the Ruhr. A. Vallance; S..........285; see also E..........513; EP.......... 645
  - Denazifying German prisoners of war. Serviceman; C 238
  - Faces an economic crisis this winter; E... 513
  - Fate of German monuments and museum objects. L. Kirstein; S................ 206

Index

PAGE

- Fire General Patton! EP............299; see also EP.........326; EP......... 354
- Hőgner, W., replaces F. Schaeffer as president of Bavaria; EP...............326; see also EP.......................242; 397
- Life in a vacuum. P. Jordan; S.......... 204
- Non-fraternisation order eased for American and British occupation troops; EP...... 50
- Occupied lands authority should replace the AMG. S. K. Padover; S............682; see also E.......................... 675
- Plight of the Jews, the. I. F. Stone; S..330; see also EP..........194; C.......... 443
- Potsdam decisions on its economic future; E 120
- Problem of reparations; EP............99; see also E..........120; EP.......... 390
- Report by American economic advisers indicates an intent to restore German industry; EP 390
- Tragedy of German labor, the. S. K. Padover; S...............276; see also 180; C ....322; C.............. 351
- Tri-partite administration of Berlin hits snags; EP ....21; see also E...........24; EP........... 50
- Visit to G. Hauptmann, a. H. Kesten; S... 627

Gershwin, George. B. H. Haggin; M....... 115

Getting, Ivan A.
- Facts about defense in the atomic age; S.. 703

Giannini, Guglielmo. See Italy

Gioia, Giuseppe di
- Laski versus the Catholic church; C..671; see also 426; E....................... 647

Giral, José. See Spain

Girl number 217. J. Agee; MP............ 385

Glazer, Alvin B.
- Proposes S. Welles as general secretary of the United nations organization; C..... 323

Goes Monteiro, General Pedro Aurelio de. See Brazil

Gómes, Eduardo. See Brazil

Goodelman, Leon
- Longshoremen's strike in New York, the; C..........535; see also E........421; EP 446; 516; 548

Gordon, King
- Atomic bomb is a world affair, the; S.... 541
- Bill Mauldin's war; S.................34; see also C...........18; C........... 47

Government agencies. See United States; names of agencies

Government finance. See Finance, public

Graham, Martha. B. H. Haggin; S.......... 95

Great Britain
- Amery, J., hanged as a traitor; EP....... 723
- And Burma's independence movement. A. Roth; S.....544; see also 617; EP..... 646
- And the atomic bomb. A. Vallance; S..488; see also 571
- And the Indonesian independence movement; EP ....509; see also 617; EP....................... 646
- Anglo-American relations:
  - American loan, the. A. Vallance; S..217; see also E...272; EP...299; E...393; 523; E..........649; EP..........674; 679
  - End of lend-lease, the; E........196; see also E......216; 217; Ct......249; E ....272; C 443; 679
- New petroleum pact, the; EP............ 326
- Anglo-French relations:
  - Power politics in the Levant. F. Kirchwey; S 52
- Anglo-Greek relations:
  - British policy remains unchanged. C. Poulos; S....450; see also 624; C.... 747
- Anglo-Indian relations:
  - British government announces prompt measures for assuring self-government; EP ....299; see also Ct........ 404
  - Wavell, Lord, assumes responsibility for the breakdown of the Simla conference; EP........61; see also EP.......2; 79
- Anglo-Iranian relations:
  - Azerbaijan revolt, the. S. W. Morrell; S...........733; see also........... 725
- Anglo-Palestinian relations:
  - British authorities order the expulsion of C. Poulos, American correspondent. F. Kirchwey; S 449
  - British cabinet reported favoring retention of the White paper; EP......300; see also 399; 424; 454
  - British members of the Anglo-American committee of inquiry. I. F. Stone; S.. 678
  - British policy breaks down. F. Kirchwey; S 540
  - See also Palestine
- Approves the Anglo-American loan and Bretton Woods; EP......674; see also...... 679
- Bevin, E., on foreign policy. F. Kirchwey; S ....197; see also.........221; 454
- British and American taxes compared. K. Hutchison; S 456
- Chatham house report on the interests of the commonwealth in the Middle east. I. F. Stone; S....................... 726
- Churchill as leader of the opposition; E........167; see also EP........610; 679
- Claim to Hongkong disputed by the Chinese; EP 165
- Coal mines to be nationalized under bill proposed by the government. K. Hutchison; S 737
- General election:
  - And the tasks of the American left. I. F. Stone; S......124; see also C...... 322
  - Composition of the new parliament. A. Vallance; S 125
  - Day after. Low; Ct.................... 78
  - Dreamland. Low; Ct.................. 3
  - Labor party comes to power, the. H. J. Laski; S.....97; see also EP.....99; E ....101; EP 118
  - Tory campaign against the Labor party, the; E........3; see also Ct........ 31
- Government's "negative" socialism creates a rift in parliament. A. Vallance; S..... 571
- Housing situation, the. A. Vallance; S.454; see also 571
- Labor government's domestic and foreign program, the. A. Vallance; S......174; see also EP.............167; 221; 454; 571
- Laski, H. J., calls for public ownership of the bank of England; EP..........118; see also Ct.......................174; 454
- Nationalization of industry. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S...........................689; see also EP......482; 679; Ct......681; 737
- Need of a wage policy. A. Vallance; S.... 454
- People demand prompter action on domestic reconversion; disapprove Bevin's foreign policy. A. Vallance; S...............359, 454
- "We are doing our best". Low; Ct....... 278
- Will there be a renaissance of the arts? C. Connolly; S......................... 367

Great return, the. M. Van Doren; P....... 39

Greece
- British policy remains unchanged; United States supports the British authorities in Athens. C. Poulos; S................. 450
- Coming elections seen favoring the rightists. P. Jordan; S......624; see also C...... 747
- Sophoulis, T., fails in attempt to form a new cabinet; EP....391; see also...... 450
- Voulgaris, P., resigns as premier; prime minister Tsouderos is asked to form a new government; EP.................. 391

Green, William
- Warns that American labor may be driven left; EP 647

Greenberg, Clement
- Reviews of art exhibitions:
  - Davis, Stuart 533
  - Fresnaye, Roger de la................ 533
  - Kollwitz, Käthe 669
  - Landscape show of the Brooklyn museum. 669
  - Portrait of America.................... 605
  - Whitney annual, the................... 669
- Tudor's "Dim luster" ballet; S........... 476

Grew, Joseph Clark. See United States—State department

Grosfils, Jean E.
- Leopold of Belgium: traitor or patriot? S.. 108

Grossman, James
- Face in the mountain, the; S............. 230

H

Haggin, B. H.
- Articles on music:
  - Eames, Emma 264
  - Gershwin, George 115
  - Hempel, Frieda 264
  - Jazz 46, 141
  - Lehmann, Lilli 264
  - Readers' comments on "Mozart" by A. Einstein 237
  - Schnabel, Artur 94
  - Teyte, Maggie 534
  - Toscanini and the New York philharmonic orchestra 189, 641
  - Victor's plastic records.............476, 744
- Articles on the dance:
  - Balanchine's ballets 413
  - Ballet russe de Monte Carlo........413, 442
  - Graham, Martha 94
  - Massine group performs at stadium concert 94
  - Tudor's "Dim luster". See Greenberg C., for review
- Music, recorded 20, 46, 67, 115, 163, 264, 321, 350, 386, 442, 476, 506, 563, 641, 669, 698, 744

Hamilton, Thomas J.
- Navy opposes the service merger, the; S.. 730

Hamlet, J. W. Krutch; D.................. 744

Hare system. See Japan

Harrison, Earl G.
- His report on Europe's displaced persons. I. F. Stone; S.....330; see also C..... 443

Haskell, Douglas
- Tomorrow's small house; Arc............ 91

Hass, Eric
- Supplies poem on imperialism requested by A. Smedley; C.....748; see also C..... 478

Hastie, William H.
- His appointment to the circuit court of appeals in the District of Columbia urged; EP 147

Hauptmann, Gerhart. H. Kesten; S........ 627

Health, public. See Medicine

Hempel, Frieda. B. H. Haggin; M.......... 264

Her highness and the bell-boy. J. Agee; MP.. 321

Herrick, Elinore M.
- Comments on "Crippling the disabled veteran" by E. M. Maisel; C..........143; see also 9

Higashi-Kuni, Prince. See Japan

Hirsch, Felix E.
- Corrects editorial note on Dr. G. Anschuetz; C..........239; see also EP.......... 119

Hoang-Xuan-Man
- Comments on A. Roth's article about Indo-China; C.........671; see also......... 422

Hőgner, Wilhelm. See Germany

Hongkong
- Claimed by both the British and Chinese; EP 165

Hoover, Herbert
- Warns about the spread of communism and the need of defending the "free American system"; EP...................... 146

Hopkins, Harry, retires from the government; EP 22

House on 92nd street, the. J. Agee; MP.... 385

Housing
- New York emergency housing committee opposes temporary housing for veterans; EP 647
- No homes for veterans. F. D. Roosevelt, Jr.; S 486
- Price controls lifted by J. W. Snyder; E.. 302
- Rebuilding our cities. F. Fisher; Arc..... 130
- Save the Delmo labor homes. D. S. Burgess; C 164
- Tomorrow's small house. D. Haskell; Arc.. 91
- Truman asks release of government surplus materials, priorities on low-cost dwellings, and price ceilings on new constructions; E 676

Hudson, Manley O.
- Comments on "The second league" by P. E. Corbett; C........116; see also........ 7

Hukbalahap, the. See Philippine islands

Hungary
- British charge of communist domination appears unfounded; EP................ 326
- Smallholders' party triumphs in the elections. H. Lehrman; S..............622; see also EP......................... 510
- Social democrats seen as probable victors in the November elections; EP............ 326

Hurley, Patrick J. See United States—And China

Hutcheson, Joseph C., named to Anglo-American committee of inquiry on Palestine. I. F. Stone; S....................... 678

Hutchison, Keith
- Britain's taxes and ours; S.............. 456
- British labor government offers a bill to nationalize the coal mines; S.......... 737
- CED's plan for full employment, the; S... 431
- Friction in the North Atlantic; S........ 688
- General motors: sovereign state; S........ 620
- Is America a "have-not" nation? S....551; see also 576
- Mr. Baruch muddies the waters: his statement on loans to foreign countries; S... 523
- Scarce minerals and tariffs; S............ 576
- Who's killing what goose? Price-wage deadlock the; S......496; see also E...... 483
- Wool-gathering in Washington; S........ 659

I

IATSE. See International alliance of theatrical stage employees

I.L.A. See International longshoremen's association

Ickes, Harold L.
- Offers program for guarding American mineral resources. K. Hutchison; S....551, 576
- Should remain as secretary of the interior; EP 100
- Warns Philippine government to purge collaborationists before the elections; EP.. 270

In the American zone. J. M. M.; P........ 37

In the wind 14, 35, 62, 83, 109, 132, 157, 178, 205, 226, 257, 287, 306, 333, 366, 425, 495, 522, 626, 729

Incendiary blonde. J. Agee; MP........... 141

India
- British government announces prompt measures for assuring self-government; EP ....299; see also Ct......... 404
- Jinnah and the Moslem league. U. Shankar; S ....79; see also EP.......... 51
- Progress of the Anglo-Indian conference at Simla; EP........................ 2
- Wavell, Lord, assumes responsibility for the breakdown of the Simla conference; EP ....51; see also........... 79

Indo-China
- Revolt flares against French rule. A. Roth; S.....422; see also EP.....390; C..... 671

PAGE
Indonesia
  American state department calls for Dutch-Indonesian negotiations in the spirit of the UNO charter; EP.... 723
  Export-import bank holds up a Dutch request for credit for the reconstruction of the East Indies; EP.... 723
  Nationalists lead movement for independence; EP....390; see also 493; EP.... 538
  Policy of the British Labor government toward the Java nationalists; EP.... 509
  Soekarno, Dr. A., leader of the nationalist movement, A. Roth; S.... 493
Industry. See Business
Inflation. See Business—Prices
International alliance of theatrical stage employees
  Seeks to break strike of motion-picture-studio employees in Hollywood. G. Ward; S....395; see also EP.... 446
International longshoremen's association
  Joe Ryan and his kingdom. M. Rosenblatt; S.... 548
  New York dock workers strike to break J. P. Ryan's rule of the waterfront; E...421; see also EP...446; 516; C... 535
Iran
  Azerbaijan revolt, the. S. W. Morrell: S....733; see also.... 725
Iraq
  Oil and national policy. E. Ben-Horin; S....399; see also.... 449
Isle of the dead. J. Agee; MP.... 321
Italy
  Commemorative meeting for G. Matteotti called off following allied intervention; EP.... 22
  Death of A. F. Formiggini belatedly reported by the New York Times; EP.... 51
  Gasperi, A. de, forms his cabinet; EP..610; see also 656; EP.... 723
  Giannini, G., and the Uomo Qualunque front; EP.... 723
  Justice under AMG supervision. D. Downes; S....37; see also C.... 746
  Letter from an Italian anti-fascist; C.... 190
  Parri, Ferruccio. G. Salvemini; S.... 59
  Parri refuses to hold elections until a peace treaty has been signed; EP.... 242
  Peace treaty and future of the colonies on the agenda of the Foreign ministers' meeting in London; EP....242; see also.... 285
  Superficial reporting by American correspondents. D. Downes; S.... 37

J

J. M. M.
  In the American zone; P.... 37
Jackson, Robert H. See United nations war crimes commission
Jackson Hole; proposal for a national monument. I. Brant; S.... 13
Jacoby, E. H.
  Coming election in the Philippines; S..84; see also.... 73
James, Henry. See Literature
Japan
  Activities of secret political police must be ended. A. Roth; S....250; see also E.... 244
  Allied ultimatum implies the continuance in power of the emperor; EP....145; see also E.... 103
  American State department versus General MacArthur. I. F. Stone; S.... 297
  Directive on education, the; EP.... 482
  Effect of defeat on the Japanese people, the; E...148; see also E...195; EP... 213
  Emperor's rescript, the. F. Kirchwey; S... 170
  Encouraged by American broadcast of E. M. Zacharias offering terms of surrender; EP.... 69
  Hare system of proportional representation proposed. W. M. Southam; C.... 416
  Hirohito meets the press; EP.... 325
  How the American army administration works; E.... 677
  Konoye, Prince Fuminaro, named to revise the constitution; EP.... 446
  Konoye, Prince Fuminaro, and other civilian oligarchs named as war criminals; E.... 677
  MacArthur must not leave the existing governmental and economic machinery intact; E....215; see also EP....213; E....244; E....273; C.... 351
  Multi-power control; EP.... 482
  No surrender at all! T. Matsumoto; S.... 311
  Political parties mobilize for the national elections. A. Roth; S....731; see also EP.... 722
  Problems of occupation; E.... 168
  Release the political prisoners. A. Roth; S ...250; see also E...244; 305; EP... 354
  Shidehara, Baron K., replaces Prince Higashi-Kuni as premier; EP.... 354
  State department's occupation policy. T. A. Bisson; S....28; see also E....23; 25; C.... 416
  Surrender reply imminent; EP.... 145
  Veblen's views of its future. T. J. Barnum; C.... 266
  Vincent, J. C., replaces E. H. Dooman as State department official in charge of Japanese occupation policy; Atcheson, G., named acting adviser to General MacArthur; E.... 245
  Zaibatsu as war-makers, the. L. E. Salisbury; S....30; see also E....23; 28; C....416; EP.... 418
Japanese Americans
  Position of the Hollywood post of the American legion. C. McWilliams; S.... 251
  Soldier's membership application refused by a post of the Veterans of foreign wars. R. H. Naito; C.... 294
  War relocation authority to liquidate its centers by the end of the year. L. Bloom; S.... 521
Jarrell, Randell
  Burning the letters; P.... 372
  Dead wingman, the; P.... 232
  Pilots, man your planes; P.... 581
Jealousy, J. Agee; MP.... 141
Jeffries, Edward J., Jr. See Detroit Jews
  Arab-Jewish relations in Palestine. I. F. Stone; S....543; see also.... 540
  Harrison report on Europe's displaced persons, the. I. F. Stone; S....330; see also C.... 443
  Survey of Europe reveals shocking conditions among survivors; EP.... 194
  What's left of them in Europe. M. Levin; S....74; see also E.... 24
  See also Palestine
Jinnah, Mohammed Ali. See India
Joesten, Joachim
  AMG—the Soviet way; S.... 77
Johnson, Edwin Carl
  Calls for secrecy in use of atomic energy. P. Wylie; S.... 619
Johnson-May bill. See Science
Jones, Ervin; Negro killed by Portland, Oregon, police. C. McWilliams; S.... 462
Jordan, Philip
  AMG fumbles the ball; S.... 36
  Greece in purgatory; S....624; see also C.... 747
  Life in a vacuum; S.... 204
  Victory for the Bulgarian Fatherland front; S.... 686
Journalism. See names of newspapers
Jugoslavia. See Yugoslavia

K

Kaufman, George. See Literature
Kelly, Edward J. See Chicago
Kent, William. See American legion
Kesten, Hermann
  Visit to Gerhart Hauptmann, a; S.... 627
Kilgore committee
  Hearings on secret German plans for a nazi underground and industrial revival. I. F. Stone; S.... 6
King, Alfred A.
  Armistice should be sought with Japan and the Pacific question referred to the World court; C.... 95
King, Admiral Ernest Joseph. See United States—Navy
King, W. L. MacKenzie. See Canada
Kirchwey, Freda
  Balkan maneuvers; S.... 197
  British policy breaks down in Palestine; S....540; see also.... 543
  Giral takes over; S....218; see also 227; C....266; E....329; 552
  Japanese emperor's rescript; the; S.... 170
  MacArthur returns to the Philippines; S....73; see also....84; 85
  More about the atom; S.... 170
  Old game, new rules in Iran; S.... 725
  One world or none; S.... 149
  Poulos and Palestine; S.... 449
  Power politics in the Middle East; S.... 52
  Russia and the atomic bomb; S.... 511
  United nations charter—mirror of our world; S....5; see also.... 7
  When H. G. Wells split the atom; S.... 154
Kirstein, Lincoln
  Monuments of old Germany; S.... 206
  Seeks letters and other material of W. Rimmer; C.... 480
Kiss and tell. J. Agee; MP.... 441
Klein, A. M.
  Rocking chair, the; P.... 341
Kollwitz, Käthe, exhibition. C. Greenberg; A.. 669
Korea
  Problem of an interim government, the; E.. 148
Krutch, Joseph Wood
  Reviews of plays:
    Are you with it?.... 604
    Deep are the roots.... 384
    Hamlet.... 744
    Red mill, the.... 441
    Rugged path, the.... 562
    Ryan girl, the.... 384
PAGE
    Sound of hunting, a.... 642
    State of the union.... 604
    Therese.... 413
    You touched me.... 349

L

Labor
  Ball-Burton-Hatch bill would end labor disputes through compulsory arbitration; E.. 392
  Employment:
    And anti-Negro discrimination. C. C. Young; C.... 190
    And veterans' seniority. C. G. Bolté; S....104; see also EP....51; 309
    Capitalism versus full employment. I. F. Stone; S....198; see also.... 358
    Comment on "Detroit plans for chaos" by I. Richter. E. J. Corbin; C.... 190
    Committee for economic development offers a plan. K. Hutchison; S.... 431
    Congressional group protests Senate changes in Murray-Wagner bill; EP... 325
    House of representatives substitutes worthless bill for the original full employment measure; EP.... 674
    Mr. Wallace and the wise boys. S. Chase; S.... 313
    Speed the Murray bill; E....169; see also E....119; 246
    Taft and full employment. I. F. Stone; S....274; see also 198; EP.... 325
    Unemployment insurance. See Social security
    Vinson, F. M., endorses the full-employment bill; E....23; see also E.... 169
  Fair-employment legislation. See Fair employment practices committee
  General motors versus the automobile workers; E....448; see also EP....269; 496; E...567; 620; E...648; EP...674; E.. 724
  Hollywood's motion-picture-studio employees on strike. G. Ward; S....395; see also EP.... 446
  Homework legislation must be revised for the disabled veterans. E. M. Maisel; S....9; see also C.... 143
  Labor-management conference, the. A. Friendly; S....514; see also E....448; EP.... 610
  New York longshoremen's strike, the. M. Rosenblatt; S....516; see also E...421; EP....446; C....535; 548
  New York newspaper deliverers' strike; EP.... 51
  St. Louis newspaper strike, the. W. Shelton; S.... 286
  Steel union votes for a strike; EP....610; see also EP.... 674
  Strikes, wages, and taxes; E....328; see also E.... 392
  Truman proposes fact-finding boards in critical labor disputes; EP....610; see also E..648; see also E..724; C.. 747 Wages:
    And strikes: EP....269; see also E.... 392
    Government must provide an adequate wage-price formula for the reconversion period; E....328; see also E....302; 483; 496
    Merchant seamen seek an increase in their basic wage rate; EP.... 146
    Southern tenant farmers' union seeks a guaranteed annual wage for sharecroppers and tenant farmers. E. C. Lindeman; C.... 478
    Truman's statement on relation of company earnings to wages; E.... 724
Labor unions
  And veterans' job rights. C. G. Bolté; S....104; see also EP.... 51
  Circuit court of appeals curbs anti-union activities of Merchant and manufacturers association of Los Angeles; EP.... 272
  Mayor of Reform, Alabama, threatens death to trade unions organizers; EP.... 272
  Motion-picture-studio employees strike for the right to join unions of their own choice. G. Ward; S....395; see also EP.... 446
  Paris conference of the World federation of trade unions; EP....354; see also.... 432
La Follette, Philip F. See Wisconsin
Landauer, Carl
  Comments on "What happened in Bavaria" by S. K. Padover; C....535; see also.... 397
Landes, Ruth
  What about Washington bureaucracy? S... 365
Larsen, H. Irgens
  Return to Norway; S.... 282
Laski, Harold J.
  Calls for public ownership of the Bank of England; EP....118; see also Ct....174; 454
  Diplomats in conference; S.... 334
  Great Britain goes socialist; S....97; see also EP....99; EP.... 101

PAGE
  His criticism of the Vatican for its support of Franco brings protests from Catholic groups. L. Fernsworth; S..........426; see also E...........647; E........... 671
  His views on free enterprise attacked by H. Brownell, Republican party chairman; E 647
  Plan or perish; S........................ 650
Last chance, the. J. Agee; MP............ 562
Latin America
  State department calls off the Rio conference; EP 354
  Uruguay's proposal for united intervention against American nations which threaten hemispheric peace. M. Seoane; S........ 654
  See also names of countries
Leahy, Admiral William D.
  His letter used by defense attorneys for H. P. Pétain; EP..................... 117
Lebanon
  Behind the British-French rivalry. F. Kirchwey; S 52
Lehman, Herbert H. See United nations relief and rehabilitation administration
Lehmann, Lilli. B. H. Haggin; M.......... 264
Lehrman, Hal
  Hungary samples freedom; S............ 622
  Progress in Yugoslavia; S................ 156
  Yugoslav democracy, limited; S........... 228
Lend lease act. See United States
Leopold III, King. See Belgium
Levin, Meyer
  What's left of the Jews of Europe; S...... 74
Lewis, John L.
  Fights the CIO's wage plan at the labor-management conference. A. Friendly; S.. 514
Liberties, civil. See Civil rights
Lindeman, Eduard C.
  Southern tenant farmers' union seeks a guaranteed annual wage for sharecroppers and tenant farmers; C............ 478
Literature
  Books of 1945.......................... 633
  Catholic revival movement. H. Arendt; S.. 288
  Face in the mountain, the. J. Grossman; S.. 230
  Fitzgerald, F. Scott. L. Trilling; S........ 182
  Is "Freedom road" true? C. Rosenberger; S............ 39; see also C........... 116
  James, Henry, and George Kaufman. J. Grossman; S 230
  Mistral, Gabriela, winner of Nobel prize. M. Adams; S....................... 739
  Nobel prize award to G. Mistral. M. Adams; S 739
  Notes by the way. M. Marshall; S....63, 110, 158, 207, 405, 434, 464, 553, 664, 694
  Steinbeck's paisanos. J. A. Babando; C.... 144
  Will there be a renaissance of the arts in Britain? C. Connolly; S................ 367
Little places. M. Van Doren; P............ 133
Longo, John
  New Jersey court of common pleas orders the reopening of his case; EP........... 611
Lost weekend, the. J. Agee; MP............ 697
Love letters. J. Agee; MP.................. 321
Lovett, Robert Morss; receives back pay owing since dismissal from government service on charges brought by the Dies committee; EP 539
Low, cartoons
  "Baby play with nice ball?"............ 202
  Day after 78
  Difficult courtship 570
  Dreamland 3
  Look things in the face.................. 623
  Nuremberg 653
  Oi! Take it easy!........................ 249
  On the higher level...................... 31
  Ssh! It's secret!........................ 459
  Star turn in the city..................... 174
  "Tell your future, dearie?".............. 681
  Unrest in India 404
  "We are doing our best"................. 278
  "You're not the only one who can raise a family" 308
Luce, Henry R.
  Plans to start a "little magazine". M. Marshall; S 63

M

MacArthur, General Douglas. See Japan; Philippine islands
Magazines. See names of magazines
Maisel, Edward M.
  Crippling the disabled veteran; S......9; see also C........................... 143
Man, Albon P., Jr.
  On the use of Negro troops as strikebreakers; C 478
Mandelenakis, M.
  Comments on "Greece in purgatory" by P. Jordan; C........747; see also........ 624
Maritime commission, United States
  Senate commerce committee rejects the nomination of R. S. McKeough; EP.... 355
Marshall, General George C. See United States—Army; United States and China
Marshall, Margaret
  Notes by the way; S................63, 110, 158, 207, 405, 434, 464, 553; 664; 694

PAGE
Matsumoto, Tsuyoshi
  No surrender at all in Japan! S......... 311
Mauriac, François. See France
May-Johnson bill. See Science
McCain, Vice-admiral John Sidney; death; EP 243
McCarran, Patrick A. See Aviation
McCarthy, Frank. See United States—State department
McKeough, Raymond S.
  His nomination to the Maritime commission rejected by the Senate commerce committee; EP 355
McMahon, Brien, named head of Senate committee to investigate atomic-power control; EP 445
McNutt, Paul V. See Philippine islands
McWilliams, Carey
  California looks to 1946; S.............. 199
  Chicago's Roosevelt college; S............ 684
  Education of Evans Carlson, the; S...... 577
  Hollywood post of the American legion takes its stand on Japanese Americans; S..... 251
  It happened in Portland; S............... 462
  La Follette progressives and the third-party movement; S......................... 657
  Legion looks at labor, the; S............. 309
Medal for Benny, a. J. Agee; MP.......... 141 Medicine
  Annual convention of the AMA condemns the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bills; supports voluntary hospitalization insurance; EP 71
  Danger! Venereal disease. A. Deutsch; S.. 284
  Fight over the proposed California state compulsory health insurance bill, the; EP 71
  Truman urges a health program along the general principles of the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill; EP..................... 567
Medina Angarita, Isaias. See Venezuela
Mendelssohn, Peter de
  Nuremberg trials, the; S........569, 652; see also EP........565; 573; Ct........ 653
Merchant and manufacturers association
  Decision of circuit court of appeals curbs anti-union activities of Los Angeles organization; EP 272
Mexico
  Committee against racism protests Texas discrimination against persons of Mexican descent; EP 272
  Guadalupe celebration and the clerical offensive. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S........ 660
  Padilla, E., and M. Alemán are chosen as presidential candidates. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S 621
  Padillo, E., under fire for having sponsored the admission of Argentina to the United nations organization; EP.............. 22
  Will Cárdenas return to politics? J. Alvarez del Vayo; S......................... 621
Micaud, Charles A.
  Pattern of collaboration in France, the; S ....127; see also EP.......... 117
Middle east. See names of countries
Mildred Pierce. J. Agee; MP............385; see also 405
Militaris
  Conscription or enlistment? Our post-war army; S........32; see also C........ 239
Military training. See United States—Army
Millis, Walter
  Atomic energy; share and share alike; S.. 707
Mining. See Coal
Mistral, Gabriela, receives Nobel prize for literature. M. Adams; S.............. 739
Money. See Finance, public
Monopolies
  Cartel arrangements of the German and American Bosch companies, the; EP.... 119
  Kilgore committee hearings on secret plans for industrial revival. I. F. Stone; S ....6; see also EP........... 390
Morinigo, Higinio. See Paraguay
Morrell, Sidney W.
  Iranian checkerboard; S................. 733
Mowrer, Edgar Ansel
  Atom control: unite — or else; S........ 712
Murder, he says. J. Agee; MP............ 67
Murray-Wagner full-employment bill. See Labor—Employment
Murray-Wagner-Dingell bill. . See Social security
Music (articles by B. H. Haggin)
  Eames, Emma 264
  Gershwin, George 115
  Hempel, Frieda 264
  Jazz 46, 141
  Lehmann, Lilli 264
  Readers' comments on "Mozart" by A. Einstein 237
  Schnabel, Artur
  Teyte, Maggie 534
  Toscanini and the New York philharmonic orchestra 189, 641
Muste, A. J.
  Comments on "The Tragedy of German labor"; C........351; see also........ 276
My name is Julia Ross. J. Agee; MP....... 562

PAGE

N

Naito, Richard H.
  Membership application of Japanese American soldier refused by a post of the Veterans of foreign wars; C............. 294
Nation, The
  Alvarez del Vayo, J., to write a weekly signed page; EP...................... 392
  Announces the end of its political war section. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S........... 403
  Seeks newspapers, leaflets, etc., from the far east; C.......................... 536
  Twenty-five years ago 76
Nation associates, the Speeches delivered at the forum on atomic energy 650; 701-720
  To hold forum on atomic power; E....484; see also EP.........511; EP......... 609
National lawyers' guild
  Urges the appointment of W. H. Hastie to the circuit court of appeals in the District of Columbia; EP..................... 147
National service act. See United States—Army
Near east. See names of countries
Negrín, Juan
  Congratulates the British Labor party on its victory in the national election; EP .... 101; See also Spain
Negroes
  Akins, L. C., and white justice in Dallas. G. C. Edwards; S................253; see also EP....243; EP....301; EP.... 327
  Chicago is the first city to adopt a municipal fair-employment ordinance; EP......... 215
  Chicago's Roosevelt college fights Jim Crow. C. McWilliams; S..................... 684
  Colored troops used by army as strikebreakers in New York dock tie-up. A. P. Man, Jr.; C......................... 478
  D.A.R. refuse to rent Washington auditorium to H. Scott; EP................ 419
  Driver was a nice guy, the. E. Brooke; S ....337; see also C........... 478
  Forman, Judge P., rebukes the DAR for restricting the use of Washington hall; EP 539
  High-point veterans barred from carrier Croatan at Le Havre because of lack of facilities for segregation; EP.......... 646
  Jim-crowed heroes. C. C. Young; C...... 190
  Jones E., killed by Portland, Oregon, police. C. McWilliams; S...................... 462
  Portland, Oregon, issues a report on "The Negro in Portland"; EP............... 167
  Serviceman answers Senator J. O. Eastland on the Negro soldier; C.............. 164
  Story of the crew of the PC 1264, the. E. Purdon; S......................... 177
New Jersey
  Longo case to be reopened; EP.......... 611
New York city
  O'Dwyer, W., elected mayor; EP........ 510
  Sixth avenue becomes the Avenue of the Americas; EP 355
New York philharmonic orchestra. B. H. Haggin; M 189
New York state
  And the St. Lawrence seaway-power project. B. J. Atlas; S....224; see also EP.... 354
New York Times
  Belatedly reports news of death of A. F. Formiggini in Italy; EP............... 51
Newspapers
  Deliverers' strike in New York city, the; EP 51
Niebuhr, Reinhold
  Lecture to liberals, a; S............... 491
Nimitz, Admiral Chester W. See United States—Navy
Nobel prize
  Mistrial, G., receives the literature award. M. Adams; S........................ 739
Norton, W. W., death; EP................ 510
Norway
  Present political and economic picture. H. I. Larsen; S 282
Notes by the way. M. Marshall; S....63, 110, 158, 207, 405, 434, 464, 553, 664, 694
Nuremberg trials. See United nations war crimes commission

O

OPA. See Price administration, office of
OWI. See War information, office of O'Donnell, John
  Sees "foreign-born leaders" attempting to oust General G. S. Patton, Jr., from his administrative post in Germany; EP.354; see also EP..........299; EP.......... 326
O'Dwyer, William. See New York city Oil
  And the Jewish-Arab controversy in Palestine. E. Ben-Horin; S............399; see also EP..................167; 424; 449
  And the revolt in northern Iran, S. W. Morrell; S ....733; see also.......... 725

PAGE

  - Anglo-American petroleum pact, the; EP.. 326
  - Tidelands controversy, the. A. Barth; S... 458
- Orr, Sir John Boyd. See Food and agriculture organization
- Ortner, Harry
  - Comments on "Labor says no"; C....747; see also E.... 648
- Osmeña, Sergio. See Philippine islands
- Our vines have tender grapes. J. Agee; MP.. 321
- Over 21. J. Agee; MP.... 189

P

- Pacific war. See War, Pacific
- Padilla, Ezequiel. See Mexico
- Padover, Saul K.
  - AMG—innnocents abroad; S....331; see also EP....326; C.... 479
  - How the nazis stay in power; S.... 362
  - Plan for Germany, a; S....682; see also E.... 675
  - Tragedy of German labor, the; S....276; see also C....322; C.... 351
  - What happened in Bavaria; S....397; see also C.... 535
- Paine, Gustavus S.
  - Comments on "Conscription or enlistment" by Militaris; C ......239; see also...... 32
- Painting. See Art.
- Palestine
  - Anglo-American committee of inquiry, the. I. F. Stone; S.... 678
  - Arab-Jewish relations today. I. F. Stone; S......543; see also 540; 615; C...... 746
  - As a haven for the remnants of European Jewry. M. Levin; S....74; see also E......24; E......194; 330; C ....443; C.... 507
  - British cabinet reported favoring retention of the White paper; EP....300; see also EP....167; 399; 424; 454
  - British expel C. Poulos, American correspondent. F. Kirchwey; S.... 449
  - Chatham house report, the. I. F. Stone; S.. 726
  - Egyptian nationalists stage anti-Jewish riots in Cairo and Alexandria. M. Clark; S... 485
  - Have the Arabs a case? E. Ben-Horin; S...399; see also EP...167; C...535; 543
  - Roosevelt-Ibn Saud correspondence, the. F. Kirchwey; S.... 449
  - World responsibility, a. R. F. Wagner; S.. 247
- Pan American airways
  - Loses its fight for air monopoly through Senate committee's rejection of the McCarran bill; EP.... 22
  - Reduction of trans-Atlantic air rate opposed by Great Britain. K. Hutchison; S...... 688
- Pan-Arab league, the
  - Opposes further Jewish immigration to Palestine. E. Ben-Horin; S.....399, 424; see also 449; C....535; 540
- Paraguay
  - Morinigo's fascist dictatorship. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.... 738
- Paris underground. J. Agee; MP.... 441
- Parker, Ralph
  - Czechs and Sudetens; S.... 307
- Parri, Ferruccio. See Italy
- Patterson, Robert Porter, named secretary of war; EP 301
- Patton, General George S., Jr.
  - Should be fired from his administrative post in Germany; EP ....299; see also EP....326; EP.... 354
- Patton, Robert D.
  - Comments on "The anatomy of full employment" by L. Barnes; C.... 47
- Pearl harbor
  - Army and navy inquiry boards submit their reports. I. F. Stone; S.... 219
  - Republican party slanders against Roosevelt refuted by testimony at committee hearings; EP 565
  - Truman demands a congressional investigation of the disaster; EP.... 241
- People's front, the (articles by J. Alvarez del Vayo) 432, 457, 497, 524, 552, 575, 621, 660, 689, 738
- Perón, Juan Domingo. See Argentina
- Pertinax
  - Trial of Pétain, the; S....152; see also EP....99; EP....114; EP ....117; EP 166; 179
- Peru
  - Aprista party calls for Inter-American economic congress. M. Seoane; S.... 654
  - Bustamante government, the. M. Seoane; S....654; see also EP.... 2
- Pétain, Henri Philippe. See France
- Philippine islands
  - Coming election, the. E. H. Jacoby; S.... 84
  - End of Hukbalahap, the. Captain X; S.... 85
  - Ickes, H. L., warns the government to purge collaborationists before the elections; EP. 270
  - In the track of trade. A. Smedley; C..478; see also C 748
  - MacArthur's private preserve. F. Kirchwey; S 73

PAGE

  - Soriano, A., and M. Roxas lead the reactionary bloc against the Osmeña government. Captain X; S....255; see also EP....241; C.... 672
  - Truman appoints P. V. McNutt High commissioner; EP 241
- Phillips, William; named to Anglo-American committee of inquiry on Palestine. I. F. Stone; S 678
- Phonograph records. See Haggin, B. H.—Music, recorded
- Pillow to post. J. Agee; MP.... 67
- Pilots, man your planes. R. Jarrell; P.... 581
- Pius, Pope. See Roman catholic church
- Plays. See Krutch, J. W., for reviews
- Poems
  - Burning the letters. R. Jarrell.... 372
  - Dead wingman, the. R. Jarrell.... 232
  - Fern hill. D. Thomas.... 664
  - Great return, the. M. Van Doren.... 39
  - In the American zone. J. M. M.; P.... 37
  - Little places. M. Van Doren.... 133
  - Pilots, man your planes. R. Jarrell.... 581
  - Rocking chair, the. A. M. Klein.... 341
- Poland
  - Future of the Polish army in exile; EP.... 22
  - Great Britain and the United States recognize the new unity government; EP.... 22
  - Proposes to deport Germans from any German lands assigned to it; EP.... 50
  - To receive east German territories under terms of the Potsdam decisions; E.... 120
- Political war
  - France:
    - Exit the marshal. F. Pottecher; S.... 179
  - Germany:
    - AMG fumbles the ball. P. Jordan; S.... 36
    - Trade unions under the AMG.... 180
  - Italy:
    - Superficial reporting by American correspondents. D. Downes; S.... 37
  - Nation's special section to be discontinued. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.... 403
  - People's war goes on, the. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S 403
  - Philippine islands:
    - Coming election, the. E. H. Jacoby; S... 84
    - End of Hukbalahap, the. Captain X; S ....85; see also 73
  - Spain:
    - New Spanish cabinet, the. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S......227; see also 122; 150; EP ....166; EP ....194; 218; C .... 266; E 329
  - Yugoslav democracy, limited. H. Lehrman; S 228
- Potsdam conference. See World war
- Pottecher, Frédéric
  - Constitutional debate in France, the; S.... 280
  - Exit Marshal Pétain; S....179; see also EP....99; EP....119; EP ....117; 152; EP.... 166
- Poulos, Constantine
  - Expelled from Palestine on order of the British authorities. F. Kirchwey; S.... 449
  - Greek tragedy, 1945; S.... 450
  - St. Lawrence seaway, the. B. J. Atlas; S ....224; see also EP.... 354
- Pregel, Boris
  - Atomic energy: power and progress; S.... 710
- Presidential succession, the; EP.... 3
- Press. See names of newspapers under names of cities
- Price control, office of
  - Bowles, C. A., calls for continuation of price controls beyond June, 1946; EP.... 647
  - Congress votes its continuation; Wherry amendment defeated; EP.... 2
  - Under pressure from big business groups which demand removal of controls; EP.. 194
- Prices. See Business
- Pride of the marines. J. Agee; MP.... 321
- Prieto, Indalecio. See Spain
- Profits. See Business
- Public finance. See Finance, public
- Public power. See Power, public
- Purdon, Eric
  - Story of the PC 1264, the; S.... 177

R

- Radio
  - Committee for radio freedom formed in Los Angeles; EP 539
  - Committee on un-American activities requests the scripts of eight liberal commentators; EP 446
  - Future of FM broadcasting, the; E.... 613
- Railroads
  - Shortages of materials and manpower slow redeployment of troops; EP.... 100
- Rankin, John E.
  - Proposes a bill exempting war veterans from the necessity of joining a union in an organized shop; EP....51; see also 104; 309
- Reconversion. See United States—Post-war
- Recorded music. See Haggin, B. H.—Music, recorded

PAGE

- Red mill, the. J. W. Krutch; D.... 441
- Refugees
  - Truman proposes to admit displaced persons to the United States up to quota limits; EP 723
  - What's left of the Jews of Europe. M. Levin; S......74; see also E......24; EP....194; 330; C.... 443
- Republican party
  - Brownell, H., attacks H. J. Laski's views on free enterprise; E.... 647
  - National committee issues a statement of policy; EP 675
- Rhapsody in blue. J. Agee; MP.... 67
- Ridenour, Louis N.
  - Science must be free; S.... 716
- Rimmer, William
  - His letters and other material sought. L. Kirstein; C.... 480
- Roberts, Leslie
  - Canada's veterans go back to school; S.... 401
- Rockefeller, Nelson Aldrich. See United States—State department
- Rocking chair, the. A. M. Klein; P.... 341
- Roman catholic church
  - Catholic groups protest speech by H. J. Laski criticizing the Vatican's support of Franco. L. Fernsworth; S....426; see also E....647; C.... 671
  - Christianity and revolution. H. Arendt; S.. 288
  - Guadalupe celebration and the clerical offensive in Mexico. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.. 660
  - Political role of the Vatican. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S....497; 660
- Roosevelt, Eleanor
  - Named as a representative in the UNO general assembly; EP.... 722
- Roosevelt, Franklin D., Jr.
  - No homes for veterans; S.... 486
- Rosenberger, Coleman
  - Is "Freedom road" true? S....39; see also C.... 116
- Rosenblatt, Maurice
  - Joe Ryan and his kingdom; S.... 548
  - New York longshoremen's strike, the; S.516; see also E....421; EP....446; C.... 535
- Rosenfeld, Oreste
  - France swings socialist; S.... 361
  - New deal for France; S.... 453
- Rosselli, Carlo. See Italy
- Roth, Andrew
  - Britain's colonial squeeze; S....617; see also EP.... 646
  - Japan's police terror; S....250; see also E....244; EP.... 354
  - Political ferment in Japan; S....731; see also EP.... 722
  - Prisoners we forgot, the; S....305; see also EP.... 354
  - Revolt in Asia:
    - 1. Indo-China; S ....422; see also C 671
    - 2. Indonesia; S....493; see also EP.... 538
    - 3. Burma; S 544
- Roxas, Manuel. See Philippine islands
- Rugged path, the. J. W. Krutch; D.... 562
- Runnion, Ray
  - Chicago the beautiful; S.... 61
- Russell, Donald S. See United States—State department
- Russia. See Union of soviet socialist republics
- Ryan, Archbishop James H.
  - Explains the political character of the Vatican. L. Fernsworth; S....426; see also C.... 671
- Ryan, Joseph P. See International longshoremen's association
- Ryan girl, the. J. W. Krutch; D.... 384

S

- St. Lawrence seaway
  - Faces perennial congressional debate. B. J. Atlas; S.......224; see also EP.... 354
- Salaries. See Labor—Wages
- Salisbury, Laurence E.
  - Zaibatsu as war-makers, the; S....30; see also E....23; 28; C.... 416
- Salvemini, Gaetano
  - Parri and Rosselli; S.... 59
- San Pietro. J. Agee; MP.... 67
- Schaeffer, Fritz. See Germany
- Schlegel, Richard
  - Scientists of the world, unite! S....515; see also EP....509; 541
- Schnabel, Artur. B. H. Haggin; M.... 94
- Science
  - Atomic control and the UNO: EP....213; see also 149; E....420; EP..509; 515; 541; 712; 715; 720; EP.. 722
  - Britain and the atomic bomb. A. Vallance; S....488; see also.... 571
  - Challenge of the atomic bomb:
    - Cooperation is the key. V. Weisskopf... 704
    - Facts about defense. I. A. Getting.... 703
    - For the benefit of all. J. Carey.... 711
    - Heritage of all, the. M. J. Coldwell.... 706

BURLINGAME

PAGE

    - New energy, the. S. Chase 709
    - No middle ground. T. K. Finletter..... 712
    - Pattern of destruction, the. H. DeW. Smyth 701
    - Plan or perish. H. J. Laski.......... 650
    - Power and progress. B. Pregel......... 710
    - Science must be free. L. N. Ridenour.... 716
    - Share and share alike. W. Millis....... 707
    - Stronger UNO, a. H. V. Evatt........ 720
    - Task before us, the. H. C. Urey....... 719
    - Unite—or else. E. A. Mowrer.......... 712
    - Veteran's view, the. C. G. Bolté...... 715
    - We turned the switch. L. Szilard........ 718
    - Weapons of peace, the. H. G. Douglas... 705
    - Resolutions of Nation Associates forum.. 717
  - Churchill, W., supports President Truman's proposal to keep the atomic bomb an Anglo-American secret; E.............. 167
  - Control of the development of atomic energy. P. Kirchwey; S..149; see also E..355; EP........445; EP 509; 515; 541
  - Everybody's atom. J. D. Bernal; S....201; see also Ct.......... 202
  - Industrial utilization of atomic energy; E..........568; see also 170; 709
  - King, W. L. M., urges world government as a means of guaranteeing security in the atomic era; EP.......... 722
  - May-Johnson bill for control of the development of atomic energy; E..........389; see also EP........417; Ct........459; 619
  - Nation Associates, the, forum on atomic power......717; see also E......484; see also EP......511; EP......609; 701-720
  - Post-atomic national defense. C. G. Bolté; S 303
  - Russia and the atomic bomb. F. Kirchwey; S......511; see also........705; 706; 707
  - Senate passes the McMahon bill; names McMahon to head a committee to investigate atomic-power control; EP......... 445
  - Truman-Attlee-King statement on the atomic bomb; EP 566
  - When H. G. Wells split the atom. F. Kirchwey; S 154
- Segerman, Herbert H.
  - Suggests that veterans send old army clothes to Spanish refugees in France; C...... 699
- Selective service. See United States—Army
- Seoane, Manuel
  - Conflict in Latin America; S............ 654
- Service man
  - How the Austrians behave; C........351; see also C 443
- Shankar, Uma
  - Failure again in India; S............79; see also EP.......... 51
- Shelton, Willard
  - St. Louis newspaper strike, the; S........ 286
- Sherman anti-trust act. See Monopolies
- Shidehara, Baron Kijuro. See Japan
- Shipping
  - Merchant seamen's wages; EP........... 146
  - Senate commerce committee rejects nomination of R. S. McKeough to the Maritime commission; EP 355
  - United States proposes that Europe's waterways be placed under international control; EP 145
- Shlakman, Sigmund
  - Comments on "America's homesick army" by J. Freeman; C..................643; see also 427, 460
- Silberstein, Murray
  - Urges support for the American veterans' committee; C 443
- Smedley, Agnes
  - American annexation of Pacific islands; C ....478; see also C.......... 748
- Smyth, Henry DeWolf
  - Atomic energy and the pattern of destruction; S 701
- Snyder, John W.
  - Reconversion director lifts price controls on housing; E 302
  - Reports on post-war employment. I. F. Stone; S........358; see also E........ 169
- Social security
  - Annual convention of the AMA condemns the Murray-Wagner-Dingell health insurance bill; EP.......... 71
  - Fight over the proposal for a California state compulsory health insurance bill; EP 71
  - Prospects for an adequate jobless insurance bill appear slight; Congress proposes increased federal grants-in-aid instead; EP....243; see also EP....301; E.... 302
  - Truman urges a health program along the general principles of the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill; EP.......... 567
- Soekarno, Dr. Achmed. See Indonesia
- Soldiers. See United States—Army
- Sophoulis, Themistocles. See Greece
- Soriano, Andrés. See Philippine islands
- Sound of hunting, a. J. W. Krutch; D...... 642
- South America. See Latin America; names of countries

PAGE

- Southam, Wilson M.
  - Hare system for Japan, the; C.......... 416
- Southern tenant farmers' union
  - Asks financial aid for its campaign to win a guaranteed annual wage for sharecroppers and tenant farmers. E. C. Lindeman; C. 478
- Soviet Russia. See Union of soviet socialist republics
- Spain
  - And the Potsdam conference; E.......24; see also EP..........270; E.......... 329
  - And the Vatican. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S............497; see also 426
  - Church issues new instructions on morals; EP 147
  - Ciano diary reveals Franco regime's role in the war; EP 673
  - France may break relations with Franco; EP 166
  - France proposes Anglo-American-French conference on relations with Franco; EP.. 673
  - Giral, J., named prime minister of the government-in-exile. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S......227; see also 218; E......329; 552
  - Life in a Spanish prison. P. Winner; S... 338
  - May be discussed at Moscow meeting of the foreign ministers; EP 645
  - Negrín, J., visits acting secretary of state D. Acheson; EP.......... 673
  - Negrín versus Prieto. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S 552, 575
  - Negrín's fight for Spanish republican unity. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S........122, 150; see also EP........166; EP........194; C ....266; E 329; 552
  - Negrín's plan for a republican government in exile. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S....54; see also EP.......... 70
  - New government in exile asks foreign ministers' conference for recognition; EP.... 271
  - Roosevelt's letter to N. Armour; E...... 329
  - Spanish refugee appeal launches campaign to collect clothes for republican refugees in France; EP..................539; see also EP..........271; C.......... 699
- Spanish refugee appeal
  - Launches campaign to collect clothes for Spanish republican refugees in France; EP..........539; see also C.......... 699
- Spellbound. J. Agee; MP.......... 506
- Stalin, Joseph. See Union of soviet socialist republics
- Stassen, Harold E., urges international control of the atomic bomb. K. Gordon; S...... 541
- State department, United States. See United States
- State fair. J Agee; MP.......... 321
- State of the union. J. W. Krutch; D...... 604
- Steel
  - Union votes for a strike unless wage demands are met; EP................610; see also EP.......... 674
- Stenzler, Sidney
  - Europe's refugees need clothes; C........ 479
- Stevens, B. F., Sr.
  - Comments on E. M. Whitesmith's letter, "American racism"; C..............643; see also C.......... 507
- Stewart, Maxwell S.
  - China's new danger; S..............172; see also 222; E.......... 357
  - Myth of Patrick J. Hurley, the; S....489; see also E.......483; 614; EP....... 646
- Stimson, Henry L., retires as secretary of war; EP 301
- Stone, I. F.
  - Anglo-American committee of inquiry on Palestine; S 678
  - Behind the MacArthur row; S........... 297
  - British election and the tasks of the American left, the; S..................124; see also C 322
  - Can Germany fight again? S........... 6
  - Capitalism and full employment; S....198; see also 358
  - Chatham house report on the Middle East; S 726
  - Grew-Dooman policy toward Japan, the; S..........25; see also E..........23; 28
  - Jewry in a blind alley; S............543; see also 540
  - Palestine pilgrimage; S..............615; see also C.......... 746
  - Pearl harbor: brass hats undaunted; S.219; see also EP..........241; EP.......... 565
  - Plight of the Jews, the;............S330; see also C.......... 443
  - Shake-up in the State department; S...... 171
  - Taft and the full-employment bill; S..274; see also 198; EP.......... 325
  - Truman program, the; S..............246; see also E.......... 302
  - Washington faces problems of industrial reconversion; S 151
- Story of G. I. Joe. J. Agee; MP........... 264
- Streit, Clarence K.
  - Comments on "The tragedy of German labor" by S. K. Padover; C........322; see also 276

PAGE

- Strikes. See Labor; Labor unions
- Surplus properties
  - American army reported burning surpluses abroad; EP 147
  - And post-war trade. R. Chandler; S....... 81
- Syria
  - Behind the British-French rivalry. F. Kirchwey; S 52
- Szilard, Leo
  - We turned the switch; S.......... 718

T

- Taft, Robert A.
  - And the full-employment bill. I. F. Stone; S........274; see also 198; EP........ 325
  - His opposition to the Bretton Woods monetary agreement; E.......... 72
- Tariffs
  - And America's mineral scarcity. K. Hutchison; S 576
  - And the American loan to Britain; E..649; see also..........217; E..........272; EP ....299; E............393; 523
  - And the American wool trade. K. Hutchison; S 659
- Taxation. See Finance, public
- Texas
  - Discrimination against persons of Mexican descent; EP 272
  - White justice in Dallas—the case of L. C. Akins. G. C. Edwards; S..........253; see also EP....243; EP....301; EP.... 327
- Teyte, Maggie. B. H. Haggin; M.......... 534
- That's the spirit. J. Agee; MP............ 141
- Therese. J. W. Krutch; D.......... 413
- Theater. See Krutch, J. W., for reviews
- Thomas, Dylan
  - Fern hill; P.......... 664
- Thomas, Norman, and J. Dewey
  - Unsolved murder of Carlo Tresca; C...... 671
- Thomas, Owen C.
  - Two forms of fascism; C.......... 95
- Those endearing young charms. J. Agee; MP 141
- Toscanini, Arturo, and the New York philharmonic orchestra. B. H. Haggin; M 189, 641
- Trade. See Business
- Trade agreements:
  - Anglo-American relations:
    - American loan, the. A. Vallance; S..217; see also E........272; EP........299; E..........393; 523; E..........649; 679
    - End of lend-lease, the; E..........196; see also E....216; 217; E....272; C.... 443
- Trager, Frank N.
  - Neuropsychiatric injuries in the American army; S 335
- Treat, Ida
  - Brittany goes to the polls; S.......... 429
- Tresca, Carlo
  - His murder still unsolved. J. Dewey and N. Thomas; C.......... 671
- True glory, the. J. Agee; MP.......... 321
- Trujillo, Rafael. See Dominican Republic
- Truman, Harry S.
  - Administration:
    - Broadcast on wages and prices. K. Hutchison; S.....496; see also E..... 483
    - Calls for post-war universal military training; E 447
    - Dismisses W. H. Davis as director of economic stabilization; E.......... 302
    - Has not shown sufficient leadership in pressing for adequate reconversion legislation; E 302
    - Message to Congress. I. F. Stone; S.246; see also E.......... 302
    - Navy day speech; EP..............445; see also 488
    - New cabinet, the; E.......... 23
    - Plans to overhaul the executive branch of the government. R. Landes; S........ 365
    - Proposes fact-finding boards in critical labor disputes; EP..............610; see also E....648; E....724; C.... 747
    - Proposes to alter the order of presidential succession; EP 3
    - Statement on American policy toward China; EP.....673; see also EP..... 722
    - Urged to retain H. L. Ickes as secretary of the interior; EP.......... 100
    - Urges unification of armed services in a department of national defense. T. J. Hamilton; S 730
- Trusts. See Monopolies
- Tsouderos, Emmanuel. See Greece
- Tudor, Anthony, choreographies. C. Greenberg; S 476

U

- UAW. See United automobile workers of America
- UNO. See United nations organization
- UNRRA. See United nations relief and rehabilitation administration
- USSR. See Union of soviet socialist republics

Index

PAGE

- Uncle Harry. J. Agee; MP................ 189
- Unemployment. See Labor—Employment
- Unemployment insurance. See Social security
- Union of soviet socialist republics
  - And Bulgaria:
    - Extent of Soviet influence, the. P. Jordan; S 686
  - And China:
    - Russo-Chinese agreement, the; E....195; see also EP.....................214; 222
    - Soong-Stalin conference, the; EP.....21; see also E.......................... 148
  - And Germany:
    - AMG—the Soviet way. J. Joesten; S.... 77
  - And Hungary:
    - Victory of smallholders' party seen as protest against Russian domination; EP 510
  - And Iran:
    - Azerbaijan revolt, the. S. W. Morrell; S...........733; see also 725
  - And the atomic bomb. F. Kirchwey; S..511; see also 705; 706; 707
  - And the Balkan states. F. Kirchwey; S.... 197
  - And the Jewish-Arab Palestine controversy. E. Ben-Horin; S...................... 424
  - And the United States:
    - Basis for agreement, the; E............ 420
  - Stalin reported to have asked Potsdam conferees to break relations with Spain; EP..........270; see also E.......... 329
- Unions, labor. See Labor unions
- United automobile workers' union
  - General motors strike, the; E........448; see also 496; E..............567; 620; E....... 648; EP.......674; E....... 724
- United nations conference. See World war—San Francisco conference
- United nations organization
  - American representatives to the general assembly, the; EP...................... 722
  - And the atomic bomb. See Science
  - Bevin proposes reorganization of the assembly to give the small nations a greater voice; EP...566; see also EP... 646
  - Dublin, New Hampshire, conference concludes that it has been rendered obsolete by the atomic bomb; calls for the creation of a new organization; E........... 420
  - United States senate ratifies the charter; E..........102; see also EP.......... 50
  - Welles, Sumner, proposed as secretary-general. A. B. Glazer; C................. 323
  - Wheeler, B. K., leads the new isolationist opposition; E 612
- United nations relief and rehabilitation administration
  - American plenty and European starvation; EP 242
  - Can it stop famine? J. Corson; S......57; see also E.........................53; 128
  - Deepening economic crisis in Europe, the; E 24
  - Europe's refugees need clothes. S. Stenzler; C 479
  - Greek big-business group diverts supplies to black market. C. Poulos; S......... 450
  - House tacks "free press" amendments to appropriation bill; EP.................. 446
  - Lack of coal in Europe paralyzes industry and transportation. A. Barth; S........ 128
  - Lehman, H. H., predicts a catastrophe in Europe unless larger food shipments are made; E........53; see also........ 57
  - Lehman's forecast of 1946 requirements; EP 721
  - Truman asks Congress for an additional appropriation to extend relief operations; EP 537
- United nations war crimes commission
  - Evidence of the Ciano diary; EP......... 673
  - Japan's war criminals; E................ 168
  - Nuremberg trials, the. P. de Mendelssohn; S........569; see also EP........418; EP 565; 573; 652
  - Role of R. H. Jackson, American prosecutor at the Nuremberg trials; EP....565; see also 573; 652
- United States
  - And Argentina:
    - Argentina will not benefit from lifting of American export controls; EP........ 271
    - State department decides not to conclude hemispheric defense treaty with Argentina as a signatory; EP.............. 354
  - And Bolivia:
    - United States recognition of the Villarroel regime termed a mistake. J. A. Arze; S 519
  - And China:
    - American troops to garrison several important cities; EP.................... 270
    - Role of P. J. Hurley, the. M. S. Stewart; S ....489; see also 172; EP....300; EP ....418; E...........483; E.P..........538; 614; EP.......... 646
    - Truman names General G. C. Marshall to replace P. J. Hurley in China. M. S. Stewart; S.....614; see also EP..... 722

PAGE

    - Truman's statement on American policy; EP........673; see also EP........ 722
    - Wedemeyer, General A. C., offers to fly Kuomintang troops to Peiping in American planes; EP..270; see also E.. 357
    - Withdraw American troops! E......483; see also EP........................ 538
  - And France. See Franco-American relations
  - And Great Britain:
    - American loan, the. A. Vallance; S..217; see also E.......272; EP.......299; E.........393; 523; E.........649; 679
    - Anglo-American petroleum pact, the; EP. 326
    - End of lend-lease, the; E..........196; see also E.................216; 217; Ct...........249; C............443; 679
  - And Iran:
    - Azerbaijan revolt, the. S. W. Morrell: S...........733; see also........... 725
  - And Palestine:
    - Roosevelt-Ibn Saud correspondence, the. F. Kirchwey; S..................... 449
  - And Spain:
    - Acting secretary of state D. Acheson receives J. Negrín; EP................ 673
    - Roosevelt's letter to N. Armour; E...... 329
  - And the Soviet Union:
    - Basis for agreement, the; E............ 420
  - Army:
    - America's homesick soldiers. J. Freeman; S 427; 460
    - Arnold, General H. H., reports on the operations of the air forces; EP...509; see also 546
    - Conscientious objectors: second-class citizens. V. H. Whitney; S............. 735
    - Demobilization; EP................118; see also EP........167; EP........ 194
    - Doss, D. C., conscientious objector, receives the Congressional medal of honor; EP 391
    - Eisenhower, General D. D., replaces General G. C. Marshall as chief of staff; EP 566
    - In Europe. British intelligence officer; C 507
    - Liberty ships converted into troop carriers; C 643
    - Neuropsychiatric injuries. F. N. Trager; S 335
    - Post-atomic national defense. C. G. Bolté; S 303
    - Report of General G. C. Marshall on the winning of the war; E............... 394
    - Report of the board of inquiry on Pearl harbor. I. F. Stone; S..........219; see also EP........241; EP........ 565
    - Service merger, the; E...539; see also.. 730
    - Stimson, H. L., retires as secretary of war; replaced by R. P. Patterson; EP. 301
    - Universal military training. Militaris; S........32; see also C........239; E.......394; E.......447; EP...... 566
  - Balkan maneuvers. F. Kirchwey; S....... 197
  - Congress. See Congress
  - Lend-lease:
    - Ended by President Truman; E....196; see also E.....216; 217; Ct.....249; E ....272; C 443
  - Navy:
    - Criticism of its point-discharge system; EP.........194; see also C......... 507
    - Forrestal, J. V., opposes the service merger. T. J. Hamilton; S..........730; see also E.......................... 539
    - Nimitz, Admiral C. W., replaces Admiral E. J. King as chief of naval operations; EP 566
    - Plans a larger peace-time fleet; EP..... 270
    - Report of the court of inquiry on Pearl harbor. I. F. Stone; S...........219; see also EP........241; EP........ 565
  - Post-war:
    - British election and the tasks of the American left, the. I. F. Stone; S..........124; see also C.......... 322
    - Ickes, H. L., proposes program for guarding and extending mineral resources. K. Hutchison; S.................551, 576
    - Labor-management conference, the. A. Friendly; S......................514; see also E.........448; EP......... 610
    - Problems of industrial reconversion. I. F. Stone; S 151
  - State department:
    - Acheson, D. G., replaces J. C. Grew as under-secretary of state. I. F. Stone; S 171
    - Atcheson, G., appointed acting adviser to General MacArthur in Japan; E...... 245
    - Benton, W., succeeds A. MacLeish as assistant secretary of state; E....... 245
    - Braden, S., replaces N. A. Rockefeller as assistant secretary of state for Latin America; EP 193
    - Brown, W., named confidential adviser to Byrnes on public relations; E........ 245
    - Byrnes, J. F., becomes secretary of state; E 23

PAGE

    - Calls for Dutch-Indonesian negotiations in the spirit of the UNO charter; EP... 723
    - Cohen, B. V., named counselor; E...... 245
    - Dooman, E. H., resigns; is replaced by J. C. Vincent who will advise on Japanese occupation policy; E..........244; see also E.........677; EP......... 723
    - Grew-Dooman policy toward Japan, the. I. F. Stone; S..................25; see also E........23; 28; E........ 168
    - McCarthy, F., succeeds J. Holmes as an assistant secretary of state; E........ 245
    - Needs a thoroughgoing reorganization; E ....4; see correction......... 53
    - Russell, D. S., becomes an assistant secretary of state; E.................... 245
    - Takes over international information functions of the OWI; EP.......... 214
    - Three of The Six charged with disclosing confidential department information are cleared; EP............... 146
    - Versus General D. MacArthur on Japanese policy. I. F. Stone; S............ 297
    - Why Dunn, Grew, and Dooman must go; E..........4; see correction......... 53
  - Treasury department:
    - Vinson, F. M., becomes secretary of the treasury; E..................... 23
- United States steel corporation
  - Rejects workers' demands for a wage increase; EP......674; see also EP...... 610
- Uomo qualunque front. See Italy
- Ureta, General Eloy G. See Peru
- Urey, Harold C.
  - Atomic energy: the task before us; S.... 719

V

- Valiani, Leo
  - Italian crisis, the; S.................... 656
- Vallance, Aylmer
  - Anglo-American economics; S............ 217
  - Britain and the atomic bomb; S.......... 488
  - Britain's new Labor parliament; S........ 125
  - British labor goes to work; S........174; see also EP.......................... 167
  - British people expect action of the Labor government; S 359, 454
  - Foreign ministers' conference, the; S.... 285
  - "Negative" socialism in Britain; S....... 571
- Vambery, Rustem
  - Law and legalism; S...573; see also EP... 565
- Van Doren, Mark
  - Great return, the; P.................... 39
  - Little places; P........................ 133
- Vargas, Getulio. See Brazil
- Venezuela
  - Medina Angarita, President I., ousted in coup; R. Betancourt forms a new government; EP......419; see also...... 457
- Veterans, war
  - American legion looks at labor, the. C. McWilliams; S 309
  - And the housing problem. F. D. Roosevelt, Jr.; S 486
  - Bradley, General O., finds some of the doctors in the Veterans' administration "pretty poor"; promises a housecleaning; EP 326
  - Canada's program of education. L. Roberts; S 401
  - Homework for the seriously disabled. E. M. Maisel; S........9; see also C........ 143
  - How to help the "shell-shocked" adjust. F. N. Trager; S...................... 335
  - Labor, and jobs. C. G. Bolté; S......104; see also EP.......................... 51
  - Native fascists rush plans for new veterans' organizations; EP 271
  - Need for coordination of federal, state, and local rehabilitation programs. C. G. Bolté; S 728
  - Report on readjustment problems by B. M. Baruch; E 243
  - Transportation home slowed by shortage of rail equipment; EP................... 100
  - War manpower commission shows job bias in favor of army officers. Corporal: C.. 164
- Veterans of foreign wars
  - Spokane post refuses membership application of a Japanese-American soldier. R. H. Naito; C....................... 294
- Villarroel, Gualberto. See Bolivia
- Vincent, John Carter. See United States—State department
- Vinson, Fred M.
  - Becomes secretary of the treasury; E.... 23
  - Endorses the full-employment bill; E...23; see also E.......................... 169
- Voulgaris. Petros. See Greece

W

- W.F.T.U. See World federation of trade unions
- WPB. See War production board
- WRA. See War relocation authority
- Wages. See Labor

PAGE
Wagner, Robert F.
  Palestine—a world responsibility; S...... 247
Wagner-Murray-Dingell full employment bill. See Labor—Employment
Wagner-Murray-Dingell health bill. See Social security
Wallace, Henry Agard
  His views on full employment. S. Chase; S 313
War, Pacific
  Armistice should be sought with Japan and the Pacific question referred to the World court. A. A. King; C.................. 95
  Australian troops heavily engaged by Japanese in New Guinea; EP.............. 50
  Broadcast to Japan by E. M. Zacharias offers lenient terms of surrender; EP.... 69
  Future of Hongkong; EP............... 165
  Guadalcanal pays off. W. J. Caldwell; S.. 11
  In retrospect. C. G. Bolté; S............ 175
  Integrated tactical power evident in Pacific campaign; EP 1
  Japan receives an ultimatum from the allies; E.......103; see also EP....... 145
  New developments in the Burma campaign; EP 50
  Organized resistance at an end on Okinawa and Luzon; EP 1
  Record of the United States third fleet; EP ....118; see also EP......... 49
  Three American armies now in the Pacific; other combat divisions being redeployed from Europe; EP..................... 1
War crimes. See United nations war crimes commission
War department, United States. See United States—Army War information, office of Ends operations; its international information functions transferred to the State department; EP 214
War production board
  Favors removal of restrictions on industrial and competitive post-war production. I. F. Stone; S 151
War relocation authority
  To liquidate its centers by the end of the year. L. Bloom; S 521
Ward, Gates
  Hollywood motion-picture-studio employees on strike; S.....395; see also EP..... 446
Warner brothers
  And the strike of the motion-picture-studio employees. G. Ward; S.............395; see also EP 446
Washington letters (articles by I. F. Stone) 6, 25, 124, 151, 171, 198, 219, 246, 274, 297, 330, 358, 543, 615, 678, 726

PAGE
Watson, Goodwin B.; receives back pay owing since dismissal from government service on charges brought by the Dies committee; EP 539
Waterways
  American proposal to place Europe's waterways under international control; EP 145
Wavell, General Viscount. See Great Britain—Anglo-Indian relations
Way ahead, the. J. Agee; MP.............. 67
We accuse. J. Agee; MP.................. 67
Wedemeyer, General Albert C. See China
Weisskopf, Victor
  Atomic energy; cooperation is the key; S...704
Welles, Sumner
  Proposed as secretary-general of the United nations organization. A. B. Glazer; C.. 323
Wells, H. G.
  Anticipated the atomic bomb in his book "The world set free." F. Kirchwey; S.. 154
Wheeler, Burton K.
  Opposes the Connally resolution for the appointment of American representatives to the UNO; E...................... 612
Where do we go from here? J. Agee; MP... 141
White, Leigh
  Comments on "Censors or reporters?" by D. Downes; C......746; see also...... 37
Whitesmith, Ernest M.
  American racism; C................507; see also C..........643; C.......... 699
Whitney, Vincent Heath
  Conscientious objectors: second-class citizens; S 735
Williams, George
  Comments on E. M. Whitesmith's letter, "American racism"; C............643; see also C...........507; C........... 746
Willson, Corwin
  Science and full employment; C.......... 415
Wilner, Isabel
  "And suddenly the room"; P............. 627
  No interval; P.......................... 627
  Small dirge; P.......................... 627
Wilson, Walter
  AMG administration of Germany; C...... 479
Winner, Percy
  Spanish prison; S....................... 338
Winter, Ernst Karl
  Comments on criticisms of his article "Austria: test for the coalition"; C...... 47
Wireless. See Radio
Wisconsin
  La Follette progressives and the national third-party movement. C. McWilliams; S. 657
Wohl, Samuel
  Comments on "Have the Arabs a case?" by E. Ben-Horin; C....535; see also.... 399
Wonder man. J. Agee; MP................ 141

PAGE
World federation of trade unions
  Paris conference, the; EP...........354; see also 432
World war
  Foreign ministers' conference (London):
    Defines the conflicts between Soviet and Anglo-American policies; E......302; see also E......................... 327
    New Spanish government in exile requests recognition; EP 271
    Questions before it. A. Vallance; S..285; see also 334
    Russian fears of Anglo-American plans to restore German economy may have blocked agreement; EP.............. 390
    Why it failed; EP.................... 353
    "You're not the only one who can raise a family". Low; Ct.................. 308
  Foreign ministers' conference (Moscow):
    Probable agenda; EP.................. 645
  Potsdam conference:
    Allies send ultimatum to Japan; E...... 103
    Decisions of the conference; E.......... 120
    see also EP........................... 50
    Items for the agenda; E............24; see also EP......................... 50
    Problem of reparations; EP........... 99
    Stalin reported to have urged a break with Spain; E....329; see also EP.... 270
  San Francisco conference:
    New world league evaluated, the. P. E. Corbett; S......7; see also 5; C..... 116
  United nations organization. See United nations organization
  War crimes. See United nations war crimes commission
Wylie, Philip
  Senator Johnson and God almighty; S.... 619

Y

Y.M.C.A. See Young men's Christian association
You touched me. J. W. Krutch; D.......... 349
Young, Consuelo C.
  Jim-crowed heroes; C.................... 190
Young men's Christian association
  And Chicago's Roosevelt college. C. McWilliams; S 684
Yugoslavia
  Democracy is limited. H. Lehrman; S.... 228
  Emergency parliament drafts new social and political legislation. H. Lehrman; S.. 156

Z

Zacharias, E. M. See War, Pacific
Zaibatsu, the. See Japan
Zelmans, S.
  Comments on "Palestine pilgrimage" by I. F. Stone; C......746; see also...... 615

Index

BOOK REVIEWS

Books are indexed under author and title, and in some cases under subject.

The following explanatory letters are used in the index:

B Book review
AN Brief annotation
R Reviewer

A

PAGE

- Abstract and surrealist art in America. S. Janis; B 378
- Adamic, Louis
  - Nation of nations, a; B 666
- Adams, James Truslow
  - Big business in a democracy; B 378
- Adams, Mildred; R 184, 598
- Adams, Ramon F.
  - Western words: A dictionary of the range, cow camp, and trail; B 161
- Against these three. S. Cloete; B 263
- Age of Jackson, the. A. M. Schlesinger, Jr.; B 406
- All summer long. W. Hobson; B 292
- Almighty atom. J. J. O'Neill; B 465
- Alsberg, Henry G.
  - Let's talk about the peace; B 500
- America: partner in world rule. W. H. Chamberlin; B 260
- America is west: an anthology of midwestern life and literature. Edited by J. T. Flanagan; B 468
- America's place in the world. N. Peffer; B 260
- America's stake in Britain's future. G. Soule; B 628
- American language, the: Supplement I: an inquiry into the development of English in the United States. H. L. Mencken; B 374
- Anatomy of peace, the. E. Reves; B 209
- Anderson, Patrick
  - Tent for April, a; B 210
- Annihilation of man, the. L. Paul; B 17
- Appel, Kenneth E., and E. A. Strecker
  - Psychiatry in modern warfare; B 600
- Appleby, Paul H.
  - Big democracy; B 113
- Asia for the Asiatics? R. S. Ward; B 291
- Asian legacy and American life, the. Edited by A. E. Christy; B 64
- Atomic energy for military purposes. H. DeW. Smyth; B 465
- Atomic energy in the coming era. D. Dietz; B 465
- Authoritarian attempt to capture education, the. Second annual conference on the scientific spirit and democratic faith; B 341

B

- Bailey, Thomas A.
  - Woodrow Wilson and the great betrayal; B 135
- Ballou, Robert O.
  - Shinto, the unconquered enemy; B 505
- Bank of England, the—a history. Sir J. Clapham. Two volumes; B 159
- Barnes, Leo; R 134
- Barnouw, A. J.; R 208
- Barzun, Jacques; R 504
- Bates, Ralph; R 17, 44, 64, 112, 186, 209, 262, 342, 632, 666, 740
- Battle, Kemp Plummer
  - Memories of an old-time tar heel. Edited by W. J. Battle; B 559
- Battle below. R. J. Casey; B 410
- Baxter, William T.
  - House of Hancock, the: Business in Boston, 1724-1775; B 44
- Becker, Carl L.
  - Freedom and responsibility in the American way of life; B 526
- Beethoven, D. F. Tovey; B 606
- Behold our green mansions. R. Boerker; B 160
- Bell, H. C. F.
  - Woodrow Wilson and the people; B 16
- Bennett, Joan
  - Virginia Woolf: her art as a novelist; B 378
- Bentley, Eric Russell; R 17, 87; see also correction 140; C 295
- Bernadotte, Count Folke
  - Curtain falls, the; B 530
- Best is yet, the. M. Ernst; B 64
- Beveridge, Sir William
  - Price of peace, the; B 500
- Big business in a democracy. J. T. Adams; B 378
- Big democracy. P. H. Appleby; B 113
- Big three, the. D. J. Dallin; B 184
- Binger, Carl
  - Doctor's job, the; B 65
- Bisson, T. A.; R 262
- Black metropolis. St. C. Drake and H. R. Cayton; B 525
- Blackford, William Willis
  - War years with Jeb Stuart; B 410
- Boerker, Richard
  - Behold our green mansions; B 160
- Bogan, Louise; R 15, 582
- Bogey of economic maturity, the. G. Terborgh; B 134
- Bojano, Filippo
  - In the wake of the goose-step; B 160
- Bolté, Charles G.
  - Comments on J. Senior's review of "Up front" by B. Mauldin; C 47; see also R 18; 34
- Bones of contention. Lord Vansittart; B 111; see also C 323
- Bontemps, Arna, and J. Conroy
  - They seek a city; B 411
- Booker, John S. and Edna Lee
  - Flight from China; B 320
- Bornstein, Joseph; R 65, 160, 530
- Bostonians, the. H. James. With an introduction by P. Rahv; B 582
- Boudin, L. B.
  - Comments on A. Guérard's review of "Bones of contention" by Lord Vansittart; C 323; see also R 111
- Boulding, Kenneth E.
  - Economics of peace, the; B 112
- Bowers, Claude G.
  - Thomas Jefferson; AN 670
- Boyle, Kay; R 368
- Brandel, Marc
  - Rain before seven; B 292
- Brazil: an interpretation. G. Freyre; B 342
- Brebner, J. B., and A. Nevins
  - Making of modern Britain, the; B 559
- Bresler, Harvey J.; R 235
- British survey handbooks. Edited by J. Eppstein; B 408
- Brodie, Fawn M.
  - No man knows my history; B 630
- Brogan, D. W.
  - Free state, the; B 235
- Broughton, Philip S.; R 113
- Brown, Ralph Adams; R 44, 161, 263, 410, 559
- Bryant, Arthur
  - Years of victory: 1802-1812; B 594
- Builders of the bridge, the. D. D. Steinman; B 185
- Building Lenin's Russia. S. Liberman; B 318
- Burch, Guy Irving, and E. Pendell
  - Population roads to peace or war; AN 642
- Bush, Douglas
  - Paradise lost in our time; B 186

C

- Can representative government do the job? T. K. Finletter; B 344
- Canfield, Dorothy; R 503
- Caruso, Dorothy
  - Enrico Caruso, his life and death; B 41
- Casey, Robert J.
  - Battle below; B 410
- Cass Timberlane. S. Lewis; B 381
- Catholic looks at the world, a. F. E. McMahon; B 695
- Cayton, Horace R., and St. C. Drake
  - Black metropolis; B 525
- Cézanne. With an introduction by E. A. Jewell; B 742
- Cézanne's composition. E. Loran; B 742
- Chagall, Marc, a study of. L. Venturi; B 262
- Challenge of red China, the. G. Stein; B 556
- Chamberlin, William Henry
  - America: Partner in world rule; B 260
- Chase, Stuart
  - Men at work; B 44
  - Tomorrow's trade: Problems of our foreign commerce; B 740
- Chase, Stuart; R 313
- Cherokee strip, the. M. James; B 438
- Chih-I Chang and Hsiao-Tung Fei
  - Earthbound China; B 528
- China's crisis. L. K. Rosinger; B 209
- City development. Studies in disintegration and renewal. L. Mumford; B 15
- Clapham, Sir John
  - Bank of England, the—a history. Two volumes; B 159
- Cloete, Stuart
  - Against these three; B 263
- Cobban, Alfred
  - National self-determination; B 439
- Coldwell, M. J.
  - Left turn, Canada; B 89
- Coleman, McAlister; R 18, 64, 438, 632
- Color and democracy: Colonies and peace. W. E. B. Du Bois; B 186
- Comfort, Alex
  - Song of Lazarus, the; B 741
- Connolly, Cyril
  - Unquiet grave, the; B 405
- Conroy, Jack, and A. Bontemps
  - They seek a city; B 411
- Conspiracy in Algiers. R. P. Gosset; B 88
- Contemporary America: The national scene since 1900. H. Wish; B 290
- Contemporary Spanish poetry: Selections from ten poets. Translated by L. Turnbull; personal reminiscences of the poets by P. Salinas; B 159

PAGE

- Corey, Lewis; R 235
- Cossacks, the. M. Hindus; AN 670
- Cousins, Norman
  - Modern man is obsolete; B 560
- Crack-up, the. F.S. Fitzgerald; B 182
- Cranston, Alan
  - Killing of the peace, the; B 410
- Curtain falls, the. Count F. Bernadotte; B 530
- Curti, Merle; R 406
- Curtis, Charles P., Jr., and F. Greenslet
  - Practical cogitator, the; B 504

D

- Daisy Kenyon. E. Janeway; B 472
- Dallin, David J.
  - Big three, the; B 184
- Dane, Clemence
  - He brings great news; B 346
- David, Henry; R 113, 290
- Davies, Lieutenant John
  - Lower deck; B 632
- Days and nights. K. Simonov; B 694
- De Chair, Somerset
  - Golden carpet, the; B 666
- Denmark. British survey handbooks. Edited by J. Eppstein; B 408
- Dickey, Dallas C.
  - Seargent S. Prentiss, Whig orator of the old south; B 559
- Dietz, David
  - Atomic energy in the coming era; B 465
- Dilemma in Japan. A. Roth; B 436
- Doctor's job, the. C. Binger; B 65
- Drake, St. Clair and H. R. Cayton
  - Black metropolis; B 525
- Du Bois, W. E. B.
  - Color and democracy: Colonies and peace; B 186
- Duffield, Marcus; R 160
- Dupee, F. W.; R 138; 210; see also correction 236; 380

E

- E.A.M. White book. March, 1944—March, 1945; B 661
- Earthbound China. Hsiao-Tung Fei and Chih-I Chang; B 528
- Easterby, J. H.
  - South Carolina rice plantation, the, as revealed in the papers of Robert F. W. Allston; B 559
- Eberhart, Richard
  - Poems new and selected; B 138
- Economic development in southeast Europe. Auspices of PEP (Political and economic planning); B 528
- Economic reconstruction. Edited by S. E. Harris; AN 602
- Economics of peace, the. K. E. Boulding; B 112
- Edman, Irwin; R 258
- Elst, Joseph van der
  - Last flowering of the middle ages, the; B 133
- Embree, John F.
  - Japanese nation, the; B 262
- Enrico Caruso, his life and death. D. Caruso; B 41
- Ernst, Morris
  - Best is yet, the; B 64
- Essay on rime. K. Shapiro; B 498; see also 690
- European manifesto. P. de Lanux; B 500
- Evolution of the Dutch nation. B. H. M. Vlekke; B 208

F

- Facts of life, the. P. Goodman; B 90
- Farewell my heart. F. Molnar; B 139
- Farmer and the rest of us, the. A. Moore; B 186
- Fate and freedom, a philosophy for free Americans. J. Frank; B 40
- Finletter, Thomas K.
  - Can representative government do the job? B 344
- Fitzgerald, F. Scott
  - Crack-up, the; B 182
- Fitzpatrick, Edward A.
  - Universal training; B 410
- Flight from China. J. S. and E. L. Booker; B 320
- Flight into darkness. R. Gustafson; B 210
- Flowering dusk. E. Young; B 65
- Fontaine, Robert
  - Happy time, the; B 139
- Forty-eight million tons to Eisenhower. Lt. Col. R. Leigh; AN 642
- Frank, Gerold, and J. D. Horan
  - U.S.S. Seawolf; B 410
- Frank, Jerome
  - Fate and freedom, a philosophy for free Americans; B 40
- Frazier, E. Franklin; R 44, 135, 319, 411
- Free state, the. D. W. Brogan; B 235
- Freedom and responsibility in the American way of life. C. L. Becker; B 526
- Freeman, Joseph; R 318
- Freudianism and the literary mind. F. J. Hoffman; B 234; see also C 415

PAGE

Freyre, Gilberto
  Brazil: an interpretation; B............ 342
From democracy to nazism. R. Heberle; B.. 65
Fry, Varian
  Surrender on demand; B............... 318
Fulop-Miller, René
  Saints that moved the world, the; B...... 696
Future of Japan, the. W. C. Johnstone; B.... 17

G

General education in a free society. Report of the Harvard committee; B............ 258
Genzmer, George; R...................... 374
German talks back, the. H. Hauser; B...... 340
Germany is our problem. H. Morgenthau, Jr.; B 433
Glazer, Nathan; R....................... 291
Glick, Nathan; R........................ 527
Golden carpet, the. S. de Chair; B......... 666
Goodman, Paul
  Facts of life, the; B................... 90
Gordon, King; R......................34, 89
Gorky, Maxim
  Seven plays. Translated by A. Bakshy: B 17
Gosset, Renée Pierre
  Conspiracy in Algiers; B................ 88
Governing of men, the. A. H. Leighton; B.. 64
Graves, Robert
  Hercules, my shipmate; B.............. 472
Gray, James
  Pine, stream, and prairie: Wisconsin and Minnesota in profile: B..........161; see also C.......................... 266
Greenberg, Clement: R....133, 234, 262, 378, 742
Greenslet, Ferris, and C. P. Curtis, Jr.
  Practical cogitator, the; B............... 504
Grinker, Lieutenant Colonel Roy R., and Major J. P. Spiegel
  Men under stress; B...................... 600
Grossman, James: R...................524, 596
Groth, John
  Studio Europe: AN....................... 670
Guérard, Albert: R..................15, 111; see also C..........323; 184, 209, 260, 500
Guerard, Albert J.
  Maqusard: B 472
Gumpert, Martin
  Hahnemann: The adventurous career of a medical rebel; AN...................... 670
Gunn, Selskar M., and P. S. Platt
  Voluntary health agencies; B............ 470
Gustafson, Ralph
  Flight into darkness: B.................. 210

H

H. D.
  Tribute to the angels; B................. 741
Haggin, B. H.; R......................... 606
Hahnemann: The adventurous career of a medical rebel. M. Gumpert: AN........ 670
Hamilton, Thomas J.; R.................. 692
Happy time, the. R. Fontaine: B........... 139
Harrow, Benjamin; R.................465; 560
Harvard committee
  General education in a free society: B.... 258
Hauser, Heinrich
  German talks back, the: B.............. 340
Hawkridge, Emma
  Wisdom tree, the: B.................... 740
Hayes, Carlton J. H.
  Wartime mission in Spain, 1942-45; B.... 692
He brings great news. C. Dane; B....... 346
Heberle, Rudolph
  From democracy to nazism: B............ 65
Henderson, Leon; R...................... 433
Henriques, Robert
  Home fires burning; B.................. 187
Henríquez-Ureña, Pedro
  Literary currents in Hispanic America: B. 184
Hercules, my shipmate. R. Graves; B........ 472
Here and now. I. Layton; B............... 210
Hindus, Maurice
  Cossacks, the; AN...................... 670
Hinshaw, David
  Man from Kansas, a; B.................. 632
History of western philosophy, a. B. Russell; B 586
Hitler and beyond -a German testament. E. Koch-Weser; B 65
Hobson, Wilder
  All summer long; B..................... 292
Hoellering, Franz; R 340
Hoffman, Frederick J.
  Freudianism and the literary mind; B..234; see also C......................... 415
Holles, Everett
  Unconditional surrender; B............. 112
Home fires burning. R. Henriques: B...... 187
Home to India. S. R. Rau; B.............. 45
Hook, Sidney; R 586
Horan, James D., and G. Frank
  U.S.S. Seawolf; B...................... 410
House of Hancock, the. Business in Boston, 1724-1775. W. T. Baxter; B........... 44

PAGE

Hsiao-Tung Fei and Chih-I Chang
  Earthbound China; B 528
Humphries, Rolfe; R......65, 159, 409, 466, 696
Hungary. British survey handbooks. Edited by J. Eppstein; B......................... 408
Hutchison, Keith; R..........112, 159, 378, 408, 529, 559, 594, 602, 642, 670
Huxley, Aldous
  Perennial philosophy, the; B............. 438

I

In the wake of the goose-step. F. Bojano; B. 160
Isherwood, Christopher
  Prater Violet; B........................ 530
Jaffe, Philip
  New frontiers in Asia; B................ 668
James, Henry
  Bostonians, the. With an introduction by P. Rahv; B......................... 582
  Short stories. Selected by C. Fadiman; B.. 434
James, Marquis
  Cherokee strip, the; B.................. 438
Janeway, Elizabeth
  Daisy Kenyon; B....................... 472
Janis, Sidney
  Abstract and surrealist art in America: B. 378
Japan and the son of heaven. W. Price; B.. 505
Japanese nation, the. J. F. Embree; B...... 262
Jarrell, Randall
  Little friend, little friend; B............. 590
Jarrell, Randall; R....................... 741
Jefferson, Thomas, biography. C. G. Bowers; AN 670
Johnson, Pamela Hansford
  Trojan brothers, the: B.................. 139
Johnstone, William C.
  Future of Japan, the; B................. 17
Journey underground. Flight Officer D. G. Prosser; AN 602
Junker menace, the. F. Martin: B.......... 65

K

Kennedy, Gail; R........................ 341
Killing of the peace, the. A. Cranston; B.... 410
Kingsley, J. Donald Representative bureaucracy, an interpretation of the British civil service; B...... 235
Koch-Weser, Erich
  Hitler and beyond—a German testament; B. 65
Kronenberger, Louis
  Reader's companion, the: B.............. 207
Krutch, Joseph Wood; R..............112, 409

L

Labor today and tomorrow. A. Levenstein: B. 667
Lane, Robert P.; R....................... 470
Lanux, Pierre de
  European manifesto; B.................. 500
Lasser, David
  Private monopoly; B.................... 526
Last flowering of the middle ages, the. J. van der Elst; B 133
Lauterbach, Richard E.
  These are the Russians; B.............. 44
Layton, Irving
  Here and now; B...................... 210
Leave cancelled. N. Monsarrat; B.......... 346
Lebowitz, Martin; R..................185, 342
Left turn, Canada. M. J. Coldwell; B........ 89
Leigh, Lt. Col. Randolph
  Forty-eight million tons to Eisenhower; AN. 642
Leighton, Alexander H.
  Governing of men, the; B............... 64
Let's talk about the peace. H. G. Alsberg; B. 500
Letters of Rainer Maria Rilke, 1892-1910. Translated by J. B. Greene and M. D. H. Norton; B 466
Levenstein, Aaron
  Labor today and tomorrow; B............ 667
Levin, Meyer; R......................... 498
Lewis, C. Day
  Short is the time: B.................... 380
Lewis, Sinclair
  Cass Timberlane; B..................... 381
Lewisohn, Ludwig
  Comments on L. Trilling's review of "Freudianism and the literary mind" by F. J. Hoffman; C....415; see also R.... 234
Liberal tradition, the. W. A. Orton: B..... 553
Liberman, Simon
  Building Lenin's Russia; B................318
Lili Marlene. R. L. Yorck; B.............. 139
Literary currents in Hispanic America. P. Henríquez-Ureña; B................. 184
Little friend, little friend. R. Jarrell; B..... 590
Loran, Earle
  Cézanne's composition; B............... 742
Lower deck. Lieutenant J. Davies; B....... 632
Lowy, Samuel
  New direction in psychology; B.......... 527

M

Macartney, M. H.
  Rebuilding of Italy, the; AN............ 602

PAGE

MacNeice, Louis
  Springboard; B 380
Making of modern Britain, the. J. B. Brebner and A. Nevins; B.................... 559
Man from Kansas, a. D. Hinshaw; B...... 632
Maquisard. A. J. Guerard; B.............. 472
Marc Chagall. L. Venturi; B.............. 262
Marshall, Bruce
  World, the flesh and Father Smith, the; B 139
Marshall, Margaret; R........207, 434, 464, 694
Martin, Frederick
  Junker menace, the; B.................. 65
Matsumoto, Tsuyoshi; R.................. 436
Mauldin, Bill
  Up front; B......18; see also 34; C...... 47
Maurois, Andre
  Woman without love; B................. 346
McMahon, Francis E.
  Catholic looks at the world, a; B........ 695
McWilliams, Carey; R.................... 64
Meerloo, A. M.
  Total war and the human mind; B........ 185
Meelquist, Jerome; R....161; see also C.... 266
Memoirs of a shy pornographer, the. K. Patchen; B 292
Memories of an old-time tar heel. K. P. Battle. Edited by W. J. Battle; B...... 559
Men at work. S. Chase; B................ 44
Men under stress. Lieutenant Colonel R. R. Grinker and Major J. P. Spiegel: B.... 600
Mencken, H. L.
  American language, the: Supplement I: an inquiry into the development of English in the United States; B.................. 374
Merriam, Charles E.
  Systematic politics; B 379
Mikhailov, Nicholas
  Russian story, the; B................... 464
Mishnun, Virginia; R...................45, 318
Modern man is obsolete. N. Cousins; B...... 560
Molnar, Ferenc
  Farewell my heart; B.................. 139
Monsarrat, Nicholas
  Leave cancelled; B..................... 346
Moon, Bucklin; R........................ 525
Moore, Arthur
  Farmer and the rest of us, the; B........ 186
Morgan, Charles
  Reflections in a mirror; B............... 209
Morgenthau, Henry, Jr.
  Germany is our problem; B.............. 433
Morse, J. Mitchell; R...................... 65
Mumford, Lewis
  City development. Studies in disintegration and renewal; B....................... 15

N

Names on the land. G. R. Stewart; B...... 18
Nathan, George Jean
  Theater book of the year, the; B........ 409
Nation of nations, a. L. Adamic; B........ 666
National self-determination. A. Cobban; B... 439
Nevins, Allan, and J. B. Brebner
  Making of modern Britain, the; B........ 559
New architecture and city planning. A symposium. Edited by P. Zucker; B......... 15
New direction in psychology. S. Lowy; B.... 527
New frontiers in Asia. P. Jaffe; B.......... 668
Niebuhr, Reinhold; R 40, 379, 526, 553, 695
No man knows my history. F. M. Brodie; B.. 630
No voice is wholly lost. H. Slochower; B.....87; see also correction 140; C.... 295
Noyes, Charles E.; R..................... 526

O

Odic, Charles
  Stepchildren of France; B................ 368
O'Neill, J. J.
  Almighty atom; B...................... 465
One small voice. M. Oswald; B............ 503
Orton, William Aylott
  Liberal tradition, the: B................ 553
Oswald, Marianne
  One small voice; B.................... 503
Ourselves, Inc. The story of consumer free enterprise. L. R. Ward; AN............ 602
Overture. F. R. Scott; B..............210; see correction 236

P

Painting and painters: How to look at a picture: from Giotto to Chagall. L. Venturi; B 234
Palencia, Isabel de
  Smouldering freedom; B................ 318
Paradise lost in our time. D. Bush; B...... 186
Partisan guide to the Jewish problem, a. M. Steinberg; B..................... 498
Patchen, Kenneth
  Memoirs of a shy pornographer, the; B.... 292
Pattern of Soviet power, the. E. Snow; B.... 160
Paul, Leslie
  Annihilation of man, the; B.............. 17

Index

PAGE
Paul Cézanne. With an introduction by E. A. Jewell; B 742
Peffer, Nathaniel
  America's place in the world; B 260
Pendell, Elmer, and G. I. Burch
  Population roads to peace or war; AN 642
Perennial philosophy, the. A. Huxley; B 438
Perplexities and paradoxes. M. Unamuno; B. 598
Philosophy of American history, the. M. Zucker; B 113
Pinckney, Josephine
  Three o'clock dinner; B 346
Pine, stream, and prairie: Wisconsin and Minnesota in profile. J. Gray; B....161; see also C 266
Platt, Philip S., and S. M. Gunn
  Voluntary health agencies; B 470
Poems new and selected. R. Eberhart; B 138
Poetry of freedom, the. Edited by W. R. Benét and N. Cousins; B 138
Polner, Tikhon
  Tolstoy and his wife; B 89
Population roads to peace or war. G. I. Burch and E. Pendell. Foreword by W. B. Pitkin; AN 642
Porter, Katherine Anne; R 376
Post-war markets. Edited by E. J. Howenstine; AN 642
Powell, A. Clayton, Sr.
  Riots and ruins; B 135
Practical cogitator, the. C. P. Curtis, Jr., and F. Greenslet; B 504
Prater Violet. C. Isherwood; B 530
Prentiss, Seargent S., biography. D. C. Dickey; B 559
Price, Willard
  Japan and the son of heaven; B 505
Price of peace, the. Sir W. Beveridge; B 500
Primer for white folks. Edited by B. Moon; B 319
Private monopoly. D. Lasser; B 526
Prosser, Flight Officer David G.
  Journey underground; AN 602
Psychiatry in modern warfare. E. A. Strecker and K. E. Appel; B 600

Q

Question of Henry James, the: A collection of critical essays. Edited by F. W. Dupee; B 525

R

R. B.; R 344, 410
Race, nation, person: Social aspects of the race problem. Edited by Bishop J. W. Corrigan and G. B. O'Toole; B 44
Rahv, Philip; R 89
Rain before seven. M. Brandel; B 292
Ransom, John Crowe
  Selected poems; B 138
Rau Santha Rama
  Home to India; B 45
Reader's companion, the. L. Kronenberger; B. 207
Rebuilding of Italy, the. M. H. Macartney; AN 602
Reflections in a mirror. C. Morgan; B 209
Representative bureaucracy, an interpretation of the British civil service. J. D. Kingsley; B 235
Reves, Emery
  Anatomy of peace, the; B 209
Riots and ruins. A. C. Powell, Sr.; B 135
Rosinger, Lawrence K.
  China's crisis; B 209
Rosinger, Lawrence K.; R 17
Roth, Andrew
  Dilemma in Japan; B 436
Roth, Andrew; R 505, 556
Rowse, A. L.
  Spirit of English history, the; B 559
Russell, Bertrand
  History of western philosophy, a; B 586
Russian story, the. N. Mikhailov; B 464

S

Saints and strangers. G. F. Willison; B 376
Saints that moved the world, the. R. Fulop-Miller; B 696
Saveth, Edward N.; R 16, 135, 666
Scandinavian plays of the twentieth century. First and second series. Introduction by A. Gustafson; B 17
Schlesinger, Arthur M., Jr.
  Age of Jackson, the; B 406
Schrődinger, Erwin
  What is life? B 342
Scott, F. R.
  Overture; B.......210; correction....... 236
Seargent S. Prentiss, Whig orator of the old south. D. C. Dickey; B 559
Selected poems. J. C. Ransom; B 138
Senior, John; R. ....18; see also 34; C 47; 185, 186
Seven plays of Maxim Gorky. Translated by A. Bakshy; B 17
Schwartz, Delmore; R ....289, 378, 438, 468, 498; see also 690; 590
PAGE
Shapiro, Karl
  Essay on rime; B......498; see also...... 690
Sharp, Roland Hall
  South America uncensored; B 262
Shinto, the unconquered enemy. R. O. Ballou; B 505
Short history of Germany, a. S. H. Steinberg; B 65
Short is the time. C. D. Lewis; B 380
Short stories of Henry James, the. Selected by C. Fadiman; B 434
Silversides. R. Trumbull; B 410
Simonow, Konstantine
  Days and nights; B 694
Sixty million jobs. H. A. Wallace; B 313
Skalds, the: a selection of their poems. With an introduction and notes by L. M. Hollander; B 409
Slochower, Harry
  No voice is wholly lost; B ....87; see also correction......140; C 295
Smith, Joseph, biography. F. M. Brodie; B .. 630
Smouldering freedom. I. de Palencia; B 465
Smyth, Henry De Wolf
  Atomic energy for military purposes; B 465
Snow, Edgar
  Pattern of Soviet power, the; B 160
Social systems of American ethnic groups, the. W. L. Warner and L. Srole; B 291
Socialism looks forward. J. Strachey; AN 602
Song of Lazarus, the. A. Comfort; B 741
Soul afire, the: Revelations of the mystics. Edited by H. A. Reinhold; B 15
Soule, George
  America's stake in Britain's future; B 628
South America uncensored. R. H. Sharp; B .. 262
South Carolina rice plantation, the, as revealed in the papers of Robert F. W. Allston. J. H. Easterby; B 559
Spiegel, Major John P., and Lieutenant Colonel R. R. Grinker
  Men under stress; B 600
Spirit of English history, the. A. L. Rowse; B 559
Springboard. L. MacNeice; B 380
Srole, Leo, and W. L. Warner
  Social systems of American ethnic groups, the; B 291
Stavrianos, L. S.; R 661
Stebbins, Lucy Poate and Richard Poate
  Trollopes, the; B 596
Stein, Gunther
  Challenge of red China, the; B 556
Steinberg, Milton
  Partisan guide to the Jewish problem, a; B 498
Steinberg, S. H.
  Short history of Germany, a; B 65
Steinman, D. D.
  Builders of the bridge, the; B 185
Stepchildren of France. C. Odic; B 368
Stewart, George R.
  Names on the land; B 18
Stewart, Maxwell S; R 44, 209, 291, 320, 410, 528; 668
Strachey, John
  Socialism looks forward; AN 602
Strecker, Edward A., and K. E. Appel
  Psychiatry in modern warfare; B 600
Studio Europe. J. Groth; AN 670
Strunsky, Sheba; R 318
Surrender on demand. V. Fry; B 318
Systematic politics. C. E. Merriam; B 379

T

Taft, Philip; R 667
Tent for April, a. P. Anderson; B 210
Terborgh, George
  Bogey of economic maturity, the; B 134
Theater book of the year. G. J. Nathan; B .. 409
These are the Russians. R. E. Lauterbach; B 44
They seek a city. A. Bontemps and J. Conroy; B 411
Thomas Jefferson. C. G. Bowers; AN 670
Thornbury, Ethel M.; R 628, 740
Three o'clock dinner. J. Pinckney; B 346
Tolstoy and his wife. T. Polner; B 89
Tomorrow's trade: Problems of our foreign commerce. S. Chase; B 740
Total war and the human mind. A. M. Meerloo; B 185
Tovey, Donald Francis
  Beethoven; B 606
Trager, Frank N.; R 410, 600
Tribute to the angels. H. D.; B 741
Trilling, Diana; R 41, 90, 139, 187, 292, 346, 381, 472, 530
Trilling, Lionel
  Fitzgerald, F. Scott; S 182
Trilling, Lionel; R ....182, 234; see also C 415
Trojan brothers, the. P. H. Johnson; B 139
Trollopes, the. L. P. Stebbins and R. P. Stebbins; B 596
Trumbull, Robert
  Silversides; B 410
PAGE

U

U.S.S. Seawolf. G. Frank and J. D. Horan; B 410
Unamuno, Miguel
  Perplexities and paradoxes; B 598
Unconditional surrender. E. Holles; B 112
Universal training. E. A. Fitzpatrick; B 410
Unquiet grave, the. C. Connolly; B 405
Up front. B. Mauldin; B ....18; see also 34; C 47

V

Vambery, Rustem; R 439
Van der Elst, Joseph
  Last flowering of the middle ages, the; B .. 133
Vansittart, Lord
  Bones of contention; B ....111; see also C 323
Venturi, Lionello
  Marc Chagall; B 262
  Painting and painters: How to look at a picture: from Giotto to Chagall; B 234
Virginia Woolf: her art as a novelist. J. Bennett; B 378
Vlekke, Bernard H. M.
  Evolution of the Dutch nation; B 208
Voluntary health agencies. S. M. Gunn and P. S. Platt; B 470

W

Walden revisited. G. F. Whicher; B 112
Wallace, Henry Agard
  Sixty million jobs; B 313
War poets, the. Edited with an introduction by O. Williams; B 138
War years with Jeb Stuart. W. W. Blackford; B 410
Ward, Leo R.
  Ourselves, Inc. The story of consumer free enterprise; AN 602
Ward, Robert S.
  Asia for the Asiatics? B 291
Waring, P. Alston; R 160, 186
Warner, W. Lloyd, and L. Srole
  Social systems of American ethnic groups, the; B 291
Wartime mission in Spain, 1942-45. C. J. H. Hayes; B 692
Wayfarers, the. D. Wickenden; B 139
Wentzel, A. J.
  Comments on J. Mellquist's review of "Pine, stream and prairie" by J. Gray; C..........266; see also R 161
Western words: A dictionary of the range, cow camp, and trail. R. F. Adams; B .. 161
What is life? E. Schrődinger; B 342
When democracy builds. F. L. Wright; B .. 15
Whicher, George F.
  Walden revisited; B 112
White, William Allen, biography. D. Hinshaw; B 632
Whitman, Walt
  Most comprehensive one-volume edition of his poems and prose, the. With a critical and biographical introduction by M. Van Doren; B 289
Wickenden, Dan
  Wayfarers, the; B 139
Willison, George F.
  Saints and strangers; B 376
Wilson, Woodrow, biography. H. C. F. Bell; B 16
Winner, Percy; R 88
Wisdom tree, the. E. Hawkridge; B 740
Wish, Harvey
  Contemporary America: The national scene since 1900; B 290
Woman without love. A. Maurois; B 346
Woodrow Wilson and the great betrayal. T. A. Bailey; B 135
Woodrow Wilson and the people. H. C. F. Bell; B 16
Woolf, Virginia, her art as a novelist. J. Bennett; B 378
World, the flesh and Father Smith, the. B. Marshall; B 139
Wright, Frank Lloyd
  When democracy builds; B 15

Y

Years of victory: 1802-1812. A. Bryant; B .. 594
Yorck, Ruth L.
  Lili Marlene; B 139
Young, Ella
  Flowering dusk; B 65
Young, Marguerite; R 630

Z

Zucker, Morris
  Philosophy of American history, the. Two volumes; B 113

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 161 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JULY 7, 1945 NUMBER 1

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 1

EDITORIALS

Britain Votes 3
Clean Out the State Department 4
Mirror of Our World by Freda Kirchwey 5

ARTICLES

Can Germany Fight Again? by I. F. Stone 6
The Second League by Percy E. Corbett 7
Crippling the Disabled Veteran by Edward M. Maisel 9
Guadalcanal Pays Off by William I. Caldwell 11
The Fight over Jackson Hole by Irving Brant 13
In the Wind 14

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

The Mystic Experience by Louise Bogan 15
City Planning by Albert Guérard 15
Briefer Comment 16
Music by B. H. Haggin 20

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor J. KING GORDON
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Editor Political War Section
J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor J. MITCHELL MORSE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates
LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS
CAREY McWILLIAMS REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1945, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

ON BOTH OKINAWA AND LUZON ORGANIZED resistance has been declared at an end, and we anticipate a protracted operational pause in the grand strategic advance in the Pacific. There will of course be no pause in Allied activity on the sea, on the ground, or in the air; but the main thrust toward Tokyo must rest temporarily while the huge job of building up the pressure of troops and supplies for the next offensive phase is carried out. Unofficial hints, as well as guarded official statements, indicate that this next operation will be carried out on such a scale and in such a fashion as to astonish the world. The navy will have the three big advanced staging areas of Okinawa, Luzon, and Guam on which to draw; and doubtless these islands are already being weighted down with men and material, as England was before the invasion of the Continent. Combat divisions from Europe are now being redeployed to the Far East, either through the United States or direct from Marseilles. Three armies are already in the Pacific under General MacArthur's overall ground command—General Krueger's Sixth, General Eichelberger's Eighth, and General Stilwell's Tenth. These armies are all pretty battle-wise and have experienced commanders; the selection of General Stilwell to head the Tenth after the tragic death of General Buckner on Okinawa nearly at the end of the battle is a particularly happy circumstance, removing our outstanding Far Eastern commander from his training job in the United States and putting him in position to apply his impressive knowledge and skill to the job of defeating the Japanese on their own ground. In addition, the six veteran divisions of the Marine Corps will undoubtedly be restored to combat strength and fitness in time to spearhead the assault. It is inconceivable that the Japanese can withstand the massive power being readied against them.

*

AT HIS LAST PRESS CONFERENCE IN PARIS General Eisenhower urged the correspondents to study carefully one thing—"the value of integrated tactical power in war." Explaining, he said: "When you put sea, ground, and air power together, the result you get is not the sum of their separate powers. You multiply their power rather than add." Already this multiplication of power is evident in the Pacific, where the integration of the three arms has been steadily on the increase. Sea power brought the Marines to Iwo, air power protected them, and their ground power won the island; so that air power could in turn be conserved there when the B-29's faltered on the long return from Japan. The fast carrier task force ranged off Okinawa as a barrier, while "jeep" (escort) carriers gave close-in air support to the gound forces until land-based planes could use the airstrips which were the ground forces' first objectives. The clearance of Okinawa means that B-29's can soon begin comparatively close-range bombing of Japan's secondary targets, the primary targets having already been largely written off by Marianas-based attacks; the way is also open for attacks on the 20 per cent of enemy industry in Manchuria, and for aerial blockade of the Tsushima Straits between Korea and Kyushu-Honshu—a blockade which can seriously interfere with Japanese war efficiency. All this is causing Japan to "bleed internally," in the phrase of a B-29 group commander; and that internal bleeding will show itself in the form of fewer casualties among American ground forces when the final battles are joined.

*

THE SIMLA CONFERENCE INCHES FORWARD toward a goal still far distant—full and responsible self-government for India. It is a hopeful sign that at the first meeting between the Indian leaders and Lord Wavell a general agreement was expressed on the proposed plans for the Indianization of the Viceroy's Council. It would seem to indicate that Congress and Moslem League leaders as well as leaders of other Indian groups are ready to accept the British proposals in good faith rather than to find reasons for rejecting an offer which they viewed with suspicion. Naturally the long-standing differences between the Congress and Moslem League leaders are not going to be resolved overnight. Already the Congress is challenging the proposal that the League should name all the Moslems on the Viceroy's Council. But if the desire for a unified Indian solution is genuine, it is hard to believe that this clash will prove fatal. To American liberals the advance represented by any accord reached at Simla may appear infinitesimal. The economic, social, and political tasks confronting the Indian leaders are of mountainous proportions. Nor is it safe to believe that British imperialists—economic as well as political—have decided to liquidate all their interests in India. Certainly, the British at San Francisco did not seem to appreciate the quickening surge of colonial poeples toward democratic independence. Perhaps a Labor victory or even important Labor gains in the British election will bring about a change in official attitude.

*

THE VICTORY OF THE NATIONAL DEMOCRATIC Front in Peru is bound to have a momentous effect throughout Latin America. From Buenos Aires to Mexico all the reactionary forces had speculated on the triumph of General Ureta, Presidential candidate of the conservative National Union Coalition, whose pro-fascist sympathies led him in the early period of the war to side openly with the Axis. The Argentine colonels, in particular, eagerly expected the election of Ureta, hoping that a strong bloc including Argentina, Bolivia, Paraguay, and Peru, would in the space of a few months succeed in overthrowing the democratic government in Chile, isolating Uruguay, and extending fascist domination through the continent. The election of the candidate of the leftist coalition, Dr. José Luis Bustamante, puts an end to these speculations. The newly elected President, besides announcing that one of his first acts when he takes office on July 28 will be to abolish all vestiges of censorship, is pledged to a program of reform which, though limited and tempered to conditions in his socially backward country, amounts to a real revolution. The latest election returns insure Dr. Bustamante a majority in both houses to carry out his program. In foreign relations his government represents exactly the opposite position to that of the Argentine government. The Peruvian elections confirm our belief that the war has exercised a profound influence on the peoples of Latin America and created almost everywhere the basis for encouraging democratic regimes. Not even from the point of view of the political realism which our State Department has so often professed can it longer justify support of the reactionary elements in Latin America. In Argentina as well as in Peru, indeed even more readily than in Peru, we could by now have had a decent democratic regime, had we not been foolish enough to save the Perón government during the Chapultepec conference and thus open the way for its acceptance at San Francisco. That is the most important lesson of the Peruvian election.

*

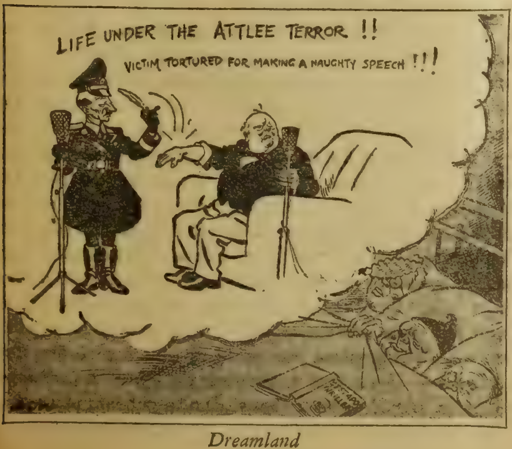
SENATOR BILBO'S EXHIBITION LAST THURSDAY made it appear that at the cost of hundreds of thousands of lives we had destroyed Hitler's racial obscenity in Europe only to have it parade in all its shameless arrogance at the very center of our democracy. If, as it appears at this writing, the FEPC is to be destroyed or mutilated, then it may well be asked how our nation can speak a word for democracy in a war-shattered world when at home we turn our backs on the elementary principle of equal economic opportunity? Perhaps we should warn the other nations that Bilbo is an atavistic survival and not an effective symbol of American democracy and compassion. Perhaps it should be pointed out that American patriotism is hardly to be judged by a Senator who would tie up the funds for seventeen essential war agencies rather than run the risk of voting $466,200 to mitigate the lot of millions of traditionally oppressed citizens. Whatever the outcome, it is important to assess the meaning of this latest manifestation of American reaction and weigh the strength of the opposing factions. The President himself has shown great courage in twice speaking for the FEPC. The Republicans have proved themselves but sorry champions of an agency which, for election purposes, they insisted ought to be made permanent; they apparently have not decided that the time has come to break with their natural allies in the South. What is quite clear is that the battleground for 1946 is being laid out. The liberal gains in the South in 1944 represent only a partial victory. Now these same liberal forces—political, labor, and community groups—must lose no time in preparing for a decisive struggle at the polls. For them, as for liberals throughout the nation, the challenge is nothing less than to extirpate from American public life all the evil intolerance that Bilbo and Rankin personify.

*

IN THE FINAL SHOWDOWN THE OPA SURVIVED the attacks of its enemies without suffering irretrievable damage. The disastrous Wherry amendment, which would have put farm prices on a cost-plus basis, and the scarcely less mischievous Dirksen amendment for court review of OPA orders were eliminated. Although a modified form of the Andresen amendment for a "food czar" was adopted by the House-Senate conferees, the Republicans are far from happy over the compromise. The Administration victory in conference makes it sure that the struggle against inflation will go on for another year without appreciable loss of vigor. Reports of growing black-market conditions in many sections of the country make it evident, however, that the OPA's task will be more difficult than ever before. In view of its restricted budget the agency cannot be expected to cope with the problem single-handed. It will need the most active kind of cooperation from local and state enforcement agents and, above all, from the general public. If every responsible citizen made a point of reporting every indication of black marketeering to his local board, the evil could quickly be stamped out.

*

MR. TRUMAN'S PROPOSAL TO ALTER THE PRESENT order of Presidential succession arose from an excellent impulse to insure that the functions of Chief Executive should be exercised by an elected rather than an appointed official. But the proposal was ill-timed and of doubtful wisdom none the less, and we hope the bill introduced in the House by Mr. Sumners will be defeated. Its apparent advantages are almost entirely fortuitous, resulting from the peculiar state of affairs that existed at Mr. Roosevelt's death. Certainly Mr. Stettinius would have been an inappropriate successor had Mr. Truman been removed from office before the new Secretary of State was chosen. And Mr. Truman apparently felt it was improper that he should have the power, in appointing a new Secretary, to appoint at the same time his own possible successor. But the proposal to vest the office of President in the Speaker of the House, as the official who comes closest to being a popularly elected representative, seems to us to be based more on an estimate of the men involved than on underlying political considerations. And surely a decision as to the Presidency should not be influenced by arguments which are both ad hoc and ad hominem. A simpler plan would be to continue the present system but provide for a special election in case the Secretary of State should become President more than ninety days before the end of the term. This would obviate the danger that the national government might be headed for a considerable time by an appointed official—a danger which has not materialized in the history of the country—without creating the danger that it might be turned over to a Representative elected locally and raised to the Speakership by the operation of the seniority rule.



LIFE UNDER THE ATTLEE TERROR !!
VICTIM TORTURED FOR MAKING A NAUGHTY SPEECH !!!

Dreamland

Britain Votes

BRITISH electors on July 5 will have their first chance in ten years to express their views at the polls, but ballots will not be counted until July 25, owing to the extra time allowed for service voters. The contest is the most open within living memory. Millions of voters—all under thirty-one—have never cast a ballot before. Moreover, the electoral register is said to be very imperfect, and some reports suggest that bungled handling of service ballot papers will deprive many soldiers and sailors of the chance to vote. Both these circumstances will tend to harm the Labor Party, for probably most unregistered voters are workers shifted from their homes on war jobs and there are numerous signs of a strong leftward trend in the services.

Another bar to prophecy is the unusually large number of candidates—1,686 competing for 640 "seats." Consequently there are only 265 "straight fights," while 293 contests are three-cornered. In sixty other places four or more candidates compete for support. As a result, either the Conservatives or Laborites could win a majority of seats on a minority of votes, or no party might secure an overall majority. That would probably mean a new coalition government—Labor has indicated its willingness to make a working arrangement with the Liberals—but the situation would be unstable.

American correspondents in Britain appear to have been shocked by the rowdy and undignified nature of the campaign. Having observed the British parties working harmoniously together throughout the war, they have been surprised by the thoroughness with which they fell apart immediately politics were reconverted to a peacetime basis. Looking back on former British general elections, we feel there is little cause for alarm. The Eatanswill tradition persists in Britain to some extent; elections are usually fought without much verbal restraint, and on this occasion there is a great deal of bottled-up political steam needing an outlet.

In so far as the campaign has taken on an unduly factious tone, Mr. Churchill and his advisers, particularly Lord Beaverbrook, must be held largely responsible. While posing as a "national" leader, the Prime Minister in his opening radio address chose to make a violent onslaught on the Labor Party. He charged that its socialist plans, if carried into effect, would introduce totalitarianism into Britain. He even raised the bogy of a Labor Gestapo which would drag all critics to concentration camps. Following this line, some Tories are now using posters of Belsen and Buchenwald to illustrate their ideas of life under a Labor government. Indignantly Labor candidates are recalling the friendliness of leading Tories toward the Nazis in the appeasement era, the praise Churchill himself once bestowed on Mussolini, and his more recent kind words for Franco.

It is doubtful whether these polemical exchanges will have an important influence on the final results. The great interest of the mass of the British people is in post-war reconstruction, in such bread-and-butter questions as jobs, social insurance, medical service, and, above all, houses. On these issues there is little to choose between the promises of the different parties and the voter's problem is to decide which will give the better performance.

Clean Out the State Department

NOW that James F. Byrnes has been appointed by the President as the new Secretary of State, one of his first acts will doubtless be a thorough reorganization of the State Department. Mr. Byrnes is one of the ablest administrators in the government. He is not likely to tolerate the conflict and inefficiency which have existed in the foreign office of our government for so many years. He will want to bring in his own men, and he certainly will not try to run the department with the hodge-podge appointees put into office along with Mr. Stettinius some six months ago.

Primary attention must be given to the selection of the top officials who, by their day-to-day decisions, are largely responsible for the determination of American foreign policy. Assistant Secretary Dunn and Under Secretary Grew have been the chief policy-making officials in recent months in all matters except those concerning Latin America. For Far Eastern policy the name of Eugene Dooman, special assistant to Mr. Dunn, should be added. Mr. Dunn's pro-Franco and anti-Russian prejudices are so notorious that it is obviously unsafe to leave him in a position where he will continue to influence American policy toward Europe. Mr. Grew is wholly without European experience. With respect to Asia, the State Department is in the incredible position of having no one in a top position with general Far Eastern experience. Mr. Grew and Mr. Dooman have served only in Japan. Mr. Dunn has never served in an Asiatic country. The Director of the Office of Far Eastern Affairs, Joseph Ballantine, has served mostly in Japan, and he has little or no influence on policy. There is no one who can speak authoritatively on China or the Southwest Pacific. The chiefs of the geographical divisions within the Far Eastern Office, though relatively capable men, have little say when it comes to policy making. Unless the dead wood at the top can be removed, the forward-looking men who are to be found throughout the State Department must remain wholly without influence.

The basic cause of the State Department's vacillation and weakness on vital issues lies in the sharp cleavage which exists between the men who came into the department prior to 1924, when the Rogers Act was passed, and those who have come in since that date. Most of the older men had no qualifications for foreign service other than money, a family name, an Eastern-university education, and a desire for social prestige. They looked upon the service as offering a soft life with good social connections. After 1924 many changes were effected. Entrance examinations were made more difficult, salaries increased, special allowances introduced, and a pension system established—making it possible for able men of moderate means to enter and remain in the service. Moreover, an increasing interest in world affairs made the service more attractive as a career. The result has been a great improvement in the quality of our foreign-service personnel. The younger men are, on the whole, abler, more aware of the significance of the problems which confront the United States, and more capable of showing moral courage when issues of importance arise.

Yet because of seniority the pre-1924 officials hold most of the higher posts in the department, together with a number of ambassadorial positions. Grew is sixty-five; Dunn and Dooman are fifty-five; Ballantine is fifty-seven. Younger men with exceptional talents have been relegated to positions where their talents cannot be fully used. This has naturally lowered their morale, and many of the more brilliant officials have left the service for less stultifying careers. Some of those who remained have been infected by the dead rot that has so long afflicted their seniors. Fear may accentuate this tendency. The recent arrest of John S. Service, one of the most capable of the younger men, is generally regarded as a warning to the others not to be too critical of the policies of their elders, even though the well-being of the country is at stake.

An effective reorganization of the State Department—designed to create an agency capable of giving this country a vigorous, consistent, democratic foreign policy—obviously demands more than a reshuffling of a few top posts. A thorough shake-up is needed. The ingrown crowd of Social Registerites must be cleaned out. For two or three years there has existed a list of officers in the top grades who are designated for retirement as "dead wood." But the department has hesitated to act. It feared that the sudden forced retirement of a number of high officials would make it evident that these men had been promoted and assigned to important posts for reasons other than efficiency. And it wondered how to explain the forced retirement of some sixty "experienced" men at a time when it was requesting funds for an expansion of the foreign service.

But a smooth-running, modern organization will not be achieved merely by eliminating the older "career" men. It will be necessary to bring into the department some new men who have not been contaminated by the snobbery and false social standards that have so long prevailed within the department. We could name several persons of exceptional ability who have been dealing with foreign countries through Lend-Lease, the FEA, or UNRRA who could well be utilized in the State Department. We do not ask that the State Department be dominated by liberals or reformers. But it is not unreasonable to insist that the men who shape our foreign policy be genuinely democratic in their outlook. The next few years will undoubtedly see an upsurge of popular movements throughout the world. It will not be easy for America to adjust itself to the basic changes that are bound to occur. But if we have the wisdom to put into office persons who, regardless of money, color, or social standing, have a broad understanding of world events as well as basic ability and experience, we can face the future with far better hope of a successful foreign policy than has seemed possible in recent years.

Mirror of Our World

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

THE United Nations Charter is a mirror of the present world of national states. It reflects the inner conflict of desire and fear that dominates even the strongest powers and expresses itself on the one hand in an honest effort to achieve security through collective agreement and on the other in a refusal to surrender any of the established attributes of sovereignty and individual power. As long as this conflict exists, the new world organization is bound to be essentially a great-power alliance rather than a world government.

And this is what it is. Power rests with the five most important national states, each of which retains its full sovereign right to prevent any action even by the other four; peace depends upon the continued agreement of the five to maintain peace. The alliance is refined and strengthened by elaborate provisions for settling disputes and for the joint use of force when force becomes necessary. It is supported by the creation of an assembly, with wide powers of investigation and discussion, in which all member nations meet on equal terms; and of a world court to handle judicable disputes. Thus the machinery of collective decision is set up while the reality of sovereign power is maintained.

Such a charter can please no one completely, because what the people of the world profoundly desire is something which will not mirror their conflicts but resolve them, which will dispel their fears and satisfy their hopes. But this desire cannot in the nature of things be fulfilled; the nations must themselves achieve integration and internal maturity before they can create a world organization that is itself mature and unified.

The new United Nations organization is the best possible expression of the present level of world opinion. Isolationists may adopt the tactics—as Senator Wheeler has already indicated—of opposing international commitments by this country in advance of a completed world peace. This, in fact, will be the opposition's most plausible line of attack: Why tie the United States to a plan of enforcement before we know what we shall be called upon to enforce? For there is no end to the evidence in support of this position ready at hand for those who choose to ignore the fact that any hope of mitigating the selfish claims of separate powers rests in a growth of confidence in the strength of a world organization.

Uncompromising internationalists will argue that the veto power of the big five negates the very essence of collective action even in its narrowest context. And logically they will be right. But since the world is not run by logic but by pressures exercised by nations and groups of nations, their objection resolves itself into opposition to any plan now conceivable. The fight against great-power control put up by some of the lesser states was worth making both for the modifications it actually brought about and for the fact that it ended in the generous acquiescence—though not the agreement—of those states, ably led by Australia, which forced the issue. In other words, the smaller states, confronted by the realities which govern relations between nations today, chose ultimately to accept the imperfect instrument which they found was the best they could get.

Reactionaries will attack the charter because it gives great power to Russia and because it presumes a willingness to accept Russian dominance over a large part of the world. Such persons will not be concerned about American plans to extend our own area of control by solidifying a hemispheric bloc and insuring our sole possession of island outposts in the Pacific. These will seem only the natural defensive measures of a great and peaceful nation. But the efforts of Russia to buttress its position both through charter provisions and spheres of influence will be taken as valid grounds for opposition. Certainly it would be a more hopeful omen if Russia were prepared to put all its eggs into the United Nations basket; but since this is not the case, these persons, too, should understand the real meaning of their attitude. Russia has emerged from the war as one of the two greatest powers in the world and it is clear beyond argument that the hope of peace depends upon a continuing union among Russia and the other Allied nations. The only alternative to such a union is not the reduction of Russian power, but ultimate war. It is this that the reactionaries must be forced to admit; this position they must be prepared to defend.

Men who are genuinely eager to have a more democratic organization for world security will not oppose the beginning made at San Francisco. They will accept it for what it is—an instrument for holding together a coalition absolutely essential to the maintenance of peace; for avoiding or settling differences between members; for putting down aggression by force when the great powers agree force is needed. These are primitive requirements for avoiding war in the early future; they correspond roughly to the makeshift provisions for maintaining order in a frontier community. No one holds frontier justice in contempt because it has not achieved the dimensions of a complete system of democratic guarantees and legal procedure. The arrangements set forth in the new Charter, for all the pomp and ceremony with which it was promulgated, are little more than a plan to give frontier justice to a world just emerging from lawlessness. It may succeed in this basic task better than in any attempt, in the present stage of international relationships, to set up a full-fledged system of world government. And those who oppose it because of its apparent imperfections are not in fact working for the more complete system they talk about; they are working for a return to unrestrained international banditry. The United Nations Charter provides a means to end the rule of the horse thief and the border raider in world affairs; it proposes to supplant lynch law with a sheriff and a justice of the peace. We believe the American people will support this effort, and we hope the Senate will follow President Truman's urgent advice and make the United States the first nation to ratify the Charter.

Can Germany Fight Again?

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, June 29

THINKING on Germany has suffered from the vices of a priori reasoning. There has been too much loose and often lazy-minded deduction from vague general principles, too little concrete knowledge. The great virtue of the hearings begun here before Senator Harley M. Kilgore of West Virginia and his colleagues of the "Kilgore committee" is that they are beginning to provide the facts.

The opening sessions have already furnished the first over-all view of the Reich's current assets and capacity for waging war again. These are considerable. Last September President Roosevelt instructed the Foreign Economic Administration to initiate a series of "studies from the economic standpoint of what should be done to limit the power and capacity of Germany to make war in the future." Enough has been learned, Henry H. Fowler, director of the Enemy Branch of the FEA, now tells the Kilgore committee, "to safeguard an estimate that, if we were to leave Germany to its own devices and not to institute a program of economic and industrial disarmament, Germany could be far better prepared for war within five years than she was in 1939."

The effect of bombings has been overemphasized. "The most striking fact that should be underscored in our current thinking," Fowler testified, "is that in late 1944 the German nation achieved the highest level of production in its entire history." Bombing was most effective where it was strategic, but strategic bombing sought out the bottlenecks of the German economy; it did not destroy German industry. "For the most part," Fowler said, "the great majority of the most important plants could today go into operation after very little repair." Fowler's industry-by-industry analysis should be required reading for all who wish to prevent a third German attempt at world conquest.

Dyestuffs is a basic war industry. The Reich has one plant "in perfect operating condition today . . . that can turn out almost as much dye in one year as all the plants in the United States together." German steel capacity is at least 25,000,000 tons, and "practically all the great iron and steel furnaces of Germany are ready for operation or can be in operation with minor repairs." Germany, which consumed less than 4,000,000 tons of petroleum products in 1934, was producing 1,000,000 tons of natural and 5,500,000 tons of synthetic oil ten years later within the 1938 boundaries of the Reich. Oil plants were a high-priority target, "but it is believed," Fowler reported, "that a large part of Germany's 1944 capacity for producing petroleum products can be restored within a brief period." The Reich, with an aluminum-producing capacity of 40,000 tons annually in 1933, ended the war with a capacity of about 250,000 tons. German synthetic-rubber capacity today is still 80 per cent greater than the Reich's imports of rubber and semi-manufactured rubber goods in 1933.

The either-or oversimplification—shall we reduce the Reich to an agricultural country?—plays directly into German hands. The sober facts are that in many basic industries German capacity is in excess of legitimate German domestic and export needs, and considerable de-industrialization is necessary as a measure of security and to create a better-balanced European economy. German machine-tool and machine-tool-building capacity is out of all proportion to its peace-time requirements. This is also the case in steel. The Reich's 25,000,000-ton capacity would have been large enough, Fowler pointed out, to supply half of the United States' peace-time requirements, including those of "the tremendous transportation system, railroads, waterways, and highways necessary to keep together our economic and industrial structure, which is spread over an area sixteen times as large as that of Germany." The Reich cannot use that much steel "except for warfare."

The Kilgore hearings have also provided some insight into German plans to utilize nest eggs abroad to support a Nazi underground and to prepare the way for the revival of an aggressive Reich. Fowler submitted detailed memoranda on the flight of German capital abroad and the extent to which it has penetrated banking, industry, and trade in other countries, notably in Sweden, Spain, Argentina, and Switzerland. Here German plans are aided by the complaisance of the State Department toward Franco and Perón. The Kilgore committee had submitted a comprehensive series of detailed questions to the State Department and elicited a long statement in reply from Assistant Secretary of State Will Clayton. This disclosed, among other things, that the largest number of Axis "spearhead" firms are in Argentina, and that not a single one of these firms has been eliminated despite the Chapultepec pledges on which the Perón regime was ushered into the United Nations. The Franco pattern is repeating itself in the New World. The Fowler and Clayton statements are the strongest of arguments that there must be new and democratic regimes in Spain and Argentina if German plans for a third try are to be defeated.

The Kilgore committee will be neglecting its duty if it rests content with the prepared statements submitted to it. A real investigation is required. There was, for example, a frustrating air of unreality about Clayotn's references to the black list and to our program for replacing Axis firms in Latin America. This replacement program was sabotaged in the Office of the Alien Property Custodian under Leo T. Crowley and withered away months ago. The facts were called to public attention by this correspondent in The Nation of last January 6 in a Washington letter called Fumbling with I. G. Farben, and in PM last winter in the series of editorials Report to the President. It is time the Senate found out how Nazi property and patents have been handled, what influences were brought to bear against the replacement program, and exactly what are the relations between Crowley and the Anglo-German banking firm of the Schröders. Crowley is still drawing the $75,000 a year paid him as head of Standard Gas and Electric, a job given him when the Schröders were the dominant stockholders in the Standard Gas holding-company system. The Schröders were leading bankers for Axis interests in London and New York before the war, and now have an important branch in Buenos Aires. One of their partners, Vlada-Mocarski, an ultra-reactionary White Russian, was appointed American consul in Zurich some months ago by the State Department, a key vantage post with respect to the flight of German capital abroad.

In the machinery of the military control commission in Germany, as in Washington, men closely linked with German cartels and friendly to German business and finance occupy key posts. The memberships of the Technical Industrial Disarmament Committees in the FEA at Washington were disclosed to the Kilgore committee, and they contain the names of many men from big concerns closely linked with I. G. Farben before the war. Testimony before the committee showed that the Germans are planning to utilize these old connections, and it is the duty of the Kilgore committee fully to explore them and to make the facts known. In this connection I want to call attention to an interesting statement on page 534 of the committee transcript, a passage in an FEA memo on German penetration of French finance during the occupation. This says that all enemy banks were put under German administration, including "American banks. The Chase Bank and Morgan et Cie., however, the only two American banks which continued operations, received special treatment."* Why did these two leading American banks receive special treatment from the Germans? The question is of especial interest because Chase is the Rockefeller-Standard Oil bank.

I have no space to do more than praise the wise and statesman-like testimony by Baruch which opened the hearings. Or to do more than touch upon the complex political and social problems involved in ending the threat of renewed German aggression. One FEA memorandum on German rearmament after World War I vividly illustrates how the German General Staff was able to exploit Bolshevik fear of the West to rebuild the Reich's military power while German industry was able to utilize Western capitalist fear of "overproduction" to increase the Reich's economic potential at the expense of its neighbors. The situation after this war is not greatly different. In the political sphere the unity of the big powers is again the first essential. In the economic and social sphere the task is even more difficult. It is the industrial reconstruction of Europe with a view to increasing (1) the potential of Germany's neighbors at the expense of the Reich, and (2) the productivity, the consuming power, and the living standards of the Continent. This is impossible without socialist ownership and control of basic industry in Western Europe, and our chances of that depend on coming elections in France and Belgium and the willingness of Britain and America to permit considerable social reform in our sphere of influence.

The Second League

BY PERCY E. CORBETT

THE San Francisco conference was a good deal like a tug-of-war, with five great states on one end of the rope and a crowd of small ones on the other. The pattern was not perfect, for certain small clients pulled with their big patrons, and once or twice several big powers, without deserting their end of the rope, either went slack or pulled openly in the other direction. This general pattern was to be expected, since the purpose of the conference was to win the consent of small states to something already decided by the great, and since the small were being asked to give up some portion of a sovereignty which the great retained intact. As was also to be expected, the great states won most of the pulls. At decisive points the issue for the small states was between formal prestige on the one side and substantial security on the other. Substantial security won.

The upshot of the struggle was the definitive design of over-all international collaboration after this world war. It is being greeted with some exuberant praise and some muffled cynicism. It deserves neither the one nor the other. Its merits—which are numerous—are the fruit of hard, patient labor by devoted men. Its defects—which, if it be regarded as a system of world government, are obvious—are mostly the product of forces beyond the control of the representatives who met at San Francisco or even of their governments.

The United Nations' power for action, such as it is, is concentrated in the Security Council. The General Assembly, unlike the corresponding body in the League of Nations, is confined to a role of discussion and recommendation. Only in the internal economy of the organization—matters of membership, budget, non-permanent representation in the Security Council, composition of the Economic and Social Council and of the International Court—does it make decisions binding on member states. The clear-cut subordination of this body of fifty to the Security Council of eleven is emphasized by the rule that it may not even make a recommendation on its own initiative concerning a dispute or situation which is being dealt with by the Council.

There is, however, no limitation on the General Assembly's range of discussion so long as it keeps within the scope of the Charter itself. Happily this restriction to the scope of the Charter was all that resulted from the Soviet Union's protest against unlimited exploration by the Assembly. In so far as it excludes examination of matters "essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any state" (Article 2, Paragraph 7), it will be difficult enough to observe or enforce. But as a forum for the ventilation of most problems arising out of the relations of states, the General Assembly undoubtedly has a very broad and very useful function.

Since the equal participation of all members in actual decision-making is politically impossible, there is much to be said for having one fully representative body which, because its deliberations do not result in binding decisions or call imperatively for action, can range over the whole field of the United Nations' activity. Some will revile it, as they reviled the League of Nations, as a debating society; but a debating society which doesn't set out to be a parliament or government can render great service.

It is easy, however, to exaggerate the operative powers with which the Charter endows even the Security Council. There is in fact no shifting of power away from its present possessors. When called upon by a vote of seven in the Security Council, members of the United Nations will lend to it a portion of their power. The portion is to be determined by agreements which have still to be made between the Security Council and all members. The seven votes will have to include that of each of the five great states. The question whether the Security Council can use any power at all thus depends on the consent of each of these five, and the question whether that consent will be given will in each case be decided like any other question of major national policy. That is the indisputable ground for the statement that the effective operation of the United Nations as keeper of the peace will at all times be conditional on the agreement of the five permanent members of the Security Council.

Now these five members could by their united action keep the peace independently of any general organization. One essential question, therefore, in assessing the merits of the San Francisco structure, is whether the organization will help materially to keep the great powers in agreement or will lend any greater efficacy to their action when they are agreed.

There are several ways in which the existence and activity of the United Nations should assist in keeping agreement among the great powers. Through its economic and social work, as well as through its machinery for the discussion, conciliation, and adjudication of disputes, the new league is calculated to reduce the number of issues developing to the point where they may sharply divide the "Big Five." Even where sharp division is threatened, the fact of having assumed a world-wide obligation of peaceful settlement, and the position of leadership in an association devoted to that purpose, will weigh among the factors making for amiable adjustment. They will not necessarily be prevailing influences; but they will count.

As for efficacy of action once agreement is achieved, the new mechanism will far surpass anything that could be devised on the spur of the moment. There will be a Military Staff Committee which, like the Security Council to which it is responsible, will function continuously. This will have in readiness plans for the strategy and direction of any military action which the Council may decide to be necessary. A mere alliance of the great powers could, it is true, maintain such a committee; but the Military Staff Committee of the United Nations, once the obligatory special agreements with all members have been worked out, will have at its immediate disposal forces, bases, and facilities which a limited alliance could only exact at the price of lives, resources, and precious time. Here is one palpable improvement on the machinery of the League of Nations. Given a modicum of good faith on the part of its leading members, the United Nations will save much misery and pay generous dividends in security.

One incisive question is being asked about these arrangements for preventing aggression. It arises out of the constant possibility that a single great power may veto action. If that happens, would action taken by another member, who is convinced that justice and prudence alike demand military measures, constitute an illegal use of force? If so, is not this an undesirable limitation of the legal freedom even of the greatest members? Certainly no legal enforcement can be undertaken by the organization itself over the veto. But the question is whether action outside the organization also becomes illegal. The Charter does not make it quite clear whether such a case would be covered by the liberty allowed to regional associates (Article 52-54) or by the reservation of "the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense" (Article 51); for the legality of action taken under regional arrangements—other than those directed against states on the Axis side in this war—or alleged to be taken in self-defense, is itself subject to the decision of the Security Council. An authoritative interpretation on this point may well be called for in the process of ratification.

The Statute of the new International Court of Justice is an almost verbatim reproduction of the Statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice established in 1920. It preserves the vices of the previous structure. Most notable among these is the idea of representation which finds expression in the institution of ad hoc judges. Unlike national courts, where a judge with a special interest in one of the parties withdraws from the case, this tribunal not only allows a judge who is a national of one of the parties to remain on the bench but invites a party not represented by a judge in the existing court to appoint one specially for the case in hand. Needless to say, this detracts from the judicial character of the tribunal and will be a standing impediment to the growth of a tradition of impartial detachment.

It is a pity, too, that individuals are not to be admitted as parties before the court. It is open only to states. The danger of frivolous or provocative applications could have been met by preliminary screening. With this continuing limitation, the court can hardly serve for the protection of those "fundamental human rights" which the United Nations are pledged to promote.

These defects, along with the absence of compulsory jurisdiction, stem from that same general reservation of sovereignty that runs, at least for the benefit of the great states, through the entire Charter. They should not blind us to the fact that the previous World Court rendered great service in the peaceful settlement of disputes and in the fuller development and definition of international law, and that the new tribunal can be expected to carry on its excellent work. The addition of the Soviet Union to its supporters may have profoundly beneficial consequences, particularly if this means the full participation of Russia in the development of a more certain law of nations.

In this connection the new rule (Article 94 of the Charter) which allows recourse to the Security Council against a state failing to carry out a judgment of the court will attract much attention. It is clearly intended to add weight to decisions. But it will need to be carefully administered lest it engender a practice of deferring satisfaction of judgment until the winning party lodges complaint with the Council. This could develop into a political appeal over judicial decision, and the resulting position would be worse than the present. For many years, without any organized sanction, the record of fulfilment of awards handed down by international tribunals has been remarkably good. It is greatly to be hoped that the Security Council will not allow the new procedure to degenerate into a mode of reopening cases in a totally different type of forum.

Great hopes attach to the Economic and Social Council, and the statement is heard that this new agency is destined eventually to surpass even the Security Council in importance. Commentators speak as if corresponding machinery had been entirely lacking in the League of Nations. This does scant justice to the battery of social, economic, and financial agencies which under the League rendered highly valued service to the community of nations. It also ignores the fact that this council will, like similar agencies at Geneva, have to make its way by persuasion. In common with the Assembly under which it acts, it lacks coercive power. Yet, as sharpened and extended at San Francisco, the United Nations social and economic arrangements do promise new initiative and new coordination.

At Dumbarton Oaks no provision at all was made for supervising the government of dependent peoples. This gap was filled at San Francisco by the "International Trusteeship System." This is designed to replace the League in relation to the existing mandated territories, and to exercise an advisory supervision over certain territories detached from enemy states as a result of the war. It will perform the same function for territories voluntarily brought under it by the states now responsible for their administration—hardly a likely contingency.

The most remarkable features in this part of the text are (1) formal recognition by the colonial powers of the obligation to insure the political, economic, social, and educational advancement of all their colonial peoples and (2) their agreement to transmit regularly information to the United Nations on their success in this respect. True, this reporting obligation, which is quite independent of the trusteeship system, is subject "to such limitations as security and constitutional considerations may require"; but it may serve to bring some most wholesome light on the complex details of colonial administration.

Everything considered, the San Francisco Charter merits much more than a grudging support which merely accepts it as, "with all its imperfections," better than nothing. In recent months we have again been furnished with the strongest evidence that for better or worse men still desire to live in separate states each flaunting at least some rags of sovereignty. So long as it continues to be a dominant human desire not to merge in one universal community, it is perhaps an error to describe as "imperfections" those elements in any plan of association which flow inevitably from this reservation. The imperfections would appear to reside in the present disposition of man and their remedy to lie in processes deeper than the mechanics of organization.

Crippling the Disabled Veteran

BY EDWARD M. MAISEL

THE latest canard used in the drive to split veterans from labor is that labor is the chief obstacle to the employment of seriously disabled veterans. Industry, by contrast, is represented as their beneficent protector. The controversy revolves at present around "homework," that is, industrial work done in private homes. With the return to civilian life of more and more disabled service men, this issue will be increasingly exploited in the anti-labor campaign. A recent open meeting called to discuss the future of New York State's 31,450 homeworkers, attended by representatives of the C. I. O., the A. F. of L., and employer groups, exploded into turmoil and bitterness.

Only the seriously disabled veterans are affected, but we face today the greatest number of severely handicapped ex-service men in our history. The number is unprecedented, first, because of the magnitude of the war and of the forces engaged, and, secondly, because modern medical and surgical methods have kept alive many wounded men who would formerly have died. Blood plasma, the sulphas and penicillin, and air transportation have tremendously increased a severely wounded man's chances of survival. A third reason for the large number of permanently disabled lies in the nature of the new weapons. Booby traps, mines, high-explosive shells, and flame-throwers do not make nice clean wounds: they shatter arms and legs; they pierce vital nerve centers.

Although no statistics on the seriously disabled in the armed forces are as yet available, it has been announced that 1,500,000 handicapped men have been discharged from the services, and it is authoritatively estimated that another 1,000,000 may be expected before victory over Japan. Eleven thousand amputation cases have been reported already, compared to the total of 4,403 in World War I. This category, of course, does not include the soldier deafened when his tank blew up, the sailor burned in a sea of flaming oil, the marine suffering from a recurrent fever, or the paratrooper stunned and shocked by an ill-fated landing. The blind, the deaf, and the speechless, the paralyzed, the infected, and the shocked, will mount up to a formidable total.

There is also an astounding number of persons who have been disabled by industrial accidents during the war—2,250,000 in 1944 alone. They are labor's "veterans in overalls."

Moderately handicapped veterans, who form the majority of the disabled, are being encouraged to find a normal place in industry. Whatever a man's partial disability, a satisfactory mechanical appliance or sensory aid, together with expert vocational advice, will fit him for a position alongside able-bodied workers. For the severely handicapped the choice is more limited. If a veteran is prevented by his extreme disability from pursuing a normal vocation, he must enter the badly regulated, badly exploited, antiquated system of industrial "homework." Homework flourishes in many different industries, of which artificial flowers, buttons, jewelry, gloves, embroideries, knitted clothing, and handkerchiefs may be considered typical. Hand-finishing of clothing, carding of buttons, rolling handkerchief hems, putting slides on shoulder straps, and the like are relatively simple processes, and can be done at home under conditions adapted to the invalid. Such work is usually paid for at piece rates, per article, per dozen, or per gross.

The abuses which have made homework the scourge of modern industry are fairly well known. The practice has developed into a system of chain sweatshops in which able-bodied as well as disabled workers are widely employed. Control of home workshops is difficult, and the sanitary conditions and workmanship may not meet consumer standards. The wages and hours of the unorganized homeworker are often far below standard and constitute a standing threat to workers employed in factories. The homeworker must frequently provide his own tools and have someone call for and deliver his work, or himself pay the shipping costs—in all these ways bearing a portion of his employer's overhead. Or he may be called upon to perform work that is physically dangerous under the circumstances of home employment. Or he is obliged to share his meager profit with the subcontractor who handles distribution.

These abuses certainly invite reform and indicate that homework should be confined to the severely disabled. Within the Department of Labor, however, certain influential elements have proposed a policy which aims not to correct the abuses of homework or to control the system but rather to abolish it entirely. The administrative complexity and excessive cost of a program of regulation are the excuses offered for this policy. It was supported by the Eleventh National Conference on Labor Legislation, the annual gathering of state labor commissioners called by the Secretary of Labor, which in December, 1944, adopted a resolution declaring unequivocally that "the system itself must be abolished."

Thus far nineteen states have enacted some kind of prohibition or regulation of industrial homework, varying from New Jersey's comprehensive law to Ohio's loose regulation, which applies only when work is done in a home by persons not members of the family. (New York's proposed new measure would prevent any group of severely injured veterans of this war from undertaking a homework cooperative.) Two cornerstones of the federal government's control of homework are the Public Contract (Walsh-Healey) Act of 1936 and the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938. The former, which prohibits industrial homework in all government contracts of more than $10,000, has acted as a real curb during the present war boom but with the return of civilian goods will lose part of its effect. It is the Fair Labor Standards Act, therefore, which represents the most decisive step toward abolition. Under authority granted him by this act, the Administrator of the Wage-and-Hour and Public-Contracts Division issued orders prohibiting industrial homework in six major industries in which it had been practiced. These orders took small account of the severely disabled, who to obtain special homework certificates must either have been engaged in the industry before a fixed date—as, for example, April 1, 1941—or be under the supervision of a state vocational-rehabilitation agency or a sheltered workshop.

It is clear from these orders that the official policy toward homework is abolition rather than intelligent control, that the ultimate aim is to throw out the baby with the bath. Thus the orders seek to limit homework to those handicapped who were engaged in it before an established date. It makes no provision for those who, because of a tolerable financial condition before that date, or because they were not psychologically or physically ready for work at that time, or because they have since become disabled, are now unemployed. It makes scant and uncertain provision for the great new army of severely disabled veterans and war-workers. To insist that they remain under a government vocational-rehabilitation agency or a sheltered workshop is to condemn them to a state of perpetual training without graduation. Are they to be excluded from the normal social-security benefits—unemployment compensation, old-age annuities, and survivors' benefits for their families—for which only the bona fide employees of a company are eligible?

Certain peculiar circumstances attending the issuance of these orders should be noted. At the public hearing before issuance of the first order, covering the jewelry manufacturing industry, neither labor nor any other interested group recommended prohibition of homework to the seriously disabled. In fact, Morris Borodkin, the C. I. O. representative, made a careful distinction on this point: "I don't think the word 'abolish' is correct. We should probably say prohibition of homework except under very strict supervision and except in cases of the infirm and aged." Moreover, no limiting date had been mentioned by anyone at the public hearing. What happened behind the scenes?

The six orders were clearly in danger from Congress, since they violated the Fair Labor Standards Act, which enjoins the administrator to prevent curtailment of employment opportunities for the handicapped. To forestall Congressional intervention and to stem the rising flood of misery among the handicapped, they were later amended so that the requirement of having been employed in an industry before a fixed date may now be relaxed in cases of "unusual hardship." This dodge has served to rescue the orders from Congressional action, but whether the arbitrary assumption of power to grade misery is legitimate may be doubted. In practice, "unusual hardship" has too often come to mean unusual hardship to the disabled worker's Congressman, who may be harassed to the point of interceding for a handicapped person needing a homework certificate. A great many persons, unless they are hardy individuals, are discouraged even from applying for certificates by the wording of the blank. In Gemsco v. Walling, test case of a seventh order, referring to embroiderers, the Labor Department soft-pedaled its handling of the disabled, and the Supreme Court, in upholding the validity of the order, February 26, 1945, took for granted that ample provision was being made for persons unable to go to a factory.

It is important to remember that the seriously wounded veteran is not well compensated for his injuries. He cannot provide a decent living for himself and his family on what he receives from the government. If he is discharged as totally disabled, he receives $115 a month for himself and his family. Moreover, many a veteran is rated medically as only partially disabled who from an employer's standpoint is totally disabled. There is no increase in a veteran's payment on the basis of increasing disability incident to age, although a man may find a handicap more disabling at fifty or sixty than he found it at twenty-five. Nor is there any provision for increasing payments to meet a rising cost of living. Seriously disabled industrial workers, despite workmen's compensation, fare even worse than their brothers in uniform. They are only a few notches on the economic scale above the disease-stricken, who are treated as the discards of society and objects of charity.

Even if government payments to the disabled were a good deal larger than they are, even if they can in the future be raised, the fundamental importance of homework to the handicapped veteran remains. Work is his sole method of participating in the life of his fellows; it is the only way he can be rehabilitated within the economic framework. A hopeless invalid who is rigged up by means of a halter in bed so that he can be gainfully employed in making fish lures is thereby transformed from a bitter, anti-social outcast into a busy, self-respecting worker. Gravely wounded veterans now being discharged from the armed forces are urged to follow some home occupation.

What is urgently needed is a comprehensive, well-administered program for bringing home employment under strict control and confining it to the severely disabled. Such a program must include (1) systematic and coordinated licensing of all employers of homeworkers, (2) an expanded and more stringent certification procedure in the Labor Department, based on physical examination under departmental auspices of every applicant for a homework certificate, (3) education of homebound people in their rights and prerogatives by government inspectors, whose work has too long been limited to simple policing, (4) sharp definition of the fields in which homework is permissible, with the exclusion of sanitary items and items whose manufacture involves physical danger for the worker, (5) organization and education of disabled homeworkers by the labor unions and the establishment of a bureau for this purpose within the union.

The employment rights of the disabled veteran are now being noisily trumpeted by manufacturers whose object is not the integration of homework but its flagrant abuse: if they succeed, they will reduce him to the status of a sweatshop slave. The human stakes in this problem are so great that nothing will excuse labor, industry, or government for failure to solve it.

Guadalcanal Pays Off

BY WILLIAM J. CALDWELL

[On December 7, 1941, William Caldwell saw most of American sea power sunk at Pearl Harbor, most of American air power blown to pieces at Hickam Field. In June, 1942, he was in on the first American victory—the Battle of Midway—when airplanes stopped the Japanese fleet that was headed for our West Coast. From July, 1942, until March, 1943, Caldwell flew in the Southwest Pacific with the famous Eleventh Bombardment Group, stacking up sixty combat missions in the Guadalcanal campaign. In November, 1943, he was medically discharged after having received the Distinguished Flying Cross, the Air Medal, the Purple Heart, and a Presidential Unit Citation. Last spring Caldwell returned to the Pacific as a special observer for Army Air Forces Headquarters. He found a very different kind of war from the war of 1942. The Nation herewith prints extracts from letters Caldwell wrote to one of its editors.]

HAMILTON FIELD, CALIFORNIA. Today, we were briefed by the Army Transport Command for the trip across. It was done with a speed and efficiency the airlines would find hard to beat. In one building in three quick packed hours we were run through the business of medical, survival, and administrative information and priority clearances. After a half-hour lecture on "ditching"—how to get out of an aircraft down at sea and how to stay alive afterward on a tiny life raft—the briefing officer ended up by saying: "No need to worry very much. In two years we've lost only one plane. And that didn't ditch. It just blew to pieces in midair."

San Francisco. Still waiting. This makes the tenth day. Head winds between Honolulu and here are keeping the planes grounded. The last plane out took nineteen hours instead of thirteen to reach Honolulu and landed with gas tanks reading "empty." At the front guys must be swearing: "Where the hell are those replacements?" "Why the devil can't they get those spare parts out here?" And all these ten days the replacements and the spare parts have been sitting here, labeled No. 1 priority, waiting for the winds to change.

The walls of the office where all passengers must check in twice daily are bulging. I asked some of the men where they were headed for. "The Philippines—Manila." "And you?" "The Marianas—Guam." . . . "Iwo." . . . "Kwajalein." . . . "Okinawa." . . . "Honolulu." . . . "Australia." . . . "Hell, I'm just a lousy Pfc. They don't tell me nothin'. Just give me a number. My guess is I'm off to Yokohama!"

I remembered that back in 1942 there weren't very many places an American could go. Japan had them all. And plane schedules had been kind of sketchy then, because there weren't many planes.

The man behind me was a corporal in the Quartermaster Corps. I turned around and asked him where he was headed.

"Me? I'm going to Guadalcanal."

That hit me hard. That chap going to Guadalcanal! And he in the Quartermaster Corps. I suppose that is what Guadalcanal is now—a supply dump, perhaps an unimportant supply dump at that. I guess that rutted, bloody, muddy road where they hung that famous sign KILL THE BASTARDS (remember?) is a paved highway now. I guess the stinking, dripping jungle that surrounded Henderson Field has been pushed back. Our elaborate foxholes where we sweated and waited and were scared have fallen in by now. Maybe when this corporal gets out to Guadalcanal he will walk around sightseeing, looking for places where men died.

Hickam Field, Hawaii. Held up for twenty-four hours by higher priorities; so have had time to look around Hickam, which was my home for a year. Everything has changed and grown beyond belief. We always thought of Hickam as the greatest, finest, most beautiful military airfield in all the world. Today the old Hickam would look pretty small. Whereas in 1941 one man could tell you the number and history of every plane on the field, it now takes three dozen men—and even they can't keep pace with the hundreds of ships parked here, arriving and departing for all corners of the Pacific day and night—bombers, fighters, fighter-bombers, cargo planes, hospital planes, passenger planes. Today Hickam is no longer beautiful. The slapdash, ugly camouflage paint we smeared on hangars and barracks has peeled and chipped. The black tar with which we blacked out every window has been removed only here and there. And on the immaculate lawns where we "airmen" used to sweat, picking weeds, mowing, and watering, are endless ugly control shacks, telephone shacks, supply rooms.

I went to look for the place where Johnnie had been killed at my side as we ran for cover on December 7. That was the first time I had ever been next to a man when he was killed by gunfire. I thought I would never, never forget it. Now I couldn't even recognize the spot where it happened. I walked down toward the ball diamond and the parking lot, where the men of the North Wing had been slaughtered in their sleeping clothes as they ran from the burning barracks. A schoolroom and a tailor shop covered that massacre ground. All that remained of the Seventh was a lot of old shell and machine-gun scars on the barracks walls.

I went to Honolulu to see what had happened there. I found it was no longer the relaxed, pretty "Paradise of the Pacific" but America's grossest, noisiest, greediest boom town. A two-lane highway used to run through practically open country from Hickam to Honolulu. Today that road is a six-lane highway, bordered all along its eight miles by immense warehouses, housing developments, camps, and airfields.

In downtown Honolulu, devoted not so long ago to such lovely things as siesta hours, the streets are jammed with hurrying people, most of them young and in navy whites. At the Alexander Young, once a leisurely, pleasant-enough hotel, a good place to drop in for a tall cool one, a long line waits patiently to get near the bar. When someone at the bar shows definite signs of getting off his stool, a "traffic cop" claps his hands—once for one free seat, twice for two—and the girl at the other end of the room lets one or two thirsty souls pass the rope. The ration is two drinks a customer. Choice: island imitation gin or island imitation whiskey, concoctions distilled from sugar cane. The bars are open from 2 to 4:30 p.m.

Johnston Island. We landed just in time for an early breakfast on this tiny atoll, so small there is hardly room on it for a full-sized landing strip. It's a navy island, and so the housing and food are good. So are the weather and the swimming and the fishing. But the monotony must be soul-wearing. The place is not a mile square, but it's an all-important stop on our air-supply route across the never-ending Pacific.

Kwajalein Atoll. Coming in for the landing at Kwajalein we all glued our noses to the windows of the plane and gazed out at those grim tiny stretches of coral that had cost us such ghastly high losses. These atolls have no charm. The beaches still are cluttered with the wreckage of battle—smashed enemy pillboxes made of stone two feet thick with slits for the guns, and wrecked landing craft and "ducks." Every square yard of this vital ground must have cost a casualty.

Kwajalein is hot and dirty and dusty. The men stationed here are disgruntled most of the time. It's in the backwash of the war now—a staging base for the refueling of planes crisscrossing the Pacific, taking out fighters, bringing back wounded. Service on any of these atolls for more than a year is in some ways worse than combat.

Saipan. This island is enormous compared to the atolls of Kwajalein and Johnston. It has hills and mountains—and plenty of room to move around and escape your immediate surroundings. The climate is tropical all right, but there is always a steady breeze from the ocean to keep you reasonably cool.

A couple of us sat ranch fashion on the rails outside the passenger terminal and watched the Saipan world go by. Transport planes landed continually, carrying mail, supplies, wounded men. Their arrival and departure aroused little interest in the folks working around. A few miles away on Isley Field we could see B-29's taking off. For an hour they kept on—two at a time from parallel runways. They were off to bomb Japan, a Saipan man told us, and it would be sixteen hours before they got back. "Three thousand miles over an empty ocean, non-stop. Poor bastards. Hope they all get back. But they won't."

A C-54 landed, and suddenly a stream of jeeps, ambulances, trucks, and brass hats rushed out to meet it. A cynic sitting next to us observed that with all that fuss there must be women aboard.

There were. Thirty women piled out. Nurses. Nurses from Manila who had been prisoners of the Japs for three years. I went over to talk to them and found there was nothing I could say. On the whole they look surprisingly well. Since they had been rescued they had had a chance to eat plenty of canned food, to bathe, get into clean clothes, and—boon to women—lay their hands on some make-up, and wash and set their hair. They said these were almost the first things they did. Not having anything to say, I casually offered one of them an apple I had in my field jacket.

The girl held it in her hands, just looking at it, silently. She called to her friends to look at it. A girl from Oregon began to cry. It had been so long since they'd seen an American apple. Not one of them would bite into it.

Our jeep came and we went sightseeing along a four-lane highway up a long, winding, steep hill to Island Headquarters. From there we could look down and see all the waterfront and the harbor and in the distance huge airfields. Hundreds of merchant ships and scores of warships lay at anchor—loading and unloading supplies. I remembered the early Guadalcanal days when merchant ships carrying our supplies came in swiftly and silently, stealing in at night, one at a time. I remembered those days on the Canal when we had been short of men, short of food, short of planes, short of gasoline. We'd had supplies piled on the beach; here they had rows of enormous warehouses. We'd had a few tents; here were rows of Quonsets.

There was a difference, too, in the spirit of the men fighting out here. They have a harder war to fight than we had—not physically harder, because they are better supplied and are winning—but a much harder war mentally. They curse and gripe about conditions and petty things which we would have considered luxurious. And their bravery is a more lucid, colder bravery than ours. We fought to keep from being killed or captured. The enemy was at our throats, on our backs, above us in the air and around us and under us in the sea. We fought viciously and full of hate. Many of the men out here have never seen a Jap. And the magnificent airmen of the B-29's fly fifteen hundred miles from the peaceful, pleasant Marianas to strike at the Jap from above his horrid, freezing, cruel homeland. And maybe they won't come back. If they could stay on Saipan they would be safe. It's like living in New York and leaving a nice warm house to go out in the rain and cold and walk to Yonkers for a fist fight, and then walk home. I would find that kind of war very difficult.

The Fight Over Jackson Hole

BY IRVING BRANT

FOR the last nineteen years John D. Rockefeller, Jr., has been trying to make a million-dollar gift to the American people. He has not yet succeeded, but he has spent $500,000 just for the privilege of holding the gift in readiness. This is only one incredible incident in the story of the effort to preserve a part of the beautiful and historic Jackson Hole country of northwestern Wyoming for the benefit and pleasure of the nation.

The public received a faint inkling of the campaign being waged against the effort when President Roosevelt last December gave a pocket veto to a bill abolishing the Jackson Hole National Monument. The bill had slipped through Congress on the last day of the session. His veto memorandum cleared up most of the misrepresentations about the matter, but not all of them. The issue is coming up again in the present Congress, where four bills bearing on the subject have been introduced.

Mr. Rockefeller bought 34,000 acres to give to the nation after a visit to Jackson Hole in 1926. He had received pledges of support from local business men, the Governor of Wyoming, and the state's delegation in Congress. When he had spent his million dollars, a joyful community supported bills introduced by Senators Carey and O'Mahoney to make the Rockefeller lands and portions of the adjoining national forest a part of Grand Teton National Park, for whose magnificent mountains it forms a foreground. Congress was about to pass these bills when the Bureau of the Budget objected to a five-year reimbursement of Teton County for the loss of $10,000 a year in taxes on the Rockefeller lands. That blocked action, and opened the way to a propaganda drive which, in accordance with a rule that now seems well established, gained in strength as it became more vicious and preposterous.

The master minds behind the drive were the Jackson Hole office of the Forest Service and a former employee of the office who had become president of the Jackson, Wyoming, bank. Cattlemen's organizations and big game hunters, hostile to the whole national park system, were drawn in. The Teton County government had, of course, a legitimate grievance. As Rockefeller kept on paying taxes through the years, the impression grew that the county had a vested interest in him. There was also a hope that he would get tired of waiting and throw his land on the market, where it would provide pickings for speculators at ten cents on the dollars.

President Roosevelt upset these plans in 1943 by creating by proclamation the Jackson Hole National Monument, comprising 170,308 acres of public lands, 33,795 in the Rockefeller tract, and 16,101 in other private holdings. The private lands were included "subject to all valid exisiting rights," which means that the government has no control over them. They have the same status inside the monument as if they were outside. Secretary Ickes announced that all grazing permits on the lands taken in would be continued through the lifetime of the holders and their immediate families. Nevertheless, a nation-wide propaganda campaign was undertaken for the abolition of the monument. Wyoming settlers were pictured as being dispossessed of their homes by a ruthless bureaucracy. Mr. Rockefeller was accused of trying to unload a white elephant on the public. It was claimed that the President had usurped power by doing what had been done eighty-three times before by various Presidents, most notably by Theodore Roosevelt.

As the result of this false propaganda a bill to abolish the monument, introduced by Representative Barrett (Republican) of Wyoming, was passed by the House of Representatives. In the Senate it was passed as a favor to Senator O'Mahoney (Democrat); everybody knew that it would be killed by a veto. Now, in the new Congress, Chairman Peterson of the House Public Lands Committee has introduced a bill to reimburse Teton County for lost taxes out of the receipts of Yellowstone and Teton parks and the Jackson Hole monument, and to confirm the promised grazing rights. Representative Barrett has introduced three bills: to abolish the monument; to take away the President's power to establish national monuments; and to turn the administration of the lands in the Jackson Hole National Monument over to the Forest Service.

Congress seems unfriendly to the first Barrett bill, and the offering of the last one is hard to explain. The Forest Service in Washington is not a party to it and has ordered the Jackson Hole office to "lay off" the whole fight. When the Jackson Hole employees of the Forest Service obeyed the President's order to turn government lands, buildings, and equipment over to the monument staff, every particle of plumbing and telephone equipment was torn out of the buildings. They did this, it is explained, by mistake; but who asked the Wyoming Congressman to offer a bill which would have virtually no effect except to block the move to reimburse Teton County for tax losses out of national-park and national-monument receipts?

Barrett's move seems to indicate that he, or his banker adviser, the former Forest Service employee, has lost his head. It would be shrewder politics, and far sounder policy, to get behind the Peterson bill while Congress, the President, and the Bureau of the Budget are sympathetic to the idea of helping Teton County. There is an old saying: "Time to take cake is when cake's passing."

The bill to repeal the President's power to establish national monuments reflects the cattle industry's hostility to land conservation for public use and enjoyment. Even a politically hostile federal judge in Wyoming—a former secretary to an old-time Republican Senator, the late Francis Warren—recently upheld the President's action when it was subjected to a court test. His opinion was full of malice and sound law.

The Antiquities Act of 1906, which was passed to assure the preservation of aboriginal ruins, authorizes the President to proclaim these and "other objects of historic and scientific interest" to be national monuments. It is argued that the act was intended to cover only small objects, since it provides that the area set aside shall be the smallest compatible with the care and preservation of the objects to be preserved.

Theodore Roosevelt, however, who signed the Antiquities Act, used it to establish the Mt. Olympus and Grand Canyon national monuments, each of more than 600,000 acres. President Hoover set up one of more than 2,000,000 acres. Congressman Lacey of Iowa, author of the Antiquities Act, described it as "my bill for the preservation of aboriginal ruins and places of scenic and scientific interest upon the public domain, under which the Petrified Forest, the Olympic Elk Range Reserve, and about 200 places of ethnological interest have been designated as 'monuments' and preserved to the public." Thus the man who wrote the provision about the size of national monuments approved one three times as large as Jackson Hole. The fact is that the words "objects of historic and scientific interest," and the power given to the President to proclaim national monuments, were not in the original antiquities bill at all, but were taken over from a bill sponsored by Lacey in 1904 for the establishment of national parks by proclamation.

The Antiquities Act has proved to be one of the wisest and most useful conservation laws ever passed, and all Americans who cherish the wonder spots of nature should join in protecting it from emasculation or repeal.

In the Wind

J. H. McLAURIN, president of the United States Wholesale Grocers' Association, has sent a letter to all members of the association urging them to "align" their Congressmen against H. R. 2232 and S. 101, which would authorize establishment of a permanent FEPC.

THE CONNECTICUT ECONOMIC COUNCIL devoted its Fortnightly Letter for June 18 to an article entitled Why 60,000,000 Jobs? It consisted of a long quotation from Samuel B. Pettengill to the effect that full employment could be achieved only by abolishing the machine age, followed by the council's own conclusions, to wit: "The blind (or selfish) politicians and reformers are misleading the blind by failing to recognize that we are not going to have 60,000,000 jobs available in the decade immediately following the end of the war. . . . What will be the number of those who are able and willing to work and for whom no jobs are immediately available no one can figure exactly. It may reasonably run to five or six million persons. . . . Americans, because of our war record, have come to believe in the impossible."

THE ALABAMA TEMPERANCE ALLIANCE has published a list of Jews, Greeks, and Italians who have liquor licenses in Birmingham, with this comment: "The iniquitous business in which these foreign elements so congenially engage is not excused by the fact that some of these licensees were born in America, or that some of them have sons in our armed services. The liquor and beer trades are inherently foreign to America; . . . they are destructive of everything that is fine and clean and wholesome in Alabama's culture. . . . The liquor traffic . . . makes its attacks upon the most valuable assets we have—human values."

DR. OTTO KOECHER, former Nazi consul general in Barcelona, has taken a villa on the Swiss side of Lake Geneva.

J. H. HOFMEYR, South African Minister of Education, has been rebuked by the National Union of South African Students for proposing separate universities for students of different color.

LEGISLATIVE MEMO: H. R. 1925, which would forbid racial discrimination on interstate common carriers, is in the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, headed by Clarence F. Lea of California.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. We will pay $1 for each item accepted—EDITORS THE NATION.]

BOOKS and the ARTS

THE MYSTIC EXPERIENCE

BY LOUISE BOGAN

MYSTICISM transcends dogma; and mystics, however orthodox their basic "faith" may be, undergo experiences based squarely on personal, human emotion. There is, therefore, a good deal of non-conformity about them; and in periods when organized religion has become thoroughly institutionalized, we hear very little concerning mysticism or the mystics. The Catholic church has recently shown signs of attempting to soften the institutional rigidity which for a long time has characterized its course. "The Soul Afire: Revelations of the Mystics," edited by H. A. Reinhold (Pantheon, $3.50), is dedicated to Jacques Maritain, and includes excerpts from the Old Testament (Westminster Version) and from Plato, as well as from the Church Fathers, St. Augustine and St. Thomas Aquinas. It places George Herbert and John Donne beside Gerard Hopkins, St. Teresa of Avila, and St. John of the Cross.

Father Reinhold, writing within a nihil obstat, in his preface makes an intelligent distinction between true mysticism and that "spiritualism and theosophy" which often gets mixed up with it in modern minds. He knows the charge of hysteria that can be brought against mystic experience by modern psychology; and he understands the difference between mystic experience and that experience of diffuse pantheism so frequently mistaken for the genuine mystic article. "The aim and content of Christian mysticism is not self or nature, but God." Mystics do not wish to wrench God to their own selfish uses, as do workers in "the occult"; nor do they wish to sink themselves romantically into nature. And the charge of a pathological state can be countered by the fact that mysticism can be known by its fruits, and those fruits are far from "pathological." Mystics have shown themselves to be marvels of practical "efficiency." William James called St. Ignatius "one of the most powerfully practical human engines that ever lived," and the two St. Catherines, as well as St. Teresa, were certainly tireless planners, able administrators, and sensible and firm heads of organizations.

The editor's purpose is to show the mystics' development through certain graded stages. We are not thrown immediately into the white light of complete mystical ecstasy, but are judiciously led through varied experiences of these men and women. The selections are rather long and of course closely resemble one another. And in spite of the inclusion of "moderns," the old-fashioned orthodox stiffness of tone continues to prevail. It seems likely that this stiffness will prevail in books of this nature so long as men like Santayana and poets like Blake, Rimbaud, Baudelaire, Rilke, and T. S. Eliot are excluded, for one reason or another. The great triumphs of the spirit here described correspond exactly to that integration of the personality sometimes brought about by modern therapy. The experience of certain poets corresponds exactly to the vision of the saints. So it does little good to bring into notice the childish, pietistic mediéval ramblings of, say, Mechtild of Magdeburg, while leaving out the obvious likeness between T. S. Eliot, in his later phase, and St. John of the Cross.

The reader who is somewhat baffled by the book as a whole can go to the modern works on mysticism—by Evelyn Underhill, von Hügel, and others—generously mentioned by the editor in his introduction. "That shallow rationalism which regards the data on which we can reason as a fixed quantity known to all, and which bases itself on formal logic, utterly unsuited to a spiritual view of things"—it is this mode of thought which has marked the modern mind in a rather barren way. An understanding of what mysticism is, not only its claims, but what it has actually accomplished "toward rendering life more spacious and abundant"; a realization of "that staunchless compassion for all life which the mystic has always realized as a direct intuition of his eternal unity with all being"—such understanding and realization are refreshing to come upon, when modern man is weary of working with that heavy tool, the will alone.

City Planning

NEW ARCHITECTURE AND CITY PLANNING. A Symposium. Edited by Paul Zucker. Philosophical Library. $10.

CITY DEVELOPMENT. Studies in Disintegration and Renewal. By Lewis Mumford. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

WHEN DEMOCRACY BUILDS. By Frank Lloyd Wright. University of Chicago Press. $4.

EUROPE has to rebuild its destroyed cities: a tragic and magnificent chance. Ours is a more confusing task: in the hour of triumph, to confess failure. Great are our achievements, and they have saved the world; yet the men who "made this country what it is" were neither generous nor wise. Our cities suffer, not from devastation, but from blight; and the blight, unchecked, would rot our civilization. City planning is our next campaign in the unending global war.

By city planning we no longer mean real-estate development, utilities, or even "the City Beautiful." City planning is more than business, engineering, sanitation, architecture, and administration; it is a synthesis of all human activities, spiritual as well as material.

Frank Lloyd Wright and Lewis Mumford have long been fighting that great crusade. But they are not alone. "New Architecture and City Planning," a symposium with some sixty contributors, treats of limited technical subjects—such as the use of plywood, plastics, and glass, and the future of ocean liners (if they have any); but it deals also with "the sociological basis of city and regional planning." The work is well conceived and adequately executed. It did not shake my distrust of the symposium method. The contributions—and some of them are extremely able—are too short for thorough treatment. On the few subjects in which I could claim first-hand knowledge they left me unsatisfied. The editor did his work well: a good introduction, a good division of labor; yet he could not turn this mass of monographs into an organic whole.

Lewis Mumford's book, "City Development" (he piously borrowed the title from his master Patrick Geddes), is frankly a minor work, but nothing that Mumford writes is negligible. For those who are not familiar with his great trilogy this will be a convenient introduction; for those who have read "The Culture of Cities" this provides important illustrations and footnotes. Mumford is a prophet and a poet who does not spurn definite, practical problems. I particularly appreciated his report on Honolulu, and his discussion of the plan for the rebuilding of London, prepared by Abercrombie and Forshaw.

In "When Democracy Builds" Frank Lloyd Wright offers us in fuller detail the Utopia he had already sketched in "The Disappearing City." He has two bêtes noires—the "continuance" or cultural lag, and Megalopolis. I read him with intense sympathy; yet I found him impassioned rather than convincing. Deliberate archaism of course is deadly, but "continuance" is not invariably an evil. If tradition is a dead weight, momentum may be a help. Frank Lloyd Wright's book would have been far less effective if he had not used the "continuance" of the English language. A ritual rooted in history loses much of its power in a Le Corbusier setting.

I too feel the oppressiveness and squalor of the Giant City. There is no gain in jamming ten million people on a few hundred square miles. But there is also in Megalopolis—and Mumford is poet enough to feel it—a fascination of power, variety, adventure, hard to match in Amenia or Taliesin. Let us compromise on a few cities of a million souls or maybe two, with garden suburbs.

The ideal common to Mumford and Wright raises a series of problems which remain unsolved. Granted that modern technique—radio, television—will break down the deadening isolation of the village; still, civilization in the past has been entirely the work of the city, and without the dynamism of Megalopolis the model rural community might lose its momentum. Jefferson's agrarian ideal had London and Paris as a cultural background. Left to its own devices, it might relapse into the engaging primitiveness of the mountain whites, or into bovine contentment.

I like Utopia; it is on that enchanted ground I first met Mumford. But I am not interested in the distant goal; heaven is my destination, and that is enough. My concern is with the way, the next step, the immediate program. Both Mumford and Wright appear to me in a halo, that is to say, in a golden haze. The city cannot be radically reformed under the profit system—unless the profiteer took such a long view that he would cease to be our orthodox profiteer. Land values breed slums, and slums destroy land values; but there is a great deal of money to be made before that term is reached. The New City will have to be a community, a commonwealth. Now Wright dreams of enlightened, social-minded small proprietors, and that seems to me a contradiction in terms. We must have at the same time much more decentralization and much more integration. For his fullest development the individual needs the pooling of efforts—collectivism. Isolated, uncooperative ruggedness is as inert as a boulder. Our civilization demands nervous centers; to have a Lewis Mumford or a Frank Lloyd Wright, we must first have a New York or a Chicago. I like some of Wright's houses, and I applaud his Carlylean denunciations, and I enjoy his Isaiah-like visions; but his doctrine seems to me a corrective rather than an incentive.

ALBERT GUÉRARD

BRIEFER COMMENT

Life of Wilson

H. C. F. BELL'S "Woodrow Wilson and the People" (Doubleday, Doran, $3) is easily the best of the single-volume biographies of Wilson. Bell has written an effective synthesis of much of the information made available in slower-paced studies, such as Notter's account of Wilson's foreign policy, Diamond's treatment of his economic thought, and Ray Stannard Baker's plodding, multi-volumed over-all view. Although the material is not unfamiliar, the book will interest the general reader; at the same time it is sufficiently scholarly and well-proportioned to be inoffensive to the specialist.

Considering the title, Bell might well have treated at greater length Wilson's changing conception of the people. The "flashbacks" used in telling of Wilson's pre-Princeton days are only partially successful in revealing his early veneration of Saxon institutions and the "English race" and his distrust of non-Germanic peoples. By 1895 Wilson, in the pattern of Turner's celebrated frontier hypothesis, was singing the praises of that mythical entity the Midwestern melting-pot, in which the peoples of Northern and Western Europe were allegedly successfully mixed. But seven years later, as his "History" reveals, Wilson was far from being favorably disposed toward immigrant peoples from Southern and Eastern Europe.

When political opportunity beckoned, Wilson swung rather abruptly toward liberal opinions regarding the government of colonial peoples, social reform, and the "new immigrant" stocks. He explained away passages in his earlier writings which Americans of Hungarian and Italian ancestry found objectionable. As President, he vetoed immigration legislation restricting the influx of Southern and Eastern Europeans. And in appealing to the people on the issue of the League, he upheld "composite America" as an example to the warring Europeans.

Omitting much of this, Bell does reveal the hostility of German and Irish hyphenates toward Wilson, whose Americanism could not abide ethnic politicians demanding favors. Wilson referred them to the principles he had enunciated for the betterment of all rather than part of mankind. They, however, were blind or else would not see and wielded a deadly political knife. The peoples, precisely because the melting-pot had not worked as well as he believed, wanted specific concessions; Wilson, alas, talked universals as if to a united nation. Bell might well have discussed to what extent the Wilsonian conception of the people contributed to his ultimate political defeat.

EDWARD N. SAVETH

The Tragedy of Man

IN "THE ANNIHILATION OF MAN" (Harcourt, Brace, $2.50) Leslie Paul attempts what one may call a philosophical and spiritual analysis of the present world tragedy. Rejecting the Marxian explanation of Nazism, he declares it to be what its founder said it was, a reaction against the confusion and materialism of liberal capitalism and a protest against communism. To this Mr. Paul adds that it was a philosophy of nihilism protesting against spiritual annihilation.

The reviewer, who himself is dissatisfied with the Marxist theory of fascism, will not deny that there is much that is forceful and suggestive in this part of the book. However, together with now classical criticisms of pre-war politics, it serves as starting-point for a series of rapid and on the whole unsatisfactory analyses of recent and contemporary attitudes toward life. This section can be considered to reach its main point in Chapter 9, which gives its title to the book. It briefly examines and rejects the philosophy of the economic man, the Darwinian man, the Freudian man, and the like. The criticisms offered hardly satisfy very rigorous demands of understanding and scholarship. A symmetrical objection is that all this facile dismissing is done in support of a conception of Christianity which seems to be devoid of theology and uncommitted to programs and form. Parsimonious as he is, however, the author's thought about religion is on the whole correctly centered. Religion is necessary, not so much to encourage man in the presence of a terrible universe as to enable him to control or dissolve his aggressions. There is little argument which might incline one to put much trust in the solution. I suggest that the book is worth reading, not for its particular contribution, but because it presents an argument that will probably serve as the basis for a great many fashionable books before long. RALPH BATES

How Shall We Treat Japan?

ALTHOUGH THE SUZUKI GOVERNMENT'S military position grows more difficult from day to day, official American thinking on how to handle a defeated Japan shows no evidence of progress. Dominant State Department circles seem bent on post-war cooperation with so-called moderate elements among Japan's present rulers, including the imperial court and its institution of a divinely descended emperor. That this approach failed tragically in the period of appeasement before Pearl Harbor is apparently not deterring those who wish to try it again.

Under these circumstances "The Future of Japan" by William C. Johnstone (Oxford, $2) will prove especially timely as a pointed, brief discussion of the main issues facing us in Japan and the principles that should govern our treatment of it. Professor Johnstone is concerned not only with the technical aspects of our policy—occupation, disarmament, demobilization, reparations, and economic controls—but also with the problem of changing Japan's social, political, and economic structure. He shows the necessity of ending the rule of the Imperial Throne and breaking the strangle-hold of such economic overlords as the Mitsui and Mitsubishi interests on national life. Most significantly, he emphasizes the danger of defining Japanese militarism in narrow terms, since Tokyo's aggression "embraces a whole system of boss rule, in which the industrial monopolists, bureaucrats, politicians, and the nobility have combined with the militarists in pursuit of aggression abroad and totalitarianism at home."

The facts and point of view presented in this book will help those who are interested in developing a sound American policy toward Japan—a policy based on the determination to root out the basic conditions making for Japanese aggression, and not simply on the desire for a conservative stability in Tokyo after the defeat of the Japanese armed forces. LAWRENCE K. ROSINGER

Dramas in Translation

WHILE THE COMMERCIAL HOUSES are making books out of every faux pas on Broadway, it is good that the university presses should remember that there is also drama. "Scandinavian Plays of the Twentieth Century," First and Second Series (Princeton, $2 and $3 respectively), and "Seven Plays of Maxim Gorky" (Yale, $3.75) are welcome additions to our dramatic library. And it is to be hoped that they will attract the attention of such little-theater groups as may still be interested in culture as well as in commodity.

The two volumes of Scandinavian plays, if we are to believe the informative introduction of Alrik Gustafson, provide a cross-section of the best Scandinavian drama since about 1910. One is glad to know about these plays; there is good stuff in them. Yet they are disappointing, for they are inferior not only, as Mr. Gustafson says, to the best in earlier Scandinavian drama but also to the best drama of the period in other countries, including America. One is glad to know a little about a Nordahl Grieg, a Kai Munk, a Pär Lagerkvist, but a little is enough, and one is content not to make the acquaintance of the many Scandinavian authors for whom their countrymen wish universal acclaim. Godspeed, however, to Mr. Gustafson's next project, which is the reintroduction to the United States public of the only great Scandinavian dramatist since Ibsen—August Strindberg.

Maxim Gorky needs, as they say, no introduction. If the best plays in the new volume, "The Lower Depths" and "Yegor Bulychov," are already known to us in earlier translations, and if the editorial comments of the present translator, Alexander Bakshy, are a little dry and external, it is nevertheless pleasant to have Gorky back in the news. Not

Two Timely Books on the Roman Catholic Church:

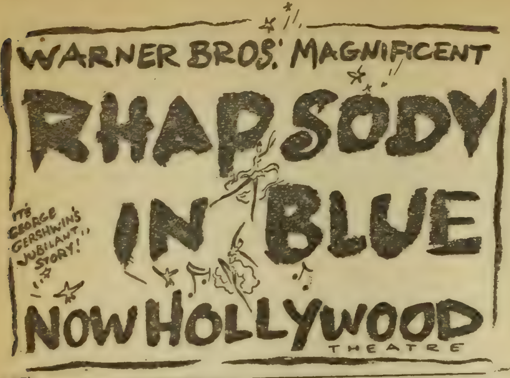
"CRUX ANSATA—AN INDICTMENT OF THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH."
By H. G. Wellls . . . . $1.75 (Cloth binding)

"BEHIND THE DICTATORS." A fully documented analysis of Vatican-Fascist collaboration.
By L. H. Lehmann . . . $1.00 (Paper binding)

COMBINATION OFFER Both these two books in paper binding for $2.00

ORDER FROM:
AGORA PUBLISHING CO.,
229 West 48th Street New York 19, N. Y.

MOTION PICTURES



WARNER BROS.' MAGNIFICENT
RHAPSODY IN BLUE
IT'S GEORGE GERSHWIN'S JUBILANT STORY!
NOW HOLLYWOOD THEATRE

HUMPHREY Bogart
ALEXIS SMITH • SYDNEY GREENSTREET in WARNERS
Conflict
in person LOUIS PRIMA AND HIS ORCHESTRA
DANE CLARK STAR OF "HOLLYWOOD CANTEEN"
STRAND

ROBERT CUMMINGS • LISBETH SCOTT • DON De FORE
In HAL WALLIS' Production
"YOU CAME ALONG"
A PARAMOUNT PICTURE
•
IN PERSON
STAN KENTON and His Orchestra
—Also—
DICK & GENE WESSON
EXTRA RETURN ENGAGEMENT
LOUIS JORDAN & His Famous Tympany Five
COOL PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

Get ready to see . . .
How Wonderful a Motion Picture Version of a Great Stage Play Can Be!
It's got us all using such expressions as "Natch," "TerRIF" and "SenSASH!" We've even found out that a woman can still be dangerous even if she is old—21! We've just seen a preview of
"JUNIOR MISS"
You'll cheer! As Peggy Ann Garner, who stole your heart as "Francie" in "A Tree Grows in Brooklyn," emerges as one of the greatest stars of our time. • • • Words alone can't describe how joyously it has been adapted and directed by George Seaton and how magnificently it has been produced by William Perlberg. • • •
IT'S SUPER ENTERTAINMENT — BUT DIF!
Proudly presented by 20th Century-Fox!
RIVOLI

STAGE PLAY

MICHAEL TODD Presents
UP IN CENTRAL PARK
Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS Lyrics by DOROTHY FIELDS Music by SIGMUND ROMBERG
BROADWAY THEATRE. Broadway & 53rd Street. Matinees Wed. & Sat.
REALLY AIR-CONDITIONED

that he ever quite lives up to the reputation of sage and prophet that has been built up for him. It is pleasing to read a Gorky play, as it is pleasing to see a Continental movie, because we enjoy the sheer absence of Broadway and Hollywood slickness. But absence is a rather negative asset. Continental movies can be dull, and so can Gorky. Judging by these plays I would say that if he is a Galsworthy plus, he is a Gogol minus. At present most of these plays seem to me excessively literal and earnest, even a little gauche. Naturalism is successful, I think, only when it is combined with non-naturalistic elements—as it is in Gorky at his best. At a first reading of the newly translated plays I do not hear the "mystic" overtone which gives grandeur to "The Lower Depths." Perhaps one needs time to feel one's way into such plays. Perhaps one should be assisted by further readings or by a production. Perhaps, on the other hand, the overtone and the irony are just not there.

ERIC RUSSELL BENTLEY

On Place Names

ONE CAN NEVER TELL what George R. Stewart is going to write about next, but one can always be certain it will make lively reading. Professor Stewart, who teaches English at the University of California, has been a resident fellow in creative writing at Princeton, and while East he wrote "Names on the Land" (Random House, $3), which is a historical account of place-naming in the United States. Mr. Stewart, who is author of the best piece about the weather since "Snow Bound," the novel called "Storm," has written here a sort of informal history of America around his central theme, and the result is highly readable.

If anyone thinks the origins of our place names is not a controversial subject, let him visit the little island of Martha's Vineyard off Cape Cod, where this reviewer lives. For three hundred years a hot battle has waged over where this island got its name. Mr. Stewart's ingenious theory that it may have originated from a joke among the crew of the Concord, Bartholomew Gosnold's ship which first anchored off the island in 1602, will never go down with our people. If there is to be any joking about names let Nantucket, not the Vineyard, be the butt.

Incidentally I was delighted to find that Mr. Stewart had included Bug Tussel in southern Illinois in his book. It was from this mining town that the minister armed with a squirrel rifle went forth to do battle for the Lord against the scab-herding gunmen at Herrin.

Don't take Mr. Stewart's book in one full draft. Sip it now and then for its full, rich flavor.

MCALISTER COLEMAN

Not Funny

"UP FRONT" (Holt, $3), with text and cartoons by Bill Mauldin, is a sort of comic strip dedicated to the proposition that the war is funny. The cartoons are not funny, and the text is characteristically illiterate. "I came back to Rome so I could send the book off and finish the sixteen drawings. I read the thing over before I took a bath, and darned if I didn't like it pretty well even though it may be full of bad grammar." He has bad taste too.

JOHN SENIOR

RESORTS

ADIRONDACKS

ESTATE providing exquisite natural charm for gracious, modest living . . .

CRYSTAL LAKE—a 60 acre natural spring-fed lake, entirely within the property of 800 acres, surrounded by rich woodland with magnificent mountain views.

Accommodations in main Residence and Cottages (steam heated), Boathouse, Tennis, Riding, Fishing. Golf nearby. Every facility conveniently located.

5½ hrs. from Grand Central Station 2½ hrs. from LaGuardia Field, Colonial Airline

Rate: Residence $100, Cottage $75

CRYSTAL LAKE LODGE
Chestertown, N. Y.

I. H. KESSLER
271 Madison Ave.
N.Y.C.—MU 5-0493

KRAMER'S

ON LUZON LAKE
HURLEYVILLE, N. Y.

A Vacation Resort for People who love a Beautiful Lake — A fine Swimming Pool and Outdoor Sports of every description.

New York City Phone: ME 3-1591

50 MI. FROM NEW YORK

MAMANASCO Lake Lodge

Ridgefield, Conn. Phone 820

A resort of distinction fashioned from a country estate. Water sports, biking trails, tennis. Library, open fireplaces. Congenial atmosphere. Famous cuisine.

OAKWOOD

NEW WINDSOR, N. Y. Newburgh 4477

Delightful...swimming & boating on private lake.
Different...the colonial atmosphere.
Delicious...our unexcelled cuisine.
Diverting...recordings for listening & dancing.
All this only 53 miles from New York City
A Resort for Adults Only

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

THE MIGHTY
7th
WAR LOAN

★ ★ ★ ★ ★

RESORTS

INVITATION TO RELAX

Enjoy the serenity of Plum Point. Gorgeous countryside, outdoor activities, delicious food — and fun. Only 55 miles from New York
MAKE RESERVATIONS EARLY

PLUM POINT
"Year-Round Vacation Resort"
New Windsor, N.Y. Tel: Newburgh 4270

The Fieldstone

On Round Island Lake

A place of unexcelled beauty for rest and relaxation. One hour from New York.

ALL SPORTS — OPEN ALL YEAR

MONROE, N. Y. Phone 7965

BREEZEMONT PARK
ARMONK, N.Y.

35 MILES FROM NEW YORK CITY

"A Country Estate in the Scenic Hills of Westchester County"

The nearest of all nearby resorts. Exclusive location. Luxuriously furnished. Dignified. All sport activities. Excellent cuisine.

OPEN ALL YEAR Phone Armonk Village 955

ARCADIA Fishkill, N. Y. Tel. Beacon 727

ALL SPORTS, including tennis, volley ball, handball, ping-pong, swimming in spacious pool, etc. Recordings. Informal social surroundings, delicious food.

Reservations for Limited Number of Families for Extended Stay Now Accepted

R.R. Station, Beacon, N. Y., 60 miles from city.

Tall Pines High in the Dutchess County hills. 100 acres of beautiful rolling country . . . land and water sports . . . a design for leisure. N. Y. Central or Hudson River Day Line to Poughkeepsie.

ATTRACTIVE RATES

PLEASANT VALLEY, DUTCHESS CO., N. Y.
Phones: 2741 or 5511

RESORT

CHI-WAN-DA
ON THE HUDSON

ULSTER PARK, N. Y. Phone Kingston 1329

Excellent Location, overlooking the Hudson River. Beautiful Lake on premises. All Water and Land Sports, Dancing, most modern improvements.

DIRECTIONS:
TRAIN—BUS—BOAT to KINGSTON

J. I. DOROSHKIN, Dir. 545 Fifth Ave.
N. Y. Office Phone: MU 2-4217

FARMS AND ACREAGE

BERKSHIRE FARM AGENCY, Chatham, New York, offers 300 New York-Massachusetts Berkshire Hills farms.

PSYCHOANALYSIS

ALERT, Intelligent Readers and Writers should belong to BASIC BOOKS, the new time and money-saving way of keeping posted on current literature on psychoanalysis, psychosomatic medicine, psychiatry and psychology. For information write Dept. F-4, BASIC BOOKS, 714 Madison Ave., New York 21.

HANDWRITING ANALYSIS

SCIENTIFIC handwriting analysis. Alfred Kanfer, 62 Leroy St., N. Y. C. Tel. WA. 5-0956. Cooperating with doctors, psychologists, schools, firms, industries. Lessons. By appointment only. Marital, educational, vocational, psychological problems. Fee $3.00.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street
New York 7, N. Y.

I want to subscribe to The Nation, or the following Nation magazine combinations as listed below:

....
....
....

☐ Remittance enclosed. ☐ Bill me.

Magazine Combinations that will save you money!

THE Nation

with Harpers Magazine You save $2.50	$6.50
with Consumers Union You save $1.50	$7.00
with Harpers Magazine and Consumers Union You save $3.50	$9.00
with Free World You save $1.50	$7.50
with Saturday Review You save $1.50	$8.50

All club combinations listed are for one year, and may be mailed to different individuals and addresses. Canadian and foreign postage extra.

THE NATION BY ITSELF

1 Year $5 2 Years $8 3 Years $11
Servicemen's Rate $3 a Year
Canadian and Foreign Postage $1 a year extra

NAME....................................
STREET....................................
CITY.................... ZONE........ STATE....................
7-7-45

Music

B. H. HAGGIN

THERE was a point at which I stopped going to hear pianists play the piano, or violinists the violin, and went only to hear them play music. Which is to say that I stopped going to the recitals of most of the celebrated instrumentalists who have impressed a "great American public" not equipped to distinguish between mastery of an instrument and insight into music or to understand any such distinction; and I attended the recitals of the few who concerned themselves with the music I was interested in and who performed it with understanding—people like Schnabel, Gieseking, Aitken, Szigeti, Milstein, Feuermann, Landowska.

"HEAVEN AND HELL"

The most definite teaching on the certainty of immortality and on the life hereafter is to be found in the Writings of famed scientist philosopher theologian and statesman. His book on HEAVEN and HELL From THINGS SEEN AND HEARD may be obtained by new readers at the introductory price of five cents

EMANUEL SWEDENBORG

SWEDENBORG FOUNDATION, Inc.
Room 1636, 51 East 42nd St. New York 17

Alcoholics ARE Sick People

ROBERT V. SELIGER, M.D.
Assistant Visiting Psychiatrist
JOHNS HOPKINS HOSPITAL
(An educational pocket-size monograph sent in a plain envelope.)

Book Dealers' Agent
REMINGTON PUTNAM CO.
Baltimore 1, Md.

ALCOHOLISM PUBLICATIONS
2030 Park Avenue, Baltimore 17, Md.

Please send: ALCOHOLICS ARE SICK PEOPLE.

☐ copies $2.00 cloth bound

Name..

Address..

....

One of the instrumentalists I stopped going to hear was Horowitz, whose prodigious mastery of the piano was not enough to keep me from being bored beyond endurance by the musical limitations that were evident in the program and performances of the last recital I attended years ago—since which time I have heard him only when he has filled in the piano parts in performances of concertos by Toscanini, and most recently at the Russian Consulate première of Prokofiev's latest sonata, whose motor rhythms and ostinato crescendos called for precisely the overpowering virtuosity Horowitz was able to bring to bear on them. In the matter of the music he plays, Horowitz told an interviewer a few years ago that he had found himself unable to understand the late sonatas of Beethoven and therefore did not play them. I admired him for his unusual honesty and humility; but I had no interest in the programs of the music that he did understand—programs in which the high point was an opening group of, say, a few Scarlatti sonatas and a bit of early Beethoven; after which there was a descent to the cheapest kind of display pieces. Nor did I care to hear him play even the few consequential works of those programs; for what does not call for technical brilliance Horowitz plays with sentimental and arch distentions and inflections of phrase.

Hence my lack of interest in Victor's June "Vladimir Horowitz Program" (Set 1001; $3.50)—in either the music or the performances of Saint-Saëns's "Danse macabre," Tchaikovsky's "Dumka," and Czerney's Variations on the aria "La Ricordanza." The reproduction of the performances is magnificently lifelike in timbre, sonority, and spaciousness; but my copy of the set is noisy.

The other piano virtuoso who packs them in nowadays, Artur Rubinstein, I have found more interesting and enjoyable to listen to—on some occasions. I do not agree that the traditional mannered style of playing Chopin is the right style; but Rubinstein's verve and grace make his recorded performances of Chopin's E minor Concerto, the Polonaises, the Mazurkas in that style superb. The trouble begins when he plays Beethoven's Sonata Opus 81a ("Les Adieux"), and it comes out with sensitive, Chopinesque contours and inflections. Or—as I discovered recently when I listened to the recording after a long interval—when he plays Mozart's Concerto K. 488, and its melodies come out sentimentalized by the same mannered style, while passagework is something to speed up brilliantly.

That is the trouble with his Victor album of Debussy's piano music (Set 998; $3.50). The pieces are "Reflets dans l'eau" and "Hommage à Rameau" from the first set of "Images"; "Poissons d'or" from the second set; "Soirée dans Grénade" and "Jardins sous la pluie" from "Estampes"; and the waltz "La Plus que lente." The last of these is early and inconsequential; the others are some of Debussy's maturest and finest works. Rubinstein plays them in an elegant, mannered style suitable for nineteenth-century salon pieces—which is not the way to achieve the gravity of "Hommage à Rameau" or the sharply flashing imagery of "Poissons d'or." Nor are the rubatos of Rubinstein's Chopin performances suitable for "Reflets dans l'eau," or even for "Soirée dans Grénade," in which moreover he alters the written rhythm a number of times, blurs the execution of some details, and plays a wrong chord at one point. The performances are reproduced with fidelity to timbre; but the treble is weak, and a limitation seems to have been imposed on the recording that keeps the climaxes from achieving their correct volume of sound. And my copy of the set is noisy.

CONTRIBUTORS

PERCY E. CORBETT is professor of government at Yale University, a member of the Yale Institute of International Affairs, and author of "Post-War Worlds." He was on the staff of the League of Nations from 1920 to 1924.

EDWARD M. MAISEL was formerly director of the Service Men's and Veterans' Division of the National C. I. O. War Relief Committee and editor of the New Veteran.

LOUISE BOGAN has contributed verse and criticism to the New Republic, the New Yorker, and other magazines. Her books include "Body of This Death" and "Sleeping Fury."

ALBERT GUERARD, professor of comparative literature at Stanford University, is well known for his books of history and criticism. He is also the author of "The Future of Paris," a work on city planning.

The Crossword Puzzle will appear next week.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 161 · NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JULY 14, 1945 · NUMBER 2

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 21

EDITORIALS

Our Policy Toward Japan 23
Cabinet Changes 23
Agenda for Berlin 24

ARTICLES

Pearl Harbor Diplomats by I. F. Stone 25
What Program for Japan? by T. A. Bisson 28
The Zaibatsu as War-Makers by Laurence E. Salisbury 30
Conscription or Enlistment? by Militaris 32
Bill Mauldin's War by King Gordon 34
In the Wind 35

POLITICAL WAR

AMG Fumbles the Ball by Philip Jordan 36
Censors or Reporters? by Donald Downes 37
Attack from the Left 38

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

The Great Return—A Poem by Mark Van Doren 39
Is "Freedom Road" True? by Coleman Rosenberger 39
Polemic Against Fatalism by Reinhold Niebuhr 40
Caruso by Diana Trilling 41
Briefer Comment 44
Music by B. H. Haggin 46

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 47

CROSSWORD PUZZLE NO. 121 by Jack Barrett 48

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor J. KING GORDON
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Editor Political War Section
J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor J. MITCHELL MORSE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates
LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL
JONATHAN DANIELS
CAREY MCWILLIAMS
REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1945, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

PERHAPS THE LENGTH OF THE PACIFIC WAR and the future balance of power in Asia were decided at last week's conference between Premier T. V. Soong and Premier Stalin. Chungking reports the possibility that Russia may resume military assistance to China on an even larger scale than that furnished prior to the Russo-German war. In return, China might grant Russia a warm-water naval base in the Liaotung Peninsula and transit rights across Manchuria such as it possessed before the Japanese invasion in 1931. (The Outer Mongolian Premier was in Moscow at the time of the Soong-Stalin talks; it may be that actual military intervention is not far off.) The achievement of a basic Soviet-Chinese agreement would almost certainly have a profound effect on the internal political conflict in China, and there are indications that new moves to bring about a truce between Chungking and Yenan have already been made. Chou En-lai, the Communist envoy, is back in Chungking after several months' absence from the capital. Even more important is the visit to Yenan of seven non-Kuomintang liberals headed by Hwang Yen-pao. This group may be planning to bring about a settlement or to line up a united opposition against Chiang; either course of action might break the deadlock. The United States should take advantage of the new situation to return to the Gauss-Stilwell policy and join with Russia in bringing pressure on both Yenan and Chungking to solve their long dispute.

*

THE IMPASSE OVER BERLIN'S ADMINISTRATION was inherent in a policy that divided into three zones, under Russian, British, and American jurisdiction, a desolated island of broken masonry miles inside the boundaries of the Russian occupation area. The food and fuel situation is critical in the American and British zones, the Red Army is apparently reluctant to withdraw from these areas, and the clash between the occupation policies of the Russians and the Western Allies is causing confusion. Without being too didactic on the basis of limited information, it does seem logical that Berlin's affairs must be placed under a single authority, whether it be a joint Allied administration or solely Russian. If Berlin has such symbolical significance as the former German capital that the Allied Control Council must be located there, then the Council should have no direct concern with municipal administration. It might be worth considering a border city, say at the point of contact of the three main zones of occupation, as the seat for the Control Council. In that event, Berlin might well be left to Russian administration. The present Berlin arrangement seems utter nonsense and an unnecessary source of interminable trouble. What is important is to get this minor disagreement cleared out of the way as soon as possible. The Big Three meeting has matters of vastly greater proportions to wrestle with.

*

AS A POSTSCRIPT TO MR. DOWNES'S ARTICLE ON page 37 we print without comment the following item from La Voce in Naples:

> PALERMO, June 11.—Yesterday a commemoration of Giacomo Matteotti was scheduled to take place at the Garibaldi Theater. The theater had been put at the disposal of the Socialist Party. But at 10:30, when the ceremony was to start and the public was filing into the theater, an Allied officer came to warn that the commemoration had to be non-political in character. . . . The Socialist Party preferred not to commemorate Giacomo Matteotti. . . .

*

RECOGNITION OF THE NEW POLISH UNITY Government by the United States and Britain is a good augury for the forthcoming Big Three meeting in Berlin. It is one step at least to the resettlement of Europe which is so urgently needed. But the problem of Poland cannot be regarded as completely solved; until the promised elections are held, which may not be for many months, we must fear the mischief-making propensities of the London die-hards who, although disbanded as a government, will no doubt attempt to continue their anti-Soviet propaganda in America and Britain. It ought to be made very clear to them that they can expect no official facilities, such as they have hitherto enjoyed, and a sharp watch should be kept to see that they do not abuse the hospitality of the countries in which they are refugees. The British government has, quite properly, promised not to send back to Poland exiles who are unwilling to return. But provision ought also to be made to insure that those who wish to go home are not deterred from doing so by any kind of intimidation. This is particularly necessary in the case of the 250,000 men in the Polish army in exile. Most of the officers appear to be anti-Soviet zealots and under these circumstances dissent in the rank and file is apt to be dangerous. Since this Polish army is under the command of the British, the latter should make certain that every man is given a free choice between acceptance of British citizenship or an honorable discharge and repatriation to his native land. Nor would it be politic to maintain as a unit those whose option is to stay in the West. That would be as challenging to Russia as the organization of a Soviet army of Indian exiles would be to Britain.

*

WHATEVER SATISFACTION WAS FELT OVER THE admission of Argentina to the new international organization did not last very long. The decision, pictured by the press and by columnists close to the Administration as a victory, has turned out to be what it actually was from the start—an unnecessary and shameful defeat. Even Señor Ezequiel Padilla, Mexico's Foreign Minister, who in San Francisco used all his considerable eloquence to force the immediate admission of Argentina, admitted in Washington last Wednesday that "the Argentine government had not lived up to the expectations of the countries which, in the interest of inter-American solidarity," had favored its admission to the United Nations organization. Señor Padilla was obliged to make this public admission before leaving for Mexico in order to temper the growing opposition that his attitude in San Francisco has aroused at home. Describing the widespread dissatisfaction that has arisen in Mexico over this departure from the uncompromising democratic foreign policy of the past ten years, Señor Narciso Bassols, Mexican ambassador to Moscow, who is on his way back to the Soviet Union after a brief visit to Mexico, published a devastating attack on Foreign Minister Padilla. The fact that the "rebel" ambassador was sent back to Moscow after an audience with President Avila Camacho seems to indicate that Señor Padilla, in taking the position he did in San Francisco, found his chief encouragement in that "dear Ezequiel" with which he was distinguished by "dear Ed" Stettinius. Both tasted an hour of victory at San Francisco, but the people of the United States will join with the people of Mexico in repudiating such frivolity in foreign affairs.

*

LAST WEEK'S RETIREMENT OF HARRY HOPKINS, more than any other of the recent Washington exits, may be taken as the final curtain on the New Deal drama. Whatever may be produced under President Truman's direction will be a new play, new authorship. Harry Hopkins will always be thought of within the Roosevelt shadow; many will think of him as the Roosevelt shadow. In the springtime of the New Deal, Hopkins was one of F. D. R.'s bright young liberals; in its sere and yellow, when big business was swarming all over Capitol Hill, Hopkins played a go-between role in that strange coalition of self-confident right and palsied left. His useful career might well have ended about the time of the war's outbreak. But it was at that very moment that Hopkins, a worn-out, sick man, grasped the opportunity to demonstrate his remarkable capacity in the field of international relations. First as Lend-Lease Administrator, then as confidential adviser and personal errand boy of the President, he played a part in forging the Allied coalition the importance of which it is impossible to overestimate. He acquired new stature and new authority. Those who watched him in conference after conference, meeting after meeting, say that his spectacular mission to Moscow, which may have saved the San Francisco conference, was but the last of numerous decisive actions which broke apparently insoluble deadlocks. The Nation salutes Harry Hopkins for his devotion, his ability, and his courage.

*

THE CIVIL AERONAUTICS BOARD, WITH THE approval of the President, granted on July 5 transatlantic flying charters to three companies—Pan American Airways, American Export Airlines (henceforth to be controlled by American Airlines), and Transcontinental and Western Airlines. Next day, the Senate Commerce Committee turned down by a narrow margin Senator McCarran's cherished bill providing for the establishment of a single American "Flagline" to operate all transoceanic traffic. An effort may be made to reverse this decision on the floor, but it seems safe to assert that Pan American has lost its long battle to secure a monopoly of the international skies. Before the war it had become "a chosen instrument" by virtue of its skill in lobbying as well as by its pioneering efforts. During the war, however, the domestic airlines nosed their way into the business as contractors for the Army Air Transport Service. In a new attempt to head them off, Pan American and its chief protagonist in Congress, Senator McCarran, put forward a plan for an all-American line in which the domestic operators would be permitted to invest. Pan American would, of course, have provided the nucleus for the new company and would have retained effective control. This proposal failed to satisfy the ambitions of the domestic companies, which united to press their claims for a share of the international routes and proceeded to give Pan American a lesson in publicity and pressure tactics—no easy task. The C. A. B. decision crowns their efforts, and competitive development is now assured. But while, under the Civil Aeronautics Act, competition between American air companies is controlled, there is no corresponding international body to regulate relations between the airlines of different nations. This question was sidetracked at the Chicago Conference last year, but it is bound to arise again if only because of the danger that competition for traffic on the basis of efficiency can so easily degenerate into competition for subsidies.

Our Policy Toward Japan

NO ONE knows when the war with Japan will end. It is conceivable that the Japanese will fight in Asia and in their homeland as they did on Okinawa and Iwo Jima. But it is also possible, as Lieut. General Holland M. Smith recently predicted, that the Japanese industrialists will try to stop the war before their cities are completely razed by American planes. In that event we may expect peace feelers in a matter of months, if not weeks. When they come, it is imperative that our responsible officials be ready with a program that will make a resurgence of Japanese militarism impossible.

Because the State Department under the leadership of Grew and Dooman has seemed disposed to deal only with the external manifestations of Japanese militarism, The Nation is devoting much of its space this week to an analysis of the Japanese problem. Laurence E. Salisbury, who served as a foreign-service officer in Japan and other parts of Asia for many years, describes the decisive role of the Zaibatsu, or big-business group, in the development of Japan's aggressive policies. Our Washington correspondent, I. F. Stone, has analyzed Mr. Grew's own account of his ambassadorship to Tokyo, showing how consistently he misjudged the situation in the months prior to Pearl Harbor and how naively he clung to his illusions about the good intentions of the Emperor and the Japanese liberals (sic). Finally, T. A. Bisson contrasts the State Department's limited program with the kind of policy that is needed to destroy the roots of Japanese militarism.

The State Department's program for a "soft" peace for Japan contrasts sharply with the firmness displayed toward Germany in the seizure of the I. G. Farben plants. Most Americans, conservatives as well as liberals, have come to realize that the Krupps and the Thyssens are basically as responsible for German militarism as the General Staff. But we have failed to realize that in Japan we have an even more pronounced concentration of economic power and an equally strong affiliation between the monopolists and the military. The public can hardly be blamed for its lack of understanding of the situation in view of the complexity of Japanese society and the dearth of reliable information. But the State Department cannot be let off on any such excuse. For years we have maintained a fairly large number of diplomatic representatives in Japan whose duty it has been to understand Japanese society. That the attack on Pearl Harbor came as a great "surprise" reveals the inadequacy of the top officials assigned to that duty. It will indeed be tragic if we permit the same State Department clique that is responsible for the disaster at Pearl Harbor to shape our post-war policies toward Japan.

Cabinet Changes

WITH the appointment of James F. Byrnes as Secretary of State and the replacement of Henry Morgenthau by Fred M. Vinson, President Truman's remaking of his Cabinet is nearing completion. Only four Roosevelt appointees now remain—Messrs. Ickes, Stimson, Forrestal, and Wallace. Mr. Ickes has been the subject of many rumors, but if he is scheduled for the ax, it is not to fall yet. Immediately he is to head a mission to London to negotiate an agreement with the British on Middle Eastern oil. Secretaries Stimson and Forrestal may stay on for a while also, and there seems no doubt that Henry Wallace will remain undisturbed at the Department of Commerce. Mr. Truman has shown himself skilful in balancing the diverse forces which make up his support, and the presence of one 100 per cent liberal in his official family is essential to satisfy the progressive forces.

As a whole the reconstructed Cabinet has a middle-of-the-road complexion. The selection of Mr. Byrnes did give it a conservative twist, but the President has done something to restore equilibrium by naming Mr. Vinson, who combines political "know-how" with a progressive outlook. Treasury and State are not only the senior departments but are central in policy-making. That is why, while recognizing the merits of Mr. Byrnes, we greet his appointment without enthusiasm. He has some of the qualities required for the job. His friends say he is a good administrator, and Heaven knows one is needed to clean the Augean stables of State and reorganize it for its enormously expanded post-war tasks. He is undoubtedly a shrewd negotiator who will deal firmly but diplomatically with foreign statesmen, and his understanding of Congress will prove very helpful in gaining approval for new treaties.

But even more important than these qualifications is the ability to conceive and carry through broad policies, and in this respect Mr. Byrnes is something of an unknown quantity. He backed Mr. Roosevelt strongly in the difficult days of the neutrality debates and the lend-lease bill; he certainly favors full American participation in the organization of world peace; he will presumably work hard for the removal of trade barriers. That is to say, he will carry on the Hull tradition, but it seems improbable that he will lift his vision beyond Mr. Hull's rather limited sights, or show any broader understanding of the emerging political and social forces in Europe and Asia on which we must build if the world is to be reconstructed peacefully.

It is not minimizing the importance of the Department of State to say it may be even more vital that the policy-making functions of the Treasury devolve on a strong and imaginative personality. For that department holds the key not only to prosperity but to world peace. The United States looms so large in the world economy, its proportionate share of production is so huge, that depression here is bound to be communicated to all other nations. As Representative George E. Outland of California told the House in urging action on the Murray bill, we cannot carry out the commitments entered into at San Francisco unless we eliminate in America the cycle of boom and bust. He went on:

> With full employment, we can be good neighbors; with unemployment, we can neither be friendly and cooperative with other nations, nor can we here in our own country be decent, fair, and democratic toward each other. Just as among ourselves, depression produces fear, discrimination, hate, and division among classes, groups, races, colors, sexes, and ages, so world depression leads down the same road to war.

Whether the Murray bill or some similar measure is enacted or not, the fiscal policies of the federal government will to a large extent determine levels of production and employment. Conservative estimates of the post-war budget place it at between $25 and $30 billion against little more than $8 billion in 1937. The manner in which this sum is raised and spent will be a major influence on the national economy as a whole. We can rejoice, therefore, that the President has ignored advice to appoint a man like Senator George, to whom a balanced budget appears the chief end of public finance.

Mr. Vinson some months ago indorsed the Murray Bill, and in a recent quarterly report as Director of War Mobilization and Reconversion he set forth a well-considered program for a rising post-war standard of living. To reach and maintain full employment, he declared, the fiscal system must be completely overhauled and taxes must be levied so that they neither hinder investment nor destroy mass markets. He advocated, therefore, a broad-based, progressive income tax as the backbone of the revenue system and the paring of regressive sales and excise taxes to a minimum. Other points in his program included stronger anti-monopoly measures, the broadening of social security, and the planning of long-term public works. Mr. Vinson, who is popular with Congress, should enjoy better success in putting over such ideas than Mr. Morgenthau, who upheld liberal standards courageously but was constantly frustrated on Capitol Hill.

Agenda for Berlin

ALL PREVIOUS meetings of the three greatest Allied powers have been devoted primarily to planning destruction. This time, with Hitler's Reich lying in rubble around their feet, they meet to agree on joint plans of construction. Together Russia and Britain and the United States face the staggering job of putting Europe and the Mediterranean world together again. No single meeting can do more than agree on objectives and the first steps to be taken toward them. But at least we have a right to demand a clear enough understanding among the Big Three so that those first steps will be headed in the same direction, so that purposes will not cross and create new conflicts. And we have a right to expect a few basic political-economic decisions.

1. Economic help for Europe. This should be the first item of business. For the solution of all other problems, political or territorial, depends upon the restoration of the continental economy. We have written a charter to preserve the peace, but we shall have no peace if Europe falls into a chaos of industrial collapse; if the people freeze and go hungry.

The situation of France can be taken as an epitome of the whole problem. Today the shortage of coal, the destruction of communications, and the lack, particularly, of rolling stock and motor trucks have brought French production to a standstill. In a recent issue, Business Week, reporting on the deepening economic crisis in Europe, said that of the normal imports of the western European countries only 5 or 10 per cent is now arriving, while the losses suffered by each country prevent recovery without help from outside. "France, for example, has only 6,000 locomotives out of a pre-war total of 16,000. In 1939 the French had 450,000 freight cars. Now, even with the slow return of rolling stock from Germany, they have only 200,000. Before the war, there were 500,000 motor trucks in France. Today only about 125,000 are usable." A nine-power emergency food conference is about to meet in London and British experts have just completed a study of France's internal production problems in time for the meeting. As a striking example of the shortages and their causes, beet-sugar production, normally 900,000 tons a year, was cut in 1944-45 to 600,000, but "because it required 500,000 tons of coal to transport the crop and handle the refining, and because the coal was not available, barely 300,000 tons of sugar were produced." It is the same for every basic necessity.

The three great powers must agree on methods of overcoming the crisis. Russia itself is desperately in need of the tools of industrial production, but it controls great food-, oil-, and coal-producing areas. These products it should be willing to share, on a planned basis, with the countries of the West. But the major part of the job of restocking must be undertaken by Britain and the United States. They control the bulk of the world's ocean shipping, and have the largest potential supplies of machinery. Even though one cannot expect agreement today as to basic methods and objectives between Russia and the West, a common policy for providing the necessities of European survival should be possible.

2. A coordinated policy for Germany. This will be even harder to achieve. Already the occupying powers are using different methods and consolidating their positions in their own spheres. Russian methods are positive and aggressive; those of the Western powers negative, related to immediate problems of security and order rather than to long-range plans of development. Russia is interested in making Germany self-supporting; the Western authorities so far have left their areas economically stagnant. Russia is promoting political activity among the anti-Nazi elements; the Western authorities are suppressing such activity, as the article by Philip Jordan in this issue so clearly shows.

Again it may be that no common basic policy can be arrived at; certainly the Western Allies show little inclination for a more positive program for Germany. But at least we must have agreement as to such immediate problems as the kind and number of industrial establishments which are to be put into production; the use to be made of the products of German industries; the feeding of the country and the sources from which the necessary minimum of food is to come; the treatment of Nazis in and out of office; the disposition of the demobilized German army. The question of reparations must be jointly solved. And without too much delay, the new boundaries of the conquered country must be determined.

All of these items properly belong on the agenda of the meeting in Berlin, but not all can be finally disposed of there. For it would be improper, and indeed futile, to settle such questions as frontiers and reparations without consulting France, one of the occupying powers and the one most directly affected. The absence of France from the Berlin conference is a great misfortune from every point of view.

3. Palestine. It is inevitable that the disposition of the homeless millions in Europe—the armies of "displaced persons"—will come before the Berlin conference. It is a part of every other problem, economic and political. Related to it, but related also to the unstable situation in the Middle East, is the issue of Palestine. No longer can military necessity be dragged out as an excuse for the inexcusable. Winston Churchill himself has used as strong language as any Zionist in denouncing the betrayal perpetrated in the White Paper, and it is certain that the Jewish people of Palestine will no longer tolerate the restrictions. Palestine is an international question and it should be dealt with as such; Britain itself should be the first to welcome a joint move for its solution. Such a move should certainly be initiated by the United States. Mr. Truman has just been urged by thirty-seven state governors, meeting at Mackinac Island, to take up the question at Berlin. The Palestine issue was cold-shouldered at San Francisco, but it will not be settled until the Balfour Declaration is again recognized as a binding obligation by the British government.

4. Spain. Certainly the Spanish issue should appear on the agenda at Berlin. Since the San Francisco conference barred Franco from the over-hospitable ranks of the new security organization, it is more than ever absurd that Britain and the United States should carry on the farce of dealing with that tottering fascist relic. Only last week Pravda revealed in detail the extent to which, now as before the defeat of Hitler, Spain is the safe refuge for German capital and German business men. If Mr. Truman fails to bring up the question of Spain at Berlin we hope Stalin will do so. But it would be far better if this piece of unfinished business were laid before the meeting by the American government. The Friends of the Spanish Republic, supported by a large group of liberal organizations, has wired to Mr. Truman an urgent request that the Berlin conference be used as the occasion for joint action on Spain by the three big powers.

Pearl Harbor Diplomats

BY I. F. STONE

IN THE fall of 1941 Joseph Clark Grew had been our ambassador in Japan for almost ten years. His second-in-command, the counselor of the American embassy in Tokyo, Eugene H. Dooman, was born in Japan, had entered the foreign service there in 1912, and had lived in Japan most of his life. Both were proud of their friendly relations with the highest circles of Japanese society. Dooman is one of the few Americans who read and speak Japanese with fluency. It was on these two officials that the American government was dependent for accurate information and appraisal of political developments in Japan. .

Our main source of information on the views they transmitted to Washington is Grew's "Ten Years in Japan," a carefully edited selection from his diaries and reports. Grew can boast of two warnings to the American government. "There is a lot of talk around town," he noted in his diary on January 27, 1941, "to the effect that the Japanese, in case of a break with the United States, are planning to go all out in a surprise mass attack on Pearl Harbor. Of course I informed our government." Grew does not seem to have taken this report seriously, for there is no further reference to it. But he did send home a grave warning in a report to the department on November 3, 1941. This report supplemented a previous report on September 29, 1941. It is odd that, unlike all the other diary entries and reports in Grew's books, these two documents are not provided in their original text. They are marked "(Substance)" and "(Paraphrase of original text prepared by Department of State)." The paraphrase says the Ambassador reported that "action by Japan which might render unavoidable an armed conflict with the United States may come with dangerous and dramatic suddenness."

These two isolated warnings must be read in context. The complete record may never become public, but even in "Ten Years in Japan," which Dooman helped Grew to edit, the evidence is unmistakable: in the fateful autumn of 1941 Grew and Dooman completely misread events. They were guilty of wishful thinking not only about the Emperor and their aristocratic friends but also about Konoye and Tojo, and this wishful thinking continued even after Pearl Harbor.

Their attitude of mind must bear its share of the responsibility for Japan's successful stab-in-the-back attack. And it needs to be recalled and analyzed because, unlike Kimmel and Short, Grew and Dooman were rewarded with new posts of influence and honor: Grew as head of the Division of Far Eastern Affairs of the State Department and then as Under Secretary, and Dooman as the department's leading adviser on Far Eastern affairs. Both men are likely to play major roles in shaping our post-war policy toward Japan. The talk in Washington is that while Grew may be removed as Under Secretary, he will be sent to the Far East as political adviser to MacArthur. His position, like his fundamental political outlook, would be comparable to that of Robert Murphy, political adviser to Eisenhower. Grew would almost certainly be accompanied by Dooman, whom Grew in "Ten Years in Japan" calls "my fidus Achates." The implied comparison is unfair to the friend and armor-bearer of Aeneas.

Grew's reports were prepared with the help of Dooman, a far abler man than his chief. In the preface to "Ten Years in Japan" Grew says he "counted greatly in the formulation through those years of the views herein set forth" on Dooman's "long experience in Japan, mature advice, and incisive diagnosis of political developments."

One is inclined to suspect from the views set forth in Grew's report to the Secretary of State on September 29, 1941, that this was made public in paraphrase rather than in text to protect Grew. It was a plea for further appeasement of Japan, and it was based on a ridiculous misconception of the character of the Konoye government, which had taken Japan a long way toward fascism and war. Soon after becoming Premier in July, 1940, Konoye abolished the Japanese General Federation of Labor. In September he signed a treaty of alliance with Germany and Italy. In October he set up the Imperial Rule Assistance Association, Japan's closest approach to a totalitarian political party. At the end of 1940 he established a Supreme Economic Council. In January, 1941, he launched a ten-year program to expand food production in Manchuria. In April, preparing the way for a southward advance against British, Dutch, and American possessions, Konoye signed a neutrality pact with the Soviet Union and in June a trade agreement. After Hitler attacked the Soviet Union, Konoye moved troops into French Indo-China. In September, when Grew sent his report to the State Department, Konoye was trying to set up control associations for each basic industry, Fascist style.

What conclusions did Grew and Dooman draw from these developments? "The Ambassador," says the State Department paraphrase of the report of September 29, 1941, "recalls his reports to the department to the effect that Japanese foreign policies are inevitably changed by the impact of events abroad and that liberal elements might come to the top in due course as a result of the trend of events. He considers that such a time has arrived." The Ambassador thought there was "a good chance" of "Japan's falling into line" with the Atlantic Charter. He felt that the "impact of world developments" had "rendered Japan's political soil hospitable to the sowing of new seeds" which might "bring about the anticipated regeneration of Japanese thought and a complete readjustment of relations between Japan and the United States." The reader who desires to may study this fantastic analysis for himself on page 437 of "Ten Years in Japan."

Grew pleaded with the American government in the negotiations then going on with Japan not to insist on "the sort of clear-cut, specific commitments which appear in any final, formal convention or treaty." He asked instead that we place "a reasonable amount of confidence" in "the good faith of Prince Konoye." He pleaded that if we insisted on "clear-cut commitments" from Japan, the conversations would drag along indefinitely and Konoye would conclude "that the United States government is only playing for time." He warned that "the logical outcome of this will be the downfall of the Konoye Cabinet and the formation of a military dictatorship which will lack either the disposition or the temperament to avoid colliding head-on with the United States."

President Roosevelt was less trusting than Grew, and the conversations lagged. In October the Konoye Cabinet fell. On the 18th General Tojo became Prime Minister. It was announced that he would be his own War Minister and, significantly, that he was retaining his active rank in the Japanese armed forces. The Tojo government was in fact a military dictatorship, and events were soon to make it clear that Tojo's accession to power was the signal that war with the United States had been decided upon. Tojo took power just fifty days before Pearl Harbor, and actual fleet and military preparations for the widespread attacks on December 7 must have begun soon after. But Grew and Dooman continued optimistic in their reports, and trustful in their Japanese informants. On the day of Tojo's appointment Grew recorded in his diary that Konoye's private secretary had "conveyed through him to me from Prince Konoye a very interesting explanation of the circumstances which had led to the fall of the Cabinet and the successful efforts of the Prime Minister to insure the appointment of a successor who would continue the conversations with the United States" (my italics). Grew himself noted, "Tojo was one of the original five members of the Konoye Cabinet last spring who supported the opening of conversations with the United States in the face of the opposition of Matsuoka. This is important."

On October 20 Grew's optimism has grown. He reported that he had learned from "a confidant of Prince Konoye" that Konoye resigned because he felt the negotiations with the United States "would make more rapid progress if our government were dealing with a Prime Minister whose power was based on . . . the army, which is the controlling force in matters affecting policy." Grew concluded that it would be "premature to stigmatize the Tojo government as a military dictatorship" committed to policies which would "bring about armed conflict with the United States." On the contrary, Grew felt that Tojo, by "retaining his active rank in the army, will as a result be in a position to exercise a larger degree of control over army extremist groups."

Five days later Grew was jubilant. "A reliable Japanese informant" told him that before the fall of the Konoye government the Emperor demanded a guaranty from the army and navy that they would not involve Japan in war with the United States. "The Emperor's definite stand," Grew reported, "necessitated the selection of a Prime Minister who would be in a position effectively to control the army, hence the appointment of General Tojo." Grew wrote that his informant, "who is in contact with the highest circles," told him "that for the first time in ten years the situation at present and the existing political setup in Japan offer a possibility of a reorientation of Japanese policy and action." There is not a line or phrase to indicate that Grew did not accept these statements as fact.

On October 29 Grew reported that the Germans were disappointed because they had hoped for "a definitely interventionist government" when Konoye resigned. Grew said the Germans were "uncertain" of what Japan would do if the United States went to war with the Reich. "The Germans," he wrote, "are at present working primarily for a Japanese attack on the Soviet." This was forty-one days before Pearl Harbor.

This extraordinary series of misjudgments was capped by the November 3 report, the second one which is presented only in State Department paraphrase. In this report, the paraphrase says, "the Ambassador refers to his various telegraphic reports during several months past analyzing the factors affecting policy in Japan and says he has nothing to add thereto nor any substantial revision to make thereof." This would imply that he still felt the moment had arrived when, as he said in the September 29 report quoted above, "liberal elements might come to the top in due course" if we did not insist on clear-cut commitments in our negotiations with the Japanese. It also implies that Grew did not think the formation of the Tojo government had brought about any fundamental change in the situation.

It is in this report, as part of a plea against economic sanctions and for "constructive conciliation"—a phrase Grew said was preferable to the term "appeasement"—that we come across the warning on which Grew and the State Department pride themselves. In the final paragraph of the paraphrase, we read, "The Ambassador sees no need for much anxiety respecting the bellicose tone and substance at present of the Japanese press." Obviously, then, he did not consider this anti-American propaganda an emotional preparation for war. But, as a final argument for "constructive conciliation," Grew adds that it would be "shortsighted" to think that "Japanese preparations are no more than saber-rattling" and warns that action by Japan "which might render unavoidable an armed conflict with the United States may come with dangerous and dramatic suddenness." The phrasing is curious. Even a diplomat would hardly say that an attack on American territory "might render unavoidable an armed conflict." Strategically, the Dutch East Indies and Singapore could not be attacked without also attacking the Philippines. I believe that when and if the full facts are known we shall find that Grew still expected Japan to attack the Soviet Union.

One would be inclined to give Grew more credit for the November 3 warning if it were not followed by the same kind of wishful thinking and bad reporting which preceded it. But Grew is as blissfully idiotic about Kurusu as he was about Tojo. On November 4, after the Kurusu mission was announced, Grew noted correctly that Kurusu "was last ambassador in Rome and then in Berlin, and he it was who signed the Tripartite Pact," but he adds, "I have no reason to believe that he is any more friendly to the Nazis than to us." His basis for this conclusion is, "His wife is American, and his daughter, Jaye, was a great friend of Elsie's [Grew's daughter]. We had a long and very frank talk." Nor did Grew see anything other than "childishness" in the fact that even as Kurusu left for Washington the Japanese were continuing "to fill their press with hostile articles which tend to render an understanding impossible."

Grew went on happily whistling in the dark until the end. On November 20 he reports that the Japanese embassy in Berlin was embarrassed by the Kurusu mission "and resents it." Even Tojo's bellicose speech of November 29, in which he celebrated the anniversary of the Anti-Comintern Pact by threatening to "purge" American and British influence from East Asia, did not disturb Grew's cheerfulness. He thought the speech "utterly stupid . . . of course, it was chiefly for domestic consumption." The Japanese, Grew concluded, "are really children and should be treated as children." The day before Pearl Harbor Grew was further cheered by "a Japanese informant of known reliability," who told him that "neither the Prime Minister nor any member of the Cabinet had seen the text of General Tojo's speech . . . in advance." Since Tojo himself was Prime Minister, this is puzzling. But Grew was informed that the speech was "read by proxy, as is often done in Japan," and it was pointed out to him that "the substance and tone" of the speech "was different from all General Tojo's previous addresses." As they say in vaudeville, it must have been two other fellows.

Grew and Dooman were suckers to the end. Even Pearl Harbor did not end their weakness for gold-brick explanations. On December 9 Grew reports another happy discovery. Ohta, of the European section of the Japanese Foreign Office, called at the embassy that day. "Dooman asked Ohta," Grew recorded, "whether the Foreign Minister, in expressing reluctance to stay up very late to receive me, was trying to avoid having to meet me in person again after the beginning of the hostilities. Ohta burst out spontaneously and with considerable feeling. 'Not at all. The Foreign Minister knew nothing about the attack on Hawaii until early the next morning.' " Dooman discussed this with Grew, and Grew concluded, "Without pressing the point too far, it seems clear that His Imperial Majesty's Minister for Foreign Affairs had no prior knowledge that an act of war was to be committed by the Japanese forces." Unversed as I am in Shinto legend, I doubt whether it contains any instances of more touching faith in the Emperor and his officials.

Grew's past record and diaries, James R. Young's "Behind the Rising Sun," and talks with Americans who have served in Japan leave the impression that the Back Bay Bostonian, Grew, and Dooman, the son of poor Persian immigrants to Japan, are snobs and social climbers who were thrilled by the Imperial Court and aristocratic Japanese society. Their judgment was affected by their social contacts to the point of fatuity, and their eager gullibility was skilfully played upon by the Japanese for their own ends. They became pipe lines for misinformation intended to lull the United States into a false sense of security while Japan expanded in East Asia, and they cannot be trusted for realistic or rigorous advice as to the future of Japan. The Japanese, seeing the high positions Grew and Dooman still occupy in our government, must chuckle over an observation Grew confided to his diary in November, 1941. "The naivete of the Japanese," Grew observed, "is really amazing."

What Program for Japan?

BY T. A. BISSON

IN these summer months of 1945 the bases required for the final offensives of the Pacific War are being won and consolidated. No one can doubt that the military defeat of Japan is now only a matter of time. It will come suddenly, as the result of a surrender by the so-called "moderates" who today control the Japanese government, or more slowly, after Japan has been racked by a suicidal last-ditch defense. But whatever form it takes, the military end can already be foreseen.

These facts mean that the first task imposed by Pearl Harbor is being successfully accomplished. We are witnessing the eclipse of that vision of a "Greater East Asia" for which Japan's oligarchy precipitated a devastating conflict. The second, more basic, task is still to be done. The Japanese oligarchy responsible for this war, and capable of preparing another, has yet to be uprooted. This objective can be whittled down only at grave peril to the future. Unless it is completely attained, there will be no certainty that the war against Japan has been finally won.

The very dimensions of the victory now unfolding will make it fatally easy to become complacent, to consent to policies inadequate to cope with dimly seen future dangers. In coming months the terms of peace to be meted out to Japan should be a major concern of the American people, who are paying the full price of the victory: there is far too much evidence that their interests are not being fully protected in the official "peace" program. Their intervention is needed to assure a peace that will be as conclusive as the military victory.

What are the yardsticks of a settlement with Japan that may be accepted as adequate, as holding out the promise of being permanent? The most fundamental criterion is not a difficult one to grasp, nor one to which Americans conscious of their heritage should take exception. It is that conditions be established which will enable the Japanese people, all of them, to participate in the choice of a government responsive to their needs. By definition, therefore, the narrow oligarchy that has dominated Japan under the 1889 constitution must be driven from power.

At this point the State Department's policy makers, to the extent that they express themselves, immediately begin to throw up a smoke screen. The only Japanese to whom they are opposed, it would seem, are the "militarists." All other aspects of the Japanese state are so "peculiar" that one must beware of interfering with them. The area of "peculiarity" is an extensive one. It embraces the Emperor, the professional bureaucracy, and, even more important, the handful of big business men and monopolists (Zaibatsu) who have waxed fat on the four major wars fought by Japan since 1894. It also covers the landlords and the Diet politicians who have flocked into Japan's "totalitarian" parties since 1940.

These groups, however, along with the "militarists," make up the oligarchy that has controlled Japan for two generations. Merely to eliminate the "militarists" is not an adequate peace program for Japan, any more than it is for Germany. The German monopolists, the Junker landlords, and the Prussian bureaucracy proved able to prepare Germany for a new war in twenty-one years. Their brothers in Japan, left with the Emperor to head a continuing regime "of the few, by the few, and for the few," will not rest until they have repeated Germany's feat. The world security organization will be faced with the permanent and, quite probably, futile task of restraining the Japanese oligarchs.

Why not lighten this task by fostering democracy in post-war Japan? After the sacrifices we have made to defeat the oligarchy in war, there is no reason for the State Department to put it back in power. And there is every reason for the State Department to support a democratic program which answers to the true interests of the American people. Such a program would include the following points: (1) elimination of the Emperor system and the intrenched bureaucracy, modeled on that of Prussia; (2) abolition of the baldly authoritarian constitution of 1889, the "gift" of the Emperor; (3) drafting of a new constitution by a convention of freely elected representatives, one that will rest on the will of the people; (4) destruction of the Zaibatsu's armament factories and nationalization of all large peace-time industrial plants; (5) drastic agrarian reforms, designed to end the landlords' rack-renting of millions of tenant farmers.

Confronted with a fully democratic program of this sort, the State Department and its apologists raise another smoke screen. Who are we, they say, to decide such things for the Japanese people? Are we able to "impose" these terms without bringing on "even worse" after-effects? Is there any real popular support in Japan for such changes? The concern manifested here for the Japanese people is touching but thoroughly hypocritical. What Grew, Dooman, and their followers are really concerned about is something quite different. They fear a popular revolt which will topple the "moderates"—Emperor, Zaibatsu, landlords, and the rest—who, they hope, will retain power in post-war Japan.

This smoke screen conveniently ignores the fact that we do not have to "impose" anything directly save thoroughgoing demilitarization and effective punishment of the leading war criminals. For our basic policy the essential requirement is quite simple: that we support the formation of a post-war government by leaders of the movements that will be in revolt against the oligarchy. This is the essence of a genuinely constructive policy, on which everything else turns. It demands a choice; evasion is possible for a time, but ultimately the choice must be made. The American people have a right to ask: Where is a policy statement by any responsible State Department official which makes the democratic choice the basis of our post-war program toward Japan?

The burden of proof certainly rests upon the State Department. If a constructive and democratically based program is under preparation, there is not a scintilla of evidence to indicate it. Evidence that the department is seeking to have the old regime retain power, on the other hand, is voluminous, despite a careful effort during the past year to conceal from the American public the baldest aspects of this program.

On the Emperor issue, a touchstone in all post-war plans for Japan, Grew's own record is quite open and forthright, much more so than the department's position on most other aspects of our Japanese policy. In public addresses he has absolved Hirohito of war guilt by asserting that he labored "earnestly but futilely to control the military in order to avoid war." What is more significant, Grew has publicly favored maintenance of the Emperor institution. Speaking before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in December, 1944, he set against the "stabilizing force" which the Emperor might exert, the dread specter of our having to "control a disintegrating community of over 70,000,000 people." The juxtaposition of ideas is an unwitting disclosure of the fear that the oligarchy might collapse in the face of popular revolt if the Emperor's "stabilizing" influence were removed. Wilfred Fleisher, whose book "What to Do with Japan" follows the State Department line, makes the same point rather more bluntly. He writes: "The Emperor, whoever he may be, can serve us after Japan's defeat. It may be assumed that at the time of Japan's surrender there will be chaos in the country, and the first duty of an army of occupation will therefore be to restore order. The Emperor would provide a rallying-point and become a stabilizing factor."

After the Emperor come the Zaibatsu—the monopolists on whom the State Department would rely in the post-war era, despite their close ties with the "militarists." In this combination, which does not exclude strong rivalry, the Zaibatsu are far from being the army's pawns. Since 1940 they have defeated the military hands down on every issue of war-time economic control, to the advantage of their swollen profits. Yet a letter in The Nation for June 16 shows Eugene Dooman, Grew's trusted adviser, indoctrinating military-government trainees with the notion that the Zaibatsu will prove our "friends," through whom it will be expedient to "control" Japan's post-war economy. Under Grew's program they will remain in the Japanese government, which they have dominated for two decades.

In the light of these facts, consider Wilfrid Fleisher's words: "However much we may be opposed to monopolies and cartels, we cannot undertake to revamp Japan's business structure. This is an internal matter for the Japanese to handle in their own way. . . . There is at present no substitute for the business magnates." If the State Department is already determined to "use" the Zaibatsu, as it intends to "use" the Emperor, how can the Japanese people be expected "to handle in their own way" this "internal matter"? Incidentally, Fleisher devotes a page to the miserable condition of the farmers but does not once employ the word "landlord." Evidently the landlords will also be our friends in the State Department's post-war Japan.

The constitution of 1889 is another joker in the pack the diplomats are using to prepare a "peace" settlement with Japan. Imbedded in this constitution, especially in the preamble, is the God-Emperor concept which provides the "holy mission" for the "master race." The State Department school insists on the need for "reform" of this constitution. Wilfrid Fleisher devotes a whole chapter to a long list of needed "reforms," concluding with the suggestion that we "use" the Emperor to secure the changes desired, since only he has the power, under the 1889 constitution, to lay amendments before the Diet.

In this formulation of the issue a wild deuce has been added to the joker. No list of reforms, however long, ever mentions the preamble or Article 1 of the constitution, in which the Emperor's divine status is posited. For the State Department, as for the Japanese oligarchy, these provisions are sacrosanct. Moreover, the grave dangers of continuing this gift-of-the-Emperor constitution, fortified by "use" of the Emperor to amend it, are blandly ignored. This policy, clearly, is of a piece with all the rest. The Japanese people will never be able to build a democratic society on the foundation of a God-Emperor's "gift" constitution or with such a constitution be able to stop their rulers from launching predatory wars. Grew himself may be called as a witness. He once wrote: "So long as the constitution fixed sovereignty in the Emperor, it was impossible for any party to come forward with the doctrine that sovereignty resided in the people." The corollary would seem obvious. A new constitution, framed by elected representatives and based on the popular will, is needed to give democracy a chance in Japan.

For purposes of argument the State Department school affects great pessimism about the prospects of democracy in Japan. The people have had so little experience with democratic reforms, the feudal background is so close, the parties have been so corrupt, and so on ad infinitum. In point of fact, the conditions for a drastic social upheaval in Japan have long been present. Under conditions of defeat the tensions between landlord and landless peasant in the countryside, combined with the unrest of city workers, which has been expressed in great strikes even during the war, will almost certainly unleash a strong popular movement against the oligarchy. The reelection to the Diet in 1942 of the veteran anti-militarist Yukio Ozaki, despite attacks by the powerful military clique, testifies to the strength of the popular opposition to the groups which rule Japan. If our political warfare, controlled by the State Department, were to use the means available to fan the embers of unrest, a revolutionary uprising might shorten the war by months.

For all their pessimistic depreciation of democratic potentialities in Japan, the State Department and its followers are not unaware of the true situation. How else explain Grew's fear of a "disintegrating community of over 70,000,000 people," or Fleisher's outright assumption that "there will be chaos in the country"? The issue thus narrows down to a choice between support for the war-breeding Japanese oligarchy or encouragement of a popular revolt that will reshape Japan's outmoded feudal system on a democratic pattern.

On this question the State Department's program is unequivocal. It is determined to choose the members of Japan's post-war regime from representatives of the oligarchy, excluding only the "militarists." It intends to keep them in power in the name of "order." Does this mean that American soldiers will be used to crush popular revolts? If so, our military forces will be destroying the hope of creating a democratic Japan which can live at peace with its neighbors in the post-war world.

The Zaibatsu as War-Makers

BY LAURENCE E. SALISBURY

FOR many decades Japan has been ruled by a coalition of four groups—the military, the bureaucrats, the politicians, and the Zaibatsu, or big industrialists and financiers. However much one group may maneuver against the other three to improve its own position, all are united in one aim: to increase their power over their own people and in the world at large through policies of expansion—if necessary through military force. Today, with military means failing, we may expect a reversion to peaceful means designed to insure the four groups' continued control of Japan in the post-war world.

The Zaibatsu will take the lead in the peaceful approach. The Japanese leaders are aware that in the democratic countries there are powerful political and financial interests which fear the elimination even in an enemy country of the class which corresponds roughly to their own. Such elimination would make way for the rise of vigorous elements discontented with the concentration of power and wealth in the hands of a few and might impair in some degree the power of industry and finance in democratic countries.

Prior to the Restoration of 1868 Japan was a feudal country, with the farmer, the artisan, and the merchant existing for the welfare and comfort of the warrior (samurai) class. The warrior class numbered perhaps a half-million in a population of some thirty millions. After the Restoration—feudalism came formally to an end in 1871—the small group of former samurai in control of affairs, aided by a few rich merchants, gave little thought to the welfare of the common people, but devoted their energies to making Japan militarily strong enough to meet possible dangers from abroad. To impress Western nations and to allay internal discontent the ruling groups gave Japan the trappings of a constitutional monarchy but kept the actual power for themselves through such devices as the constitution of 1889, the corruption and intimidation of political parties, and legislation which permitted the imprisonment of malcontents. The Zaibatsu are the descendants of the rich merchants who in this period intermarried with the nobility or were themselves ennobled.

Many members of the Zaibatsu have been educated in Western universities. They speak the language of their associates in the democracies. They seem to be solid, able men with the "know-how" needed in international finance, men who could further the rapid rebuilding of a defeated country on a pattern to insure comparatively early resumption of that mutually beneficial association with big concerns abroad which existed before Pearl Harbor. The Zaibatsu will stand no nonsense from the intellectuals, the little business men, or the little leaders of the Japanese people who may strive to emerge after the war. In short, the Zaibatsu will reimpose pre-war conditions in Japan.

This description of the Zaibatsu though accurate is incomplete. It fails to show how the policies of the Zaibatsu helped to bring on the present war and would endanger any future peace. In the first place, the Zaibatsu kept both urban workers and farmers economically so depressed that they proved to be a fertile field for the propaganda of Japan's leaders that world conquest was the country's destiny. Secondly, by depriving the lesser business interests and organized labor of effective political representation, the Zaibatsu throttled opposition to their own plans and those of the military. Thirdly, the Zaibatsu actively and consciously prepared the way for military aggression by making commercial and financial considerations subsidiary to those of military power in their business operations throughout East Asia. The successes of the Japanese military in the China and Pacific wars owed much to the activities of the Zaibatsu.

In the corridors of Washington one hears the theory that there are two kinds of Zaibatsu—the militaristic Zaibatsu who worked with the Kwantung Army in Manchuria, and the good old families like the Mitsui and the Mitsubishi, whose members are in many ways like us—nice people. Unfortunately the theory is false. One cannot separate the Zaibatsu from the military, the bureaucrats, or the politicians. The four groups are inextricably bound together, not only by their intention to retain power and to expand territorially but by financial and economic interests, by intermarriage, and by a tradition of compromise and cooperation coexistent with acute business rivalry. They are also united by fear of the people whom they exploit, the impoverished Japanese millions.

It was not until the "enlightened" twenties that social legislation of any importance found its way into the statute books of Japan. This progress was not due to a change of heart on the part of the ruling groups but to such factors as the post-war boom, which made Japanese labor somewhat more articulate, and the influx of Western humanitarian ideas, which augmented the rulers' fear of socialism. The rice riots of 1918 showed the rulers the potential strength of the people.

In 1920, for the first time, the welfare of the people became sufficiently important for a Bureau of Social Affairs to be set up within the Ministry of Home Affairs. For the next ten years, that is, until the situation was altered radically by the Kwantung Army's seizure of Manchuria, this bureau proposed considerable legislation intended to improve the condition of the people. But at every turn elements of the Zaibatsu staunchly opposed any reduction of their profits or their power. Exploitation of the people continued both in the factory and on the farm. Some of the legislation passed reads extremely well, but it was only partially enforced.

It was the Japanese military, ironically enough, and not the Zaibatsu or their close associates, the big landlords, that awakened belatedly to the necessity of improving the condition of the people. After the outbreak of the Sino-Japanese War in 1937 the military leaders became acutely aware that the poor health of the recruits for the army and of the men and women in factories was hampering the prosecution of the war. The military were not motivated by humanitarianism but by the cold logic that underfed and diseased people make poor cannon fodder and incompetent factory workers. So in 1938 the Social Affairs Bureau was elevated to the status of a ministry, the Welfare Ministry. As in the 1920's, a spate of social legislation was now proposed. But it came too late to aid the people. The war with China dragged on, and the Pacific War approached. The military could not allocate funds to implement social legislation without sacrificing funds needed for the more visible sinews of war. After Pearl Harbor such social legislation as did exist was largely thrown into the discard because of the "greatest crisis in Japan's history."

Had the Zaibatsu been willing to limit their inordinate ambitions, the people might have had enough money to buy more than a little rice and fish and have become healthy and contented. This would have had two results: (1) the expansionists who led Japan into the war would not have found the people so ready to follow because of their empty bellies; and (2) the Zaibatsu would not have been so in need of new markets—there would have been a market at home.

Americans who say that the Zaibatsu were unwilling victims of the military ignore their eagerness to acquire new and exclusive markets and their paramountcy within the ruling coalition of the four groups. Two years prior to the seizure of Manchuria by the Kwantung Army, a comparatively enlightened and able Premier, Hamaguchi, attempted to carry out financial and economic policies which would have made military expansion less necessary in the eyes of the Japanese. Important elements among the Zaibatsu sabotaged his efforts. It is probably true that some of them were at first apprehensive about the aggression in Manchuria, but when they saw that the Western powers were not going to take action, they devoted their efforts to directing the expansion along sounder economic lines than the military unaided could evolve and to exploiting the victories of the military. Their ruthlessness toward their own people increased. For example, trade unions were suppressed in 1940; the elimination of the little business man and the small factory worker was accelerated; and the farmer was further oppressed by enforced enrolment in "cooperatives" and other measures.

The Zaibatsu did not object to war: they objected to policies which would impair their power and reduce their profits. In every important conflict behind the scenes between the military and the Zaibatsu the latter either won their point

HAPHAZARD ENTERPRISE FOR PRIVATE PROFIT ? or PLANNED DEVELOPMENT FOR THE COMMON GOOD Politics for the Child-minds ARE TORIES HUMAN ?
BOO! GESTAPO!
WILL LASKI BLOW UP PARLIAMENT ?
My Nest-egg right or wrong
"TOTALITARIAN" TOSH IS CHURCHILL PRETTIER THAN ATTLEE ?

ON THE HIGHER LEVEL

or effected a satisfactory compromise. Frequently the Zaibatsu gained the victory through an alliance with high military officers who had become sufficiently "moderate" to realize that cooperation with the Zaibatsu would enable them to pursue aggression more effectively. In recent years an increasing number of army and navy officers have joined the great industrial concerns, an indication that the policy of mutual accommodation continues.

Consistently the Zaibatsu have increased their strength. In the agencies which were established during the five years prior to Pearl Harbor as part of the movement toward a controlled economy, virtually all leading posts were allotted to business men. In 1940 a group of bureaucrats, with military support, advanced a plan—originating with Naoki Hoshino—to reorganize industry so that control would be wrested from the Zaibatsu. The Zaibatsu succeeded in emasculating the plan: the Minister of Commerce felt impelled to announce that the government had never thought of separating capital from management, and the author of the plan was shortly afterward dropped from the Cabinet. Again, during 1942 and 1943 when the Japanese leaders realized that the tide of war had turned against them, the Zaibatsu were successful in modifying Premier Tojo's effort to obtain virtually dictatorial powers over the war economy. Tojo found it necessary to create a Council of Cabinet Advisers consisting of seven leading men of the Zaibatsu; and in February, 1943, it was reported that he denied any intention of placing the country's chief industries under state control. Similarly, when the Munitions Ministry was established in 1943, the strength of the Zaibatsu was so great that they obtained great advantages in return for abiding by certain rules. In fact, after Pearl Harbor the Zaibatsu enjoyed an unparalleled boom: they enlarged their plants, launched new enterprises, and obtained phenomenal increases of capitalization.

Ever since 1931, when the current program of expansion began, there has been abundant evidence that the Zaibatsu not only have failed to oppose military aggression but have directed that aggression to their own profit, have employed the resulting situation to enhance their power within the coalition, and have used their enlarged control further to oppress the people, not only in order to augment their own wealth and power but to render the people impotent to challenge that power even in the empire's defeat. Under conditions of defeat, the Zaibatsu will prepare for the next war if given the opportunity.

Conscription or Enlistment?

BY MILITARIS

PRESIDENT TRUMAN, with the support of his Cabinet, has asked Congress to pass legislation now for compulsory military conscription in peace time. It is a dangerous request. Decision on such an important matter should not be taken without the fullest public discussion, and it would be grossly unfair, not to say undemocratic, to rush the thing through without giving the present members of the armed forces a chance to join in the discussion—at home, where they can hear and be heard. Nothing in the present situation calls for such haste.

Moreover, the discussion to date has not been notably realistic. With slogans ringing in our ears, we tend to overlook the fact that conscription is an old institution, with a history that might afford us some light. France inaugurated conscription in 1793, Austria in 1805, Prussia in 1808, Russia in 1864, Japan in 1873, and Italy in 1875. On the record, it cannot be said that conscription either created or destroyed the republican character of the French government or the autocratic character of the Russian or Austrian. Conscription, then, is neither democratic nor anti-democratic by nature, and arguments for or against it on grounds of political theory have no relevance. The record is equally impartial as regards the danger of war. Conscription has not secured peace for the countries that have adopted it, nor has its absence prevented England and the United States from engaging in numerous wars, offensive as well as defensive. And finally, there is no historical evidence that conscription guarantees victory or that its absence insures defeat.

The current proponents of conscription in the United States have two favorite arguments, unrelated but usually coupled: (1) it will improve the health, character, education, and patriotism of the conscript, thus performing the functions of social-service agencies; (2) in a world not yet at peace, and in the absence of a foolproof collective security organization, conscription is a military necessity.

The social-service argument is almost unbelievably thoughtless. It assumes (1) that the home, school, church, synagogue, club, union, and community have not made and cannot make Johnny and Janie healthy, intelligent, honest, and patriotic, and (2) that the armed forces can and will do these things. It is of course true that our present civilian social services leave much to be desired; but the armed forces are peculiarly unfitted to replace them. If 20.9 per cent of the rejections in the present war were for dental defects—to cite one well-known example—the answer is adequate food and dental care from childhood on. A year of military service would hardly be a substitute. Nor is it likely that educational and moral deficiencies of eighteen years' standing would be remedied. The army is not a school or a health resort; certainly it is not an ancient Greek ephebeum.

The purpose of military training is to produce efficient killers, not gentlemen or scholars or social-minded democrats. Whatever training is given to the conscript, be it physical, vocational, or moral, is conditioned by one supreme and abiding military motive: to kill the enemy. It could be truthfully argued that certain physical and educational improvements do accrue to the conscript, but the army has always frankly avowed that they are merely incidental to the basic job of acquiring proficiency in the art of killing. It could be truthfully argued that some character-building values inhere in being a member of a disciplined collectivity; the esprit de corps of a battle-seasoned group is high, and their civilian prejudices tend to dissolve under common danger—this extends even to Negro-white relations on the battlefield. But this sort of thing doesn't happen in the training camps, because it isn't allowed to happen. The armed forces have never claimed to be social pioneers. They haven't the time, the knowledge, or the will.

And even the incidental benefits are largely canceled out by the evils that go with military life. There is a fierce attack on the individual personality to make it fit the common mold of group discipline; there is a large gap between theory and practice in the fields of education and orientation. The removal of home and community restraints tempts many eighteen-year-olds into premature experiments, under bad conditions, with sex and alcohol. And it cannot be argued that the armed forces offer the best teachers, or even qualified teachers, in the field of democratic education. There is a wide gulf between officers and men—a gulf not warranted by the demands of discipline and representing primarily a survival of the military caste tradition. Segregation even extends to separate toilets for officers and men.

All in all, there appears to be little basis in fact for the idea that the armed forces are the best institution to give eighteen-year-olds health, education, and character development. This conclusion does not invalidate the idea that "a year of service to the country" would be a good thing. But there are many services and many agencies.

The argument that conscription is necessary for national defense stands on much firmer ground. To reject compulsory military service as a possible course of action, without full consideration, is to seek escape from a world not yet at peace and not yet practiced in the ways of peace regardless of good intentions. We cannot at this stage rule out the possibility of war. Only a world fully committed to economic and political cooperation can hope to have enduring peace. To this end we devoutly work. Meanwhile, conscription for defense is a legitimate issue for debate.

National defense, however, involves much more than military conscription. To consider this one resource in isolation from all others is unrealistic. Germany has demonstrated that no matter how powerful a nation may be it cannot overcome the military strength of a combination of enemies. No nation can defend itself alone against all comers; national defense for America cannot be divorced from participation in an international security organization.

The quantity and character of men and matériel needed for defense-by-helping-to-keep-the-peace are not precisely determinable, but we do know that the United Nations could provide a sufficient combined force without requiring a tremendous contribution from each nation. The commitment will probably entail a comparatively small but highly trained and highly mobile ground force, a two-ocean navy and merchant marine, and an independent air force. Since no one nation can ever attain a "defense" greater than all the others combined, the purely national defense units of the respective countries can be scaled down. Skill and mobility, not size, will be important.

In the light of this conception of national defense—and none other is valid except on the premise that we must prepare now for another world war—should we have universal military conscription? Would it assure us an adequate armed force? Probably not. A gunner on a Liberator or Flying Fortress today gets three months of basic training, three months of gunnery instruction, and three months of combat training before he goes on his first mission. Every other member of the crew—pilot, navigator, bombardier, engineer, and radioman—needs additional months of training. Altogether, the crew of a B-24 or a B-17 needs fourteen or fifteen months of preparation—intensive preparation. No peace-time air force would willingly accept the grueling schedule imposed on these men in the last phase of their war-time training. The process would almost inevitably be slowed down by 30 to 40 per cent. In short, one year of conscription would not be enough to train a bomber crew; and even if it were, the crew would have to be retrained within two years or be hopelessly out of date. The techniques of modern warfare change so rapidly that continuous training is essential. In an emergency it would do no good to call up airmen trained two years previously. And what is true of the air forces is more or less true of every branch of the services. For the most part, conscription would be good only for the sort of elementary training that can be acquired in a Boy Scout troop or a high-school R. O. T. C.

If, then, conscription is ineffective to produce adequate national defense, what are the alternatives? Surely we don't want to revert to the pre-war standards of voluntary enlistment, which made the uniform of the United States Army a social stigma except for officers. The only proper alternative is to raise the standards and increase the rewards sufficiently to assure an adequate professional army. I shall not argue the merits of the following proposed incentives, but I am sure most G. I.'s would approve them.

1. Promises as to training and assignment, except in the event of war, should be rigorously kept. There should be adequate aptitude and other tests before induction, on the basis of which the recruit should be given an assignment for which he is fitted or, if unfit for military service, he should be returned to civilian life. The air forces eventually saved a great deal of time and expense by testing candidates before sending them to training schools.

2. The minimum period of enlistment should be three years, for training and assignment will take almost that long.

3. Rates of pay for all enlisted men, particularly for the lower grades, should be considerably improved. At present rates it is impossible for married men below the grade of staff sergeant to live on army pay unless their wives work. This curtails their ability to have children, which is bad not only for the individuals concerned but for the nation.

4. Adequate housing and commissary, on or near military reservations, for all personnel, both married and single.

5. Real training and supervision of cooks. The possibility of abolishing K. P.—except as punishment—should be investigated. Civilian personnel should be employed here, as they are in PX cafeterias.

6. Standardization of promotion practices. Arbitrary freezing "in grade" reduces incentive. The experience of the Civil Service could be a useful guide here.

7. Direct commissions should be available for men with special skills, but generally the practice of sending good men to officer-candidate schools should be maintained.

8. Replacement of the caste system with true discipline. Good officers, like good teachers, good foremen, or good employers, have no trouble in enforcing discipline. They receive a personal loyalty from the men which no artificial distinctions can replace.

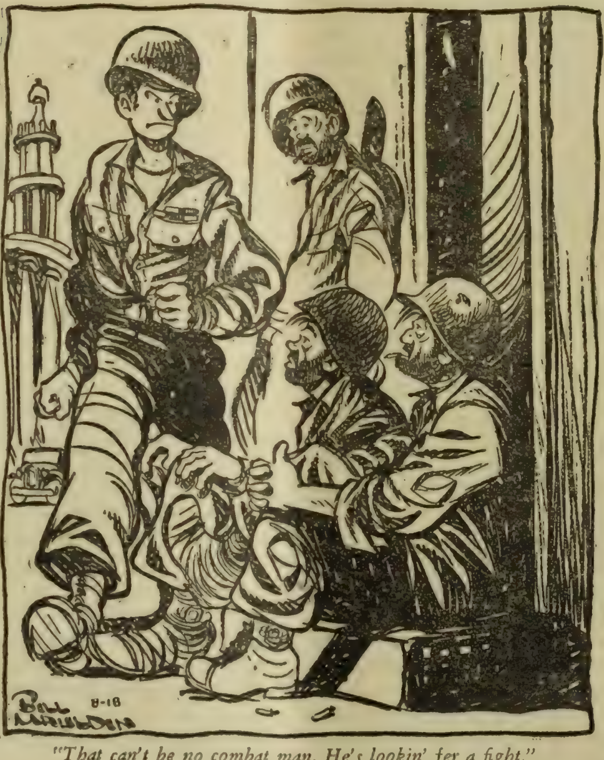
With these incentives, it should be possible to build a real citizen army. The military caste system would be modified, and the old stereotypes of the "drunken sailor" and "the bad boy who ran away to join the army" would tend to disappear. The armed forces would be elevated to a new and better place in our national life, partly because they would contribute to the national well-being and partly because they would fulfil the legitimate needs of the individual.

Conscription can only encourage the worst aspects of a necessarily hierarchical system; voluntary enlistment under enlightened conditions can make the armed forces a calling to which free men in a democratic society will gladly dedicate themselves. Surely the cause of preserving peace in the world is worthy of such dedication.

Bill Mauldin's War

BY KING GORDON

I HEAR you have just left the army, Bill Mauldin, after putting in five years, collecting about a hundred service points—I don't know how many medals — and reaching the mature age of twenty-three. I've been looking at your cartoons for quite a time now and have come to the conclusion that you have done about as well as anybody could to give the folks back home an idea of what life "up front" is like. It's not easy to get the idea across to those of us who have put in a pretty safe and comfortable war over here. As you yourself say, "I guess you have to go through it to understand its horrors. You can't understand it by reading newspapers or by looking at pictures or by going to newsreels. You have to smell and feel it all around you until you can't imagine what it used to be like when you walked on a sidewalk or tossed clubs into horse-chestnut trees or fished for perch or when you did anything at all without a pack, a rifle and a bunch of grenades."



"That can't be no combat man. He's lookin' fer a fight."

So it's not easy for a civilian to write in praise or blame of a book* that comes right out of an experience in which he has no share. Probably I wouldn't have let out a peep had it not been for a review in last week's Nation. Now The Nation is scrupulous about respecting the independence of reviewers, but in this case it seems to me that another opinion is worth recording. I hadn't read your book when I saw the review, but I knew that whatever else your book might be it was not "dedicated to the proposition that war is funny." Because I never saw a cartoon of yours that didn't hit me closer to the midriff than to the funnybone. I couldn't judge, then, about your being "illiterate"; I would have been surprised to discover you were or that you had "bad taste." Without reading a word of the text I was prepared to bet that it was a pretty dignified and perceptive job and that if you did not quite have Ernie Pyle's flair for words, you and he probably talked—and understood—the same language.

Well, I read your book last night and my hunch was right. If I were you I wouldn't worry too much about literary style or grammar or standards of taste. You've given us a picture of the combat soldier in this war that will stick for a long time, and in about twenty-five years some wizened old ex-infantryman who spent the early '40's in northern Italy will pick up your book and say: "Yes, it was like that."

I was right too about you and Ernie Pyle. Your craft is drawing and his was writing, but your minds worked the same away. Remember he talked about "that stare" in the eyes of a soldier who has seen a lot of action, "a look of dulness, eyes that look without seeing, eyes that see without conveying any image to the mind. It's a look that is the display room for what lies behind it—exhaustion, lack of sleep, fear beyond fear, misery to the point of numbness, a look of surpassing indifference to anything anybody can do." You put it this way: "Look into an infantryman's eyes and you can tell how much war he has seen. . . . If he is weary and resigned to the fact that he is probably going to die before it is over, and if he has a deep, almost hopeless desire to go home and forget it all, if he looks with dull, almost uncomprehending eyes at a fresh-faced kid who is talking of the joys of battle and killing Germans, then he comes from the same infantry as Joe and Willie."

---

* "Up Front." By Bill Mauldin. Henry Holt. $3.

The humor of your book is a very special kind. It is humor that comes out of the mud and misery and boredom and fear of death that is modern war. It is a humor that asserts the ultimate bravery of the human spirit faced with unending distress and anguish. Frequently it is sardonic, sometimes it is impertinent (there were a good many brass hats who didn't appreciate you), almost always it is compassionate. It is never slapstick, never forced, never insensitive. Sometimes it simply states the wonderment and relief at being alive in the context of death. Sometimes the point is lost on the civilian through his sheer inability to identify himself with a front-line situation. Occasionally you stumble on a made-to-order formula, as in the case of the motorized cavalryman shooting his wounded jeep. But usually the humor comes naturally out of the experiences of your two weary dogfaces, Joe and Willie.

Most of your readers will understand what you mean when you say, "Since I'm a cartoonist maybe I can be funny after the war, but nobody who has seen this war can be cute about it when it is going on." There was nothing very funny in your description of the men staying for days and weeks in the wet foxholes in Italy and contracting trench foot. "If they couldn't stand the pain they crawled out of their holes and stumbled and crawled (they couldn't walk) down the mountain until they reached the aid station. Their shoes were cut off and their feet swelled like balloons. Sometimes the feet had to be amputated. But most often the men had to make their agonized way back up the mountain and crawl into their holes again because there were no replacements and the line had to be held." Most of your readers will get what you mean when you speak of the "certain nobility and dignity in combat soldiers and medical-aid men with dirt in their ears."

You've done a lot in throwing across a bridge—and there are all too few bridges—between the combat soldier and the civilian. Those who read your book are not going to frown heavily and escape responsibility by talking of the "problem of the returning veteran." Instead, they are going to think of a young American who has been away for a while doing a different kind of job and leading a different kind of life that has produced certain important changes in the way he looks at things. As you say, "If he is lucky, his memories of those sharp, bitter days will fade over the years into a hazy recollection of a period that was filled with homesickness and horror and dread and monotony, occasionally lifted and lighted by the gentle, humorous, and sometimes downright funny things that always go along with misery." You've helped us understand the man that's coming back from up front. It's probably going to be harder for him to understand us who stayed put at home sweating over our income taxes and Victory gardens.

Anyway, thanks for your book. And good luck to you.

In the Wind

THE TRIAL OF LORD HAW HAW in London drew forth this editorial comment from the Los Angeles Herald Express on June 20: "His trial is being watched with interest, particularly by Americans, for there are in this country many persons who are living on the borderline of treason. Jap lovers who want California again infested with wild, brute-animal Japanese are among these. Communists who love Russia more than the United States are another group. People of any race who use radio and women's clubs or other mediums of propaganda to overthrow the American Way of Life for foreign ideologies are another. . . . They should get the same kind of mercy from this country that Lord Haw Haw is going to get from Great Britain."

UNDER THE OPA-WPB low-cost clothing program, manufacturers are required to pre-ticket certain garments with their ceiling prices. The tickets are there, but in many cases they are hard to find. Sometimes they are hidden under the size labels, and sometimes they are sewn inside a seam in such a way that the customer must turn the garment inside out in order to see them.

THE NEW YORK DAILY MIRROR (Hearst) devoted its editorial on July 3 to the Nation Associates' dinner for Thomas Mann. It seems the affair was part of a plot to make the United States join Russia in a war against England.

THE WAR DEPARTMENT will release 10,000 light and 20,000 medium trucks for sale to farmers.

REVERSE LEND-LEASE from France in the year after the Normandy invasion amounted to $400,000,000.

AT THE ANNUAL commencement day luncheon of the University of California Alumni Association, June 23, the guests brought their own lunches. A good time was had by all.

HEADLINE in the Santa Monica, California, Evening Outlook for June 12: "RACKETEERS PLAN TO MILCH PUBLIC—Better Business Bureau Leads in Campaign."

LEGISLATIVE MEMO: H. R. 776, which would make it possible for Filipinos to become American citizens, has been passed by the House and is now in the Senate Committee on Immigration, headed by Walter Franklin George of Georgia.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. We will pay $1 for each item accepted—EDITORS THE NATION.]

AMG Fumbles the Ball

BY PHILIP JORDAN

Kitzbühl, Austria, June 19

A CURIOUS but by no means inexplicable dichotomy is manifest today in the minds of both Bavarians and Austrians. (I write only of Bavaria and American-occupied Austria, since these are the two regions I have been able to observe.) They resent with much overt bitterness the Allied Military Government's retention of former active members of the Nazi Party in positions of authority; and, simultaneously, they are beginning to wonder whether perhaps they were not better off under the rule of the Nazis before their two countries were defeated and unconditionally surrendered. It is particularly distressing to find this hankering for a discredited regime, whose sudden ruin overwhelmingly disillusioned them, among sections of the population where it had never been truly popular.

An examination of the causes of this unwholesome state of mind discloses that much is lacking in the conception, as opposed to the execution, of Allied military government; the disclosure is the more disturbing in that it shows how "higher levels"—who will ultimately, one assumes, be responsible for the peace—have refused to learn anything from the mistakes they made when they set up military governments, first in North Africa and subsequently in Italy. Or else, of course, it shows a light-minded obstinacy happily rare in the annals of democratic government.

Let it be said at once—and all that follows must be read in this context—that, with a few neurotic exceptions, the personnel charged with Allied administration are doing conscientious and honorable work in exceedingly difficult conditions. Their business is to govern conquered enemy territory; but since no real policy, other than the brutally stupid policy of non-fraternization, has ever been formulated for their guidance, the areas under their control are necessarily ruled by capricious and empirical methods, varying from day to day and even from hour to hour. No over-all line of conduct exists to guide them: a string of negatives circumscribes the opportunities for setting a bewildered people a democratic example, with the natural result that each small area, in some cases each hamlet or village, is governed along lines totally different from those followed in neighboring communities.

AMG officials, many of them unable to speak a word of German, are frequently more bewildered by the problems that face them than are the people over whom they have been appointed to rule. In the resulting chaos Nazi officials may be retained in power simply because their knowledge of local conditions and of administration at least insures that the wheels of community life will continue to turn, albeit at a much-reduced speed. Such Nazi officials inevitably obstruct the efforts of Military Government officers to discover men of administrative ability who have not been corrupted by contact with the party.

Were it not for the policy of those responsible for psychological warfare, it would be a simple matter to discover this talent, to test its good-will, and at the same time to show these people how the workings of democracy can better their rapidly worsening lot. But, alas, psychological warfare is in the hands of one Brigadier General Robert McClure, in whom those who know him can have neither confidence nor hope. It was he who headed the reactionary censorship department installed in Algiers when the Allies first landed in North Africa; it was he who prevented correspondents there, infinitely better informed than himself, from stating that there was no need either to use Darlan or to employ the servants of the Vichy regime, since a fund of administrative ability friendly to our cause was available to us at any moment we cared to employ it. It was he who daily described as "highly inflammable" any dispatch which ventured to suppose that the appointment of Darlan was not the wisest move made since the war began. Sources of friendly aid also exist here, but because General McClure's old-fashioned ideas still prevail, they are difficult to find. All that his methods have achieved is to drive the people of these two areas, at least, to listen to the Berlin radio in preference to the drivel which comes nightly from the BBC and Luxembourg, and, by the prohibition of local newspapers produced by local people, to prevent AMG officials from discovering what the people under their control are thinking.

If we were anxious to discover what people are thinking, the way to achieve our object would be to allow them publicly to say what they think. If they were allowed to produce newspapers or to enjoy the right of free assembly—always under the possible veto of the local AMG of course—we should very shortly find out who was thinking what and be able to judge in some degree the qualities of various citizens who might be useful both to us and to their fellow-countrymen. Above all, perhaps, by granting such privileges we should have offered an example of the democratic principle in operation at a moment when it would be most persuasive.

In some communities here 90 per cent of former Nazi officials are still employed; and because some of the young men appointed to govern are losing heart, it is possible that these Nazis will continue in power for a long time to come. In other localities, where more imaginative or more optimistic governors have been appointed, there has been a change; and the mental health of the community has noticeably improved.

In the little town of Strobl, not far from Salzburg, a young American captain with nothing to lose—and that is important—has performed a wonderful piece of work. An ardent anti-Nazi himself, he first dismissed the Nazi mayor and deputy mayor. His difficulty was then to discover replacements for these men, and he solved it in a manner that has impressed his "pupils in democracy" with the efficacy of the American doctrine.

He called in a dozen of the "city fathers" and astonished them by saying that as it was their community over which he was temporarily ruling, it would be for them and their fellow-citizens to nominate and then to elect a mayor and deputy mayor. He would set only one condition: no Nazis were to be nominated; but in the elections the Nazis were to be allowed to vote. They above all, he went on to explain, needed to learn what voting meant. The next day 60 per cent of the town's adult population turned out to present their nominations, and the six men with the most supporters were chosen to run in the election. A week later the ballot boxes were set up, each guarded by an American soldier to see that the votes were not falsified, and 70 per cent of the town came out to register their wishes. Despite original official disapproval of this exhibition of common sense, the process is now admitted to have been a success, but it has not been recommended elsewhere.

Strobl, alas, is an exception to the rule. In most places the AMG is no more than machinery for forbidding people to take action rather than for guiding them toward more healthful political methods than any they have known for many years.

Life in most communities is at a wholly unnecessary standstill, and food is growing short. Food was bound to grow short, and can grow a lot shorter before the people are down to the standard of Britain, let alone France, Holland, and Belgium. But the shortage, combined with that inertia which lack of policy has made inevitable, is causing many people to wonder whether they would not prefer the Nazis. However oppressive and uncivilized the Nazis may have been, there was some purpose in life, some organic direction, and you knew where you were going. The rule of non-fraternization is not teaching what democracy means; indeed, its impact on the population is hardly easier to bear than the former arrogance of the Nazis. How, indeed, is democracy to be taught to these people if none of its elementary decencies are manifested?

Downing Street and the White House have much to answer for in their conduct of our political warfare since September, 1939. Their lack of vision is now plainly revealed here in southern Germany and in Austria. "High-level" officials, "policy-making" officials, have had six years to think out a plan for Germany, and all they have produced is non-fraternization and a total black-out on our way of life—except for a few pompous platitudes uttered over the radio, to which the defeated can listen only with great difficulty. Small wonder that they are beginning to want to believe what Berlin and Vienna stations tell them; those stations offer them hope, however spurious it may be.

In the American Zone

There was a sound of revelry bei Nacht
For Ribbentrop and Kesselring and Schacht.
Herr Ribbentrop, a connoisseur of wine,
Declared the drinks were only fit for swine.
Reporters called his manners into question,
But Robert Murphy noted the suggestion.

J. M. M.

Censors or Reporters?

BY DONALD DOWNES

Milan, June 21

IT IS fashionable now to blame America's ignorance of what goes on in Europe on the military censors, but it is possible that American correspondents are also guilty of doing some pretty superficial reporting. Many hot spots of Europe which may cause another war and send another generation of Americans to Europe to die are not well covered in the American press. One of these is Italy.

The current Stars and Stripes carries a story which Leigh White of the Chicago Daily News sent home from Milan on June 18. In it Mr. White compares Lieutenant Colonel Hershenson to Major Joppolo of John Hersey's "A Bell for Adano," and says, "But it was not a church bell that was wanted by the people of Milan; it was something far more complicated—namely, a workable system of rapid justice capable of punishing the more important of local Fascists without degenerating into anarchy or civil war." The Stars and Stripes adds, "White says that Colonel Hershenson created orderly courts, paid every Italian patriot according to a specific scale of benefits, and started an investigation of prisoners taken by the partisans." White says further, "The purge of Fascists is being carried out by the Milanese themselves with a minimum of Anglo-American supervision. Everybody, even the most radical of Partisans, now agrees that justice is being done in a fair and impartial manner" (italics mine).

This Mr. White wrote on a day when thousands of North Italians were picketing with indignant banners the offices of the AMG in Milan, Genoa, Turin, and other cities because one Basile, who had ordered more than six hundred patriots shot and had procured forcibly for export to Germany more than six thousand Italian slave laborers, received a prison sentence instead of death. And on a day—June 17—when the Italian press of Milan carried four stories of men either pardoned by the Allied-supported royal family or given sentences considered too light by an overwhelming majority of the press and the public alike.

Mr. White credits Colonel Hershenson with the new Extraordinary Assize Courts. In point of fact these courts were established by decree of the Italian government at Rome on April 22 and accepted by Admiral Ellery Stone, U. S. N. R., for the Allied Commission. On all sides one hears criticism of these courts from Italians of all parties because the Bonomi government and the Allied Commission prefabricated them before the liberation in such a way as to leave very great influence to the judiciary which held office under Mussolini.

Mr. White also credits Colonel Hershenson with the fact that the street cars and public utilities run. They never stopped running. I arrived here on April 30, the fifth day of the anti-Fascist revolution, and ahead of the Fourth Corps, and I found all utilities and local transportation operating normally, traffic policed, and the central military command of the partisans in complete control. This was so because Ferruccio Parri and his associates had planned and executed a partisan movement against the Germans combined with a revolution against Fascism with such precision and force that there were few open hostilities and no damage to the necessary utilities or the factories—not because the AMG and the Fourth Corps were preparing to enter the city.

Colonel Hershenson is in every sense "a good guy" and has succeeded for the most part in giving the Milanesi a good government with a minimum of interference in small local matters, so far as the directives from on high, the Allied Commission at Rome, and Allied Forces Headquarters at Caserta, would allow. But to say that the AMG for Milan or for Lombardy, the latter under Colonel Charles Poletti, pleases "everybody," or even a majority of the Italians, or even the Americans themselves is misleading.

For instance: on June 8 the newspapers here received an order from PWB dictated from "on high" threatening them with suspension if they used news sources other than the United Nations News Service (predigested and selected by PWB), the BBC, or an American program relayed from London called "The Voice of America." One editor had a copy of Mussolini's orders muzzling the press, and the similarity to ours was frightening. "How," he asked me, "can we establish a democracy without freedom of the press?"

Today again the paper carries stories of wrist-slapping sentences against Fascists. Our canned news service has failed to give out a story of paramount interest to Italians—namely, that two such important Americans as Sumner Welles and Walter Lippmann think our policy toward Italy, and toward England in regard to Italy, needs radical revision. The AMG continues to ignore the black market. The wealthy industrialists who backed Mussolini and made millions out of Fascism continue at liberty to make eyes at British and American big business. The armistice terms are still a frightening secret, and Italian initiative is paralyzed by uncertainty about the future. Prince Umberto remains in power. And Italian disillusionment with our brand of democracy mounts daily.

But the good people of Chicago—and New York and hamlets beyond and between—continue to read either nothing about Italy or a report like Mr. White's that all is well because Anglo-American Major Joppolos are everywhere dispensing sweetness, light, justice, and democracy.

This is because political news, peace news, is being reported by war correspondents who flit by plane from here to yon, being an expert on Syria today, on Italy yesterday, and on Norway tomorrow. They live in comfortable hotels supplied by the army and see few "natives" except officials who dare not talk. Their reports are based on the wishful handouts of the public-relations sections of various army commands. They have neither the time nor the inclination to dig locally for the sad facts which might reveal that we are expending American prestige wholesale and reaping suspicion and distrust by making a fetish of order as opposed to revolutionary justice and by backing reaction against liberalism.

The American people are charged with decisions on foreign policy which will determine whether another generation must fight and die in Europe. World War III may come upon us while the readers of the Chicago Daily News and thousands of other papers are congratulating themselves on what a wonderful job we have done in democratizing Europe—in the opinion of reporters who may have written excellent stories about how bravely John Doe of 1313 Main Street, Oshkosh, Michigan, behaved at Cassino but who are wholly out of touch with the disillusioned peoples of Europe.

Attack from the Left

[The letter from which we take the following excerpts was written to an American friend by a young Frenchman who escaped from France in 1942, joined the Fighting French, and is now convalescing from tuberculosis brought on by the hardships he suffered.]

I'VE sent you another letter in which I do nothing but speak of personal things, so this letter shall be mainly about the situation in France. It's very simple: the resistance, lacking political experience, has not lived up to the hopes of the "alive" section of France and of our foreign friends that it would guide the regeneration of the country. The trusts, far more versed in these matters, have it, for the moment, in the palm of their hand. Practically in its entirety the resistance was and still is left. The question before the resistance then was not to know what political ideology to pursue but to know what methods to use in order to make its ideology prevail after the liberation. It is there that the resistants, honest, idealistic men but like many idealists naive, committed their gravest error. They believed that platonic suggestion would be sufficient to resolve the problem "amicably." They thought that because they were heroes they had only to speak and they would be listened to, and a new France, in their mold, would arise. "The others" let them talk, loaded their arms with flowers, and then maneuvered and jockeyed until now the resistants are sidetracked. They will go down in the history books, but they're not "to stick their noses into serious affairs." . . .

Among the resistants the Christian Democrats are largely responsible for the calamitous tactic of conciliation. The Christian Democrats deserve respect; they furnished the resistance movement with an important contingent of fighters and martyrs. But as far as domestic policies are concerned, they are swimming in a sea of rose water. Their idea is to transform society by transforming men. They think that all they need do is preach sermons to the bosses, and bad bosses will become good bosses and everybody will love everybody else. Perhaps in the next three thousand years the bosses may begin to listen to them, but have we the right to make starving people wait three thousand years? The Catholics are illogical, for in foreign affairs the theologians admit the legitimacy of force when no other way is left. Why not admit it in domestic affairs? Christ didn't preach homilies to the "sixty families" of the Temple—he drove them out with a whip. Today it would be a machine-gun.

Perhaps you may ask: You tell me that the resistance has been shunted to one side, but isn't it true that a large number of resistants are now in the government? Yes, that's true. But the resistants chosen have not been always the most talented, and many are men who came back from London and from Algiers. Most of these resistants in office have been selected from among the people of the right or of middle-class origin. There were, it must be said, many bourgeois in the resistance. They were honest and courageous. But a bourgeois reasons, just the same, like a bourgeois. With the best will and intentions in the world, unless he has a special kind of genius, a sort of atavism molds his views. . . .

Anyway, as I've said, the fight has merely been postponed.

BOOKS and the ARTS

THE GREAT RETURN

Some day ten million Ithacas will have them;
They will come steaming home, come banking home
Past the big cloud the god of our suspense
Built high above sweet springs and shingled houses.
Some day, some day, the oceans and the air,
Man loud, will bear them hither in slow swarms—
Slow, but a host will gather, and long shores
Live with familiar feet, and inland acres
Shudder beneath fond weight, and cars and cattle
Caper again; the factories, the highways,
Fields, and old hedges musical with raincrows,
Parlors, and potato-scented kitchens,
Be as ten million nests for homing men.
Who as they nod and settle will remember
Others that never flew—the jungle holds them,
And the exploded abbey, the shrill street
Where snipers are no more; nor comrades either.
Sweet is the land that death too once desired,
Sweet the acknowledged waters, the roof ridges
That faded in a far dream or did not—
Not now, except for these who are the world's Forever as they halfway too come home.

MARK VAN DOREN

IS "FREEDOM ROAD" TRUE?

BY COLEMAN ROSENBERGER

THE literary quarterly Sewanee Review, recently rejuvenated under the editorship of Allen Tate, has attacked the historical accuracy of Howard Fast's novel "Freedom Road." But more, Fast is pictured as the leader of a "cult" which has as its purpose the deliberate distortion of Southern history. In a review of twenty-one current novels Sewanee finds that "nine bear the taint." The "members of this cult," runs the Sewanee argument, are "anti-historical propagandists" and "prophets of a new past, the past being overhauled to meet the specifications of some immediate political pressure." The area of their activity has included the "liberal" weekly (the quotation marks are Sewanee's), and "the most disturbing achievement of this cult, if its influence shall continue, will be an actual past fanatically destroyed and replaced by a 'scholarly' past existing only in the fictions of research."

What is the truth of this? I suspect that what is really agitating the intellectual apologists for the Old South is that for the first time their interpretation of history is being challenged and subjected to a searching reevaluation.

Sewanee notes with satisfaction that "the world of serious scholarship" has not been "invaded" by "propagandists" like Fast, and regrets that "sober Southern historians" are being ignored. Let us, then, call a "sober Southern historian" to witness. A recently published volume, which has been all too little noticed, casts much light upon Reconstruction history. It is the careful, 500-page biography of Senator Benjamin R. Tillman by Francis Butler Simkins, "Pitchfork Ben Tillman: South Carolinian," published by the Louisiana State University Press in 1944. The author was born in the same county in South Carolina as was the subject of his biography, so he would hardly be, as Sewanee charges of Fast, "guilty of the elementary ignorance of not knowing that South Carolina is a part of the Deep South."

Simkins's book includes a chapter, The Campaign of 1876, which describes the young Tillman's "yeoman service in the struggle to rid South Carolina of Negro and Carpetbag rule." It is a completely documented account, which, I think, will be very difficult to explain away. It is much to the point of the questions raised about the authenticity of "Freedom Road."

What does the South Carolinian Simkins say about the campaign of 1876? Tillman and his neighbors decided upon "the use of intimidation and fraud as the only means of forcing the blacks back into subordination." They "felt no compunction in applying lawless tactics to the political situation." Under the command of a former Confederate officer, Tillman and nearly half a hundred of his fellows developed what became known as "the Straightout, the Shotgun, or the Edgefield policy." The enemy was the freed slave. Simkins quotes Tillman's statement of the strategy: they "agreed on the policy of terrorizing the Negroes at the first opportunity, by letting them provoke trouble and then having the whites demonstrate their superiority by killing as many of them as was justifiable."

Incidents were not long in coming. The house of one of the white citizens was burned. Although, in Tillman's words, only "circumstantial evidence and suspicions" pointed to any Negro as the incendiary, a warrant was issued for the arrest of a Negro leader. When he was not found at his home, the members of the white military company were made a posse comitatus which hunted through the countryside for ex-slaves.

In the summer of 1876 an "opportunity for bloodshed" was provided at the town of Hamburg, which may or may not have a resemblance to Fast's Carwell, but which Simkins describes as "a once prosperous town which had degenerated into a refuge for Negro criminals and politicians." A trial was called after a disturbance when two white men in a buggy forced their way through the town. Tillman is quoted: "It was our purpose to attend the trial to see that the young man had protection and, if any opportunity offered, to provoke a row, and if one did not offer, we were to make one."

The description of the "Hamburg massacre" which followed may best be read in Simkins's book. It may be noted that after a number of prisoners were taken it was asked "whether the lives of only two blacks should pay for the death of one white. The answer was an emphatic negative."

Simkins observes of Tillman: "That the entire North as well as liberal Southern circles condemned the so-called Hamburg massacre caused him no heartaches; he was contemptuous of such opinions. As he neared home that morning, he stopped at a neighbor's house and ate heartily of watermelon; he felt elated."

The feeble attempt of the state government to bring the rioters to trial on charges of conspiracy and murder was met with "defiance and derision." Simkins notes that "there were no judicial authorities in South Carolina with the temerity to reckon with Ben Tillman and his neighbors."

With its local success, the Edgefield policy became the model for the rest of South Carolina. Two of the Edgefield leaders captured the state democratic convention and engineered the nomination of Wade Hampton as Governor. The "Red Shirts" were organized to put the Edgefield "Straightout" on a state-wide basis. In one of the first clashes several former slaves were killed in a swamp, and Simon Coker, a mulatto state senator accused of making a "very incendiary speech," was executed.

Two months later Hampton became Governor.

This, very briefly, is part of the story which a "sober Southern historian" has to tell. His book is the result of long and thorough historical research. It deserves consideration in judging the historical "distortions" of such a novel as "Freedom Road."

Polemic Against Fatalism

FATE AND FREEDOM, A PHILOSOPHY FOR FREE AMERICANS. By Jerome Frank. Simon and Schuster. $3.

WHEN a lawyer, judge, and former chairman of the Securities Exchange Commission writes a book on the philosophy of history, every impartial reader will admire and respect the intellectual versatility which makes such an achievement possible. Frank's previous books have dealt with social and political themes and have marked him as a student who transcended his specific legal discipline. In his latest volume he goes even farther afield and essays a treatise on one of the most vexing problems of historical interpretation—the relation of human freedom to the casual sequences and "trends" of history.

Frank's interest in this problem is not academic. He believes that modern culture has been too much inclined to determinism and fatalism and that this tendency contains a threat to a democratic culture. He therefore marshals every possible resource of his wide erudition and imaginative mind to counter the influence of what he calls "inevitablism" and to establish the thesis that a healthy democratic culture requires confidence in the reality of human freedom and responsibility.

Few would quarrel with the main burden of the thesis, though it may be questioned whether it is possible to carry it through as unqualifiedly as Judge Frank attempts. In his polemic against "inevitablism" he not only challenges historical determinism but adduces all possible evidence against the concept of causality in the physical sciences, bringing indeterminism in the physical world to the support of a pure voluntarism in the interpretation of history.

In this unqualified defense of voluntarism, the paradoxical relation of freedom to fate is not fully comprehended. Mr. Frank admits, for instance, that "both Freudians and Marxists paradoxically aim to alter the inevitability which they proclaim to exist." That is equally true of older determinists, such as Moslems and Calvinists. The determinists are, in other words, not so consistently deterministic as they pretend and as Mr. Frank assumes. They assert human responsibility even while they seem to deny it. Mr. Frank is quite right in insisting that they violate logic in doing so; but the important point is that their system of thought may do more justice to the fact of human responsibility than his polemic against them implies.

On the other hand, Mr. Frank is forced to qualify the rigor of his indeterminism and voluntarism. He makes his reservation in his introduction but unfortunately fails to elaborate its full implication. He declares:

> Much is said in this book about the impossibility of accurate history writing. The reader, noting that I have engaged in considerable historical discussion, may feel that I have refused to take my own medicine. The answer is that, unlike most professional historians, I frankly acknowledge that my versions of history are "just-so stories." Indeed, my fundamental thesis is that all human interpretations of experience are "just-so stories," some of which are more desirable, or plausible, or useful than others.

The words "plausible, desirable, or useful" are weasel words which leave one in the dark whether or not Judge Frank desires to escape pure relativism. If the words imply that some stories are more truthful than others, there must be criteria of truth; and history cannot be a chaos of pure contingency from which no significant concepts of meaning can be derived. If the words do not imply "truthfulness," there is no reason why anyone should read the "just-so stories" of anyone else.

The issue between determinism and voluntarism, in short, is not so clear-cut as Judge Frank assumes. Determinists make concessions to the fact of human freedom and responsibility; and voluntarists, such as Frank, must make their concessions too, or they will reduce the realm of historical events to such a chaos of contingency that nothing can be said about it.

The undue rigor of the thesis of the book does not, however, invalidate many wise and searching observations upon the central theme. The pretensions of the historical sciences to scientific exactness are nicely debunked. In dealing with the relativism of all historical judgments, the contingent character of historical events is perhaps unduly emphasized, and the relative perspective of the historical observer, as a source of the relativity of judgments, is not fully dealt with. But the problem is illumined from a wide field of learning.

One very confusing element in Frank's treatise is his belief that historical determinism is somehow or other related to asceticism. I have read and reread the chapter entitled Our Ascetic-Fatalistic Science in an effort to understand the connection between asceticism and fatalism, but it still eludes me. Judge Frank writes:

> The makers of modern physics were (to use the modern jargon) sublimating the fierce ascetic drive that formed the central part of their social heritage. It was easy for men steeped in Platonism and in the gospel of St. Augustine to make a scientific gospel of Democritus's ascetic-deterministic doctrine.

Judge Frank rightly regards the determinism of the eighteenth-century physiocrats as the root of many modern social illusions which prevent us from dealing adequately with the problem of poverty and justice. He admits that this kind of determinism is part of a commercial civilization which reacted strongly against medieval asceticism, "liberating greed and making it a virtue, indeed the highest virtue." So the relation between determinism and asceticism remains a mystery.

Yet this book is a book to be read for both instruction and enjoyment, even if the central thesis cannot be accepted unqualifiedly. REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Caruso

ENRICO CARUSO, HIS LIFE AND DEATH. By Dorothy Caruso. Simon and Schuster, $2.75.

IF CARUSO were alive today he would be seventy-two years old. He died in 1921, at the age of forty-eight, the greatest singer of his own and perhaps of all time. To the people who were fortunate enough to hear him from the stage, he remains, after all these years, a unique recollection; but even for those of us who know his voice only from recording, it is a still-present wonder. Part of the wonder is its extraordinary range and power; much more of the wonder is, I think, its emotional quality. It is a quality in response to which our usual class protections and vulnerabilities seem miraculously to disappear. Whether we are opera lovers or scorners, whether we look upon singing as the noblest or the least noble of the arts or as no art at all, when Caruso sings, the discriminations and prejudices bred of education no longer obtain; only Caruso obtains. I doubt that there has ever been an art performance more widely shared and more unanimously received. At once the most personal of artists, who would seem to sing to each listener alone, and the most impersonal of artists, who refuses to be made the property of any social or aesthetic coterie, Caruso is an occasion for that sense of community with our fellow-men which has been set down as a purpose of art but which art in actuality seldom aims for and even more seldom achieves.

I suppose it is an expectable irony that the man who could dispel our loneliness was himself a very lonely man, a frightened and finally a tragic man: the lives of artists constantly teach us this pattern by which the artist's unhealthiness becomes our health, his suffering our pleasure. Yet as it uncovers the background of pain to a performance that gave the appearance of being, above all things, easy and "natural," Dorothy Caruso's account of the three years of her marriage—they were the last three years of Caruso's life—is almost unbearably newly poignant; and perhaps it is always so; perhaps the suffering of any individual artist is always without precedent. In Caruso's case there was, first, the anguish simply of being a singer—of having as one's instrument one's own body, so that added to the not uncommon anxieties for the flesh, there was the uncommon invitation to identify flesh and art. There was the anguish of being the greatest singer: how terrible it must be to live with an awareness of being the greatest anything! There was the anguish of being a public person—the usual threats and invasions, the destroying emotions of not daring to trust. At last, there was the anguish of

How has SOVIET RUSSIA accomplished the impossible
?

THE BASIS OF SOVIET STRENGTH

By George B. Cressey

Chairman, Dept. of Geology and Geography, Syracuse Univ.

The Basis of Soviet Strength is a non-political, realistic and readable account of Soviet power in terms of industries, land, climate, agriculture, people, regional characteristics, and its future as one of the great nations of the world. Mr. Cressey, the author of Asia's Lands and Peoples, pierces the riddle of Russia and presents the country and its people with the impartiality of a scientist and the warm understanding of a humanitarian. He has seen first hand the Soviet Union's development from the initial chaos following the Revolution to its phenomenal military and industrial accomplishments during the recent European war. Here is fundamental data necessary to any realistic appraisal of Russia and her future role. Extensively illustrated with photographs and maps. $3.00

At all bookstores

WHITTLESEY HOUSE
A Division of the McGraw-Hill Book Co.

By all means read 2nd enlarged edition

THE DIES COMMITTEE
By August Raymond Ogden

A complete survey and analysis of this famous Committee on Un-American Activities from its beginnings to its close.

". . . a solid, competent and comprehensive job."
I. F. Stone in The Nation

". . . sound scholarship and sound democracy."
R. L. Duffus in The New York Times Book Review

cloth per copy $3.00

Send for our catalogue

THE CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA PRESS
Washington 17, D. C.

To read this book is to be forearmed

WOODROW WILSON and the Great Betrayal

By Thomas A. Bailey

The dramatic story of Wilson's fight for American approval of Versailles and the League of Nations is fraught with implications for today. Here is the whole interesting and tragic affair, with a searching appraisal of the many political, national, and economic forces which brought about the great betrayal of our pledges to Europe.

Professor Bailey is also author of Woodrow Wilson and the Lost Peace, which the Springfield Republican characterized as "fascinating reading, dramatic, swiftly moving, full of human interest. These words apply equally well to his new book. $3.50

Backgrounds of Conflict

By Kurt London

The battle of the isms will continue long after the last shot of the war is fired. Here is ammunition—a highly pertinent analysis of the ideologies of fascism, communism, and democracy, and a description of how they have worked out in practice. $5.00

At your bookstore.

MACMILLAN

the long sick prelude to death, the coming to terms with the annihilation of all of self and power.

Although Mrs. Caruso's memoir supplies personal details about Caruso—his tastes, his relations with family and friends and servants, his program of work—for which we have a boundless curiosity, in the long run what she tells us about her husband is much less interesting than what she lets him tell about himself, through the letters he wrote on tour. (Herself, Dorothy Caruso is a character conceived by Edith Wharton and given moral stature by Henry James; she would seem to have been born only for Caruso's need of her.) Caruso's letters to his Doro are written in what must be a quite precise transliteration of his Italian American speech. They reveal no slightest trace of the consciousness of possible posthumous publication. They ring with a directness of statement which I doubt has been equaled in the correspondence of any public figure. Caruso complains of the difficulty of translating his feelings to paper, but here too the performance is deceptively easy; and after all, how small was this effort of art compared to the effort of translating his feelings into music. The weirdly spelled words, the strange and beautiful locutions, "pour out" on to paper just as the Caruso voice poured out into air.

Of course there is always this mistake about singing: because it is an art of the body, it is taken to be mindless, a primitive art without thought or discipline. And similarly Caruso's personality, so demonstrative of emotion and apparently so little of the head, is a temptation to oversimplification: he is a peasant with God-given vocal cords, he is "all wop" with a voice. But could the letters be so heartbreaking except for their constant interplay between the simple man and the complex artist? Here, for instance, is Caruso himself to contradict any false assumptions about the nature of the singer's art; from Havana he is writing about a performance of "Carmen": "But where I made everybody crazy was at fourth act, the big duet, I do not know myself where I find all this power of voice and drammaticity. I think this came from my brains in which is the motto, 'Before you will kill me, I will kill you,' and, for consequence, I put all my soul in what I do." It is a primitive formulation, it you will, of the sublimative process, of art's desperate offensive-defensive. But that anyone can be called a primitive person who is able to forge such a statement, I very much question.

Indeed, my own sense of Caruso's personality, from his letters, is of a primitive nature upon which the gigantic endowment of gift gradually thrust large responsibilities of maturity and wit and wisdom, then the responsibilities themselves created or found in Caruso the necessary maturity and wit and wisdom. The letters which are so plentiful, for instance, in neurotic—that is, symbolic—fears, are also plentiful in proofs of Caruso's capacity to cope with the world; the pointedness of his social protests is always in exquisite contrast with the "emotionated" tone of his personal protests. Thus, the same letter which begins, "Then, sweetheart, you cry on my letter? Wy? Have I the power with my bed englisch to let you cry? I dont want that your beautiful eyes cry . . ." can continue, "At 2 p.m. we went outside of the town for lunch. There was Mr Trepiedi who invited us, but this man must be called 'Onepiedi', because he is short of intelligence. He say that the lunch will be 'en famille' but there was many people of the Italian colony, beginning from the Ministre. That was nothing. The dinner was fine. At the end Mr Trepiedi come up and make speek and say, 'I must thank Commendatore Caruso and the Ministre for the honor which they had to come to my house.' I was making a sketch [one of his caricatures, which were so remarkable] and I heard what he says, and with laughing, I sad, 'Here, here! The honor is yours.' Everybody laughing. He sad, 'Excuse me, I have a little cognac in my head and made mistake.' It very funny until here. But he continue and invited me to remember that the Italian colony is poor, and ask if I will sing for the poor. This was the point of the lunch. I stopped to sketch and told few words in thanking, and let remark that it was not necessaire to give me such a Lucullian dinner which was better to give to the poors, and showing himself to be charitable. But all this was telling with laughing, but the concret was that I dont need a lunch to make a charity. I dont know how the presents took my words but there was a silence like when the people make a 'gaf.' "

Or here is the Italian peasant who may know sorrow but no confusion, when he is confronted with the sophistications of Southampton internationalism. A summer charity fair has been arranged, and Caruso is the chief attraction; he has offered to do his caricatures at ten dollars each, and a lady of fashion leads him to his booth, decorated with red, green, and white streamers, two Italian flags, and thick fringes of dry spaghetti. Mrs. Caruso reports the quick blankness of Caruso's face. "I am sorry, Madame," he says, "but I cannot make my drawings in there. Please have the spaghetti taken down." And he adds with a smile, "Spaghetti, you know, is for the kitchen and I am not yet hungry." It is on the way home that he comments sadly to his wife, "They do not imagine such things will offend because many people think of Italians only like that. What surprise me is that such nice people make such mistake."

Nice people? And yet, perhaps they were nice people—for the moment, at least, in which Caruso needed to see them so. There is always the artist's uncharted perception of the decencies; and there is also his taste for aristocracy, his need—often quite open—of a superior social class with which he can make some fraction of common cause—enough, at any rate, to account for his own superiority. The changeling fantasy belongs to all children, but it belongs especially to artist-children; and the youngest of a big, undistinguished family, Caruso explained his distinction by the fact that he was nursed by a Countess, whose own baby had died. Perhaps the fantasy helped him carry the burden of his uniqueness.

Certainly one has the impression that at the age at which we meet him, the burden has become—deep down within him—unendurable; when he becomes ill and allows himself to be given such bad medical treatment, the suspicion is bound to occur to us that his choice of doctors is not wholly without some profound inner direction. Of course, in a quite literal sense, just as he paid for his art in anguish, he paid with his life for his art: there are the Italian specialists, for instance, who because they fear to take chances with so eminent a patient, let Caruso die. But before that there are the medical errors which Caruso himself permitted, even seemed to ask for—the doctors he suffered because he could not bear to hurt their feelings. When we recall that this is the man

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY

By

LEWIS MUMFORD

JOSEPH HUDNUT: "A distillation of the high purpose which has informed a lifetime of writing... it spans the totality of the author's thought; of that thought which quickened the conscience of his time... Here we discover with him the chaos and inhumanity of our cities, share his angry protest against their iniquities, and know the aristocratic and generous spirit which sought to overcome these with new patterns of justice and order."—N. Y. Herald Tribune

"A sheaf of essays by the most distinguished American city planner of our time... Informed, thought-provoking, authoritative."—St. Louis Globe-Democrat $2.00

CITY DEVELOPMENT

By

STUART CHASE

ORDWAY TEAD: "Stuart Chase presents in the best tradition of creative journalism, the findings and experience in significant areas of business personnel and economic pioneering... No manager—of factory, store, philanthropic agency, hospital or college—could fail to carry away a score of workable ideas from this notebook record of social experiments."—Survey Graphic

JAMES RORTY: "A really excellent job... Chase understands better than any other American journalist I know the importance of studying and improving the actual texture of American life; of getting down to cases and saying what works and why." $2.00 who told someone to go home and brush his teeth because his odor was offensive, and put it together with Caruso's recurring "premonition" of death, we get a glimpse of what otherwise would seem only an excess of delicacy. The life-giving artist is also the man weary of life. The precarious balance between the two impulses is finally destroyed, and as Caruso dies, the story seems even to by-pass our usual notions of tragedy. We confront an elemental realm, where the idea of tragedy is too intellectual for what is happening: the mind turns to images of great noble animals and their long death throes, to the tremendous overwhelming of the force of life by its opposite. DIANA TRILLING

Men at Work

BRIEFER COMMENT

About the Russians

RICHARD E. LAUTERBACH'S "These Are the Russians" (Harper, $3) is a book by a foreign correspondent which can be warmly recommended. It is, to be sure, written in Time and Life style, and in its chapters on Stalin and such military leaders as Zhukov and Novikow it says little that has not been said before. Nor are the author's findings about the status of religion in the U. S. S. R. original. Mr. Lauterbach is not a student of revolutionary theory, and can be extraordinarily naive, as when he says, "The Russians like Tito. So do the British." There is much of this sort of thing. Like most correspondents he is convinced that Russia will collaborate with the rest of the world, on a basis of realistic security interests. What distinguishes the book is the author's energy. He gets around, he is persistent, even brash, with his questions, and usually they are the right questions. (He speaks Russian.) He has vitality and warmth; his interviews are convincing; he sees not merely the small but the large human realities. As a result there is a surprising amount of new information in the book, particularly about the reconstruction work now being done. RALPH BATES

Catholic Views on Race

TEN CATHOLIC SCHOLARS of various nationalities have contributed essays to "Race, Nation, Person: Social Aspects of the Race Problem," which is edited by Bishop Joseph W. Corrigan and G. Barry O'Toole (Barnes and Noble, $3.75). It is the second of two symposiums. The first dealt with the biological aspect of race. The present volume discusses race in the context of history, philosophy, ethics, jurisprudence, and politics. The prevailing point of view of the various contributors is indicated in the following sentences from a foreword by one of the editors: "The need of the hour is for an antidote to secularist thought, which by its denial of the personal dignity of man saps the foundation of American democracy, making for the triumph at home of the very totalitarianism we are fighting abroad." "It is only by returning to Christian personalism that America can hope to avoid state socialism, the despotic extreme to which reaction against the abuses of an unreasonably anti-social individualism will inevitably lead." Since the discussions of such problems as the relation of individuals and occupational groups to the state and to church and national cultures are based upon Catholic philosophy, the reader with a secular attitude toward such questions would naturally expect to find certain postulates which he could not accept. Even so, readers who place their trust in "secularist thought" may be surprised to find that in one of the essays John Dewey is accused, with the logical skill characteristic of such writers, of preaching an irrationalism which provides a philosophical justification for German racial theories. It would probably be futile to ask the author how, if one would avoid the unreality of scholastic thought, the universality and objectivity of truth can be established except through the generalization of empirical and pragmatic knowledge. Although this volume is based upon premises which are not compatible with secular science, some of the essays will appeal to persons with a modern scientific outlook. For example, the essay by Professor Joseph T. Delos, of the Catholic University of Lille, is a penetrating analysis of the individual's rights vis-à-vis the state and the race. E. FRANKLIN FRAZIER

Democracy on the Job

MANY OBSERVERS have been distressed at the waste and inefficiency in the average office or shop resulting from the gulf between "management" and the "staff." Yet it has never been quite clear what the remedy was. Scientific management has too often been merely a polite word to cover up a speed-up or a reduction of staff, and labor unions have often only intensified the existing suspicion and strife. Stuart Chase shows us in "Men at Work" (Harcourt, Brace, $2) that modern industry can be made far more efficient—as well as more pleasant—if the workers are encouraged to participate as a team both in planning and operation. He cites a number of dramatic instances in which workers have banded together with management to achieve results not dreamed of under the old-fashioned autocratic management. In a word, democracy works as well in economic life as in political life—if we really give it a chance. MAXWELL S. STEWART

The Hancock Fortune

IT IS EASY TO DWELL on the many weaknesses of John Hancock; one of the better modern historians has referred to him as an "empty barrel." Yet his services to the Revolutionary cause were very real, though derived less from his ability than from his economic and social position. That position was a legacy from his uncle, Thomas Hancock. The methods by which the Hancock fortune was created are established in an exhaustive study by William T. Baxter, professor of accounting in the University of South Africa—"The House of Hancock; Business in Boston, 1724-1775" (Harvard University Press, $3.50).

This volume has important implications for the political historian, but its greatest value lies in the field of economic history. Too little economic history has been written, and too much of what has appeared has been inadequately done. Professor Baxter, a trained accountant, has skilfully analyzed the Hancocks' business records and made a distinctive contribution to our understanding of the business life and procedure of their time. RALPH ADAMS BROWN

Return to India

THE EFFORT TO CHART a personal course through a complex situation is most rewarding when the environment is revealed by the reaction to it. Then the place as well as the person falls into focus, and insights of general interest emerge. That, happily, is the case with Santha Rama Rau, who at the age of sixteen returned to her native land, India, after ten years in England. Her story is told with the distinction that comes from honesty and unpretentiousness in "Home to India" (Harper, $2.50). It covers the years between 1939 and 1941. The slim volume has no statistics but is full of sense and sentiment. And it is one of the most useful aids I have seen to the understanding in human terms of an important segment of Indian life. Miss Rau was a foreigner at home. Her grandmother's rigorous Brahman code was strange to her. And equally unknown were the multitudes who slept on the Bombay streets, the upper set with its parties and tennis games, and the earnest workers for India's freedom, to whom prison terms were sometimes a goal, sometimes a casual excursion. And of course she found that some of the most ardent workers for a new India were, like her mother, members of the upper class. Either as observer or participant Miss Rau sought out all these groups and through them came to know India's varied life. Humor and an inquiring, discerning mind helped her to find her own bearings, which, like those of every truly well-balanced person, appear to have a slight imbalance. The result of it all was the decision to come to America to find out how a democracy really works so that the knowledge might later be applied to India. Another equally important result was a book that sheds genuine light on the surface of one of the most talked about yet least understood countries in the world.

VIRGINIA MISHNUN

MOTION PICTURE

ALHAMBRA
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
COLISEUM
81st STREET
86th STREET
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
58th STREET
HAMILTON
MARBLE HILL
125th STREET
PELHAM
REGENT
RIVERSIDE
ROYAL
23rd STREET
WESTCHESTER
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCHELLE
WHITE PLAINS
YONKERS

NOW RKO

"Very Touching . . . Sentimentally Moving"
—N. Y. Post.

Dorothy McGUIRE
Robert YOUNG
Herbert MARSHALL

THE ENCHANTED COTTAGE

Based on the play by SIR ARTHUR WING PINERO
— Plus —
"Brighton Strangler" JOHN LODER JUNE DUPREZ

STAGE PLAY

MICHAEL TODD Presents
UP IN CENTRAL PARK
Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS Lyrics by DOROTHY FIELDS Music by SIGMUND ROMBERG
BROADWAY THEATRE, Broadway & 53rd Street. Matinees Wed. & Sat.
REALLY AIR-CONDITIONED

MOTION PICTURES

WARNER BROS.' MAGNIFICENT
RHAPSODY IN BLUE
IT'S GEORGE GERSHWIN'S JUBILANT STORY!
NOW HOLLYWOOD THEATRE

ROBERT CUMMINGS • LISBETH SCOTT • DON DeFORE
In HAL WALLIS' Production
"YOU CAME ALONG"
A PARAMOUNT PICTURE
•
IN PERSON
STAN KENTON and His Orchestra
—Also—
DICK & GENE WESSON
EXTRA RETURN ENGAGEMENT
LOUIS JORDAN & His Famous Tympany Five
COOL PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

Get ready to see . . .
How Wonderful a Motion Picture Version of a Great Stage Play Can Be!
It's got us all using such expressions as "Natch," "TerRIF" and "SenSASH!" We've even found out that a woman can still be dangerous even if she is old—21! We've just seen a preview of
"JUNIOR MISS"
You'll cheer! As Peggy Ann Garner, who stole your heart as "Francie" in "A Tree Grows in Brooklyn," emerges as one of the greatest stars of our time. • • • Words alone can't describe how joyously it has been adapted and directed by George Seaton and how magnificently it has been produced by William Perlberg. • • •
IT'S SUPER ENTERTAINMENT—BUT DIF!
Proudly presented by 20th Century-Fox!
RIVOLI

HUMPHREY Bogart
ALEXIS SMITH • SYDNEY GREENSTREET in WARNERS
Conflict
in person LOUIS PRIMA AND HIS ORCHESTRA
DANE CLARK STAR OF "HOLLYWOOD CANTEEN"
B'WAY & 47th STRAND

★ ★

WAR BONDS AND STAMPS
Buy a share in AMERICA. Invest in your country and help win the war. Get the Victory Habit — buy WAR BONDS and STAMPS every pay day.

★ ★

Music

B. H. HAGGIN

THE attitude I have been objecting to—the preoccupation not with the piece of music but with ideas about its style, period, and tendency—turns up in unexpected places. It isn't only the New Friends of Music audience that, instead of listening to a quartet of Haydn or Mozart, reads in its program-notes a history of chamber music by Dr. Curt Sachs, or a discussion of the style and tendency of the particular quartet (which is difficult to correlate with the details it refers to even when it has such real connection with the work). A museum which finds it possible to hang its pictures and simply let people look at them cannot do the same thing with music: it must have a musicologist to construct programs and write program-notes that will teach the audience about styles and developments (with results that I will soon get around to describing). And—most absurd of all—a record company which decides to reissue some outstanding recorded performances of jazz cannot offer them as something to be listened to and enjoyed; it must offer them as something to teach styles and developments, with the help of booklets containing the fantastic inventions, the confusions and obscurities, and the sheer illiteracies of the "authorities" in this field.

The latest instance of this is six albums of recordings of what Victor calls hot jazz that it has reissued for educational purposes. Jazz, says the Victor announcement, "has mainly been considered as pleasant listening, but of little serious value for the music student"; but "before hot jazz can be incorporated into serious American music, each giving to the other, there must come about a better understanding of jazz" by musicians and listeners; and it is to achieve this that Victor has reissued the performances with booklets by Charles Edward Smith. This "well known jazz authority" seems to have refrained tactfully from pointing out to Victor that hot jazz is nothing that can or will be incorporated into serious American music; or that not all of the performances reissued by Victor are hot jazz. Of those I have heard the Jelly-Roll Mortons (Set HJ-5; $2.50) are hot jazz, with vitality and good invention in the collective operation of the small groups. But the McKinney Cotton Pickers (Set HJ-4; $2.50) are large-band arrangements in a hot style that doesn't sound very hot today, and are quite dull. And the Louis Armstrongs (Set HJ-1; $2.50) are purely "commercial" affairs, with Armstrong vocals and exhibitionistic trumpeting against arranged gilt-and-plush large-band backgrounds. As for the notes on the performances, they go through the verbal motions of describing styles and developments which they actually don't describe at all.

Louis Armstrong's early career is documented by Decca's Armstrong album in its Brunswick Collectors' Series (Set B-1016; $3.50), containing "Terrible Blues" and "Santa Claus Blues," recorded by the Red Onion Jazz Babies, a Clarence Williams five-man group, in 1924; "Static Strut" and "Stomp Off, Let's Go," recorded by Erskine Tate's larger Vendome Orchestra in 1926; "Georgia Bo Bo" and "Drop That Sack" recorded in 1926 by Lil's Hot Shots, another name for the Hot Five that included Johnny Dodds and Kid Ory; and "Wild Man Blues" and "Melancholy," recorded in 1927 by Johnny Dodds's Black Bottom Stompers, with Earl Hines at the piano. I have found all but two uninteresting—the two exceptions being "Georgia Bo Bo" (80060), which is a good performance in simple Hot Five style; and "Wild Man Blues" (80059), which is one of the greatest jazz performances on records. In Armstrong's other Hot Seven "Wild Man Blues" (originally on Okeh 8474, later on Vocalion 3193) his trumpet solo is an uncontrolled and extravagant outpouring in comparison with the one in this Brunswick performance, in which the control and power one feels in the rhythmic and stylistic coherence of the extraordinary flow of invention are tremendous. Dodds's clarinet solo and Hines's support at the piano are also superb.

There is another attitude of the musicologists that turns up in jazz. They have a habit of establishing the original form of an art as the only legitimate form, of which the inevitable modifications and developments into new forms are sternly condemned as degenerations from the primitive typus. In the same way the original New Orleans style—produced by "cornet lead, and clarinet and trombone countermovements, over a two-beat rhythm section," as one reader described it to me—has been set up as the only authentic form of jazz, with much the same result: any departure from New Orleans style is not jazz, and all the different departures are equally terrible. The reader I have mentioned spoke of Chicago style as though it were as far from the truth as "powerhouse arrangements for 27 trumpets and 89 saxophones"; and for him the Louis Armstrong Hot Five played jazz, whereas the Armstrong-Hines-Robinson-Strong combination merely played like jazz.

This of course is all nonsense. Jazz could not stop with the New Orleans style; and among the departures and developments we have to distinguish those, like the Chicago style, that are jazz, from those, like the "powerhouse arrangements," that are not. Moreover we have to recognize value in whatever style it appears in—to recognize that the Armstrong "Wild Man Blues" in the Decca album is an incomparably greater jazz performance than the Hot Five "Georgia Bo Bo"; that the Chicago Rhythm Kings' "I've Found a New Baby" and "There'll Be Some Changes Made" are more exciting than the New Orleans style performances in Victor's Jelly-Roll Morton album.

And so, even though they did not originate in the brothels of New Orleans for which some of the jazz authorities have such a strong nostalgia, the following, on Commodore records, are excellent jazz performances: "Tin Roof Blues" and "Royal Garden Blues," with Davison on trumpet, Brunis on trombone, Schroeder at the piano (556; $1); "How Come You Do Me Like You Do" and "Struttin' With Some Barbecue," with Butterfield on trumpet, Wilbur de Paris on trombone, Bowman at the piano (561; $1); "Memphis Blues" and "Sweet Sue, Just You," with Spanier on cornet, Mole on trombone, Russell at his worst on clarinet, Schroeder at the piano (1519; $1.50). Also good is "St. Louis Blues," with Hackett on trumpet, Mole on trombone, and Russell doing his strangling act on clarinet (1518; $1.50), and with an unbearable "Peg o' My Heart" on the reverse side; and as good playing as I have heard from Teddy Wilson in recent years is in "Caravan" and "It's Only a Shanty," with some coarse-toned and spasmodic clarinet-playing by Edmond Hall (557; $1). Wilson also is exciting in the fast-paced Benny Goodman Sextet performance of "After You've Gone (Columbia 36781; $.50); but he is at his aridly tortuous and ornate worst in a dreary duet with Goodman in "Body and Soul" on the reverse side.

Mr. Agee, now on vacation, will resume his film column in the issue of July 28.

Letters to the Editors

A Veteran Wires

Lyme, Conn., by Western Union

Have spent unhappy afternoon in country reading and rereading John Senior review of Bill Mauldin's magnificent book in current Nation. Review consists of three sentences by Senior and one quoted from Mauldin. Am I wrong in thinking that only the one from Mauldin makes sense? Mauldin in both cartoons and text says plainly that war is not funny but that there are occasions of grim humor to relieve the horror and boredom. Far from being "characteristically illiterate," the text is, in fact, artful and extremely accurate reporting of the way soldiers feel. Advise rushing one Ross dyspepsie tablet and/or stomach pump to Senior at once.

CHARLES G. BOLTE

Full Employment Is Possible

Dear Sirs: Leo Barnes's article, The Anatomy of Full Employment, in your May 26 issue is doubtless as good an estimate of post-war employment prospects as can be made from a limited point of view. But to achieve a complete picture, anatomy must be supplemented by physiology. Mr. Barnes barely takes into account the organic functioning of our economy. There is no limit to employment outside of the economy itself—except the willingness of people to work. Mr. Barnes ignores this fact and tacitly assumes that the very best we can hope for in the post-war years is to provide as much employment in most lines as in our best pre-war years. Of course he does attempt the difficult job of estimating the effect of changes in public demand and of technological development, but he does not examine the factors which might either facilitate or retard the employment of everyone who wants to work, whatever the size of the labor force.

This, actually, is the most important aspect of the problem. The core of the matter is the utilization of income, which is itself derived from the productive process. Income can be used in ways which will support full employment or in ways which will produce unemployment. Mr. Barnes correctly assumes a continuing check to full employment in our economy on the basis of past performance. But he is probably wrong in tacitly assuming that this will also be true in the immediate post-war period.

In taking this position, I do not rely too heavily on the allegedly imminent consumer buying spree based on accumulated war-time savings. S. Morris Livingston's War-Time Savings and Post-War Markets in the September, 1943, Survey of Current Business and your June 9 editorial, The Threat of Deflation, discuss that problem realistically. What I do rely on is the great volume of investment opportunities created by reconversion to peace-time production and the application of all the technical advances made during the war. Morris Livingston and E. T. Weiler, in an article, Can Business Finance the Transition? in the February, 1944, Survey of Current Business estimate that in the aggregate business will have resources adequate not only to reconvert but to expand production. How great the outlet and need for investment may be in new industries, neither these authors nor any others, so far as I know, have attempted to estimate. Livingston and Weiler estimate maximum reconversion needs at 36 billion dollars. New industries and new facilities in plastics, electronics, and light metals will certainly add several billions, despite prospective bargain prices for government-owned plants.

For the first few years after the war at least, business capital expenditure offers a good prospect of supplementing direct consumer expenditure sufficiently to maintain substantially full employment. This conclusion does not, of course, take into account the inevitable transitional unemployment during reconversion. There are many pitfalls in the path toward full employment, and we may fall into them. But Mr. Barnes fails to consider the possibility that we may not fall into them. And if we don't, we may reach new high levels in both employment and national income within the next few years.

ROBERT D. PATTON

Galena, Ohio, July 2

The Austrian Riddle

Dear Sirs: Among those who have criticized my article on Austria in your May 26 issue are Socialists who feel that I dealt too unfavorably with them and Catholics who think that I commented too favorably on the writings of Ernst Fischer, the new Communist Minister of Education in Catholic Austria. I refer both these groups to the following passage about the Jesuits in Fischer's pamphlet "Der Oesterreichische Volks-Charakter" (London, Austria Center):

> Austria had become 90 per cent Protestant when it was changed back into a thoroughly Catholic country by the Counter-Reformation. The terror of the Counter-Reformation is known. Yet its victory cannot be explained by terror alone. Jesuit "propaganda," to use a modern word, played no small role. In the first place there were the Jesuit schools, which led the young people back to Catholicism and exerted a powerful influence on the most intelligent and gifted sons of both the aristocracy and the bourgeoisie. The Jesuit schools were far more attractive, many-sided, and consistent than anything that had yet existed in the field of education.
>
> I would not dream of whitewashing the Jesuits and their reactionary tendencies, but we must also rid ourselves of the Greater German, anti-clerical legend which onesidedly glorified Protestantism and stigmatized the Jesuits as the essence of damnation. The Protestant Leibnitz admired the Jesuit schools, and sadly

McGUFFEY'S READERS
1879 Edition
Clean — unused. Only 75 cents up
Full Set — 6 Readers — $7.00
Post card brings detailed price list
KENNETH ABBOTT
220 E. Duncan St. Columbus 2, Ohio

Courses in MAGAZINE WRITING fiction • non-fiction

The Magazine Institute, a private school owned and operated by successful writers and editors, offers practical, up-to-date training in story and article writing. You work in your own home. Every assignment you send in is returned with detailed criticism.

EXPERT INSTRUCTION. An experienced writer or editor takes you in hand, answering all your questions, helping you find the type of work for which you are naturally suited. Before long you are writing in your own home fiction stories, essays, short sketches, whatever you are best fitted to do.

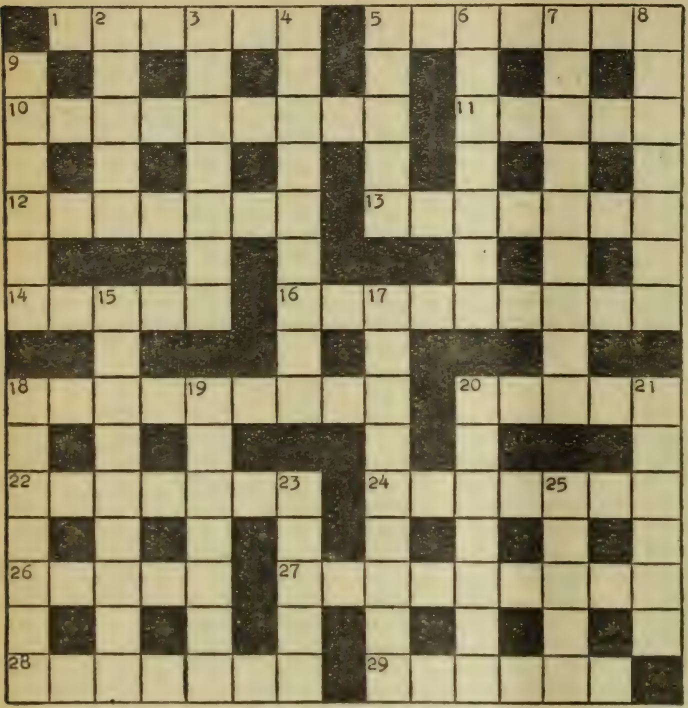
Send coupon today for free catalog which tells about opportunities in magazine writing.

The Magazine Institute, Inc. Dept. 97-C
Rockefeller Center, New York 20, N. Y.
Please send catalog, without obligation to:

NAME ....
ADDRESS ....
....
(Confidential. No salesman will call.)

Crossword Puzzle No. 121

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 Famous artist's retort when asked what he mixed his paints with 5 Fancy describing an aircraft carrier as a teetotal flop!
10 It is not for chanting before meals (hyphen, 5-4)
11 Aptly put
12 Daughter of Ahab and Jezebel in Racine's tragedy of the same name
13 A singular species of bindweed
14 The festive board
16 They regarded bootleggers as legitimate prey (hyphen, 2-7)
18 League started by a typical German
20 Wife of Isaac — had her first child when she was ninety 22 Champagne for the buffoons? Er — Mumm's, perhaps 24 Not a gumboil, but a kind of molasses
26 Central African animal that goes around trying to look like a giraffe
27 By Sheraton, Chippendale or Hepplewhite, perhaps 28 They often bear traces of lipstick
29 A force of 200, decimated by enemy fire, has how many casualties?

DOWN

2 Insect or fish
3 Floating slab of frozen aqua pura
4 The mark perhaps of a churchman's crowning labor (two words, 6 & 3)
5 "Big ----- have little ----- upon their backs to bite 'em, and little ----- have lesser -----, and so ad infinitum"
6 I am a car (anag.)
7 Where the foot that speeded the parting guest was applied (three words, 2, 3 and 4)
8 Though engaged to both Lord Mountararat and Lord Tolloller, she was unhappy because she loved Strephon (Iolanthe)
9 Rooted to the spot with terror
15 How one would be judged destitute (three words, 2, 2 and 5)
17 He and his wife form a fine combination in domestic economy (two words, 4 and 5)
18 They finally made Socrates drink it
19 Kermit the Hermit
20 Wolsey was weary and old with it (Henry VIII)
21 "Nothing but a lot of quotations!" was Simple Susie's verdict on this Shakespearean play
23 Furnishings of a s.s.
25 Den, relatively speaking to some extent

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 120

ACROSS:—1 DESPAIR; 5 MINERVA; 9 NIGGARD; 10 SQUEERS; 11 EMS; 13 UNTRUE; 15 SERENE; 16 SCHOLAR; 17 NODS; 19 ERSE; 20 EXEMPLARY; 21 HOPE; 23 EDIT; 26 POLITIC; 28 ACUMEN; 29 NUNCIO; 30 STY; 32 DEPRIVE; 33 AUTOMAT; 34 DAYBEDS; 35 DRESSER.

DOWN:—1 DON JUAN; 2 SIGHTED; 3 ABACUS; 4 RYDE; 5 MOSS; 6 NEUTER; 7 ROE-DEER; 8 AUSTERE; 12 MOOT POINT; 14 ECHELON; 15 SALADIN; 18 SEE; 19 EYE; 21 HOARDED; 22 PAUL PRY; 24 DECAMPS; 25 TROTTER; 26 PETITE; 27 CUPTIE; 30 SETS; 31 YARD.

acknowledged that teachers were despised among the Protestants. The principle of Jesuit education was to adhere stubbornly to its goal in all decisive questions; but at the same time its methods were designed to meet the interests, needs, and peculiarities of its pupils. . . . The Jesuits utilized the arts, and primarily the theater, to the utmost in the service of their educational method. A strange double game of gaiety and danse macabre, . . . of liberty in small matters and obedience in great ones, characterized the pedagogy and thereby the theater of the Jesuits.

It may well be that this interpretation of Austrian Catholic history by a leading Austrian Communist intellectual will serve as a key to the many riddles that will be posed in Austria.

ERNST KARL WINTER

Tenafly, N. J. June 30

CONTRIBUTORS

T. A. BISSON is the author of "Japan in China," "America's Far Eastern Policy," and the forthcoming "Japan's Wartime Economy."

LAURENCE E. SALISBURY is editor of the Far Eastern Survey, official publication of the American Council of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

MILITARIS is a forty-year-old buck private who has been in the army two years. In civilian life he had taught at a large university, worked for the government, and been public-relations director of a large non-profit-making organization.

PHILIP JORDAN was formerly chief foreign correspondent of the London News-Chronicle.

DONALD DOWNES is a correspondent for Overseas News Service.

MARK VAN DOREN is a well-known poet, critic, and novelist. His "Collected Poems" won the Pulitzer prize for poetry in 1940.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR is professor of Christian Ethics at Union Theological Seminary. His most recent book is "The Children of Light and the Children of Darkness."

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 161 · NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JULY 21, 1945 · NUMBER 3

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 49

EDITORIALS

Power Politics in the Middle East by Freda Kirchwey 52

The Specter of Famine 53

ARTICLES

Negrín's Plan for Spain by J. Alvarez del Vayo 54

Can UNRRA Stop Famine? by John Carson 57

Ferruccio Parri by Gaetano Salvemini 59

Chicago the Beautiful by Ray Runnion 61

In the Wind 62

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall 63

Briefer Comment 64

Films by James Agee 67

Records by B. H. Haggin 67

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor J. KING GORDON
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Editor Political War Section
J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor J. MITCHELL MORSE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates
LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL · JONATHAN DANIELS
CAREY MCWILLIAMS · REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1945, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

THE GUNS OF ADMIRAL HALSEY'S THIRD FLEET, striking at the steel heart of Japan, have ushered in a new phase of the Pacific war. The cities of the eastern coast, from Sendai in Honshu to Abashiri on the northern tip of Hokkaido, were raked by naval shellfire which met with no resistance from coastal batteries or enemy aircraft. Particularly devastating were the attacks on the great steel centers of Kamaishi and Muroran, the latter in the land-locked entrance to the strait between Hokkaido and Honshu. The destruction or beaching of six out of the seven train ferries which plied across this vital strait connecting the mining and steel centers of the north to the war plants on the southern island should have a crippling effect on the Japanese industrial organization. The daring fleet action followed hard on last week's strafing by carrier-based planes and the war's heaviest single day's bombing by fighter-bombers and Liberators from Iwo and Okinawa and B-29s from bases in the Marianas.

*

THE FAST CARRIER FORCE PROVIDES THE NAVY with the most mobile striking air arm in the world. Operating from movable bases, the carrier air force has a highly desirable offensive capacity for short-range attack and surprise, and an equally desirable defensive capacity through the great fire-power of the escort ships. Moreover, its bases can be withdrawn when necessary from under the enemy's attack. It is thus admirably suited to what may be its chief new role—darting close in to the Japanese islands to bomb and strafe enemy airfields, harbors, and the small war plants or targets of opportunity which the big land-based bombers are not so well-fitted to handle. Last week's operations gave further proof of what can be done in this fashion. They were provocative in the extreme, but were carried out without drawing serious enemy counter-attacks on the carrier force itself. This suggests an important deterioration in the enemy's air strength. However, Japanese aircraft losses, in the air and on the assembly line, have only recently begun to mount higher than the monthly production rate, and it is too early to assume that the enemy's first-line air strength has fallen dangerously low. General Chennault has a more plausible explanation: the Japanese are shifting aircraft to Manchuria. Such a shift would be of a piece with the shift of ground forces in continental Asia toward the same region—the innermost redoubt of the powerful defensive triangle from which the Japanese will have to meet the major blow of a Red Army offensive when it comes. Like everyone else, the Japanese must suspect that this will be a high-priority item on the agenda of the Big Three.

WHILE STRENGTH IS GATHERED FOR THESE MAIN thrusts toward the Japanese heart, peripheral offensives far from Tokyo are being fought which must seem anything but peripheral to the Allied troops who are doing the fighting. One is killed no deader over Tokyo making headlines than in forgotten New Guinea, where Australian troops are still heavily engaged, with only about half the island cleared of the enemy. Other Australians are doing an excellent job of rewinning the Balikpapan oil fields on Borneo—an operation which may pay fairly quick dividends in the form of shortened supply lines for oil. In Burma, completely out of the news, the enemy is counter-attacking in an effort to establish a defense line covering the approaches to Thailand and Indo-China, but neither he nor the monsoon has been able to halt the advance of the British Fourteenth Army. When the monsoon is over, two months from now, this battle-wise force, two-thirds of which is Indian, will be joined by the new Twelfth Army in operations which, though perhaps peripheral, are essential to the successful conclusion of the war against Japan.

*

THE MOST EXCITING NEWS FROM WASHINGTON last week was the absence of excitement at the Senate hearings on the United Nations charter. This was the event that summoned memories of the great betrayal of twenty-five years ago. Last week, the astonishing thing was the absence of any substantial opposition. The opponents represented a handful of dissenters and commanded no important following. Those who testified in favor of the Charter spoke for millions in all parts of the country. One or two Senators asked a few questions; there were no indications that there would be any serious Senatorial dissent when it comes up for vote some time next week. Even the question of the powers of the American representative on the security council, which was raised last week, is not likely to lead to any serious debate. This unanimity throughout the country and in the Senate is something more than a spontaneous change of heart since the bitter days of the isolationist rampage before Pearl Harbor. The war, of course, has had a lot to do with hoisting sky-high the isolationist delusion. But of even greater importance has been the solid educational work carried on by all kinds of organizations interested in assuring America's participation, fully and without reservation, in the world organization. The State Department's campaign to inform people of the meaning of Dumbarton Oaks also had its effect. Perhaps most important of all was the decision of President Roosevelt and Secretary Hull to call on the Republican Party leadership to assume active responsibility in the sponsorship of the charter. The solid Republican bloc which kept America out of the first League shows no signs of materializing, chiefly because Senator Vandenberg, a bitter critic of the Roosevelt Administration, has been converted into a sincere advocate of the Charter. It has taken twenty-five years and a second world war, but out of time and trial the nation has learned some world geography and a little political wisdom into the bargain.

*

BEFORE PRESIDENT TRUMAN ARRIVED IN BERLIN important steps were taken to create an atmosphere conducive to friendly and frank discussion. The tangle that had developed over the joint administration of the giant waste city was resolved by giving supreme authority over the four zones of occupation to a Kommandatur made up of representatives of the four main powers. Already there have been adjustments to lessen the discrepancies between the policies of the Soviet Union and those of the Western Allies. If within Berlin the four powers can arrive at a workable common policy, then the capital may turn out to be a school for inter-Allied cooperation in Germany as a whole. The larger zones of occupation can no more be isolated from one another than the zones within Berlin's limits. Even now it has been found economically necessary to link Berlin—an island in the Russian zone—to the American and British areas, since the Russian zone is incapable of producing sufficient food. And if reason demands the working out of a common economic policy, so also a common political policy must be devised. At the moment, ironically enough, it is the Russians who are encouraging free political discussion and organization, while American AMG officers, for whatever reason, appear intent on preserving a political vacuum. The Eisenhower-Montgomery order easing the non-fraternization ban should do something to bring together Russian and Anglo-American practice, but obviously the larger question of a common Allied policy must be placed high in the agenda of the Postdam conference.

*

ONE PROBLEM FOR WHICH THE BIG THREE MUST find at least a provisional solution is the future of the Germans now living in the Sudetenland and in the territories claimed by Poland. Both the Polish and Czech governments have begun to deal with this matter unilaterally by deportations, and both have announced a policy of ridding these regions of all Germans. So far as Poland is concerned, its western boundaries have yet to be fixed by the peace conference, which must also decide the fate of the inhabitants of any lands assigned to Poland. The position of the Sudetenland is different since this is territory stolen from Czechoslovakia which has been recovered. Yet in this case, too, the disposition of the German population cannot be regarded as purely a Czech problem. Thrusting some ten million landless, propertyless Germans from these two areas into the diminished Reich will enormously increase the difficulty of contriving any solution for the economic problems of that country—a matter of concern for all the United Nations and particularly for those with the responsibility of occupying and administering Germany. Moreover, such wholesale transfers of populations will mean an immediate, if not permanent, loss of production, increasing the strain on the resources of the rest of the world. Until Poles and Czechs can be found to take the place of the expelled Germans, fields will go untilled, coal unmined, and factories unproductive. According to reports, the provisional Polish government is planning to move some two and one-half million Poles into areas which have supported more than six million. It is doubtful whether even this quota can be filled by voluntary methods. Peasants do not move readily. There is hopeful talk of the "re-immigration of Poles from abroad," but how many of the millions in America, for instance, are likely to be attracted by offers of land in Pomerania?

IN ANNOUNCING THE BREAKDOWN OF THE Simla Conference, the Viceroy of India, Lord Wavell, asked that there be no recriminations. "The responsibility for the failure," he said, "is mine. The main idea underlying the conference was mine and I cannot place the blame for its failure on any of the parties." This was a wise and tactful statement, but actually the main cause of the deadlock was the instransigence of the Moslem League and its leader, Mohammed Ali Jinnah. Lord Wavell's proposals for the reconstruction of the Indian government on representative lines, as a first step toward the renewal of constitutional discussions, provided that "caste Hindus" and Moslems should each have one-third of the places, with the remainder divided among the Untouchables, the Sikhs, and other minor communities. This plan was more than fair to the Moslems, but Jinnah was not prepared to cooperate unless only Moslems nominated by the League were appointed to the Cabinet. The All-India Congress, which has a Moslem president and claims a large Moslem membership, obviously could not accept this condition; nor could the Viceroy, on whose prerogative it encroached. Mr. Jinnah justified his stand on the ground that he represented 90 per cent of the Moslems. Most observers believe this claim to be very inflated, but it needs to be tested. The best method would be to hold new elections for the provincial assemblies, which have mostly been in a state of suspended animation since 1939. The Simla Conference has, at least, reestablished relations between the Congress leaders and the Viceroy, who seems to have convinced everyone of his sincere anxiety to forward Indian aspirations for self-government. A small flame of good-will has been lit; it would burn more strongly if the remaining political prisoners were released. But above all, some new initiative is needed to lift India out of the sterile morass of communal squabbles.

* * *

THE VETERAN-VERSUS-LABOR SITUATION IS serious enough without John Rankin maliciously stirring it up with a bill to exempt veterans from the necessity of joining a union in an organized plant. The bill is ostensibly designed to insure the veteran a job; actually it is intended to smash unions and lower the bargaining power of all workers, including veterans. For if the bill that Rankin sneaked through the House Veterans' Committee when most of its members were absent ever became law it would only invite the use of returning veterans as strike-breakers. And after strike and union were broken, what would become of the rights of the veteran as a worker in industry? As the June 15 bulletin of the American Veterans' Committee puts it, with reference to similar legislation proposed in California: "What [the veterans] probably would receive, in return for the privilege of not having to join a union, is a return to the good old days of lowered wages, worsened working conditions, wildcat strikes, violence on the picket lines, jurisdictional disputes between competing unions, and cheap scab labor driving them off their jobs." The belated "minority" protest of the majority of the committee members should have some effect in making the House hesitate before jamming through a measure so packed with dynamite. It is utterly characteristic of Rankin that he drafted his bill in spite of a report issued by former Veterans Administrator Frank T. Hines, which stated that such legislation was quite unnecessary to guarantee veterans a job. This report came out of a nine-man committee made up of representatives of the National Association of Manufacturers, the United States Chamber of Commerce, the Department of Commerce, the A. F. of L., the C. I. O., the Railroad Brotherhoods, and three veterans' associations, including the American Legion.

* * *

MILLIONS OF NEW YORKERS WHO HAVE BEEN deprived of their daily papers for more than two weeks by a strike of newspaper deliverymen may well cry "a plague on both your houses." They are the victims of a collision between a tough and unreasonable union and a tough bunch of employers anxious to seize an opportunity to "put the workers in their place." The men's organization—the independent Newspaper and Mail Deliverers' Union—has adopted a foolish strategy by defying the War Labor Board. It claims, however, that the nub of its dispute with the publishers—a demand for a 3 per cent payroll levy for a welfare fund—cannot be acted upon by the WLB, whose policy is not to order such clauses in contracts, though it will approve them if freely negotiated. The publishers, well aware of this fact, have insisted nevertheless that the issue must be certified to the WLB. If they had really wanted to avoid the strike they might have offered to arbitrate this point. They have preferred, however, to settle comfortably into a pillbox behind the WLB, whence they broadcast unctuous statements about the wickedness of the union in disobeying government orders. They forget how much they themsleves (the New York Post excepted) have done to undermine the authority of the WLB when it has cracked down on recalcitrant employers. Remember how they hailed the heroism of Sewell Avery! Now having got a ruling from the WLB that the old closed-shop contract with the union is null and void, the publishers are threatening all the men with dismissal. Just how they are going to recruit replacements is not quite clear; 1,700 strike-breakers are not easy to come by in these days. Perhaps the publishers will be content to sit tight, hoping the union will weaken when its funds run low. They know that the paper they are now accumulating can be used to sell extra advertising later on, while what they are losing in revenue they are saving in taxation. They do not have to depend on "virtue" for their rewards.

* * *

ON JULY 16, 1945, THE NEW YORK TIMES revealed in a special dispatch from Rome that on November 28, 1938, a distinguished Jewish author and publisher, Angelo Fortunato Formiggini, had committed suicide by leaping from the campanile of Torre Ghirlandina in Modena, but because he was an anti-Fascist Jew "not a word about it ever appeared in the papers." The Times is to be congratulated on catching up on the meaning of fascism, for on January 28, 1939, a letter in The Nation told of Formiggini's tragic death. It concluded: "His death was a protest against the senseless brutality of racial persecution. But no newspaper dared to print the news of his death, for the names of Jews, even in obituary notices, must no longer contaminate the columns of the Fascist press. (Signed) Michele Cantarello, Max Salvadore."

Power Politics in the Middle East

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

An attempt to explain the conflict in the Middle East in simple terms of Gaullist intransigence or British ambition is worse than useless. No situation today is more complex; none illustrates better the multiform tensions between the powers and the obstacles that block understanding.

The British, having taken over the enforcement of "order" in the Levant, stolidly maintain that the dispute is a local one between the French and the Levantine republics. This is manifestly untrue. First, the world knows the record of British intervention from the period of Lawrence and his Arab raiders down to the present. French-British rivalry forms the big-power background to all the unrest in the Levant and conditions every statement made by any official of either country. Less well known are the economic roots of that rivalry. Some day, I hope in these pages, the full story of commercial intrigue in the Middle East, centering largely around oil, will be told in all its lurid detail. It is a story that involves the United States and explains our government's consistent indorsement of Britain's acts in Syria and Lebanon in 1943 and today. The source material for the story is buried in company reports and State Department and Foreign Office files, but when it has been dug out it will be far more enlightening than the public pronouncements of heads of states.

The French, outraged at Britain's bland assumption of "impartiality," maintain that the dispute is not essentially between them and the local authorities at all. They had, they insist, practically restored order when the British intervened, and since then the British have conspicuously failed to prevent widespread brutal attacks on isolated outposts, on French civilians, on disarmed French troops. They reiterate their charge—flatly denied by Churchill—that the British themselves supplied arms to Syrian rioters and that British agents are still busy stirring up trouble. They point out that French troops charged with attacks on Syrians are, in almost every instance, Syrians belonging to the troupes speciales. Very well; one may accept the French case or dispute it, but even if every accusation against the British were substantiated, there remains the fact of native unrest put down forcibly by French arms. It is true that the French had voluntarily acknowledged Syrian and Lebanese independence and were trying to negotiate treaties which would protect their special interests, as Britain has done in Iraq and Egypt. But suspicion of French intentions remained. The politicians of Damascus needed no instigation by foreign agents; they seized upon the first plausible pretext to proclaim their grievances, refuse further negotiations with the French, and rally the British, who were not reluctant.

Behind all this local activity stands the rather ambiguous silhouette of the new Arab federation. This league of Moslem nations may have been a British invention, but it is rapidly developing a character of its own. For while it may be true, as old Middle East hands insist, that the Arab states can never carry out a unified positive policy, it is equally true that the league is adept at showing publicly a single face to the West. And its leaders are masters of the art of expediency, capable of welcoming British intervention in Syria and Lebanon while preparing to knife the British in Palestine and Egypt. Only the other day the Paris press carried a London dispatch describing the spread of tension from Syria into Palestine, where both Jews and Arabs were said to be armed, and pointing out that only a "strong British force" could guarantee order there. One can imagine the reaction to this report of Arab leaders primed with pious British pronouncements in favor of Arab independence—in areas of French influence!

British-French rivalry and Arab nationalism are the main ingredients of the struggle for power that has, momentarily, centered in Syria. They are not the only ones. Less visible but never to be ignored is the growing influence of Russia. Its interest in the Middle East is far more immediate than that of the United States. Russia has made demands on Turkey for a more favorable position in the Dardanelles. Russia has demanded a hand in Tangier. Russia is interested in oil, like the other powers. Indeed, Russia's firm determination to share in the future control of the Mediterranean basin can no longer be questioned. Toward the Syrian dispute Moscow has so far taken a reserved attitude. It insists on the independence of the Levant states but is not willing to see French influence supplanted by British. It may be assumed, however, that Russia will take a hand in any settlement that goes beyond the immediate, local issues.

Today the newspapers hopefully assume that a settlement is near. The French, with what grace they could muster, announced last week that within forty-five days they would turn over to Syria and Lebanon the special forces recruited in those countries. Direct negotiations with the British and the two Levantine republics have been under way for some days in an attempt to settle the outstanding immediate issues. But it would be a mistake to assume that any fundamental solutions have been found. What all this adds up to, of course, is surrender by the French of their cherished position in the Levant. They have backed out because they had not the power to remain; they have yielded to major force. And they will not forget. Undoubtedly they will do their best to retrieve what they can of their commercial and cultural investment in Syria and Lebanon. The atmosphere that surrounds their retirement is one of resentment, however it may be described in the cables. The underlying rivalries, the conflicts of interest that lie at the back of the whole dispute, remain untouched. A breach has been opened between the two leading European democracies just when unity is most needed.

There is only one possible way of salvaging the situation—the way proposed by De Gaulle and refused by Churchill and Truman more than a month ago. No matter what local agreements may be made, the larger problem of the Middle East should be taken up at a general conference of the interested powers, including Russia and the United States.

For the issues involved are neither merely local, as the British have tried to persuade us, nor merely between Britain and France, as the French sometimes claim. The issues reach out to the edges of the Arab world and beyond.

They interest all the major nations of Europe, and the United States as well. In their solution will be found the fate of the Jews of Palestine as well as of the Christians in Lebanon. The security of a critical strategic area is at stake, with decisions to be reached regarding bases and the presence of Western armed forces. It is easy to talk about withdrawing the French army from the Levant; is Britain prepared to leave the policing of the whole Middle East to the local Arab governments? This question will have to be answered very quickly now that France has made its applauded gesture of conciliation.

Under whatever guise it operates, Western colonialism in the Eastern Mediterranean is a poor expedient. But its faults will not be cured by shoving one power out of control and installing another in its place. The British say they do not want to do this in the Levant. Perhaps not, but in effect they have already done it. And in the process they have precipitated the whole question of mandates and special treaty rights so carefully avoided at San Francisco. Only a conference called for the specific purpose can effectively deal with this question, and it is such a conference the French have demanded. It should not be postponed much longer, for certainly the conflict in the Middle East is one problem that cannot be dealt with at Potsdam. For France is not represented there.

The Specter of Famine

CLINTON P. ANDERSON, the new Secretary of Agriculture, has told us with admirable candor that the food situation is bad, that there is little hope of its early improvement, and that it may easily take a turn for the worse. The present most serious domestic worry is the corn crop, which threatens to be the smallest since 1941 and well below the demand. Shortage of corn means a smaller production of meat, milk, butter, and eggs. It means also increased pressure on other cereal crops and the diversion of wheat to stock-feeding. But wheat is the one primary food which we are able to supply to Europe in quantities which have some relation to needs. If wheat shipments to the liberated countries had to be curtailed, it might prove impossible to avert widespread famine.

Already Herbert H. Lehman, director general of UNRRA, has prophesied "catastrophe" in Europe next winter unless there are greater sacrifices by those of the United Nations which are comparatively well supplied. Recently UNRRA has been forced to make drastic downward revisions in its delivery schedules. Yugoslavia, which has been receiving food relief at an average rate of 41,000 tons monthly, is to be reduced shortly to 15,000 tons. Its estimated minimum needs are 90,000 tons. Louis Swenson, coordinator of procurement for UNRRA, has stated recently that practically no fats or oils, "the foods that starving people most crave," have yet been sent to Europe. Brazil had promised 10,000 tons of cotton-seed oil, but local demand has been heavy and export permits have not been granted. Meanwhile the United States has canceled a commitment to supply 200,000,000 pounds of canned and fat pork after furnishing only 14,000,000.

Mr. Anderson, in the speech already referred to, said correctly that "America cannot feed the whole world." He added, however, that we must do whatever we can, not only for Europe's sake but for our own. The peaceful resettlement of Europe is very much an American interest, and it will prove a tough enough task unattended by famine and pestilence. If Americans could see for themselves the conditions in many parts of Europe they might understand how incomparably better off they are and be prepared to accept shorter rations of some commodities. As it is, too many of us grumble because we cannot get our accustomed foods in the accustomed quantities and express resentment that any scarce goods are shipped abroad at all. We hope that President Truman, who undoubtedly will spend much of his time in Berlin discussing food problems, will report faithfully to the nation when he returns and dramatize the necessity of affording more aid even if it means tightening our own belts a little.

This problem has not taken the world by surprise. In 1943 the conference of the United Nations which launched UNRRA foresaw the urgent need of relief when the war ended and proposed to meet it by a new form of international collaboration. The results have been extremely disappointing, and UNRRA itself is being made the whipping boy. But as John Corson shows in an article on another page, the organization has been hamstrung by the military authorities, on whom it was dependent for supplies and shipping space, and constantly hindered by the political maneuverings of the big powers and the political fears of the small.

One of its greatest handicaps is that it has not been afforded the means to carry out rehabilitation, which, properly organized, could do much to scale down the size of its relief job. Nothing can be done now about the current European harvest, which is much below normal, but if the danger of famine is not to continue into the winter of 1946-7, more help must be given to Europeans to help themselves. That means larger shipments of seed, fertilizer, tools, and, above all, transport facilities, since it is no use having food on the farms if it cannot be transported to the cities. Beyond this, steps should be taken to increase the supply of staple consumers' goods in Europe by making available more raw materials and machinery. Farmers must be given a greater incentive to produce; if the money they get for their crops cannot be used to buy clothing, household equipment, and other necessities, they are not likely to exert themselves to raise output. Food is Europe's most immediate need, but its supply cannot be fenced off from other problems. Relief, rehabilitation, and reconstruction must march hand in hand.

We apologize to our readers for an unfortunate error in an editorial two weeks ago when it was stated that Mr. Grew was "wholly without European experience." It is true that Mr. Grew was out of direct touch with Europe during the momentous days when Hitler was building and expanding the Third Reich, the days of appeasement, the days leading up to and away from Munich. From 1932 to 1941 Mr. Grew was in Tokyo. But before that Mr. Grew had served in Turkey, Switzerland, Denmark, France, Austria, and other countries—in fact, had had rather a wide European experience.

Negrin's Plan for Spain

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Mexico City, July 15

THE arrival of Negrín in Mexico brings to a sharp issue one of the chief political problems left unsettled by the war—the problem of replacing the fascist Spanish regime with a democratic regime entitled to admission into the United Nations. News from inside Spain and the Big Three meeting, at which, according to reliable reports, Spain is to be discussed, have intensified public interest in the conversations beginning here this week with a view to reaching an agreement among the Republicans. These talks coincide with frantic attempts on the part of Spanish fascism to delay its collapse by a change of façade. Ministers like Arrese, secretary of the Falange, who in Hitler's time enjoyed the special favor of the Führer, have been removed in order to create a Cabinet free of notorious Falangists. Should it prove necessary, the Falange itself will be dissolved. Everything possible will be attempted to provide that section of Allied diplomacy which is hostile to the Republic with "proof" that a "new regime" has come to power in Spain and, consequently, that the San Francisco resolution is no longer valid.

All these facts taken together furnish an incentive for Republicans to overcome their differences. The desire for unity overshadows every other consideration. And the man who appears to the mass of refugees best fitted to bring them together automatically becomes their leader. For the great majority here, that man is Negrín. This explains why, had he chosen to reveal the hour of his arrival in Mexico, an immense public demonstration of welcome would have taken place. A similar ovation would have greeted him had he been willing to address a public meeting. But Negrín wanted no reception. He was determined to arrive quietly, just as he had arrived in San Francisco and in Washington. He left the plane at Monterrey and continued to Mexico City by car. It was a disappointment to the great mass of Spaniards, but they have found a certain compensation in discussing in packed coffee-houses what Negrín plans to do.

The first thing he will do is visit President Avila Camacho. After that he will preside at a meeting of the Cabinet with all those members now in Mexico, several of whom will later participate in a meeting of the executive of the Socialist Party, of which Negrín and I are members. Then he will begin negotiations with the different groups.

I am now in a position to reveal for the first time Dr. Negrín's plan for Spain, about which so much speculation has been going on since he left England in January to go to France.

Until a few months ago Dr. Negrín had consistently opposed any change in the government which, under his leadership, had conducted the war and which had continued, even after the defeat, to regard itself as the legal government of Spain. He had no objection to replacing one or two ministers who for various reasons had voluntarily resigned their Cabinet posts when the government left Spain. But he believed that a complete change of government in exile would be extremely dangerous. And this for the following reasons:

1. The controlling influence of public opinion, essential to the effective functioning of every truly democratic regime, was necessarily lacking after the government was forced to abandon national territory.

2. Even if a new government could have been created in strict conformity with the constitution, it would have required extraordinary precautions to prevent a situation in which the executive—the most delicate arm of government in a parliamentary system—could exercise arbitrary powers which would weaken and discredit republican institutions.

3. Once the government that left Spain had been altered, there would have been no guaranty that new crises would not arise, producing a succession of governments during the period of exile. This, obviously, would have damaged the Republic's prestige and weakened its authority.

4. Even if the personal animosities and differences produced during the period of exile were overcome, they had already created an atmosphere which would make the solution of pressing political problems extremely difficult. No government created under these conditions could have counted upon the united support of the parties and organizations, all of which have been subdivided into contending factions.

5. The authority of Parliament has suffered during the past few years as the result of attempts by some of the Republican leaders to use it in their factional maneuvers.

6. Any general change in the government would have meant a corresponding dilution of responsibility. It has been one of the chief contentions of Dr. Negrín that, no matter how long the period of exile lasted, the legal government had an obligation to give an accounting to the Spanish people and submit itself to their judgment.

7. Not only would responsibility have been diluted, but, even worse, differences of conduct among the individual leaders would have been blurred. It is most important for the future of the Republic that every leader be held to strict account for his own behavior; a change of government would tend to put everyone on the same basis.

8. No government re-created in exile could enjoy the formal authority of the government formed in Spain in 1937, which received a unanimous vote of confidence from Parliament shortly before it was forced to abandon national territory in January, 1939. Parliament, moreover, on that occasion—the historic meeting at Figueras—ordered the government to continue its mission even if it had to leave Spain. Nor could any regime set up in exile claim the moral authority of the "Government of Resistance" which fought until the last possible day in Spain; and when forced to leave, continued abroad the same policy it had followed during the war with the approval of the people, Parliament, and the President of the Republic.

For all these reasons Dr. Negrín was opposed to changing the government while it continued in exile. He still maintains this point of view. But he is enough of a realist to recognize that the campaign carried on against the government during these years by certain factions of the political parties and by certain individuals has reduced its capacity to act effectively, especially on international matters. Because of these dissensions he has been forced to limit his functions as Prime Minister, speaking only on those occasions when he felt morally obliged to do so. Obviously this situation cannot be allowed to continue now that the Spanish issue has come to the point of imminent decision. Dr. Negrín has therefore reluctantly agreed to the necessity of changing the government without further delay. A regime must be organized which can command the unequivocal support of the majority of Spanish Republicans in order to direct the fight inside Spain and to promote the cause of the Republic outside.

The first thing to be done is to fill the vacant post of the Presidency of the Republic. For until there is a Chief of State to whom the Prime Minister can offer his resignation, the change cannot be made constitutionally. Señor Azaña's resignation in February, 1939, left Spain without a President. Señor Martinez Barrio, who, as president of the Cortes, would have succeeded Azaña until the next presidential election, refused to do so. The government, which had moved to Madrid in order to continue the resistance in the Central Zone, invited Señor Martinez Barrio, then in Paris, to come to the capital. He imposed certain conditions, which the government accepted. But he remained in Paris. In the meantime Casado's Madrid putsch occurred, organized by British and French agents in the very spirit of Munich capitulation. The government was obliged to leave the country, but as soon as it arrived in France, Dr. Negrín again requested Martinez Barrio to become Provisional President. He again declined. A few weeks later he resigned as president of the Cortes, turning over his functions to one of the vice-presidents. Therefore, the first step that must now be taken in Mexico is to name a Provisional President of the Republic.

The republican constitution provides the means for doing this. According to its by-laws a quorum of a hundred members is required for the election of a president of the Chamber of Deputies, who then automatically becomes the Provisional President of the Republic. When Dr. Negrín is asked, in conversations here, who he thinks should be elected, he always answers that it is up to Parliament to decide; but personally he thinks that the best solution, under existing circumstances, would be to instal Señor Martinez Barrio in his former post. The process of changing the government is already complicated enough without introducing the problem of finding a new president of the Cortes.

The one thing on which Dr. Negrín insists is that the change be made constitutionally—not through excessive legalism but because he is convinced that adherence to the republican constitution will strengthen the government's position at home and abroad. Take, for example, the question of extra-territoriality. Legally the Cortes can exercise its functions only in a place where it possesses sovereignty. Extraterritorial rights, even when they have not been established through legal codes or treaties, have frequently been granted by many countries. The most recent example is that of Great Britain, where all the governments and parliaments in exile set up in London during the war exercised sovereign rights in their official premises.

In the case of Spain several solutions could be applied. Mexico, which has refused recognition to the Franco regime, could authorize the use of the former Spanish embassy for the meeting of the Cortes; or it might declare any other place where the Cortes convened Spanish territory for the duration of the session. There is even the possibility that the deputies may come together on a ship flying the Spanish flag and anchored beyond the five-mile limit.

Once the Provisional President of the Republic is elected, the political crisis can be resolved by constitutional means. Should Dr. Negrín be confirmed in the post of Prime Minister, he would, in line with his policy of Republican unity, attempt to form the broadest possible coalition government. Only those Republican groups would be excluded which excluded themselves. Dr. Negrín would want the representation in such a government of all parties, trade-union organizations, and even their various subdivisions formed during the period of exile. He would also urge the participation of outstanding national leaders. Only men who prepared or aided the rebellion would be left out. This automatically excludes Gil Robles, leader of the ultra-reactionary clerical party, Acción Popular, who was involved in the revolt of July, 1936, although he early broke with Franco and took refuge in Portugal. It also excludes Colonel Casado, author of the 1939 coup—which was no less an act of rebellion than the Franco uprising itself.

The thing Dr. Negrín hopes to obtain through his conversations here in Mexico is an agreement on certain vital issues. He has always insisted that it is more exact to talk about agreement than about unity. Absolute unity at this moment on all the complex problems facing the Republic, both in exile and after its return to Spain, is impossible. The Spanish Republic is not a single-party regime. It is a democracy in which each party has its own ideas about the republic of tomorrow. The issues on which agreement should now be reached are:

1. Coordination of efforts inside and outside Spain to hasten the liberation of the Spanish people and the reestablishment of the Republic.

2. An amnesty which opens the way for a general policy of national reconciliation.

3. Election in Spain of a new Parliament—with the least possible delay after liberation.

4. Continuation of the policy of solidarity with the United Nations, of which the Republic feels morally a part.

To his present mission in Mexico Dr. Negrín brings a record of detachment from the internal conflicts of the emigration. He has always insisted that there are issues which the Spanish people alone can decide, and that these should not be aired abroad. As a result of this attitude Dr. Negrín has been accused of inactivity even by some of his closest friends and followers. But now, because of his silence in the midst of factional dispute, he is in an excellent position to carry out the task of conciliation he has undertaken here.

During his visit to France early this winter there was not a single Republican party or group, not a single individual who had taken an active part in the Spanish political and labor movements, whom Dr. Negrín failed to approach. Nor did he ignore those who had distinguished themselves by opposing his policies during the war and after; indeed, he even visited and sought the agreement of men who had denounced and slandered him.

In Mexico Dr. Negrín will follow the same course. His dominating concern is to bring about the restoration of the Republic with a minimum of violence and to establish rapidly the peace and order necessary for reconstructing the country. If his plan were put to a vote, an overwhelming majority of Spanish Republicans would support it. In fact, it is hard to see how it can be opposed, especially since he refuses to make an issue of his own retention of the Premiership. He is determined to facilitate the formation of a government under any Republican leader chosen according to constitutional requirements; with only one condition—that the new regime is truly inclusive and represents substantial agreement among the Republican groups. Dr. Negrín will oppose a solution that excludes any party or labor organization that fought to the end in defense of the Republic, first, because such exclusion would be morally unjustified, and, secondly, because he wishes Spain to avoid the experience of Greece, where civil war followed close on the heels of liberation. While it goes without saying that Dr. Negrín would, if it became necessary, fight for the reestablishment of the Republic with the same determination that he displayed in defending it against Axis aggression, he will do everything in his power to create peace in Spain and harmony among Spaniards. He looks upon this as essential if Spain is to play the part it should in the rebuilding of Europe.

We Spaniards are not interested only in bringing back the Republic and enjoying a deserved peace after nine years of war—because for us the war that began in 1936 is not yet over. We are not indulging in quixotic fancies when we claim that no country understands better than Spain the meaning of the fight against fascism. Political victory in this world war is far from won, and we know that Spain can help immeasurably to win it. We are not arrogant, but we are confident; our record gives us the right to believe in the contribution the Spanish Republic can make to the democratic reconstruction of the world. A Republican government in exile must be formed now to carry out this program and to break the present diplomatic stalemate that operates to keep the Franco regime in power.

At the San Francisco conference the first official steps were taken to present the case of the Spanish Republic to the governments of the United Nations. In addition to the direct, personal activities of the Republican Prime Minister and myself, and to negotiations which cannot now be discussed, a letter was addressed to the four chairmen of the conference on April 27. This communication, which has not been made public until now, reads as follows:

> Mr. President: As a Minister of the constitutional government of Spain, and by decision of the government, I have the honor to express to Your Excellency the most categorical reservation in regard to the decision to consider Spain a neutral country in the present world war, thus preventing its participation in the San Francisco Conference.
>
> Such a decision ignores the fact that during three years, and before any other European people, the people of Spain fought alone against German-Italian totalitarianism in defense of its independence and its democratic institutions; it ignores also the fact that neither the Spanish people nor their legitimate representatives ever yielded or gave up the fight.
>
> Conscious, nevertheless, of the great responsibilities which in the present hour rest upon all of us, I limit myself to expressing this reservation to Your Excellency and to stating our solemn protest, without adding any petition or demand, since we take into account that two of the inviting powers and a considerable number of participating powers maintain relations with the regime of force established in our country by the rebels as a consequence of an internal aggression provoked by Mussolini and Hitler in a form and under conditions identical with those used by fascism in its later attacks on other countries.
>
> Accept, Mr. President, the expression of my highest consideration. (Signed) JULIO ALVAREZ DEL VAYO, > Foreign Minister of the Spanish Republic

The resolution introduced by the Mexican delegation excluding the Franco dictatorship from the World Security Organization was approved by acclamation. It will be immensely useful in exposing to the people of the whole world the character of the present Spanish regime. But it might also have produced decisive practical results had the legitimate government of Spain been able to speak for all Republican groups. In that case the nations which have never recognized, or have broken relations with, the Franco regime might well have issued statements in support of the Republic which would have been equivalent to recognition. Public opinion in the United States, always sympathetic to the Republic, would have been galvanized into action; there would have been swift repercussions in London; and a new chain of events would have been initiated that would have fully exploited the diplomatic value of the San Francisco resolution.

But the disunity of the Spanish Republicans has prevented even nations favorably disposed toward our cause from taking positive steps toward recognition. No government wishes to give the appearance of supporting one exile political group against another. This is true even of Mexico, which more than any other country has demonstrated its ardent sympathy for the Republican position. Both President Avila Camacho and former President Lazaro Cárdenas have done their utmost for the Spanish Republic. But their efforts have been hampered by the conflicting claims of various factions. Other governments less favorably disposed have used these divisions as a welcome pretext to avoid taking the logical step after San Francisco—breaking relations with Franco.

Because Dr. Negrín's visit to Mexico holds out the hope that, through reconciliation of divergent elements, a peaceful restoration of the Republic can be brought about, the great mass of Spanish exiles, here and everywhere, are following his activities with passionate interest.

Can UNRRA Stop Famine?

BY JOHN CORSON

AMID the rejoicing over the signing of the United Nations Charter there sounds a discouraging, realistic note. It is the voice of Herbert H. Lehman, director general of the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration. Governor Lehman pleads for real international collaboration—not the kind that is concluded with the signing of a charter, but the kind that will deliver food, clothing, and medicines to the victims of this war.

Less than two years ago there was similar rejoicing when the agreement creating UNRRA was signed. In it the United Nations promised to collaborate in bringing prompt relief to the war-ravaged countries. But though these countries have been liberated, their peoples continue to suffer. Reports accumulate of hunger, cold, distress, starvation, and death. International collaboration has not yet fed or clothed these people as well as the Germans did. And in the coming winter food, clothing, and coal will be scarcer in Europe than in any other winter for decades. Has the UNRRA failed to measure up to its job or is international collaboration already faltering?

Look back over the past two years. A committee representing all European Allied governments and the United States estimated as early as September, 1943, the minimum amount of "foodstuffs, raw materials, and articles of prime necessity" needed in each Allied country during the six months following liberation. But Allied military authorities, who controlled shipping and supplies, never accepted the responsibility of providing for these minimum needs. Rather, they scaled down the estimates of food and other basic imports for civilian populations to an amount calculated to be sufficient "to prevent disease and unrest."

Not even supplies sufficient to prevent "disease and unrest" have been provided. Last autumn the Allied leaders decided that the liberated peoples would be aided most by knocking out Germany finally, completely, and immediately. Hence the bulk of all supplies was given to the armies. Civilians were allotted only the bare minimum necessary to prevent disorder. If the war had ended in Europe sixty days after this decision, the choice would have been justified; as the war continued, people in France, Belgium, the Netherlands, Greece, and elsewhere starved on hopes.

Take France, for example. During the six months following liberation the military authorities shipped in for civilians 262,150 tons of food, clothing, medical supplies, and petroleum. This volume represented less than one-fifth of the supplies estimated to be necessary "to prevent disease and unrest." And the need was greater than had been estimated. But there were not enough ships to bring supplies both for the armies and for French civilians.

The Allied radio had promised that relief would be available after liberation. "Strike down your oppressors and win both freedom and food" was the line. Military government and the distribution of food, clothing, and medicine by soldiers was not what these long-suffering people were led to expect. But UNRRA, in each country, instead of doing the emergency job of civilian relief for which it was organized, has had to await the military's pleasure.

The governments of the liberated areas themselves have also kept UNRRA waiting. France, Belgium, the Netherlands, and Norway announced that they would not require UNRRA's assistance. And the first resolution adopted by the representatives of the forty-four collaborating nations that make up the UNRRA Council dictates that UNRRA shall not operate in any country unless the government of that country requests aid.

But why should these governments, whose peoples are suffering, not request aid? In the first place, each of the Western European countries had substantial balances of foreign exchange with which supplies could be bought, and they proudly believed that, when liberated, they could cope with the urgent needs of their own people. Then, too, the men who made up these exiled governments feared that reliance on "outsiders" would weaken their position at home.

In the second place, UNRRA's resolutions require each nation that requests aid to pass a "means test"—that is, the nation must reveal its resources to representatives of five other nations and must take a "pauper's oath" that it is unable to pay for aid in foreign exchange. Nations, like individuals, can be dissuaded from seeking relief by the application of a means test.

In the third place, these governments allege that they fear UNRRA's encroachment on their national sovereignty. Marshal Tito, for example, refused for months to accept aid for Yugoslavia, fearing that the presence of Allied staff members in his country to observe that the supplies were distributed equitably, as UNRRA's charter requires, would abridge the national sovereignty of Yugoslavia. China eagerly looked for supplies but asked why UNRRA should want an office in China and a nuclear staff to report on the use made of these supplies. Similarly, Premier Osubka Morawski of the new Polish Provisional Government objected to having UNRRA's representatives visit Poland and received the backing of the Soviet Union.

Taxpayers in this country, the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, and Brazil view UNRRA as an agency through which their philanthropy is distributed. But the heads of state in liberated countries have a different view. They believe assistance is due their peoples for resisting or throwing back the common enemy. If as sovereign members of the fraternity of the United Nations they are to receive aid, they insist it be on their terms. Only Greece, destitute and flat on its back, seeks help without reservation. Mr. Hoover, heading an agency responsible only to itself, could distribute relief on a "take it or leave it" basis. Governor Lehman, distributing relief for an association of nations, must conform not only to the will of the group but to the will of each member nation.

But even if UNRRA had received the cooperation of the military authorities and been welcomed by the governments of the liberated countries, it would have been unable to meet the people's needs. UNRRA simply has not been able yet to translate the promises of its member nations into food, clothing, and medicines. Great Britain agreed to contribute £80,000,000, and Parliament promptly appropriated this sum. The United States agreed to contribute $1,350,000,000 and has already appropriated $800,000,000. Canada has provided $77,000,000. Australia, Brazil, Iceland, Mexico, New Zealand, and others have formally agreed to contribute their respective shares—90 per cent of which must be used to purchase supplies in the contributing country. But legislation confirming the UNRRA agreement, or even appropriations, won't fill hungry stomachs or clothe children. Relief means flour or meat unloaded at Le Havre, clothing delivered in Brussels or Antwerp, shoes given out for bare feet in Athens, medical supplies deposited along the Dalmatian coast. UNRRA can go on with its job of aiding the tragically displaced persons of all nationalities to find their way home from Germany, but to discharge its primary duty it must have supplies and ships.

In Great Britain the total production has so far been inadequate to provision the British troops at home and in Europe and to meet the sharply rationed needs of civilians. In Australia available products are insufficient to provision the armies and navies operating in the Pacific, feed the population, and leave any substantial quantities for UNRRA. Even in Brazil, Canada, and Mexico essential food, textiles, and other supplies have been competed for by the armies and local consumers.

The United States' contribution to UNRRA's resources is proportionately no greater than that of our less rich collaborators. Yet it represents UNRRA's principal source of supply. So far the drain on this reservoir has been very small. The real sacrifices ahead only became apparent in March when former "Assistant President" Byrnes created a committee of government executives to consider how a scarce food supply should be distributed. On March 13 three members of the United States Senate rose to demand that the committee should "dam the flow abroad of food" while shortages of meat, butter, and other food staples existed at home. President Roosevelt immediately countered with the hope that the United States would, as a matter of common decency, share its food.

As yet his hope has not been realized. Of 200,000,000 pounds of meat promised to UNRRA for the second half of this year, 14,000,000 pounds are to be made available. UNRRA's requirements of dried fish, milk powder, and dried eggs for babies and mothers and of essential fats have also been drastically cut. If UNRRA is to meet the minimum needs of Europe's liberated peoples during the second half of this year, this country's consumption of evaporated milk, meat, fats, soap, cheese, eggs, and margarine must certainly be curtailed. This is the price of preventing starvation among the Greeks, Yugoslavs, Czechs, Chinese, and Poles. Is the desire of the American people to collaborate in this international humanitarian undertaking equal to the test?

Perhaps the United Nations did not foresee that their pledges of collaboration would be put to such an earthy test. But surely the statesmen who created this new international institution knew that national political and economic interests must be subordinated to the common desire to relieve human distress. UNRRA's experience is hardly a good augury for other international institutions.

First, consider its experience with Poland. In September, 1944, discussions with the Polish government in exile, which had been going on since 1943, were interrupted by a telegram from the "Lublin committee" requesting aid. UNRRA offered to send a group of technical experts at once to survey Poland's needs and plan UNRRA's action. From that moment until the Big Three officially buried the Polish government in exile at Yalta UNRRA was "in the middle." It expressed full willingness to deal with whichever group could bring relief to the Polish people. But supplies could be delivered only through territory of the Soviet Union and to a Poland controlled by the Red Army. For four months, from September, 1944, until February, 1945, just before the Yalta conference, the Soviet Union failed to reply to repeated inquiries as to whether supplies for Poland could be shipped through Soviet territory. The Soviet Union did not grant visas applied for by UNRRA's technical experts in November, 1944, until July, 1945.

Yugoslavia is a second example. Hunger and distress there have been acute, particularly along the Dalmatian coast. Representatives of the Soviet Union vigorously urged, as early as July, 1944, that UNRRA should deliver supplies to Marshal Tito for the small area then liberated. UNRRA was willing. Anglo-American military authorities said it was impracticable to distribute relief in Yugoslavia and refused to turn supplies over to UNRRA for this purpose. But subsequently Allied military authorities negotiated with Tito as to when and how their forces might bring relief to the Yugoslavs. Tito apparently did not relish American and British soldiers distributing relief in his country: his partisans had liberated the land; the Allied armies were not needed to fight Germans. Did not the Anglo-American authorities trust their partisan Yugoslav allies sufficiently to turn over relief supplies? he asked. And he doubtless wondered whether the Anglo-American authorities wanted to have their uniformed forces bring relief in order to counteract the influence reflected in the often-displayed hammer and sickle and the use of the new personal address—"Comrade."

The third and most costly example is Greece. UNRRA's staff went into Greece with the first Anglo-American military forces as the "agents of the military." Two United States Senators, Harold H. Burton of Ohio and James M. Tunnell of Delaware, visited the Middle East shortly after the strife in Greece and had an opportunity to appraise the results of this arrangement. Each reported to his Senate colleagues in February that in his opinion the British military forces "used that relief organization in an improper manner by integrating its representatives with the armed forces." In short, the British made UNRRA's representatives seem benevolent agents of their military forces.

UNRRA's representatives, let it be said to their honor, did their best through the civil strife to see that relief supplies were distributed to both ELAS and government supporters.

Seven UNRRA staff members were shot while carrying on their tasks, and one was killed. But UNRRA lost its impartial international status in the eyes of many of our friends in the Balkans.

To cope with these problems of national pride, competition from the military forces, promises of collaboration only partially met, and international politics, UNRRA has had a devoted but inexperienced staff. UNRRA has brought together 3,000 persons of more than 30 different nationalities. They are located in London, Paris, Cairo, Athens, Rome, Belgrade, Addis Ababa, Rio de Janeiro, Sydney, and Chungking, as well as Washington. Within eighteen months UNRRA has had to mobilize this variegated group, weld them into an integrated efficient unit, and improvise methods of doing its job while actually carrying on the job. That so much is still uncompleted is not surprising.

UNRRA has been severely criticized for its ineffectiveness. Lord Strabolgi in the House of Lords has dubbed it "UNRRA the unready," and Lord Beaverbrook's Daily Express lambasts it as a "top-heavy, muscle-bound bureaucracy." American newspapers describe it as poorly organized, over-cautious, over-centralized, and lacking essential imaginative leadership and drive. Having been a part of the organization so recently, I cannot appraise these criticisms objectively. Yet I believe that within a year UNRRA has built as efficient an organization as the time would permit. The machinery still creaks, but less than it did six months ago. Given a chance, Governor Lehman and his colleagues can do the job. To charge UNRRA's failures to weakness of organization is to miss the salutary lessons which its experience teaches.

UNRRA's existence reflects the popular will, throughout the United Nations, to collaborate in making the future world secure. But UNRRA's experience indicates that effective collaboration for relief demands more than good-will. Though its failures are due in part to the unyielding scarcity of essential supplies and ships, they are due also to the unwillingness of the various states to compromise on matters affecting their political and economic interests or to restrain the bureaucrats—in brass hats or in Homburgs—who would substitute their own or their department's policy for this country's avowed policy of international collaboration. The hope of a world made secure by the cooperation of its states in relief, finance, agriculture, civil aviation, and the maintenance of order can be brought nearer realization if advantage is taken of the lessons to be learned from UNRRA. Its experience to date makes the promise of San Francisco appear somewhat less bright.

Ferruccio Parri

BY GAETANO SALVEMINI

FERRUCCIO PARRI is fifty-five years old: that is, he belongs to the generation that was twenty-five or thirty when the Fascist movement came to power in Italy. He and his contemporaries saw pre-Fascist Italy, and after the tagic experience of Fascism they can appreciate with a mature mind its faults, which were many, and its merits, which were few. It is they who must assume the gigantic task of rebuilding their country on the ruins caused by twenty-five years of evil and stupidity. It is they who must fight against the domestic and foreign forces which will do everything possible to hinder the second Italian Risorgimento. Ferruccio Parri is one of the best of that generation.

In 1915, when Italy joined the Triple Entente in its war against the Central Powers, Parri was an instructor in history in a high school. Tall, pale, with beautiful dark eyes and a great shock of black hair, as severe with himself as with others in the fulfilment of duty, Parri was adored by his pupils. The free Italy of those days had many similar teachers, men who devoted their lives to study and teaching, content with a humble economic status, incorruptible ministers of the faith in truth which will save mankind. Even in the worst years of tyranny these teachers kept alive the scholastic traditions of the old free Italy.

Parri, like all the best youth of his generation, was an "interventionist": that is, he favored Italy's intervention in the European war. English and French politicians announced that they were not waging war for territorial conquests in Europe or for colonial expansion outside Europe. The European map would be redrawn according to national self-determination. The rights of the smaller nations would be as securely guaranteed as those of the great powers. Parri was one of those who wanted Italy to share the sacrifices in that war which was going to obtain justice for all, and then to get its share of justice. He never supported the campaign waged by the Italian nationalists, the forerunners of the Fascists, for the conquest of Dalmatia. The Italian Risorgimento had stopped at "Trento e Trieste." Parri was faithful to that tradition. He wanted no less, but certainly no more. Italy's war with the Central Powers was to be the last war of the Italian Risorgimento and was to give the final touch to national unification.

As a rule teachers in all countries prove excellent officers. For his intelligence and bravery Parri was promoted from lieutenant to captain and then to major. He took part in nine offensives. He was decorated four times for acts of valor and also received the French Croix de Guerre and the Italian Croce per Merito di Guerra.

He followed President Wilson's work with enthusiasm. When Leonida Bissolati resigned from the Orlando-Sonnino Cabinet because he would not associate himself with its demands for Dalmatia and openly defied the nationalists and Mussolini, Ferruccio Parri took sides with him, while Ivanoe Bonomi, who had been Bissolati's follower and friend, betrayed him by taking his place in the Cabinet.

After his discharge from military service, Parri worked as an assistant editor of the Corriere della Sera until November, 1925, when the chief editor, Senator Albertini, was forced to give up his post to a Fascist. Parri refused to work under the new editor, although he was offered an excellent salary. But he did not remain idle. He became secret correspondent of the daily Corriere degli Italiani, put out, under the direction of Giuseppe Donati, by anti-Fascists who had taken refuge in France. Almost all the reports from Italy published by this paper in 1926 were the work of Parri.

In November, 1926, the reports ceased. Parri, together with Carlo Rosselli, was planning to effect the escape from Italy of the leader of the Socialist Party, Filippo Turati, a man of seventy, ill, kept in house arrest, and threatened with internment on a penal island. Turati escaped through a service stairway while the guards posted at his front door were chatting. A taxi driver, one of those humble heroes who were to be found by the thousand in Italy, and whose name, unfortunately, I do not know, drove the three fugitives to a country house near Varese which belonged to a close friend of Turati. From Varese, passing from one person to another and never being betrayed, Turati, Rosselli, and Parri arrived at a point near Savona. Here they boarded a motor boat piloted by Italo Oxilia, another humble hero. Carlo Rosselli paid all the expenses with the generosity which his wealth allowed him.

Parri and Rosselli, after bringing Turati to safety, returned to Italy. Italy was their field of battle against Fascism. There they intended to take up the fight again. As they landed on the coast of Tuscany, they were stopped by customs guards. The police, of course, suspected that they had had a hand in Turati's escape. They did not deny the "crime." Since they were in the hands of the enemy, the best tactics were to challenge him openly, come what might. According to Fascist law, persons charged with the "crime" of complicity in "unauthorized expatriation" were granted liberty while awaiting trial. The judge at Savona, therefore, ordered the two defendants to be set free. But the police intervened and sent them to the island of Ustica for internment until they should be tried.

Persons sentenced to internment were transported in railway coaches divided lengthwise by a passageway into two lines of cells, one for each prisoner. A chain went from one cell to another through apertures in the side walls and bound all the prisoners together by their wrists in such a way that if one of them made an abrupt motion the others were injured. The only ventilation in each cell came through a tiny observation hole in the door leading to the central passage. The cell was bitterly cold in winter and suffocating in summer. Each evening the train stopped at a station, and the prisoners, handcuffed and chained together, with their packs on their backs, were taken in closed horse-drawn vans to the local jail, where they ate supper and spent the night. They received no other food. Some men traveled under these conditions of torture for two months. Mussolini hoped by this means to undermine either their will-power or their health.

Carlo Rosselli has described the night which Parri and he spent in the prison at Palermo before they were taken to the penal island of Ustica:

> There are at least a hundred of us in the "well," which is the section for transients in the Palermo prison. Around us confusion and squalor. Convicts enjoying a break in their usual routine, gangsters evacuated from their customary sewer-like quarters, prisoners technically freed who still have weeks to wait before their release, political prisoners like ourselves. . . . Sleep is impossible. I look at Parri. His slender, pale face framed by a three weeks' beard is the picture of nobility, Parri is my second conscience, my elder brother. If my imprisonment had given me nothing more, his melancholy friendship would be enough of a reward. . . . Before I knew Parri the hero of the Mazzini stamp seemed to me abstract and rhetorical. Now I see him lying near me with the sorrow of the world, and all its spiritual energy, engraved on his face.

In May of 1927, while Parri and Rosselli were confined on the island of Ustica, Mussolini told the Chamber of Deputies that the anti-Fascists sentenced to compulsory domicile were beginning to see the light and that several of them had written him letters of submission. When Parri, Rosselli, and another man of unyielding character, Riccardo Bauer, read in the newspapers what Mussolini had said, they wrote him that they had made no act of repentance or submission and did not intend to do so. This letter Mussolini did not read to the Chamber of Deputies.

After a month at Ustica Parri had to make the painful trip back to Savona. Here, on the eve of the public trial, he and Rosselli decided to define in writing their attitude toward the Fascist regime. I give Parri's statement in part:

> I have no personal grudge against the Fascist regime. I pride myself on having served the Italian state in peace and war with loyalty and self-sacrifice. I have never followed extremist political movements. I have never had any political ambitions. I have always kept out of political parties. I have no responsibility for the disorder of the years immediately after the war. . . . My hate of Fascism has moral grounds. I uncompromisingly repudiate the whole atmosphere of Fascism. My feelings are shared by thousands of young men. Yesterday soldiers fighting for their country, today they are enemies of the rhetoric and corruption typical of the Fascist regime. To these young men Fascism must and will render strict account of the wounds it has inflicted on the nation. The regime can persecute and scatter them; it will never stifle their opposition. . . . We hold as certain that the ideals of liberty and justice, misunderstood and mute in times of servitude, are imperishable. We recognize each other by our faith in these ideals; we recognize Fascism in its contempt for them. Against our persons Fascism can use bludgeons and handcuffs; against our faith it is powerless. Fascism brands us as "unpatriotic." But after teaching Italian history in our schools, after serving my country in war, I know that the example of the Risorgimento and of 1915 shows us our duty today.
>
> When in November of 1926 all remnants of resistance were suppressed in Italy, I felt it my duty to make a protest which should declare my faith in a better Italy. This protest could only be made public abroad. . . . Thanks to his fine character and an honorable and dignified life, Signor Turati is well fitted to present to civilized Europe our protest against the darkness that has fallen upon our country and our faith in an Italy which will give equal liberty to all Italians. Since Fascist law calls us to account for what we have done, we assert with pride our responsibility. Our pride is the greater today when the degradation and hypocrisy of public life and the cowardice of the ruling classes call for an example of sacrifice and of loyalty to ideals. Today > there is no break in the clouds on the horizon. But we have steadfast faith in the future. Gentlemen, the Fascist regime, in sentencing us, will honor us.

At the trial Parri and Rosselli resolutely took the offensive, accusing the Fascist government of having treated Turati illegally and unjustly and having compelled him to go into exile if he were to save his dignity and, indeed, his life. Tall, thin, and pale, Parri described the infernal conditions of existence in Milan in November, 1926. "Had I been in England, that is, in a civilized country," he said, "I could have legally contested the legitimacy of Fascist law. In Italy that was impossible. But I refused to recognize its legitimacy. That is why I violated it with open eyes and full awareness of what I was doing." "Bravo," came a voice from the audience. It was the voice of Parri's old father. Then came Rosselli's turn. Claiming a full share of the responsibility for Turati's escape, he said that half a century earlier one of his ancestors had welcomed and hidden the dying Mazzini in his house at Pisa. When he himself had carried one of the finest of Italians to safety outside Italy he had only followed the example, almost the command, of his heritage.

The judges were amazed at the spirit of these two young men; the public was electrified. During the wait for the sentence the courtroom, the halls, the stairways, the whole neighborhood were crowded with people. Fascist law made the crime of unauthorized expatriation punishable by a minimum of ten months of prison if there were no political motives and by a maximum of six years if there were such motives. After four hours of discussion the three judges gave the accused the minimum sentence of ten months for their complicity in an unauthorized expatriation without political motives. The crowd burst into wild applause for the victory of the two young men against an oppressive government which no one had hitherto dared to challenge.

After he had served his ten months in prison, Carlo Rosselli was interned on the penal island of Lipari, from which he escaped a year later, in July of 1929. Parri was freed, but from 1928 to 1943 the police of Milan kept special watch over him. He was by no means inactive during those years. He took part in the underground Giustizia e Libertà movement. He escaped arrest by a miracle when, toward the end of 1930, various leaders and members of this movement—Ernesto Rossi, Riccardo Bauer, Nicola Fancello, and Nello Traquandi, among others—were seized and sentenced first to jail and later to internment on a penal island, where they remained until 1943. Amid the general hopelessness Parri steadfastly refused to make any compromise with the victorious Fascist regime.

I am not so well informed as I should like to be on Parri's activities since the fall of Mussolini. Last autumn very few of us knew which of the partisans was "General Maurizio" or "the Uncle," and those who did know guarded their secret. Many times in recent months I have been asked whom I would suggest as leader of the democratic Italian republic. I always answered, "It is not up to me any more than it is up to Mr. Churchill to name the future leader. The Italians will choose their own leader when they can." But Parri was in my mind.

One story of his life as a partisan reached me two months ago from Switzerland and has now been confirmed by an O. N. A. dispatch from Milan dated June 18. In January of 1945 Parri fell into a trap laid by the Gestapo. He was saved by the generosity and quick wit of an American major, who signed the name of General Clark to a message addressed to the German command saying that if Parri were not released at once to Switzerland, high Gestapo officials held by the Allies would pay for his life with theirs. This was language that the Germans could understand. Parri was taken immediately to the Swiss frontier. From there he quickly returned to Italy and took up his work again.

And today he is Premier of Italy.

Chicago the Beautiful

BY RAY RUNNION

THE rest of the country associates the name of Chicago with gang killings and the radio voice of Mayor Kelly's sewer commissioner, who was the phantom cheerleader at the 1940 Democratic National Convention. Local citizens have an ingrained belief that the city is incurably ugly, noisy, inconvenient, and rapacious. But strange as it may seem, Chicago is currently exhibiting symptoms of a civic conscience. There is evidence that it is entering a period that should produce something more deserving of community pride than livestock receipts or lake-front embellishments.

Since the first of the year the voters have approved by referendum a state law creating a public transit authority for the acquisition and modernization of the decrepit and bankrupt elevated and surface lines. (Seventy-five years of private ownership have left a legacy of rattling elevated trains that carry kerosene tail lanterns and of street cars that were new in the Theodore Roosevelt era.) The legislature has passed a series of laws to permit far-reaching slum clearance under municipal auspices. The Chicago Park District has been voted $24,000,000 to finance the first four years of a ten-year program of bringing green open spaces to the city's congested areas. The Chicago Plan Commission has prepared an extraordinary post-war improvement program, ranging from new schools to new subways. The Mayor's Race Relations Committee is attacking in a down-to-earth way the factors that foster racial discontent, with special commissions covering the fields of housing, employment, health, law and order, education, and recreation.

The transit and slum-clearance programs are the product of an unprecedented collaboration between Mayor Kelly, a Democrat, and Governor Green, a Republican, which brought about the enactment of the necessary laws by the legislature, both houses of which have Republican majorities. In the ideal political society such cooperation between state and municipal executives for the public welfare would perhaps be taken for granted. In Illinois the discovery that the waters of Lake Michigan had suddenly acquired a pleasant vanilla flavor would have been hardly more astonishing.

Kelly fought Green hard in the November election and lost, though President Roosevelt carried the state. A few months later Kelly went to Springfield to confer with the Governor on a legislative program for Chicago. Kelly's political doctrine, he frankly announced, is, "If you can't lick 'em, jine 'em."

To soothe downstate Republicans, who always view Chicago as a sink of iniquity, Green enlisted the forensics of Werner W. Schroeder, Republican national committeeman. Schroeder brushed up on the tortuous transit problem and made several persuasive appearances as a witness before legislative committees. The legislators were impressed by the spectacle of a deep-dyed conservative arguing for a public-ownership policy that once would have been denounced as socialistic. As a result the transit and slum-clearance laws were passed with scant opposition, though not without grumblings from Republican members from rural sections who feared the political consequences of collaborating with the Chicago machine.

The Kelly-Green alliance is not hard to explain. It was simply good politics for both men to take up the causes they are jointly supporting. The two apparently realized that the mass of Chicago's citizens, like those of many other cities, want to see something worth-while emerge from the disruption of the war period. People were beginning to scrutinize the city's lacks and defects and to protest against their continuation. There was no answer to the argument that private ownership of the transit facilities had completely broken down under the dead weight of receiverships and wrangling bondholders' committees. To have opposed slum clearance would have been to approve the undisputed social decay that slums produce. Kelly, who had seen himself depicted throughout the country as the symbol of political bossism, is credited with a sincere desire for constructive accomplishment. Green is young and seems politically ambitious.

To the credit of both, the public-ownership program came into being without demagogic promises of lower fares. A subsidized five-cent fare like that of New York is in effect outlawed by a requirement that the Chicago Transit Authority must make good by its own efforts. The proponents of public ownership argued frankly that since a publicly owned transit system would be free of income and other taxes and could sell its tax-exempt securities at a low price, it would have greater resources for modernization and expansion. A $100,000,000 replacement program has been scheduled for the next ten years. A transit board appointed jointly by Kelly and Green has begun to function, but actual acquisition of the properties awaits the conclusion of bankruptcy litigation in the federal court.

For slum clearance an initial fund of $10,000,000 is provided, half through a special bond issue and half through an appropriation from the state's accumulated surplus. Since this sum will only do the spadework in correcting Chicago's vast housing deficiencies, present plans are regarded as the nucleus of a far-reaching program to be carried out after the war, entailing the possible expenditure of $100,000,000 of city, state, and federal funds. The City Council's housing committee is basing its policies on the statistical fact that in 1940 the income of 23 per cent of Chicago's families was $1,200 or less. The Chicago program, therefore, emphasizes the construction of low-rental housing units.

Despite all this there are no signs that Chicago is nearing a bipartisan millennium. Kelly and Green failed to cooperate in a citizen-sponsored movement for a new constitution and in efforts to obtain a state fair-employment-practices act; both proposals were rejected. Moreover, there has been a revival of commercialized gambling, with eight gang killings since the first of the year. What has happened is that Chicago, made self-critical by the disturbing events of the war period, has discovered that its physical development has become, in Lewis Mumford's phrase describing American cities, "a crystallization of chaos." The discovery is late, and the corrective surgery will be costly. The important thing at the moment is that Chicago is a more humble and more introspective city than the one which a few years ago gaudily celebrated its glories in a "Century of Progress" exposition that prominently featured the fan-dancing of Sally Rand.

In the Wind

A SOLDIER JUST IN from Italy brings this story. The American ambassador, Alexander C. Kirk, gave a reception in Rome for members of the staffs of Yank, Stars and Stripes, and the American Expeditionary [radio] Station. He told a soldier connected with the station, "Broadcasting is one of the things that will survive the war." The soldier said, "Soap opera will die with us," and the Ambassador replied, "I manufacture soap."

THE FAMOUS ANGLO-EGYPTIAN censorship is still doing the things that made it famous. These are some of the instructions it issued to the Egyptian press on June 4: "It is forbidden: (1) to mention the visit of the Minister of the U. S. S. R. to the Egyptian Prime Minister and the note relative to the Russian point of view on the questions of Syria and the Lebanon; . . . (4) to mention any statement attributed to General Paget; (5) relative to the declaration made on the third of this month by the president of the Syrian Chamber to the journalists gathered at the Lebanese Legation in Cairo, to mention (a) that the British have given 5,000 rifles to the Syrians and (b) that they have given 35,000 tons of wheat to the Syrians. . . ."

IF THERE IS sufficient demand, the United Nations Information Organization and the Library of Congress will publish the official documentation of the San Francisco conference. The documents will fill 12,000 pages, and it is planned to publish them in eight volumes. Inquiries should be addressed to the Secretary General, United Nations Information Office, 610 Fifth Avenue, New York 20, N. Y.

THE STRIKE OF NEW YORK'S newspaper deliverymen is having repercussions in nearby resort towns. This is from a special report to the New York Times from Asbury Park, New Jersey, on July 11: "One amusing by-product of the strike was the sight of a well-known member of the New York Stock Exchange seated in his chauffeur-driven car at the station reading a copy of the Daily Worker."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind —either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. We will pay $1 for each item accepted—EDITORS THE NATION.]

BOOKS and the ARTS

NOTES BY THE WAY

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

LAST fall I noted that the head of Time, Inc., had it in mind to add a "little magazine" to his high-powered, fast-running journalistic stable. Opinions and Ideas or Opinion and Thought, whatever it is to be called, has now actually set up shop; but according to reports it is planning to invade the field not only of the little magazines and the more conventional quarterlies but of The Nation and the New Republic.

The project of a magazine of ideas financed and controlled by big business which also happens to be big journalism and aimed at the vaguely liberal reading public, which is rather large in this country, suggests pretty sinister possibilities. Come to think of it, the new incarnation of American imperialism might well bear the label of National Liberalism; if it took as its slogan The American Century of the Common Man it might go far in a post-war period of disillusion and confusion; and considering the auspices under which Opinions and Ideas is being launched, such a magazine would be a likely candidate for highbrow spokesman of such a development.

I doubt very much that these obvious implications have risen to the consciousness of Luce or of his editorial collaborators. The new venture would have less chance of success if they had. Luce is one of those "naturals" whose strength is as the strength of ten because he is, at most, only half-aware of what he is doing. I am sure he considers himself "progressive"; he is no doubt convinced that his advocacy of the American Century is based on a disinterested desire to carry the benefits of the American way to the millions of outlying natives with whose welfare he has always been concerned—his missionary background should never be forgotten. The editor in charge of the projected magazine is Willi Schlamm, a disillusioned Marxist who has apparently found it possible to accept the Lucite illusion that there is no reason why Time, Inc., should not be the sponsor of a liberal magazine to put all other liberal magazines in the shade.

This is a combination whose strength, as I have already indicated, lies in its very presumption and naivete. But its weakness lies in the same quarter. It is quite likely that Opinions and Ideas will appeal to those liberal readers who are more or less vague, undiscriminating, or confused. There are plenty of writers who as liberals are confused or disillusioned or both. These would seem to be the natural contributors to a "liberal" magazine sponsored by Luce. But Opinions and Ideas, to my knowledge, is trying to enlist what might be designated as left literary writers who are not at all undiscriminating and to whom, for instance, Time, Inc., is the last word in philistinism, political and other. This is further evidence of the basic obtuseness of Luce thinking. Here again, I suspect the motive is a mixture of a desire to prove that even the most advanced writers can do their most advanced writing for a Luce publication and the imperial-missionary urge to gather in those spirited mavericks, left or literary or both, who obviously should have the benefit of safe, richly grassed pastures.

I very much doubt that these authors will find it possible to collaborate. The prospect of getting paid three or four hundred dollars for a serious "highbrow" article will be very tempting to American writers, whose feelings about writing and money are, for obvious reasons, ambivalent—living continuously on the edge of a money civilization is difficult and frustrating. But as long as Opinions and Ideas is owned by Time, Inc., a writer of political discrimination will see it in that frame of reference; no amount of assurance that he can write exactly as he pleases will wipe it out; and in any case he will not write in the same way as he would for The Nation or the Partisan Review.

Say that such a writer was moved to do a critique of liberal or left ideas. If it was to be published in an authentic liberal or little magazine he would feel quite free to be as severe as he liked because of his consciousness that his readers were liberal or left of liberal and would read his essay as a critique and not as an attack on the liberal or left point of view per se. If it was to be published in a magazine which was under the same management as Time he would think twice before setting down his opinions and ideas, and that second thought marks the difference between a genuine and a contrived liberal magazine. The writer who wished to write critically of modern art or literature would come up against the same difficulty.

When Lionel Trilling's book on E. M. Forster came out, Time's review as it was printed put the main emphasis on Trilling's discussion of Forster's critical remarks about liberalism. I say "as it was printed," because it was pretty clear that the unsigned review had been cut; it was crystal clear that the editors of Time were delighted to exhibit liberals finding fault with liberals and had no qualms about pulling the discussion out of its original context and proportion.

I don't mean to imply that articles for Opinions and Ideas will be tampered with. My point is that Opinions and Ideas must bear the onus of Time, whatever convictions to the contrary are entertained by Mr. Schlamm—unless, of course, the first article in the first issue turns out to be a sharp analysis of Time, Inc., of the sort which might be published in The Nation or the Partisan Review. That would have the double advantage of demonstrating the independence of the editor and the freedom of contributors.

But even if Opinions and Ideas is forced, as I think it will be, to change its sights as far as writers are concerned and be content with contributors who are conscious of no anomaly in the conception of a liberal magazine run by Time, Inc., its success would be, to say the least, ominous. It would serve to blur even more the line that divides right from left. And that line has already become difficult enough to distinguish—thanks largely to the confrontation in the current world of a collective state which is totalitarian by capitalist nations in which democratic processes and individual liberty are still cherished and continue to flourish, however imperfectly. A magazine that, given its sponsor, could hardly help becoming an apologist for the right while exploiting the traditional principles of the left would be an effective herald for the monstrosity of National Liberalism which I have already postulated. And yet its editors might be the last to realize what function they were performing.

BRIEFER COMMENT

The Irrepressible Morris Ernst

TO REVIEW THE LIFE of Morris Ernst as he exhibits it in "The Best Is Yet" (Harper and Brothers, $3) in any cool and detached manner would be like reporting a three-alarm fire at the Stork Club in terms of property damage and insurance. This collection of "free-wheeling pieces" which Ernst has dashed off in lieu of an autobiography is either "swell"—a favorite Ernstian adjective—or the opposite, according to how much the reviewer likes the author or how heartily he hates him.

Morris L. Ernst is a lawyer, a member of a firm with offices in New York where such unexciting matters as torts, writs, summonses, and duces tecums are frequently discussed. He is a serious-minded and courageous fighter for the under dog. When I first met him, he was acting as counsel without fee for a committee of public-spirited citizens who were trying to present the anthracite miners' side of one of our perennial coal strikes. Gently and sympathetically, he was drawing from a badly flustered man from the picks the tragic story of life on a Pennsylvania coal patch. Years later, with this story in mind, he defended the desperate anthracite "bootleggers" in a report to Governor Earle of Pennsylvania which deserves to rank with the best of labor documents. He has been in the van of the handful of defenders of our civil liberties; he has fought censorship like an infuriated wildcat; and if in the memory of us iron-gray lads there has been a liberal cause which he has not actively supported, I do not know its name.

Nevertheless, for reasons best known to himself, Morris Ernst chooses to present himself in life and in this book as an "irrepressible"—that's the word on the book's jacket—happy-go-lucky character about town. As some people cannot bear to watch anybody having a good time, and as the accepted picture of the liberal is that of a tight-lipped, sour-faced individual reading the minutes of the previous meeting, I expect that Ernst has gone out of his way to prove that there can be laughter as well as thunder on the left.

MC ALISTER COLEMAN

Data for Governing the Japanese

WHATEVER HARDSHIPS and inconveniences the mass evacuation of 110,000 persons of Japanese ancestry from the West Coast may have caused the evacuees and the administration, it has unquestionably proved to be a godsend to sociologists and anthropologists. For to the social scientist mass evacuation has, in effect, created ideal conditions for observing how people react when the social structure in which they have always functioned is suddenly disrupted, how the family system responds to sudden change, and how, under pressure of events, new types of social organization develop. Owing largely to the foresight and curiosity of John Collier, these opportunities for scientific research and observation have not been lost. Under his auspices, Lieutenant Commander Alexander H. Leighton was enabled to study at first hand a fascinating range of social phenomena in the Poston relocation center and to scrutinize the administration of the project at close range. In "The Governing of Men" (Princeton, $3.75) he has recorded these phenomena with admirable detachment and attempted to draw from them certain basic conclusions about the governing of men from the standpoint of applied anthropology. Unquestionably, his conclusions can be of incalculable value to the administrators of Iwo Jima, Okinawa, and other areas destined to be brought under American rule as we advance in the Pacific. Whether they will be so utilized, of course, is another matter. The volume is well organized and carefully documented and indexed, and also contains some excellent photographs.

CAREY MC WILLIAMS

East and West

I FOUND A GOOD DEAL of pleasure and some puzzlement in "The Asian Legacy and American Life," edited by A. E. Christy (John Day, an Asia Press book, $3.50). It consists of a series of essays, some of great value and some quite worthless, on the influence of Asiatic culture and experience upon Western modes.

The first paper, by Arthur E. Christy, seems to me little more than an example of the sort of exercise for which Ph.D.'s are granted, being a historical review, with considerable gaps, of the "literary interest" in Asia. What serious purpose is fulfilled by reminding us at great length that Joseph Addison wrote "The Vision of Mirza" for the Spectator and that Beckford composed "Vathek," "an Oriental Gothic thriller," I do not know. A somewhat better paper is that of Curt Sachs on The Orient and Western Music, though Dr. Sachs's frequently over-confident assertions might not always be satisfactory to one who knew, say, the literature of the debate about Arabic influence on Spanish music. Laurence P. Roberts, in The Orient and Western Art, provides an excellent paper, and John Gould Fletcher, in The Orient and Contemporary Poetry, is warmly appreciative of Chinese poetry, imagism, and his own verse. Next comes a really curious piece about the transcendentalist arcana of orientalism, in which we are asked to take Madame Blavatsky and the Rosicrucians seriously—and, believe it or not, Gerald Heard also. Mr. Tindall, the author of this piece, says of Los Angeles, home of strange cults, "The attraction of this place for spiritual men and even for spirits is plain. But I am not sure that I know what it means." And that remark may be applied to the book as a whole. Dr. Coomaraswamy, who commits himself to the usual intellectualist extravagance about the superior "spirituality" of the East, where "chaque occupation est un sacerdoce," suggests in Understanding and Reunion that the West must absorb much of the Asian perceptiveness for the truths of art and religion. Pearl Buck corrects Dr. Coomaraswamy—if I understand her rightly—and declares that we need the Oriental sense of the importance of happiness while the East needs our productive capacity. How these syntheses are to be brought off is not suggested. The whole, if it has any definite basis at all, seems to rest upon the unproved assumption that if we all knew enough about one another we should be able to live in peace.

The difficulty with all such enterprises as this is that the East is as full of contradictory diversity as the West, while the conspicuous weakness of this particular effort is that there is no trace of an account of the solid achievements of the West. To sum up, this well-written book seems to me to have little purpose; yet it is full of that out-of-the-way learning which it is perhaps a personal idiosyncrasy to like. The illustrations are good.

RALPH BATES

Wide-ranging Memories

CHEERFULNESS AND SIMPLICITY characterize the memories which Ella Young has written down in "Flowering Dusk" (Longmans, Green, $3.50). They range in time over seven decades, and in place from Ireland to California. Miss Young's acquaintance included AE, Yeats, Maude Gonne, the Colums, and the leaders of the Rising: both people and events, however, are presented pleasantly, rather than memorably, in these pages. The author's Irishness is displayed, at times, with a rather self-conscious, arty, of-the-lecture-platform manner; nor is the cliché altogether alien to Miss Young's prose. There are some good stories, though, of the Cave of the Red Steeds, the Boat of the Dead, the music of the Sidhe, and so on. In America Miss Young has traveled extensively, particularly in the West: she knew Robinson and Una Jeffers, Charles Erskine Scott Wood and Sara Bard Field, and Mabel Dodge Luhan, among others. Miss Young seems to be essentially an amateur, at times in the best sense of the word, at times in its less happy connotations: the effect of her book, therefore, can be either disarming or annoying. The text is illustrated with half a dozen striking photographic studies of the author.

ROLFE HUMPHRIES

Layman's Guide

POPULARIZATION is a dangerous thing; not primarily because it makes authorities of the uninitiate but because it encourages a tolerance, if not a taste, for baby talk. The bad political influence of the popular magazines is due less to their content than to their style, including that of their most unpolitical illustrations; and many a book intended to enlighten our minds defeats its purpose by stultifying our taste. This is something Goebbels understood much better than the Writers' War Board. The most dangerous thing a writer can do is to fight trash with trash. Such being the state of things, it is a pleasure to report that "The Doctor's Job," by Carl Binger, M.D. (Norton, $3), is not only good for you but easy to take. That is to say, it presents a complex subject in simple terms without denying its complexity. It is an intelligent layman's guide to contemporary medical thought and practice, with due emphasis on their social aspects.

J. MITCHELL MORSE

Books on Germany

IN "THE JUNKER MENACE" (Richard R. Smith, $2) Frederick Martin discovers the "logic" of Germany's history in the influence of the Prussian Junkers. Yet the power of the Prussian Junkers was not as exclusive as Mr. Martin pretends, and Germany was not the only country in which a caste of landowners exerted strong and sometimes decisive influence. Mr. Martin's book is full of over-simplifications, exaggerations, distortions of historical facts—all typical of those authors who in writing about Germany offer a very simple formula for the solution of an extremely complicated problem.

Serious information, strongly recommended to Germany's present would-be educators, is given in "From Democracy to Nazism" by Rudolf Heberle (Louisiana State University, $2.50). In the modest frame of a "regional case study" analyzing the political developments in Schleswig-Holstein, Mr. Heberle, professor of sociology at Louisiana State University, contributes valuable material for an unbiased judgment of the German tragedy. The author shows the fallacy of the popular belief that Prussianism and Junkerism were identical with Nazism.

"A Short History of Germany" by S. H. Steinberg (the Macmillan Company, $3) presents a reliable catalogue of Germany's developments from the year 911 to the outbreak of the Hitler war. Influenced by Bismarck's federalist opponents (Constantin Frantz), Mr. Steinberg overemphasizes the racial and political differences between the German tribes. He even denies the existence of a "pure German language," except on the stage, and attributes to the various German dialects the quality of languages. There are actually no greater differences between the dialects of Germany than between those found in France, Italy, or America.

A liberal version of the "German case" is given in "Hitler and Beyond—a German Testament" (Knopf, $2.75) by the late Erich Koch-Weser, once minister of the Weimar Republic and chairman of the German Democratic Party, who died last year in his Brazilian exile. Since Badoglios and even Dönitzes were used for the sake of order and expediency, more leniency is required in the judgment of the men of Weimar, who for the same reasons compromised with the Kaiser's generals and unwittingly opened the road for Hindenburg and Hitler. But Koch-Weser goes too far in the defense of his colleagues, especially in his explanations of the Ruhr war and the Weimar reparations policy. Worth reading, however, are the chapters which deal with the question why there was "so little resistance" against Hitler inside Germany: The Opponents of National Socialism, and Foreign Policy. Besides the usual explanations for the success of Hitlerism one finds in Koch-Weser's testament a few remarks in which this good old liberal pointed to the other side of "progress." "A hundred years ago," he wrote, "simple people, peasants and craftsmen, formed their own conception of the world, even though it was a narrow one. . . . Formerly the people knew a great deal or everything about a few things; today they know a little or nothing about all things. . . . Everyone, indeed, still thinks that he has an opinion of his own, but it is an opinion derived from reading, from hearing others speak, from having it drilled into him."

JOSEPH BORNSTEIN

WARNER BROS.' MAGNIFICENT
RHAPSODY IN BLUE
IT'S GEORGE GERSHWIN'S JUBILANT STORY!
NOW HOLLYWOOD THEATRE

ROBERT CUMMINGS • LISBETH SCOTT • DON DeFORE
In HAL WALLIS' Production
"YOU CAME ALONG"
A PARAMOUNT PICTURE
•
IN PERSON
STAN KENTON and His Orchestra
—Also—
DICK & GENE WESSON
EXTRA RETURN ENGAGEMENT
LOUIS JORDAN & His Famous Tympany Five
COOL PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

Get ready to see . . .

How Wonderful a Motion Picture Version of a Great Stage Play Can Be!

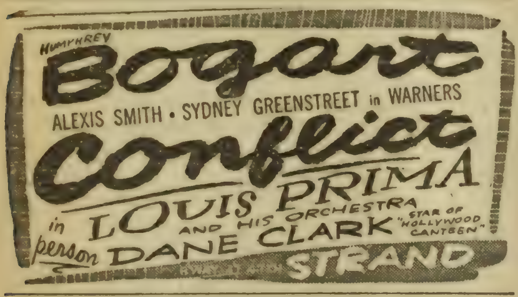
It's got us all using such expressions as "Natch," "TerRIF" and "SenSASH!" We've even found out that a woman can still be dangerous even if she is old—21! We've just seen a preview of

"JUNIOR MISS"

You'll cheer! As Peggy Ann Garner, who stole your heart as "Francie" in "A Tree Grows in Brooklyn," emerges as one of the greatest stars of our time. • • • Words alone can't describe how joyously it has been adapted and directed by George Seaton and how magnificently it has been produced by William Perlberg. • • •

IT'S SUPER ENTERTAINMENT—BUT DIF!
Proudly presented by 20th Century-Fox!

RIVOLI



HUMPHREY
Bogart
ALEXIS SMITH • SYDNEY GREENSTREET in WARNERS Conflict
in person
LOUIS PRIMA AND HIS ORCHESTRA
DANE CLARK STAR OF "HOLLYWOOD CANTEEN"
STRAND

MICHAEL TODD Presents
UP IN CENTRAL PARK
Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS — Lyrics by DOROTHY FIELDS — Music by SIGMUND ROMBERG
BROADWAY THEATRE, Broadway & 53rd Street. Matinees Wed. & Sat.
REALLY AIR-CONDITIONED

"A commanding screen biography." . . Crowther, Times.

DARRYL F. ZANUCK'S
WILSON
In Technicolor

Directed by HENRY KING — Written for the Screen by LAMAR TROTTI

A 20th Century-Fox Picture

With Alexander Knox . . Charles Coburn . . Geraldine Fitzgerald . . Thomas Mitchell . . Ruth Nelson . . Sir Cedric Hardwicke . . Vincent Price . . William Eythe . . Mary Anderson . . and a huge cast of 12,000.

Opening July 25th

Popular Prices ROXY 7th Ave. at 50th Street

NOW RKO

BROOKLYN & QUEENS
ALDEN Jamaica
BUSHWICK
DYKER
Keith's FLUSHING
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
Keith's RICHMOND HILL
STRAND Far Rockaway
TILYOU

"Very Touching . . . Sentimentally Moving"
—N. Y. Post.

Dorothy McGUIRE
Robert YOUNG
Herbert MARSHALL

THE ENCHANTED COTTAGE

Based on the play by SIR ARTHUR WING PINERO
— Plus —
"Brighton Strangler" JOHN LODER JUNE DUPREZ

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street
New York 7, N. Y.

Dear Sirs:

I want to subscribe to The Nation, or the following Nation magazine combinations as listed below:

....

....

....

☐ Remittance enclosed ☐ Bill me

NAME.................................

STREET.................................

CITY.................. ZONE...... STATE..........
7-21-45

Money-Saving Magazine Combinations
●

THE Nation
with Harpers Magazine You save $2.50	$6.50
with Consumers Union You save $1.50	$7.00
with HARPERS & Consumers Union You save $3.50	$9.00
with Free World You save $1.50	$7.50
with Saturday Review You save $1.50	$8.50

All club combinations listed are for one year, and may be mailed to different individuals and addresses. Canadian and foreign postage extra.

THE NATION BY ITSELF
1 Year $5 2 Years $8 3 Years $11
Servicemen's Rate: $3 a Year
Canadian and Foreign Postage, $1 a Year Extra

Films

JAMES AGEE

SOME of the following movies, which were released during my vacation, should be reviewed in detail. But in order to catch up on them at all, I can provide only a check-list.

"We Accuse," the most powerful and important of them, is the Russian record of war-criminal trials at Kharkov. Its atrocity pictures and the pictures of Russian civilians in the courtroom are convincing and moving enough practically to annihilate any doubts you may have whether the trials were in fact just. The confessions of the accused Germans, on the other hand, seem impossible either to accept or to reject.

"Rhapsody in Blue," a biography of Gershwin, is not by a good deal the picture that might have been made about the man, his music, and the time and place they functioned in. But it is too sympathetic to deserve its generally chilly reception. Robert Alda lacks the obsessiveness, the elegance, and the power to persuade you that he is a man of great ability which would have made him fully adequate as Gershwin; but I think he is nearly as good a Gershwin as Alexander Knox was a Wilson, and any amount better cast than there was any law-of-averages reason to hope for. The invented romances and the elementary dramatization of conflict between highbrow and popular music are misguided, but sincerely, not shamefully, so. There is a great deal of good music. I wish all of it had been used as well as "Bidin' My Time," which turns up casually, late in a crowded party; and that they had given more than a snatch of that fine song.

"The Way Ahead," Carol Reed's most ambitious movie, is the story of the education of eight English infantrymen, from conscription to combat. It is not likely to be very popular with those who think that the English language is spoken correctly only in the several thousand dialects used between Portland Headlight and Point Sur. But it is filled with good characterization, taste, perception, and performance. It is also, for all that, formulatic and conventional rather than very strongly imaginative.

"A Bell for Adano," I gather, is generally held to be weak in comparison with the book and the play, which I don't know. Of itself I thought it very sincere and kindly, especially in John Hodiak's performance as Joppolo, well photographed and staged in several of its street scenes, unintentionally patronizing in its general portrayal of the Sicilians, and as a whole rather insipid, more like a valentine of good-will than like the living thing.

"Blood on the Sun," and practically everywhere else, tells of James Cagney's dangerously hampered efforts to get the Tanaka Plan out of Japan in time—during Hoover's administration—to warn his countrymen. Except for Cagney's vivid performance little in the film transcends likable athletic melodrama—or tries to; and little falls short of that.

"Murder, He Says," in which Fred MacMurray, a straying investigator for the Trotter Poll, runs foul of Marjorie Main and several other lethal mountaineers, is a broad and possibly terrible farce which I very much enjoyed.

"Pillow to Post," in which, for reasons not worth mentioning, Ida Lupino pretends to be married to an army lieutenant, is a broad and certainly terrible farce which I hardly enjoyed at all.

"Christmas in Connecticut," in which, for reasons still less worth mentioning, Barbara Stanwyck pretends she is married to Reginald Gardiner, is a broad and inconceivably terrible farce. To enjoy almost any moment of it, you have to accept the premise that it is the most natural, charming, and funny thing in the world for people to treat each other abominably.

The short, unbeatably fine war film "San Pietro" became available to theaters several weeks ago, at the time it was reviewed here. I have just learned that it can be seen in New York, for the first time, during the two weeks following July 11, at the 55th Street Playhouse. It will presumably be shown elsewhere if enough people request it of their exhibitors. Otherwise it is not likely to be shown at all.

Records

B. H. HAGGIN

COLUMBIA also has issued a volume of excerpts from Mussorgsky's "Boris Godunov" (Set 563; $5.50) recorded by Pinza with the Metropolitan Opera chorus and an orchestra, presumably the Metropolitan's, under the direction of Emil Cooper. The music is again the Rimsky-Korsakov falsification; and the excerpts are for the most part the same as the ones in the Victor volume: the Coronation Scene (two sides), Boris's I Have Attained the Highest Power (one side), his Ah, I Am Suffocating (one side), and the Death of Boris (two sides). But Columbia, giving two sides instead of Victor's one to the opening scene, has recorded the scene complete except for Tchelkalov's address; and instead of Varlaam's In the Town of Kazan and the Boris-Shuisky dialogue Columbia has recorded Pimen's last narrative (one side and the Polonaise (one side).

The one point of superiority of the Columbia volume is Pinza's singing, which has a variety of dynamics and inflection and a dramatic incisiveness that are lacking in the flood of sonorous, opulent sound produced by Kipnis. Apart from this, if the music often drags in the Victor volume it is often rushed in the Columbia; the choral singing in the Columbia volume hasn't the beautiful tone and sensitive phrasing that are to be heard in the Victor; and the Columbia performances are in Italian whereas the Victor are in Russian. As for recording, Columbia has done an excellent job with Pinza's singing, but has not achieved the superb balance and integration of voice and orchestra that Victor did: in I Have Attained the Highest Power the orchestra that is clearly audible all around Kipnis is almost inaudible behind Pinza. Moreover the sound of the orchestra itself, in the Columbia volume, is extremely weak in bass, and without the body, the spaciousness, the richness that it has in the Victor volume; and the chorus is shrieky. And finally Columbia doesn't provide the English translations of the texts of the excerpts that Victor does.

Also on Columbia's July list is a new recording of Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fêtes" made by Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra (Set X-247; $2.50). With his exaggerated expansions and contractions of sonority and his accelerations and retardations of pace in "Nuages" Ormandy makes impassioned and personal a piece which is intended to be completely impersonal and unimpassioned, concerned as it is with "the immutable aspect of the sky and the slow, solemn motion of the clouds." "Fêtes" is well performed, except that the retardation of the section near the end marked un peu retenu is not little but enormous. The recorded sound of the clarinets at the beginning of "Nuages" is dulled, veiled, wooden, as is much of the sound thereafter on the first side; the second side brings a sudden increase in volume and a brightness of an unpleasantly acidulous kind;

RESORTS

Something NEW in a Summer Resort!
BILL'S VEGETARIAN HOUSE
WITH LATEST MODERN CONVENIENCES
where Nature's Food is Served to you according to the latest Nutritional Ideas in a Variety of Tasty Succulent, Nourishing Dishes, Salads and Beverages.
In the Cool Catskills, 2,300 feet above sea-level set in a panorama of woods and mountains.
Only $35 Per week and up
Write for Reservations to
BILL'S VEGETARIAN HOUSE
P. O. BOX 72 PARKSVILLE, N. Y.
PHONE, LIBERTY 104 F 2
J. FLAMENBAUM, Prop.

50 MI. FROM NEW YORK
MAMANASCO Lake Lodge
Ridgefield, Conn. Phone 820
A resort of distinction fashioned from a country estate. Water sports, biking trails, tennis. Library, open fireplaces. Congenial atmosphere. Famous cuisine.

Birdland CENTRAL VALLEY, N. Y.
200-ACRE ESTATE 1,000-FT. ELEVATION
Congenial adult resort. All sports. Golf, fine food. Only 45 miles from N. Y.
Highland Mills 7895. DIANA & ABE BERMAN

HATHAWAY LODGE
Formerly the palatial 592 acre Macy estate in the beautiful "Hills of the Sky." Large, luxurious rooms, most of which have open fireplaces and private porches. Tennis, Handball, Swimming Pool, Horseback Riding, also Golf nearby. Marvelous food. Open all year. Attractive Summer Rates.
For reservations or further information write or call
HATHAWAY LODGE, Haines Falls, N. Y.
Telephone: Tannersville 299

CAMP ANNISQUAM
Gloucester, Mass.
ABRAM RESNICK
Director
This Adult Camp...
in sheltered cove near picturesque Gloucester. Salt water swimming, sailing, boating and fishing on premises. Dancing, tennis, trips and all sports. Six hours by train from New York.
Write for booklet and rates

OAKDALE LODGE
OAKDALE, CONN.
AN ADULT CAMP
All Sports—Swimming—Private Twin Lakes.
Modern Accommodations.
RATES $42.50 UP
Write for Booklet. Rose & Ike Lifschutz

WESTERN VIEW FARM
26th Season
Rate: $9 a day — $49 a week
TED OHMER
New Milford Connecticut
Telephone: NEW MILFORD 440

FARMS AND ACREAGE

STONE HOUSE; best modern improvements; brooks; springs; cave; view; good barns; 180 acres; pine and hardwood. In N. Y., 8 miles Lenox; $12,500. Terms. Berkshire Farm Agency, Chatham, N. Y.

and at the end the effect of the pp tremolo of the basses and ppp roll of the kettledrum is destroyed by the muddy uproar those instruments make on the record. "Fêtes" is well recorded, except for a brashness in its brilliance, and the shattered and shattering sound of the two trumpets at the beginning.

Then there is Tchaikovsky's charming Suite No. 4, "Mozartiana"—his orchestration of three Mozart pieces for piano and a Liszt piano transcription of a Mozart motet—performed by Rodzinski with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony (Set X-248; $2.50). Whether Rodzinski made his cuts in the concert performance or only for this recording, they reveal the musical insensitiveness that has been evident in his performances. The concluding movement is a theme and variations, of which the first seven variations complete themselves with full stops, but the eighth continues and builds up to a sustained major chord on D, which prepares us for the entrance of the solo violin in a little cadenza that introduces Variation 9. Rodzinski completes Variation 5; and the next thing we hear is that chord on D, stated as a beginning of what follows, but actually conveying its relation back to the context—the eighth variation—that has been omitted. And in Variation 10, which develops into the long coda of the movement, he again makes cuts which inflict similar wounds on the continuous tissue. The music is treated with the same insensitiveness by a performance which is tense and violent, and which is faithfully reproduced by the recording.

RESORTS

INVITATION TO RELAX
Enjoy the serenity of Plum Point. Gorgeous countryside, outdoor activities, delicious food — and fun.
Only 55 miles from New York
MAKE RESERVATIONS EARLY
PLUM POINT
"Year-Round Vacation Resort"
New Windsor, N.Y. Tel: Newburgh 4270

Tall Pines High in the Dutchess County hills. 100 acres of beautiful rolling country . . . land and water sports . . . a design for leisure. N. Y. Central or Hudson River Day Line to Poughkeepsie.
ATTRACTIVE RATES
PLEASANT VALLEY, DUTCHESS CO., N. Y.
Phones: 2741 or 5511

SHADYBROOK
MAHOPAC, N. Y. Tel. Mahopac 2326
50 miles from N. Y. 140 acres rustic country, secluded, restful, homelike. Unexcelled American cuisine. Sports, Movies. Beautiful walks. $45.
Mrs. G. Popper

ART EXHIBIT

SCULPTURE by Nicholas Mocharnuik. Marquie Gallery, 16 West 57th Street, New York City.

TYPING WANTED

EXPERT TYPING, manuscripts, miscellaneous, intelligently done at home. No addressing of envelopes. Reasonable rates. Box 1540 c/o The Nation.

Classified Advertisements
62 cents a line (six words)
Minimum — three lines
$6.16 per inch
THE NATION
20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y
BArclay 7-1066

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS
THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

And finally a volume of music by Villa-Lobos sung by Jennie Tourel with an orchestra conducted by the composer (Set X-249; $2.50). The pieces are five of the twelve "Seréstas" or Brazilian Serenades composed in 1925-26, and one of the six "Miniaturas" composed in 1916-17; and they are simpler and more agreeable, but no more valuable, than the more recent output of the Shostakovitch of Brazil. Miss Tourel sings them beautifully; and the recorded sound, though not entirely clean, is good enough.

CONTRIBUTORS

J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO, editor of The Nation's Political War section, was Foreign Minister in the last legally elected government of Spain.

JOHN CORSON is director of research for the Washington Post.

GAETANO SALVEMINI was professor of modern history at the University of Florence until 1925, when he was arrested as an opponent of fascism. He is now Lauro de Basis lecturer on the history of Italian civilization at Harvard University.

RAY RUNNION, a reporter for the Chicago Sun, is making a special study of the city's housing and transportation problems.

McALISTER COLEMAN is a journalist with long experience in leftist politics. He is the author of "Men and Coal," a study of the American miner.

JOSEPH BORNSTEIN was for many years managing editor of the Tagebuch in Berlin and later became editor-in-chief of the Pariser-Tageblatt.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 161 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JULY 28, 1945 NUMBER 4

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 69

EDITORIALS

Bretton Woods Wins 72
MacArthur's Private Preserve by Freda Kirchwey 73

ARTICLES

What's Left of the Jews by Meyer Levin 74
25 Years Ago in The Nation 76
A.M.G.—The Soviet Way by Joachim Joesten 77
Failure Again in India by Uma Shankar 79
America's Post-War Trade—I by Robert Chandler 81
In the Wind 83

POLITICAL WAR

What Price Independence? by E. H. Jacoby 84
The End of Hukbalahap by Captain X 85

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Our Culture and its Critics by Eric Russell Bentley 87
Briefer Comment 89
Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling 90
Music by B. H. Haggin 94

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 95

CROSSWORD PUZZLE NO. 122 by Jack Barrett 96

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor J. KING GORDON
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]
Editor Political War Section J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO
Assistant Editor J. MITCHELL MORSE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON
Director of Nation Associates LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS
CAREY MCWILLIAMS REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1945, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

THERE IS A STRONG CONTRAST BETWEEN THE massive and relentless military offensive against the Japanese and the note of hesitancy, almost of appeasement, which has crept into our political warfare. The Allied fleets patrol Japanese shores, striking at will; American fliers monopolize Japanese air, continuing their systematic obliteration of war potential. Enemy radio stations suggest that war-weariness is growing. There are indications of ecoenmic disruption and civil unrest. Yet the Japanese government can hardly fail to extract some hope from such American broadcasts as that delivered on July 20 by Captain E. M. Zacharias, Navy expert on Japan. Speaking officially for the United States government, he told the Japanese that they faced two alternatives: "One is the virtual destruction of Japan, followed by a dictated peace. The other is unconditional surrender with its attendant benefits as laid down by the Atlantic Charter." This is very curious phraseology. It suggests an unconditional surrender which will, in fact, be conditional, since it does not involve a "dictated peace"; it also implies more favorable treatment than that obtained by Germany, which was specifically excluded from any rights under the Atlantic Charter. Again, Captain Zacharias declared: "If Japan should initiate the cessation of hostilities without further delay, it may be assumed that it will be the United States which will enforce the formula and insure the peace." This appears to be a warning to Japan to get out of the war before Russia gets in and claims a share in the post-war settlement. But the Japanese may take it as hint that the United States is scarcely less anxious for Soviet participation than they are, and it will thus serve to strengthen their belief that a way out may be found by playing America against Russia. At any rate, ambiguities in our recent policy statements have led them to rejoice in "an American about-face."

*

THE LEGEND OF GENERAL CLAIRE L. CHENNAULT will go down with that of T. E. Lawrence in the romantic military records of our time. Eight years ago he organized the American Volunteer Group—the Flying Tigers—to assist the Chinese armies which were being battered back mile by mile into the interior. He had declared a personal war against Japan when the majority of his fellow citizens were content with a wistful and impotent sympathy for the "gallant Chinese," and other Americans of a more practical bent were cashing in on oil, scrap-iron, and other metal shipments to Japan. In the jargon of high Washington circles, Chennault and his fighters were just "premature anti-Japanese." What they achieved was little short of miraculous. With their group of P-40's they were constantly harassing the Japanese supply columns and shipping, raiding airfields, and intercepting Japanese fighters and bombers on their way to Chinese targets. After Pearl Harbor Chennault was given official status with the American army and took command of the 14th Air Force. During the disastrous retreats of 1941 and 1942, when the whole of south-east Asia was overrun by the Japanese, Chennault held on to his base at Kunming and intensified his operations. Since then his has been the directing mind in building up the American Air Force in China.

*

WHY THEN WAS GENERAL CHENNAULT DROPPED at the moment when American and Allied might is massing for the knockout blow? The answer seems to be partly personal, partly military, partly political. Chennault, like so many independent military geniuses, is apparently not a man who cooperates well in a complicated military organization. He did not get on with Stilwell, he did not get on with Stratemeyer, who was appointed head of the American Air Forces in China. He was quite firm in his insistence that America's contribution to China should be concentrated on air support and military supplies for the Chinese army. In this he echoed a recent statement of Generalissimo Chiang, to whom he has been personally devoted. It is now quite clear that a mass landing on the China coast is contemplated, and Stilwell's name—probably as legendary in China as Chennault's—is talked of in connection with the top field command. From the point of view of American participation it will be Stilwell's war—not Chennault's. Lastly, there is the political side. Chennault is a Chiang man. The pressure within China and in this country against the reactionary, and militarily inefficient, clique around the Generalissimo has reached its highest point. Just last week the Chinese People's Political Council, which lauded Chennault for his "magnificent contribution" to China, insisted that the November 12 constitutional assembly be delayed and that immediate steps be taken to bring about unity with the Communist-controlled areas. The imminent possibility of Russia's entering the eastern war brings political and military considerations into close juxtaposition. The Chennault phase of our war effort in China has ended: a new phase is about to begin.

*

KING LEOPOLD OF BELGIUM, AFTER WEEKS OF vacillation about complying with demands for his abdication, has decided not to decide. He proposes to retain his throne but to stay in exile until after an election or referendum has provided an opportunity for an expression of the national will. In a letter to his brother, Prince Regent Charles, he asserts that the present Parliament, elected before the war, is unrepresentative. He has, he says, received information showing that "a considerable majority in the country insisted on my return." However, although the King's chief support is within the Catholic Party, the largest of the Parliamentary groups, a motion in the Chamber of Deputies to bar his return to Belgium until both houses of Parliament gave their consent, was carried by 98 to 6. Even the conservative Senate endorsed the proposal by 77 to 58. This means that Leopold has by no means all the Catholics with him. Nor has any evidence been presented suggesting that the Parliamentary verdict is contrary to popular sentiment; in fact, there is every indication that a general election would show a farther swing to the left and would probably strengthen the groups which are not only anti-Leopold but anti-monarchist. At present, public hostility appears to be focused on the King personally, because of the dictatorial tendencies he showed before the war and the defeatist attitude he took after the Nazi invasion. The government proposes that he should abdicate in favor of his eldest son, Prince Baudoin, with Prince Charles continuing as Regent until the boy reaches his eighteenth birthday in 1948. However, Leopold's decision to force a political campaign on the constitutional issue may raise the whole question of the monarchy's future. By his stubborn resistance to demands for his abdication, Leopold may be risking his dynasty.

*

THE EFFORT TO UNIFY SPANISH REPUBLICAN forces has achieved its first major success. At an extraordinary assembly, two factions of the Left Republicana, a predominantly bourgeois-intellectual party founded by the late President Azana, decided to merge and to "support the constitutional institutions of the Republic." The two groups are Union Republicana Española, until now led by Antonio Velao, Minister of Public Works in the Negrín Cabinet, and the so-called Independents. Both have come under the chairmanship of Mariano Ruiz Funes, last Republican ambassador in Brussels and an eminent professor of penal law. The resolution, adopted unanimously, declared that "they do not consider themselves as represented in the Junta de Liberation and cannot accept the position that the legitimacy and legality of the Spanish Republic can be transferred to entities created in exile by factions in disregard of the people's will." The resolution amounts to an open repudiation of Prieto's junta and support of the Negrín government. Over the week-end Negrín conferred with Martinez Barrio and other leaders and denounced the latest changes in the Franco Cabinet as "a sign of the utter decomposition of the Spanish fascist regime which is trying a new disguise every month to prolong the agony." One has only to look at the background of the new ministers, men of distinctly clerical standing, to see that Franco's latest moves are designed to insure the continued support of the Vatican.

*

A LOOPHOLE IN THE TAX LAWS WHICH HAS enabled aliens living in this country but legally "non-residents" to avoid taxes on capital gains has been disturbing the Treasury for some time. According to an act passed in 1936, alien visitors were exempt from income tax so long as they did not engage in business—and the buying and selling of securities is not regarded as a business. The intention appears to have been to avoid double taxation and to encourage such visitors to deal on American stock exchanges, and pay transfer taxes, rather than cable orders to their home countries, most of which, in peace time, maintained an active market in American securities. The situation which arose during the war when hundreds of thousands of refugees came to this country on visitors' visas was never contemplated. Since these people could not return home their visas were extended again and again. A comparatively small number, with access to funds, have allayed the tedium of exile by playing the market, with conspicuous success. And as non-residents de jure they have not been subject to the tax on capital gains levied on citizens—25 per cent when securities have been held over six months and up to 94 per cent, according to the tax bracket, on short-term gains. It is all perfectly legal except in cases—perhaps numerous—where such non-residents have acted as fronts for citizens who have staked them on a profit-sharing basis. But like other forms of legal tax evasion, which keep so many corporation lawyers lucratively employed, it doesn't smell good, and we favor the principle of the bill introduced by Representative James P. Geelan, which proposes to end this privilege of non-residents and make their tax liability retroactive to 1940. At the same time, however, we would point out that only a small fraction of well-heeled foreigners have indulged in profiteering of this kind. Most refugees have arrived here penniless, have set about becoming citizens as rapidly as possible, and have paid taxes on their earnings cheerfully. Their position should not be prejudiced by the greedy few.

*

FILIPINO BAITING IN CALIFORNIA HAS STARTED again, now that final victory in the Pacific seems assured. It was different when Manila fell and Bataan knew its hour of grandeur and agony. Then Filipinos in California enjoyed a novel status—that of friends and allies. They were photographed at flag-presentation ceremonies on the steps of city halls; they spoke from the rostrums of city councils; they were seated at the speakers' tables at non-Filipino banquets. This attitude lasted well into 1944. But now fair weather has diminished West Coast ardor for these late-found friends. Recently California legislators listened attentively while General Carlos Romulo spoke of the dead Americans and Filipinos whose dust could never be separated—and then proceeded to ignore requests that a memorial be sent to Congress urging enactment of legislation making resident Filipinos eligible for naturalization. And still more recently a brief strike of Filipino field hands in the Santa Maria valley provoked an advertisement in the local newspaper warning the Filipinos that the war-time honeymoon was over. The advertisement, which was sponsored by the powerful Economic Council of Santa Maria, said: "At best, Filipinos are guests in the United States. . . . While Americans are dying to free their countrymen from Japanese slavery, the lavish expenditures of money by Filipinos on white women instead of assisting their countrymen is not promoting good-will among Americans. . . . Filipinos want America to build up their homeland and protect them, while their people conduct themselves as strikers are doing in Santa Maria Valley. . . . If the Filipinos act as they have recently, they should be classified with the Japanese; denied renting of land and such, as the Japanese were who also did not act properly as guests in America."

*

THE AMERICAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION GALLOPS forward with the terrifying speed of a snail. Ten years ago at its Atlantic City convention it took a firm stand against compulsory health insurance but approved of voluntary budgeting for medical care. This year at its annual convention in Chicago it roundly condemned compulsory health insurance, specifically in the form of the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill, as "regimentation and totalitarianism" (some doctor has been reading Hayek) but supported increased "hospitalization insurance on a voluntary basis." However, the A. M. A. favored "sustained production leading to better living conditions with improved housing, nutrition, and sanitation, which are fundamental to good health." The doctors agreed to "support progressive action toward achieving these objectives." These are pretty dangerous thoughts, gentlemen. Some of these days one of your members may let slip the blasphemous phrase "social planning," and then the Trojan horse will be inside your impregnable citadel of free enterprise.

*

IN THE SESSION RECENTLY ENDED, CALIFORNIA'S legislature put on a performance that reads like the plot of a Grade B movie, without the happy ending. Governor Warren and the C. I. O. sponsored bills, which differed only in minor details, for compulsory health insurance to be paid for by a 1½ per cent payroll deduction and an equal contribution by employers. The bills were supported by the State Federation of Labor, the California League of Women Voters, and the Parent-Teacher Associations. They were opposed by the California Medical Association, the private hospitals, the insurance companies, the Los Angeles Merchants and Manufacturers Association, and similar disinterested parties. Members of the legislature allowed themselves to be wined and dined by such groups, lending their uncritical ears to a stream of propaganda as corny as it was irrelevant. "Foreign ideologies," "regimentation," "bureaucrats," "sovietization"—the bills were discussed in such terms almost exclusively. Governor Warren pointed out that 38 per cent of all Californians examined at selective service induction centers were rejected, and estimated on this basis that 1,500,000 citizens of the state are immediately in need of medical service but cannot afford it; also that wage and salary earners in California last year borrowed $11,000,000 from loan brokers, often at exorbitant interest rates, to meet medical, dental, and hospital bills. Facts availed nothing. Governor Warren, who keynoted the Republican national convention in 1944, was accused of spreading Communist doctrines. The public health committee of the Assembly issued a report condemning the bills before the hearing was held; after the hearing it refused to send them to the floor. The Governor sent a message to the Assembly in support of the legislation; under the state constitution he is required to send messages on pending bills. But when Assemblyman A. C. Wallenberg attempted to read it he was ruled out of order by Speaker Charles W. Lyon, who went further and accused the Governor of improper lobbying. In view of the open lobbying that was going on, and in view of the fact that the Assembly voted down a resolution to investigate lobbying, this accusation has a piquant psychological interest.

NEXT WEEK IN THE NATION

Harold Laski on the British vote; Charles G. Bolté on Labor, Veterans, and Jobs; J. A. Del Vayo on the coming Mexican election.

Bretton Woods Wins

DESPITE a last-ditch fight of isolationist Republicans, the Senate has followed the House in approving the Bretton Woods agreements by a decisive majority. By so doing it has repudiated Senator Taft's thesis that "the parallel between political and economic cooperation is fallacious," and has recognized that prosperity is as indivisible as peace. Simultaneously, by voting larger funds for the Export-Import Bank, Congress has provided means of aiding other countries until the Bretton Woods institutions begin operations.

Senator Taft's performance as leader of the opposition has drawn plaudits from the conservative columnists, who allege that he showed much more knowledge of the subject than those on the other side. Undeniably he had studied the Bretton Woods documents in a search for debating points, but his speeches made it very plain that he had no grasp of the fundamentals of the international monetary situation. For instance, one of the amendments he moved sought to prohibit members of the International Fund from using it to obtain the currencies of other members until they had removed all exchange restrictions on current transactions. Actually the statutes of the Fund provide for the elimination of such restrictions within five years, and one of its short-term objectives is to tide over the difficult transition period nations which have been forced to resort to controls to protect their currencies. Mr. Taft, blandly ignoring the conditions which make such restrictions necessary, proposes in effect to deny medicine to sick economies until they are cured.

It is clear, for instance, that the passage of this amendment would have excluded Britain from participation in the Fund. For Britain cannot possibly forego exchange controls for several years. It has contracted a huge foreign debt during the war, and its exports have shrunk to little more than 30 per cent of their 1938 volume. Until it has rebuilt its foreign trade and so begun to earn foreign currencies on a scale commensurate with its normal import needs, it must protect its exchange reserves. If it were to allow free dealings now, enabling anyone who tendered pounds to the Bank of England to buy dollars, or pesos, or kroner with them, the market would become glutted with sterling and its value drastically depreciated. "We emerge from the struggle," said the British Chancellor of the Exchequer recently, "with . . . a balance-of-payments problem such as we have never before had to face." The virtue of Bretton Woods is that it offers Britain and other countries in the same plight a method of solving their problems on an international instead of a national basis.

It is very much to our interest that they should be solved on such a basis, for to no country is the restoration of multilateral trading and free exchanges so important as it is to the United States. We are seeking, as Robert Chandler points out on another page, to expand our exports enormously and so take care of our surplus production. We cannot do this if the conditions obtaining before the war, when international trade was rapidly being reduced to terms of barter, are not changed. The United States, for instance, is in a poor position to make bilateral deals since it exports more than it imports. Suppose the only way we could do business with Britain was by a direct exchange of goods. In 1938 American exports to Britain were valued at $448 million; imports from Britain at $80 million. To achieve a balance, therefore, we would either have to cut down our sales to Britain drastically or accept a much larger volume of British goods, or both. In any case we would be unlikely to achieve an increase in exports.

Similarly, in the international monetary field America is in the position of a man who has won all the chips at poker. If he wants to go on playing he has got to help the other boys make their stakes; otherwise they are likely to go off and play a different game. If the rest of the world, or any important section of it, decided to carry on currency transactions in an unorthodox manner, the United States would be badly situated. As the one country in the world with its currency firmly attached to gold, it cannot easily play the game of competitive currency depreciation. If Britain cut the sterling exchange rate from $4 to $3, thus making its goods relatively cheaper in foreign markets, we could, of course, reduce the gold content of the dollar in an effort to depreciate to a similar extent. But this would not necessarily affect the sterling-dollar relationship; if the British choose to peg sterling to the dollar rather than to gold, they can fix the ratio at whatever figure is convenient to them. The only retaliatory action open to America would be to cease buying foreign gold at a fixed price. But that would mean the end of the gold standard, a collapse in the value of the metal, and the reduction of the Fort Knox hoard to comparative worthlessness.

Considering, then, that the alternatives to restoration of multilateral trade and free exchanges would be much worse for America than they would be for some other countries, it might be just as well not to talk of the American contributions to Bretton Woods as if they were charitable donations. The International Fund and the International Bank have, in fact, been tailored to American needs. They involve an investment of dollars in an opportunity to restore international trade by methods which will not interfere with America's chosen system of free enterprise and will not freeze American goods out of foreign markets.

We say an opportunity; but it is perfectly true that the opportunity can be lost unless the Bretton Woods program is supplemented by agreements which will enable the trading nations to balance their international accounts at a high level. If this is to be achieved, America must not merely call upon other nations to abandon discrimination and lower their trade barriers; it must reduce its own likewise. Eventually it must be prepared not merely to import as much as it exports but more, so as to be able to accept payments of interest and principal on the loans it makes. A country cannot be both an international creditor and a net exporter of goods unless it wants to lose its shirt and bankrupt its debtors. The opposition to Bretton Woods has constantly insinuated that no trust can be put in the pledges of other countries to make the plan operative by abandoning their exchange controls as rapidly as possible. We shall do well to remember that our good faith is also involved. Bretton Woods obligates us to put our foreign trade on a two-way basis. If we do this we shall probably find other nations willing to do their part.

MacArthur's Private Preserve

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

GENERAL MAC ARTHUR came back to the Philippines, just as he said he would. He came back and tucked the islands in his pocket. They are his private sphere of influence, and the people of the United States know less about what is going on there than they do about events in Greece or Rumania. Considerably less. Never were the Philippines more completely cut off from the world—even while they were locked in the isolation of Japanese control, even when they were blanketed under the smoke of battle. The battle is over now and the Japanese are dead except for a few who still survive in remote mountain hideouts. But MacArthur's censorship goes right on.

We have heard a great deal in recent months about the "closed" areas of Eastern Europe dominated by Russia. Truman and Churchill are said to be urging Stalin at Potsdam to permit free access to Rumania, Hungary, Bulgaria, and Yugoslavia by American and British newspapermen. It is time such a demand was made. And I hope Stalin will promptly accede to it, asking only, in exchange, that Britain permit Russian and other correspondents freely to report developments in Greece, Syria, Lebanon, Palestine, and Egypt, and that the United States invite the world press to see—and tell—what is happening in the Philippines Commonwealth. It would be a healthy change all around.

Until this agreement is reached, however, we shall have to scrabble for facts about the Philippines. Occasionally a few leak through the censorship and find their way into print. This week The Nation is able to publish two articles which give a first-hand picture of American methods of control in those islands so lately rescued from enemy domination. They will shock many readers. We are not, I think, prepared for a Greece in our own back yard. We have been told true stories about the magnificent cooperation of the Filipino guerrillas in the reconquest of the islands, and no stories at all about their rapid and ruthless liquidation. We know that a good Philippine patriot, Sergio Osmeña, succeeded Quezon as President, and we have not heard how limited are his actual powers or how careful the MacArthur control has been to protect him from his left-wing supporters by throwing them wholesale into prison. We Americans like to congratulate ourselves over our record in the Philippines. I hope a careful reading of these articles will jolt a few of us out of our complacency. We cannot afford any holier-than-thou attitudes. What the British have been doing in Greece to preserve the defenses of their empire, our military authorities are doing in the Philippines, for reasons not so very different. They are repressing or wiping out the men who formed the tough fighting corps of the liberation movement, and by doing so are shoving into the foreground the old crew of professional politicians, Franco sympathizers, and clerical fascists. Nor is the situation one to look upon with detached disapproval. It is a challenge to action. For the Philippines are not yet free. They are the direct, immediate responsibility of the United States, and what happens there depends upon the people of this country even more than upon the Filipinos.

The trouble is partly political, partly economic, and the second complicates the first. The economic situation is so desperate that Osmeña, a decent man but a weak one, is unable to make an effective stand for his moderately liberal ideas. He began by putting resistance leaders in the Cabinet and ousting the collaborationists. Little by little, as conditions grew worse, the right moved in, urging that collaborationists be forgiven and restored to office, maneuvering to get rid of the guerrilla influence. And Osmeña yielded. Perhaps he might have held out if he had been able to get any promise of substantial continuing economic support from the United States. None was available.

As everybody knows, the Philippines will automatically become "independent" on July 4, 1946, unless the date is changed. But independence will be without meaning unless the Philippines are helped, first, to rescue their towns from the devastation created by American bombs and Japanese armies in retreat, and second, to establish an economy that can ultimately survive without a protected market in America. Nothing has been done on the job of rehabilitation, although Senator Tydings recently made a special survey of the islands, reported "indescribable" conditions of suffering and physical destruction, and proposed that the United States make a gift of $100,000,000 to the Philippines to be used for reconstruction under the direction of army engineers. The army is supposed to relinquish its civil functions on September 1 but it is the only organized body which has at its disposal relief supplies, warehouses, transportation facilities. When it withdraws no civil authority stands ready to assume responsibility. The Commonwealth government has neither the material nor the political strength to take the emergency measures the situation will demand. The Rehabilitation Commission appointed a year ago by Congress, under the chairmanship of Senator Tydings, seems not to be functioning, and the other United States agencies on the islands, such as the FEA, the War Damage Corporation, and the Treasury, are helpless without some authority to coordinate their functions. Nothing will be accomplished until a High Commissioner is appointed to head up the whole job.

Even more important, if less pressing, is the need of long-range plans to carry the Philippines through the initial phases of their independence without economic collapse. Independence will mean chaos unless the islands are helped toward a diversified economy that can eventually stand on its own feet. In the eleven years since the Act of Independence was passed, nothing has been done to change the feudal plantation system which is completely dependent on the American market. On the contrary, the land-owning interests have hung on grimly, hoping that some good fate would intervene to save them from the penalties of freedom. Now that the day of independence draws near they still look for relief through a prolonged period of protected trade. And it is a fact that unless some such plan is provided, the Filipinos will starve. But it is a fact that if the present preferential arrangements are continued, the landowners will never voluntarily diversify crops, pay decent wages, or accept any other reforms to make the islands more nearly self-sufficing.

Such changes will occur only if the progressive political elements get into power. The resistance fight brought those elements together and gave them hope and a common program. The collapse of that hope under the repressive measures taken by the army has aroused dangerous resentment among the people. Only an early shift to civilian control with a liberal High Commissioner will prevent disorder and open the way to democratic solutions of the problems that harass the islands. It is time to end the MacArthur dictatorship.

What's Left of the Jews

BY MEYER LEVIN

BEFORE the war there were sixteen million Jews in the world. Little more than half are left. Nobody really believes in the annihilation of the Jews of Europe. There are certain facts so massive that the human mind for a long time rejects them, and this has happened with the story of European Jewry. The survivors themselves, after living these years within the massacre, don't believe their own knowledge of its completeness.

In a village near Weimar I met a man who had escaped from one of the last columns marched out of Buchenwald. For three hours, sitting on his pallet on a factory floor, he told me about the two years he had worked on the Auschwitz train platform, where Jews had arrived for extermination. He estimated that he had seen four million arrive; he knew that only one in ten was selected for slavery, the rest went to the gas chambers. He knew that the chosen slaves had about one chance in a thousand of living more than a year. Two years ago he had seen his own sister arrive on a death train. And yet, after speaking to me only of death—death in Auschwitz, death on the icy trains, death on the road marches, death in the work camps—this man seized my arm and said, "You go to all the concentration camps, you see all who remain alive—write down the name of my sister. Perhaps you will find her. Perhaps she has survived."

Of all the survivors I talked to, none was without a story of sisters, brothers, mother, father gone, and yet none ever said these loved ones were dead unless he had actually seen them killed. "They were taken to Drancy, and from there deported"; "I heard of him last in Warsaw, but from there he may have been deported." Always they spoke as though myriads of Jews might somewhere yet be found alive as we went farther into Germany.

Finally we had been through all Germany, and found only the remnants in the concentration camps, and the few dozens in each city, and the scattered survivors of the last trains that started from Buchenwald and Auschwitz toward the Alps and halted wherever they ran out of fuel, while the guards shot a few last Jews and seized automobiles and fled from the approaching Americans.

It has been estimated that there are a million and a quarter Jews alive in Europe outside of Russia. This estimate may not stand, for the Poles in renewed pogroms are killing off the few hundred thousand who escaped the Nazis, out of Poland's four million Jews. Moreover, twelve thousand of those found alive in Bergen Belsen died after the camp was liberated, and after six weeks were still dying at the rate of fifty a day.

A million and a quarter people form a considerable community; this is nearly twice as many Jews as there are in Palestine. How can it be said, then, that European Jewry has been wiped out?

You have to look at those who are left. I looked for Jews all through France, Belgium, Holland, Germany; I sought them in every concentration camp; I hunted survivors on the roads where they had scattered from the last death trains. I've seen what is left of them in the west, and in Prague I talked with a man who as a member of the Czech mission for displaced persons had followed the Russian armies and sought surviving Jewish communities. I pooled my information with Dr. Rosenberg's, to arrive at the total picture.

About half of the remaining Jews of Europe are in Rumania. Though the Iron Guardists and their followers were violently anti-Semitic throughout the rise of fascism, the 600,000 Jews of Rumania were never seized for slaughter; they therefore form the only intact European Jewish community outside of Russia.

Numerically, the Polish Jews come next. Dr. Rosenberg estimates that from 200,000 to 300,000 are still alive. They are scattered, starved, and in constant fear of pogroms. Poland was the ever-living well, the source of Judaism in modern times. The Jews of Poland were the real Jews; they thought of themselves only as Jews; and though they were despised and reviled, though they were hated even by sections of their own race, such as the German Jews, they were nevertheless the source of Jewish vitality. Westernized Jews detested the old-fashioned pious Poles with their long caftans and ear curls, the peddlers and beggars who were the characters of anti-Semitic cartoons. French, Belgian, and Dutch Jews charged that it was the Polish Jews, swarming westward, who were the cause of the new anti-Semitism. Well, the last ghettos have been burned. From General Bor himself I heard of the incredible fight put up by the young Jews of the Warsaw ghetto, and that the ghetto now is only a large burned area in the middle of the city. Yet there is still anti-Semitism, a new and fresh anti-Semitism, all through Europe.

After the Polish come the Hungarian Jews; they have a higher percentage of survivors since they were the last to be rounded up for elimination. Nearly 150,000 in and around Budapest were not gathered in, and the others—those who survived the Auschwitz ordeal—suffered less than a year of slavery. Wherever groups of Jewish factory slaves were found, Hungarians predominated; the Poles had had more time to die.

In two places near Leipzig I encountered groups of a thousand Hungarian girls. They were emaciated—stylishly thin, as they wryly put it—and their fingers were yellow from war chemicals, but they were still young and alive. Each had a faint hope that some member of her family had also survived; each wanted to return to Hungary long enough to find out her family's fate. But live there? No, they could not imagine going back to live among the people who had let this be done to them.

In France, of 350,000 Jews, 175,000 survived. The French people as a whole were sympathetic during the German occupation and helped Jews to hide; but now the atmosphere is different. Every Jew who returns to Paris and tries to recover his apartment, or his business, or his job has to displace a Frenchman, and though the law declares that the victims of Nazism shall have their belongings restored, each returning Jew faces a court battle, and in each case a new little circle of anti-Semites is created. Some new tenants' organizations, such as the Locataires de Bonne Foi, have urged their members to use force to prevent Jews from moving back into their apartments; even returning soldiers—propagandized in German prison camps—have demonstrated against Jewish shopkeepers. Anti-Semites say the Jews took no part in the resistance movement; but all-Jewish companies fought in the Battle of Paris, there were all-Jewish groups in the maquis, and thousands of other Jews were active in the resistance movement everywhere, though not identified as Jews.

This same bitter aftermath is found in Slovakia, where Jews fought as partisans and then returned to their villages only to find a hatred so great that, in the words of a former Jewish partisan leader, it became "impossible to live in an atmosphere so anti-Semitic."

In Belgium, where the Jewish population shrank from 90,000 to 23,000, the community leaders told me that though they were making the most energetic attempts at readjustment, the Jews were encountering an anti-Semitism that had not existed before. "What can we expect? The population was subjected to years of concentrated propaganda. Victory does not erase this." In Holland, of 140,000 Jews, some 25,000 remain. Anti-Semitism was previously unknown. But when the little Jewish community in Maastricht tried to arrange a Purim festival for American Jewish soldiers, they were advised to omit it, lest the report of the celebration add fuel to the rising feeling against Jews.

In the Duchy of Luxembourg the old and prosperous Jewish settlement has dwindled to a few hundred. Dr. Henry Cerf of the SHAEF mission told me that a number of Jews had come in from France and Belgium but had found so much hatred where there had been none before that they had despaired and wandered back westward.

Even in the concentration camps anti-Semitism was fostered to such a point that when Chaplain Eichhorn attempted to hold an open-air service for the Jews of Dachau, the newly formed self-governing committee of the camp declared that such a service would lead to disorders.

The effect of persecution has been to drive the survivors to extremes: either they have become Jews in a more positive sense than ever before, or they have decided to lose their identity as Jews. The man who is led to affirm his Jewishness is convinced that his miraculous survival is proof that he was always completely right in all his beliefs and principles: thus the orthodox Jew is more zealous than ever in his orthodoxy; the Zionist upholds more strongly his particular sectarianism, be it labor Zionism or political Zionism or cultural Zionism; and while the Communists, the Zionists, and the religious bodies in the surviving communities work together on ameliorative projects, they have little inner unity as Jews. Those who have concluded that being a Jew is not worth the price are constantly slipping away from the community. Day after day in the Journal Officiel one finds columns of notices of Cohens and Levys who have changed their names to Dumont and Bontemps.

In Italy several thousand Jews are reported to have followed a converted rabbi into the Catholic church; in France, where there has always been active proselytizing among the Jews, the movement has noticeably increased. Many Catholics made a definite effort to retain in the faith the Jewish children who had been confided to them for safekeeping. I witnessed an actual struggle betewen a priest and a rabbi for the souls of several hundred children. The priest, who alone knew where the children had been placed, maintained that he would have to secure the order of some living relative of these children before he could give them back to the Jewish community. He finally agreed that if no relatives could be found, the children would be returned.

Drawing by Giacomo Patri

It is charged that up to 3,000 children have thus been lost to Judaism in France. This is a large number when one realizes that there are exceedingly few Jewish children left in Europe. Some 6,000 children were hidden in France by various underground organizations; perhaps an equal number were hidden by their parents, in direct placement. Beyond these, scarcely more than a thousand were found in the concentration camps, mostly in the fourteen-to-eighteen-year age group, though so stunted and starved that they were six years under age. There is no Jewish generation under fourteen. These children were destroyed.

The destruction of the Jews was most complete in Germany itself. In each city I found a dozen, perhaps a hundred, survivors living in the remaining official Jewish houses, one family to a room. In Leipzig I found exactly 16 of a former 16,000. Only Jews married to non-Jews had been permitted to remain, and of these marriages only the children who professed Christianity were alive. During the last months even Jews married to Gentiles had been seized. In each city, a doctor, a lawyer, and a community head had been left. It seemed to be generally expected that a great many Jews would "come out of hiding" after the Nazi defeat. Their number is insignificant; I doubt that it totals 500 for all Germany, where some 4,000 have survived.

About 4,000 Jews were found alive in Buchenwald, 5,000 in Dachau, 12,000 in Bergen Belsen—perhaps 50,000 in all the camps. With the exception of the young Hungarians found in factory enclaves, nearly all the survivors are suffering from physical and mental exhaustion which must have a permanent effect. What shall be done with them? Some have been repatriated to France and Czechoslovakia, but the Poles protest bitterly against being sent "home." What do the Jews in the camps ask for themselves?

A small percentage know they want to go to Palestine, and they are the luckiest, for they have a specific objective and a will to live. The one cheerful hour in all my time among Jews was spent in a barracks in Bergen Belsen, where a dozen youngsters sang Hebrew songs, of Palestine. The mass of survivors have no clear hope for the future. "We are too weak, too tired; we can endure no more struggle in our lives," they say. "We need only some place where we can live out our years." A large proportion have relatives outside Europe with whom they hope to get in touch, but few have exact addresses. Contacts will be difficult to make, and then the cry will be raised against Jewish immigration, as though these few thousands were hordes of undesirables. For most of the survivors the obvious solution is Palestine; yet there are already complaints that the sickly products of the concentration camps are unfit material for the upbuilding of that land. And of course there will be a campaign against a "flood of Jews" directed toward Palestine, and there will be Zionists making calculations about how many millions Palestine can absorb. It will be forgotten that there are no millions to come. If Palestine cannot give immediate refuge to the few thousand survivors of the concentration camps, that is indeed the last miserably ironic comment on what world politics has done to the Zionist ideal.

Outside the camps, and outside Rumania, some half-million scattered Jews will make an effort to adjust and resettle in their previous lands; most of them can perhaps still find a way to live as Jews in France, Belgium, and Holland, though in the coming years they may seek either to assimilate or to emigrate.

With the well of Europe so dry, the threat of Jewish "domination" in Palestine is deflated. The millions who might have pressed in from Poland are dead. The Jews of Russia and the United States are not likely to emigrate to Eretz Israel. When all the scattered refugees in the Russian area and in ours are registered, it may turn out that there are some hundreds of thousands for whom Palestine should offer a solution. Still, the ever-renewing sources of Jewish population are gone. The continuing stream of emigration must run dry. It looks as if the Jewish population of Palestine must level off and depend chiefly on its birth rate for increase. In this, it is always behind the Arabs. Thus there is no real population threat to the Arabs of Palestine. This knowledge should dampen the growing conflict there.

The heart of Jewish culture, it seems to me, is now definitely in Palestine; the greatest population is in the United States. Jewish casualties in the war—not in proportion but in actual numbers—are as large as those of the great nations. Seven million Jews were slaughtered for being Jews, and added to this number are the Jewish casualties in all the Allied armies.

It is common knowledge that anti-Semitism is rising in this country. In a large sense, the fate of the Jewish people will be decided here.

25 Years Ago in "The Nation"

BRYAN WILL AND WILL NOT win his fight for prohibition; Mr. Wilson will dominate the convention, he will not dominate it; he will dictate the platform and not the nomination; he will dictate the nomination and not the platform; he and Mr. McAdoo will and will not accept the nomination—with these delightfully positive assurances from San Francisco and dozens of others the American people are being regaled as we go to press.—July 3, 1920.

EXCEPT FOR the authorization of a war with the Turkish Nationalists, the conference of the Allied Premiers at Boulogne appears to have accomplished little that is definitive.—July 3, 1920.

THE COLLAPSE of Herbert Hoover as the embodiment of the hopes and aspirations of numberless Americans disgusted with the political game as played by the major parties is pathetic. To a great section of the more liberal electorate, especially to the newly-enfranchised women, Hoover appeared the man of the hour. . . . That he threw away his opportunity [by indorsing the Republican platform as "constructive and progressive"] can only in a slight degree be laid to political ineptitude.—July 3, 1920.

PRECISELY as the Republican convention turned at the end to the weakest candidate [Harding], so has the Democratic [Cox]. . . . Any hope of a stimulating campaign pregnant with great issues vigorously presented, or with a program of genuine social and economic reform, vanishes into thin air. . . . Between the twin evils of the fruits of the Republican and Democratic conventions The Nation declines to choose. —July 10, 1920.

THE DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION did well to nominate Franklin D. Roosevelt, former Assistant Secretary of the Navy, for the Vice-Presidency, for a finer type is not to be found in our public life.—July 17, 1920.

COLONEL HOUSE believes that if Poland succumbs to Russian invasion Germany too will turn Bolshevist. He thinks that the Germans would hail the Russians as liberators. It is doubtless true that the dictated peace terms have driven many conservative Germans in their despair and bitterness to such a pass; it is also true that large masses of radical German workingmen are heart and soul Bolsheviki. But the present German government is of a different cast; it is dominated by men of the Stinnes type—millionaire captains of industry who believe that they can and will restore the old industrial Germany.—July 31, 1920.

BOOKS OF THE MONTH: Count Bernstorff, "My Three Years in America"; Upton Sinclair, "The Brass Check: A Study of American Journalism."

A.M.G.—the Soviet Way

BY JOACHIM JOESTEN

THE almost total blackout of news in the Soviet-occupied portions of Germany is slowly being lifted. With the influx of Allied correspondents into Berlin, the recent revival of political life in the shattered German capital, and a slight relaxation of Russian secrecy, the picture is coming into focus. News from the vast hinterland—and that includes practically all of the former Third Reich between the Bay of Mecklenburg and the Sudeten—continues scant, but occasionally a significant bit of information comes through, by way, perhaps, of an article in a Soviet newspaper, a controlled German broadcast, a story published in Sweden or Switzerland. These are not wholly reliable sources, but added together the items enable us to hazard at least a preliminary answer to the questions: What are the Russians doing in Germany? How does their Military Government compare with ours?

In purpose the programs of the four Allied forces of occupation in Germany differ very little. They all are determined to eradicate Nazism, Junker rule, and militarism. They all hope eventually to bring the Germans back into the international fold on a basis of peace, cooperation, and democracy. The methods by which these lofty ideals are to be put in practice are less uniform. There are minor divergences in the British and American ways of handling a given situation; the French, in some respects, are going their own way; but the schism between the eastern and western conceptions of Military Government is profound. Roughly speaking, one might say that the Russians intend to reform Germany by working with the people; we, by working without, or even against, the people. As regards Nazism, the Russians rub it out; we "rub it in."

Soviet policy toward a defeated Germany has not always been as clear as it is today. For several years the Kremlin seemed to pursue a wavering course, apparently agreeing one moment with Ilya Ehrenburg and the next with the "Free Germany Committee" in Moscow. Ehrenburg, by international standards the greatest publicist ever produced by the Soviet regime, stands for an extreme policy of hatred and revenge. His views on the Germans and what to do with them can be summed up in William L. Shirer's "They're all guilty—punish them." The Free Germany Committee, however—that peculiar combination of orthodox German Marxists and Junker generals which proved so effective an instrument of psychological warfare against Hitler—assured their Gestapo-ridden countrymen by broadcasts and leaflets that they need only overthrow the Nazi regime to receive Russia's outstretched hand of friendship.

For years the two conflicting lines of propaganda found expression in the Soviet press and radio. Then, a few weeks before the German surrender, a remarkable thing happened. In an article published in Pravda on April 14, Ehrenburg's extreme views on the Germans were publicly slapped down by the Soviet Propaganda Chief, G. Alexandrov, in a manner which, a few years ago, would probably have meant arrest and deportation, if not worse, for their author. Ehrenburg's defeat, however, did not mean complete triumph for the "Free Germans." Not much has been heard from them since the armistice. Contrary to apprehensions which early this year were widespread in this country, no share in the administration of Germany has been given to the repentant Junker generals, von Paulus, von Seydlitz, and company. Of the original civilian members of the committee only two have thus far been given executive positions of importance: Erwin Hörnle, a former Communist Reichstag deputy from Stuttgart, has been appointed vice-president of the Brandenburg provincial administration; and Hans Mahle, Communist Youth leader from Hamburg, is now in charge of the radio department of the Berlin City Council.

With commendable political acumen, the Russians have made a point of installing in office some of the courageous Germans who were actively involved in the plot against the Nazi regime that aborted on July 20, 1944. Andreas Hermes, one of the few surviving ringleaders of that conspiracy, is the new deputy mayor of Berlin; Jacob Kaiser, a political associate of Hermes, figures prominently in the revived Trade Union Council.

The Russians do not play up military government the way the Americans do. The Red Army is conspicuous, because a show of force is indispensable at this stage, but its administrative apparatus is not. The tendency clearly is to pick trustworthy Germans and let them run their country on all levels except the highest; and not to hamper their work needlessly by consistent and deliberate humiliation.

In the political field the "totalitarian" Russians have evinced far greater liberalism than the democratic Americans. In Bavaria as in the Rhineland, AMG has installed unpopular, reactionary, and clerical regimes, including a number of thoroughly discredited Nazi helpers, and any demonstration against the administration has been ruthlessly suppressed. In Cologne, late last May, American troops were used to dispel thousands of Social Democrats and Communists demonstrating against the Centrist (Catholic) Mayor Konrad Adenauer, who had stuffed the municipal administration with his clerical friends. In Dachau an anti-Nazi group demanding the four freedoms was forcibly disbanded on orders from Colonel Charles Keegan, military governor of Bavaria, on the theory that the Germans, as a conquered nation, had no right to demand anything!

Not so the Russians. Within six weeks of the fall of Berlin, Marshal Gregory K. Zhukov authorized the re-creation of all anti-fascist political parties, and subsequent events have proved that this was not an empty promise. The Communist Party was reconstituted on June 25, the Social Democrats have reformed their cadres, and two brand-new parties have opened shop. One of these, the Christian Democratic Union, is but a variation of the old Catholic Center with the admixture of some liberal elements; the other group, the "Liberal Democrats," appears to pick up where the former Democratic Party, or State Party, left off.

All this was done before the Allies' entry into Berlin. The haste with which some of these parties were formed indicates that both the Russians and the Germans wanted to have an accomplished fact before their democratic friends from the west could raise the "Verboten!" cry. The British and American authorities in Berlin will hardly be able to undo what the Russians have done unless they wish to see a democratic underground operating in the western and southern parts of the city from headquarters in the eastern section.

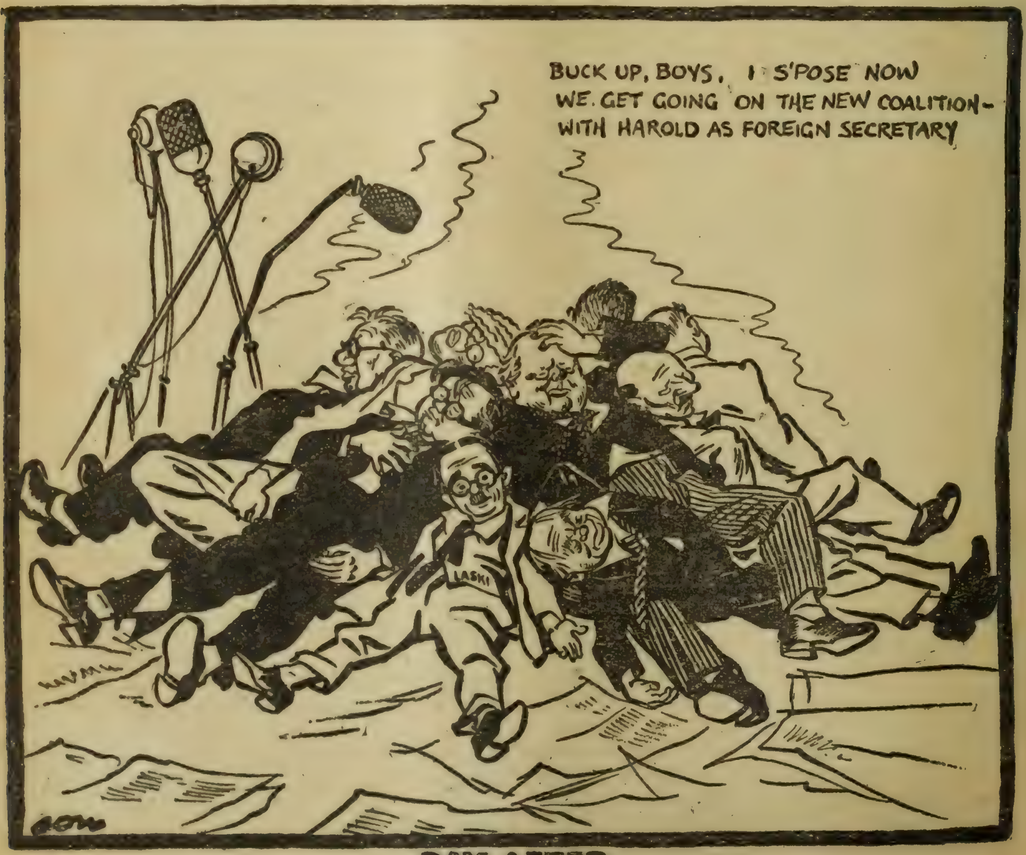
In keeping with the "popular front" formula which the Russians are favoring everywhere in Eastern Europe, the four anti-Nazi parties now functioning in Berlin formed a coalition as soon as they were organized. Only July 16 the Berlin press—each of the new parties already has its daily paper—published the joint program of this coalition, which is called the "Anti-Fascist Democratic Union." It was, almost word for word, the same program which Colonel Keegan in Bavaria had outlawed on the ground that Germans "had no rights."

The new City Council of Berlin has considerable political variety. Its head, Lord Mayor Arthur Werner, is a man of conservative leanings but inexperienced in party politics; his deputy, the aforementioned Hermes, formerly a leading member of the Center, is now prominent in the Christian Democratic Union. Only one or two Council members are Social Democrats—not an adequate representation of this once great party. A Catholic priest, Father Peter Buchholz, is in charge of religious matters.

Communist influence in the Council is strong. A former member of the Prussian Diet, Paul Schenck, is second deputy mayor. Ottomar Geschke, former Reichstag deputy and a member of the party's executive committee, is in charge of social welfare. Education has been intrusted to a Communist editor, Otto Winzer; radio is controlled by a former Communist youth leader, as was said above. Probably the most significant appointment, however, is that of Arthur Pieck as head of the personnel department; he is the son of Wilhelm Pieck, leader of the German Communist Party.

A real surprise was the appointment of Dr. Ferdinand Sauerbruch, world-famous surgeon who treated Hindenburg and Hitler, as director of Berlin's health services. It was probably the inclusion of this controversial figure in the City Council which gave rise to reports that the Russians were using some former Nazis in high posts. As a matter of fact, Sauerbruch's record is not yet clear.

In the economic sphere there is not the slightest trace of "bolshevism," though a drastic agricultural reform is in



BUCK UP, BOYS, I S'POSE NOW WE GET GOING ON THE NEW COALITION— WITH HAROLD AS FOREIGN SECRETARY
LASKI
LOW

DAY AFTER

progress, especially east of the Oder River. Much of the territory in which this reform is being carried out is claimed by Poland. In the cities, only Nazi property is being confiscated.

Free trade and the profit system were restored by the Soviet authorities as early as May 19, and the manifesto of the German Communist Party, published on June 25, explicitly subscribed to these measures. Banks and stores are open—though, of course, business isn't exactly brisk. Many of the former bank directors and corporation executives are now cleaning streets and living on scant rations—not, however, because they were business magnates, but because they were active Nazis.

In some provincial cities—Stralsund, Rostock, Greifswald, among others—a semblance of economic life was achieved much more quickly than in devastated Berlin. Public utilities and communications were restored in many places in a surprisingly short time. By June 3 the Russians had trains running on two trunk lines which had been severely bombed—Berlin-Stettin and Berlin-Frankfurt.

Food rations in the Soviet zone of occupation have been consistently larger than in western and southern Germany—not only because greater supplies were available, but also because the Russians do not think that starving the Germans will make them more democratic.

The opening of schools in the American zone of occupation is proceeding at a snail's pace and with something more than necessary caution. By contrast, the Soviets have granted permission not only for elementary schools but also for high schools to resume their courses. The Russians were about to open Berlin's colleges—the University, Technical College, and the College of Commerce—but desisted in deference to their Western allies, who had requested postponement of the measure. If our AMG experts have their way, German universities will stay closed for at least a year.

In the Russian zone theaters, opera houses, movies, and even night clubs are open; sports events are being organized, with German and Russian teams sometimes facing each other; the radio provides entertainment as well as indoctrination. Under the American concept of AMG there is to be no surcease from repentance. Atrocity pictures, doleful music, and unending radio sermons are the only cultural fare allowed.

The Russians are not being soft with the Germans, just sensible. They are dealing severely with Nazis and war criminals, but they know that many millions of Germans will be left and that even though Germany has been beaten and disarmed, it will continue to be a factor to reckon with in the affairs of Europe. In Russia's blackest hour—on February 23, 1942—Stalin made a statement which still apparently guides Soviet policy. "It would be ridiculous," he said, "to identify Hitler's clique with the German people and the German state. History shows that Hitlers come and go, but the German people and the German state remain."

Failure Again in India

BY UMA SHANKAR

THE failure of the Simla conference and of Lord Wavell's efforts to reconstitute his Executive Council to include acknowledged Indian leaders was not unexpected. It must not be taken to mean that the Indians cannot get together or that India is not fit for self-government.

To the question of self-government or freedom for India the Wavell plan had no relevance. It made no change in the constitutional set-up, as the White Paper itself acknowledged. The Viceroy retained his absolute power in the shape of the veto. The checkerboard of princes and princelings was kept, and they remained beyond the jurisdiction of the Executive Council. The Wavell plan was purely an interim measure, without prejudice, as it said, to the future constitution of India. All that was envisaged was the replacement of the political pariahs who constitute the present Executive Council by Indian political leaders.

It would be completely false to say that the Simla conference broke down because Indians could not agree. In fact, the vast majority of Indians, at least as represented by the acknowledged leaders of the various parties, did agree. The Indian National Congress, the largest and most representative party in India, drawing support from all groups and including a large number of Moslems, accepted the plan. The Sikhs accepted it; and so did the depressed classes. Not even the Moslem League rejected it. But the Moslem League did refuse—or rather Mr. Jinnah, its leader, refused—to concede that any other party represented any of the ninety million Moslems of India. Specifically, he refused to cooperate in the formation of a new Executive Council unless all its Moslem members were chosen from his party.

Jinnah's claim that the league represents 90 per cent of the Moslems of India is false. In the first place he has no way of substantiating his claim. No estimate of the strength of the Moslem League can be formed except on the basis of the results of the 1936 election. At that time Jinnah's party did not gain a majority in any of the larger provinces, not even in those in which a majority of the population is Moslem, such as Bengal and the Punjab, and in the predominantly Moslem North West Frontier Province the Congress Party received a majority large enough to form a Ministry. Other facts available to the Simla conference also refute Jinnah's claim. The Moslem Premier of the Punjab, Malik Khizar Hayat Khan Tiwana, who commands the support of a majority of Moslems in his province, broke away from Jinnah more than a year ago. In Bengal large sections of the Moslem population follow Fazlul Huq, a former Premier, and do not acknowledge Jinnah as their leader. The Shias and Momins, who number millions, sent telegrams to the Moslem president of the Congress Party, Maulana Azad, saying that the Moslem League did not have their support. And last, but by no means least, the Congress Party has many Moslem members. All the evidence indicates that the Moslem League does not represent a very large majority of the Moslems, perhaps not even a majority at all. The only basis for Mr. Jinnah's claim is that the British allowed him to wreck the conference.

Lord Wavell very gracefully took the blame for the failure of the conference on himself. In so far as he apparently did not contest the position Jinnah took, at least not by deeds, he is to blame. But the real blame must be assigned to the long line of British viceroys who have followed the policy of divide and rule. The whole thing was started by Lord Morley when he introduced communal electorates and thus made the emergence of a purely communal body such as the Moslem League inevitable. The Congress Party's efforts to build a national organization have been hampered by the same policy. Apparently the British have not changed.

No political solution can be based on communal or religious considerations. Yet these have been the point of departure for every British offer—and the Wavell plan was no exception. It contained one clause that was bound to cause trouble—the stipulation that there should be parity between the Moslems and the caste Hindus. It was a foregone conclusion that a purely communal body like the Moslem League would take the stand that every Moslem member of the Executive Council be from its ranks; otherwise the foundation of its existence would collapse. This clause also ran counter to the principles of the Congress Party, which is a national, not a sectional, organization, with members in every community pursuing the common aim of a free and united India. Nevertheless, the Congress made far-reaching concessions, and demanded only two Moslem seats in the council, conceding three to the Moslem League. If the British wanted a solution they should have had the perspicacity to know that the mention of communities would cause trouble, particularly as they were apparently not prepared to contest the claim of a minority within a minority to block a solution. The Viceroy would have been quite justified if he had ignored Mr. Jinnah and formed a government with the support of Congress and of those Moslems who do not belong to the League. He can still do that. The Moslem League will in that case either split up and some of its members will join the Executive Council, or it will decide to cooperate as a party. It contains too many ambitious politicians who will stay in the wilderness so long as they know they can bargain for advantages. Once they realize that the bargain will be closed without them, they will fall in line.

The British had good reasons for letting Jinnah wreck their scheme besides their traditional policy of playing off one section against another. The Moslem League is a reactionary force, representing landed interests. Furthermore, it opposes a united India, and India can be strong only if united. This suits the British, who for similar reasons support the Indian princes. It may be useful here to inject a point about Pakistan. On the surface Pakistan seems like a democratic solution for the minority problem. In actual fact, it would create more minorities and greater problems. If the scheme were put into effect there would be large Hindu minorities in Pakistan, as well as the Sikhs in the Punjab. There would also be millions of Moslems in Hindu India. Moreover, it is doubtful whether the majority of Moslems support the Moslem League and want Pakistan.

Another reason why the British may be supporting Jinnah is their desire to gain favor with reactionary Moslem elements in the Middle East, where they wish to block possible Soviet influence. At least that reason may be advanced if any member of the British Cabinet questions why Jinnah was allowed to exercise so much power.

Wavell, it is reported on good authority, favored the formation of a new Executive Council whether or not Jinnah cooperated. The reason he did not insist is said to have been his desire to wait until the new government was formed in Britain. If a Labor government gets in, as is quite possible, it is said that Wavell will have more support from London. But nothing startling should be expected from Labor. In the past when it has been in power it has done no more for the freedom of India than have its opponents. No British party can afford to let India have its freedom so long as the British economy is supported by an empire of which India is the keystone.

Regardless of the nature of the British government, and within the framework of the Wavell offer, action is possible without injustice to Jinnah's claims. There have been no elections in India for eight years. If elections were now held, it would be possible to form some estimate of the relative strength of the various parties and to judge Jinnah's claims. Valuable information would be gained even though only a small and relatively well-off section of the Indian population is enfranchised. The plea that the war makes elections impossible does not hold water. For all practical purposes, England is just as close to the war as India.

Some action in India is necessary. It is possible to do anything with the Indian situation, as has been said of bayonets, except sit on it. Because of this urgency Wavell took the unprecedented step of leaving his post and going to England, where he spent two months cajoling the British Cabinet, and particularly Churchill, to move. The problems facing any administration in India are tremendous. More than two million soldiers must be demobilized, soldiers who have seen the British sahib thoroughly beaten in the field and who have learned their own power. The reconversion from war to peace will be difficult and may cause large-scale unemployment. The poverty of the people is appalling, and there is a scarcity of food and clothing. If another famine were to occur, as is always possible in India, things would go badly. Only a government that commands the confidence of the people can handle these problems.

This analysis is confirmed by statements made recently by Jawaharlal Nehru, India's youngest and most progressive leader. India, he observed, was like the liberated European countries, where the resistance movements were coming to the surface. "In spite of the repression which continues in many ways, the spirit of the people has hardened, and it is quite impossible to find a stable solution except on the basis of complete freedom." It should be noted that the Wavell plan was only a possible step to freedom. Nehru pointed out that after the last war demobilization caused many disturbances, which were channeled into the non-cooperation movement of the Congress Party. "Obviously," he continued, "the situation will be much more critical on this occasion, both because of the numbers involved and of the vastly greater power of resistance to foreign rule that has developed." Many members of the armed forces, he added with the trace of a smile, were nationalists and "entered the army with the intention of learning to fight so that it would be useful when the time should arise."

Unwarranted conclusions have been drawn from the fact that the Congress Party and the people of India in general welcomed the Wavell plan. The Indians did not accept the plan in lieu of independence but as a step toward independence. Many observers are saying that a new atmosphere of good-will toward Britain has replaced the accumulated bitterness of years. That may be so, but it would be a mistake to capitalize on it. The fact that Wavell allowed Jinnah to wreck the proposals will call British sincerity into question. As Mr. Rajagopalachari expressed it, the Congress Party would never have gone to Simla if it had known that the decision would rest with the Moslem League. There is a new spirit in India today if Nehru and other observers are to be believed. Nehru has warned that there may be revolts; the present mood of Indians, he says, is "To hell with anyone who tries to push us out of the way."

America's Post-War Trade

BY ROBERT CHANDLER

I

UPON one thing, at least, liberals and conservatives, Republicans and Democrats, spokesmen for business and for government are agreed, and that is that after the war the United States must greatly expand its export trade. Now that the Charter of the world security organization has cleared most of the hurdles confronting it, and Congress has given its blessing both to the extension of reciprocal trade agreements and to the Bretton Woods plan for international monetary stabilization, there is a general feeling that this country is ready to supply the world with everything it needs. Advertisements assure us that one job out of every ten will be in the field of foreign trade. In New York City alone 650 new export firms have been organized to get a share of the business. Since the trade exists in posse, it is assumed that it virtually exists in esse.

Before we accept this rosy view, it would be well for us to examine a few of the hazards along the path to its realization. That the world can use our goods there is no doubt. That it will do so is questionable. Foreign trade is affected not only by the usual problems of buying and selling but by the additional ones of national sovereignty and international exchange. Today, these latter are extremely serious. Let us consider some of them—first, those which the American trader will encounter at this end of the transaction, and, second, those which he will encounter at the other.

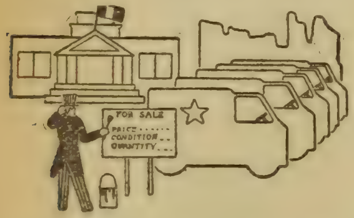
Among the former the first, in time if not in importance, is uncertainty about whether it will be our national policy to set aside part of our production for the export trade in the first months after the end of the war. This is a matter of crucial importance, for though we have, for example, increased our capacity to produce railroad equipment 700 per cent during the war, we shall not be able in the first months after the war to produce more than a trickle of the equipment needed to rehabilitate our own railroads and those of Europe, and to construct roads in South America, Africa, and China. We have the ultimate capacity to produce tremendous quantities, but during the first year we shall not be able to produce enough to meet domestic demands. Will the railroad-equipment companies turn down an order from, say, the Pennsylvania Railroad, with payment prompt and certain and no problems of shipping space and exchange, in favor of a smaller order from, say, Brazil?

It will be important to set aside part of our initial post-war production for the export trade.

If we are to build up our foreign trade, they will have to do so. Traders from other countries will be in the field trying to sell their goods and offering many inducements, including immediate delivery. The governments of those foreign traders will be helping them, for both traders and government officials know that they must export because they must import. They are not exporting a surplus; they are exporting goods they could use at home in order to buy the basic materials for the reorganization of their economies. England, for example, is already making plans to set aside part of its production for export, and British industry spokesmen are demanding, not that the government take its hands off private business, but that the government get busy and lay down the general principles of export allocations.

Our government is now allowing partial reconversion. If we are planning to develop an export trade, now is the time to establish export allocations. So far as can be discovered, we are doing nothing of the kind. Some government officials may recognize the need, but the cry for the government to "get out of business" is too strong for them to take any action. A long period of education of the public will be necessary first. People are demanding that we avoid the mistakes of 1919—failure to join the League of Nations, raising tariffs—but they do not yet see that it is necessary to meet the new problems of today with new measures. The Bretton Woods plan will provide the mechanism for trade, but how is trade itself to be provided? By repealing the Johnson act we hope to permit other nations to borrow money from us, but unless we greatly stimulate their sales to us, how can they repay these debts any more easily than they could after the last war? Our problem today is to start trade now; to do that we must set aside a certain proportion of goods for our export trade, and at the same time we must restore the economies of our potential customers. No public statement has been made by any responsible person, in or out of government, on what we are doing now about these all-important questions.

It is to our interest to have the British recapture their export position, for the empire has always been our best customer, taking around 40 per cent of our exports in pre-war years. But it would not be to our interest to wait for several years after the war's end before trying to enter the market. Buyers by then would have made their connections; and moreover no buyer is going to be happy depending upon a seller who will sell only when he has a surplus and forget about his customer when the home demand is great.



FOR SALE
PRICE ......
CONDITION ..
QUANTITY ..

Disposal of government-owned surplus property in foreign countries will present problems.

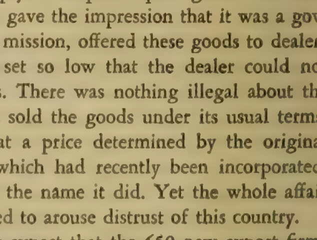
Many individual businesses may set aside a portion of their product for the export trade, but there will be no system about it. American manufacturers of farm machinery will almost surely do so; they are accustomed to taking care of their export departments. But we cannot be certain that the right producers will all do this. In fact, the opposite seems probable. The very goods in tight supply here and hence likely to be in greatest demand after the war are in tight supply all over the world.

Another set of problems which will plague our efforts to expand our exports is connected with the disposal of government-owned surplus property in foreign countries. We have great quantities of goods scattered all over the world which we wish to sell on the spot rather than bring back to this country. The idea is a good one. To bring the goods home would use shipping space, flood this country with stuff for which—by definition—we have no use, and deprive the countries where the goods are now stored of things which they very probably could use. Much of the purely military matériel may have no value except as scrap, but many items have peace-time uses—road-building machinery, railroad equipment, clothing (army), mining machinery, insecticides.

With the existing world-wide shortages of all sorts of goods, it would seem that both parties to the transaction would profit by our disposing of such property. But the situation is not quite so simple as it appears. In the first place, how will prices be set? There is no world market now. Shall we sell at original cost, less a percentage for depreciation? But suppose we paid too much for the original product—too much as compared with the price of similar goods two or three years after the war. If foreign purchasers felt this to be true, international bad feeling could easily develop. In the second place, if a foreign country uses any considerable part of its supply of dollar exchange in buying from the United States government, how will our private traders make sales to the traders in that country? We are committed to the reestablishment of private trade, but the sale of surplus government property may make that difficult unless the government continues its foreign procurement policy, and that would mean that the government would be in business—up to its neck.

Possibly the most serious of the problems connected with surplus-property disposal is whether the condition of this property shall be guaranteed. Will the government guarantee that the machine it sells is in good condition? Apparently not. Yet if the buyer finds that it breaks down sooner than he thinks it should—whether because it was originally in poor condition or because he does not have adequate facilities for upkeep—the reputation both of the government and of the private trader will suffer. Already a most unfortunate instance of this has occurred. A private corporation in a certain Latin American country bought from the RFC a four- or five-year supply of surplus capital goods. The corporation, whose name gave the impression that it was a governmental purchasing mission, offered these goods to dealers with a discount rate set so low that the dealer could not profitably do business. There was nothing illegal about the transaction. The RFC sold the goods under its usual terms, with no guaranties, at a price determined by the original cost. The company, which had recently been incorporated, was at liberty to take the name it did. Yet the whole affair was of a sort calculated to arouse distrust of this country.

Can one reasonably expect that the 650 new export firms in New York, all new to the game, all eager to share in the bright future they read about, will have the self-discipline to spend time and money and imagination to create good-will for all American traders? Many manufacturers are planning to modernize their plants after the war. They will want to sell their used equipment. With government and business telling the exporter that his efforts will bring the high level of employment necessary for continued prosperity, must one not expect to see fly-by-night exporters buy up this second-hand equipment in whatever condition they find it and sell it to some foreigner who has been starved for equipment for years? And would this not deal such a blow to our reputation that an exporter from another country who offered new material, with a guaranty, would get the buyer's future business?



Our conflicting policies often cancel each other.

One of the things most of the enthusiasts about exports seem to forget is that the foreign trader has a government which is eager to protect his interests, and its own. American government officials talk about the free flow of trade in the world and advocate the removal of trade barriers. But Congress promptly enacts legislation to give subsidies to certain producers of basic commodities. Our pronouncements and our practice simply do not hang together, and foreigners are not such fools as not to see this. Our cotton prices are sustained by subsidies far above the world price. Are we likely to bring our practice into accord with our preaching? It seems not—to judge from the Congressional reaction to Will Clayton's far from subversive ideas on letting our cotton prices sink to world prices. Congress is likely to respond to the pressure of special interests and pay subsidies or raise tariffs to help the American producer. Foreign governments respond by tariffs to keep out our goods.

Our individual traders want to get the government out of business.

Actually the United States as a whole—and foreigners see this clearly—has not a policy but policies, and these policies often cancel each other. We are strong advocates of free private trade, but we have the highest tariff walls any creditor nation ever had. We do not like to do business with countries through government purchasing missions, but we are out after Russian trade. We believe that competition is the law of trade, but we pay subsidies to producers till we have more goods than we can consume. We do not believe in dumping, but we practice dumping. We do not believe in organizations which limit production, such as cartels, but we are in favor of international commodity agreements—provided we are in on the agreements.

The same disparity between theory and practice can be found in the individual American trader. He wants to get the government out of business. He sees red whenever the United States Commercial Company is mentioned; he views it as a government agency doing the business which the private trader might be doing, although there is not the remotest chance that the private trader could, in fact, carry on the preclusive buying that the U. S. C. C. was formed to do. On the other hand, when the British trader, gladly using the parallel British organization, the U. K. C. C., gets back much of his pre-war business in the Middle East, where the British have for years carefully sought to satisfy the desires of their customers, the American business man again sees red and wants to know why the government does not help him out!

Other countries are not going to adapt their plans for the future to our wavering pronouncements; nor are they anxious to enmesh their economies so completely with ours that they will be dragged down by the depression which they expect us to have if we do not realize that jobs, like charity, begin at home. They are convinced that we have not yet learned the lesson of the '20's and '30's—namely, that a creditor nation cannot export and refuse to import. The figures on our exports and imports from 1919 to 1929 make sad reading today. Every year except one we had a surplus of exports over imports. Every year our gold holdings increased, until we had most of the world's supply of gold, having drained it out of other countries as payment on their debts and their excess purchases from us. Then all payments stopped, and we had 1929, Hitler, and finally war. Other countries do not want to see this happen again. And they think the wise thing to do is to get along without us. People who are bankrupt do not have to get involved with the money-lenders—not if they are willing to work together and make sacrifices.

In the Wind

AN INTERESTING INDICATION of the effect of overseas service on political opinion is given in the breakdown of the soldier vote in the Canadian election, which has just been released. Canadian soldiers in the European, Near Eastern, and Pacific theaters voted more than 38 per cent for the left-wing C. C. F., the highest figure for any party; the vote of those stationed in Canada was 26 per cent C. C. F. The over-all service vote was 32 per cent C. C. F., as against a civilian vote of 16 per cent.

CYNICAL NEWSPAPERMEN who used to opine that papers carried Mrs. Roosevelt's column, My Day, merely as a sop to the White House, must have been surprised by an advertisement the United Feature Syndicate placed in Editor and Publisher on July 14, reporting that seven papers have recently subscribed to the column. This brings the total to eighty-six, the largest number since My Day was begun.

THAT ALLEGEDLY SUGGESTIVE advertisement of bathing suits, which the New York City Board of Transportation ordered out of the subways, can still be seen on the subways of Boston. Here's to the city of Boston, inveterate foe of the book, where freedom to read is restricted indeed, but not so the freedom to look.

SENATOR THEODORE BILBO of Mississippi gave the Senate this summary of his racial views on July 6: "Many persons have been led to believe that I have denounced Catholics, Jews, and Negroes. I have not done anything of the kind. . . . God knows, I am not that narrow or bigoted. . . . Some of the best friends I have in the world are members of the Catholic Church. . . . I have never denounced the Negroes as a race. I have discussed the characteristics of the race. . . . So far as the Jews are concerned, we have Jews in my state, and some of my best friends are Jews."

A NEW ORGANIZATION, the People's Political Action Committee, has been set up in Detroit. In an interview with the Detroit News on July 11 its president, James D. Zurcher, said its aim was "to combat the Sidney Hillman organization at every turn." It was launched with a contribution of $100,000 by the People's Committee to Defend Life Insurance and Savings, whose directors, Mr. Zurcher pointed out, are mainly "executives of banks, insurance companies, and industrial establishments." Apparently the only thing the People's PAC hasn't got is the people.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. One dollar will be paid for each item accepted.]

What Price Independence?

BY E. H. JACOBY

THE joyous celebrations in Manila following the liberation are over. The Filipinos received the Americans as liberators after years of terror and fighting. But the Philippines' real problems are still far from being solved. MacArthur, triumphant as a general, is in close cooperation with the Osmeña government, which has few triumphs to its credit. Every day the black market in Manila defeats the regulations of the American army and the Philippine government. The last record was seventy centavos (thirty-five cents) for one egg.

The Osmeña government carries the political failures of the past into the present. The landlord tradition sublimated by a democratic technic today dominates the Malacañan (the presidential palace in Manila) as completely as in the time of Quezon. Tomas Confessor, former Secretary of the Interior, the only outstanding Filipino leader with a fine guerrilla record, was unlucky as administrator and politician. Today he is a beaten man. He spent his political energy in the fight against the collaborators—an indiscreet course of action in a political atmosphere where the spirit of collaboration was predominant. Manuel Roxas, who was in charge of the Economic Development Board for the Laurel puppet government, has only recently cleared himself of official suspicion. He is the most adroit politician in the Philippines, an excellent speaker, and a clever administrator. Hacienderos and business men see in him their savior from economic and social troubles. For many years he was one of the leading Filipino figures in the negotiations preceding the Tydings-McDuffie act. The youths of the Nacionalista Party consider him their great leader, and luckily for his followers he has been sufficiently cleared to take up the fight against Osmeña for the Presidency in the elections next November. Confessor has been out of the running for some time.

General Romulo's powerful rhetoric at the San Francisco conference has no doubt increased the glory of the Osmeña government in those Manila circles that believe a reputation in world policy can make up for failures on the home front.

Independence has always been a miraculous word in Philippine elections. It was with the slogan of "Independence" that Manuel L. Quezon reached the zenith of power. In the coming election a new slogan will also be used: "Down with the collaborators."

Any campaign against independence is inconceivable. For the masses in the provinces independence means the hope of being freed from the political and economic rule of the landlords. The people are convinced that foreign rule in the Philippines will always favor the ruling class, and their conviction is strengthened by the fact that many political leaders in the Philippines, while publicly demanding immediate independence, inwardly hope for a postponement. These leaders really want to perpetuate the economic bonds with America, which were so favorable for upper-class Filipinos but passed on few benefits to those living on the lowest possible economic level. They fear that economic disturbances and social unrest will be the result of independence. The official program of President Osmeña calls for immediate independence, but he actually hopes to obtain for the Philippines a political status which will guarantee the continuation of the traditional trade relations—that is, the preferential importation of Philippine sugar and copra by the United States. Manuel Roxas, on the other hand, considers himself strong enough to neglect the independence slogan and is realistically emphasizing the idea of economic interdependence. His followers hope that he will fight for dominion status for the Philippines. However, if he should accomplish his purpose, it would mean that America would be guaranteeing the feudal system in the Philippines, politically and economically.

The issue of ousting the collaborators has not the same importance today as it had three months ago. Too much water has flowed under the blasted bridges of the Pasig River since the first exciting days of liberation. In Manila the realists are stronger than the idealists, and Manuel Roxas is triumphant over Tomas Confessor. The Filipinos are being coached in the difference between "good collaborators" and "bad collaborators." They have been told that many officials sacrificed themselves by collaborating with the Japanese and that the life of the guerrillas in the mountains was occasionally less risky and more comfortable than that of collaborators with the Japanese in Manila! The example and propaganda of Manuel Roxas have reinforced this idea. Moreover, it is a fact that the number of efficient officials is very small in the Philippines and that administration would be difficult if this group were really purged of collaborators. Manuel Roxas realized this fact very early, and government officials, intellectuals, and all those who hope to be "cleared" are therefore gathering around him. Thus the issue of guerrillas versus collaborators has ceased to be a clear-cut one. Many men once considered collaborators are now known to have been guerrillas.

Never in the history of the Philippines has an election gone against the ruling class in the government. The power of the feudal system has always been strong enough to guarantee the loyal vote of the dependent masses and so to strengthen the political and economic position of the landlords. The real political battle was always between different cliques within the ruling party. Now, however, a new and significant factor has entered the Philippine scene. The war and the resistance have aroused large sections of the population formerly indifferent to politics. Guerrillas all over the islands are thinking and talking politically—a fact which sooner or later will break up the traditional pattern of life. This political process is most advanced in the Visayan Islands and in the provinces of central Luzon. No one who has been able to watch developments during the war years believes that the politicians of Manila, however clever they may be, can in the long run prevent the Filipino masses from dominating the political arena. The democratization of the government is inevitable.

It is doubtful whether these new forces will prevail in the coming election. The Philippines are still controlled by the American army, which of course must maintain peace and order as long as the war against Japan continues. This fact automatically favors the present rule in the Philippines. Therefore it is unlikely that by the time of the election the guerrilla movement in the Visayas, which is strongly influenced by Tomas Confessor, will have made common cause with the masses of the Hukbalahap, the anti-Japanese and radical guerrilla movement in central Luzon, against the political bosses of Manila. Probably the coming campaign will result in a stalemate between the Osmeña group and the followers of Manuel Roxas: Osmeña may remain President and Roxas may become Vice-President. The actual political power would then be concentrated more and more in the younger hands of Roxas.

The future of the Philippines is still an American problem. The best of the Filipino youth fought on the side of America against the Japanese. As a result of this common effort a truly democratic spirit is developing. It is to be hoped that with the return of more normal conditions—after military necessities have ceased to be of primary importance—Americans will realize that they must support the forces of democracy in the Philippines and no longer sustain a political and economic system whose medieval structure affronts American political principles. The rehabilitation of the Philippines, pledged by President Roosevelt in 1943, must be carried out fully, but in a way that will create a well-rounded and sound economy. This will help to diminish the social contrasts and forestall the clashes and bloodshed which threaten today. The years of occupation and war in the Philippines were a severe test for the Filipino nation, and everything possible should be done to eliminate the conditions which might bring on civil war.

The End of Hukbalahap

BY CAPTAIN X

Manila, P. I., June 10

THE left-wing anti-fascists of the Philippines have fared no better than their brothers in other nations. Their lot under Japanese rule was similar to that of resistance fighters under the Nazis. Under their liberators it has been the same as that of their comrades in Italy, Greece, and Belgium.

The left-wing anti-fascist movement here is called Hukbalahap, a word that means "People's Anti-Japanese Army." Unlike the resistance movements in European nations, this one does not have the support of the majority of the people. Its adherents number about 150,000, and its power is concentrated in a few provinces—Nueva Ecija, Pampanga, Tarlac, Bulacan, and Laguna. A fairly large group is found in Tayabas and a relatively small one in Rizal. These are agricultural provinces suitable for guerrilla warfare.

The origin of the movement is obscure, though it is not accidental that it arose among the peasants, who have long been a militant segment of the Philippine population. Hukbalahap was formally launched on March 29, 1942, by a Socialist named Avisantos, working closely with other capable leftists—Louis Taruc, Costo Alejandrino, Lava, and Fileo. These men led the movement after Avisantos was killed in an engagement with the Japanese. Taruc, now in prison, is commander-in-chief. Under their leadership the Hukbalahap developed into an effective military and political organization. How effective it became can be seen from the Japanese decision to send a large force to central Luzon to destroy it. The expedition was a failure.

After November, 1942, the Huk forces were expanded by the inclusion of the Chinese anti-Japanese guerrilla force known as Wah Chi, which became the 48th Squadron of the Hukbalahap. Wah Chi is composed of Chinese sympathetic to the Communists in Yenan. Sun Yat-sen is their guiding light. (Incidentally, there also exists a large Kuomintang movement here. The two movements are bitterly opposed and have never united in any action.)

The Hukbalahap established a department of civil government soon after its organization. It saw the necessity of mobilizing civilians in the struggle, for it is only by the active support of communities that guerrilla forces can be maintained. Furthermore, it was clear that the people had no confidence in the puppet government. In the provinces mentioned above, therefore, elections were held and governors, mayors, and minor officials chosen. Almost immediately some land reforms were instituted. The properties of large landlords were expropriated and divided among the peasants, who used the land for the production of food. The Counter-Intelligence Corps charges that some landlords were killed. However that may be, the movement's agrarian policy was directed against those collaborationist owners who used the land to produce crops essential to the Japanese war effort, such as cotton. It was through this reform program that the peasants and guerrillas became solidly bound together and the Hukbalahap became a people's movement.

The Huk guerrillas, including the Wah Chi, were the most important group carrying on large-scale, coordinated activities during the occupation. Other bands, sponsored by the United States army and led by Filipino and American regular-army men, limited themselves in the main to intelligence work and preparations for the invasion. But the Huks also coordinated their plans with the invasion; so that when MacArthur landed in Lingayen Gulf, the Huks went on the offensive and liberated San Fernando and other cities.

Despite the generally excellent work of the Hukbalahap, it has never been recognized as a legitimate organization and never will be. United States army and Filipino officials brand it "Communist." The C. I. C., therefore, is trying to destroy it. The plan for its destruction has as its main features (1) the arrest of important leaders, (2) the quiet and unnegotiated disarmament of the guerrilla forces, (3) the arbitrary disregard of and replacement of the elected representatives of the people. American forces which entered the islands last February did not hesitate to disarm the Huks and remove them from office in local governments. The plan makes no provision for free discussion or other democratic means of settling differences. Hukbalahap was described to me by a C. I. C. officer as a movement dominated by Communist cutthroats who had forced their rule on civilians by threats of punishment and death; there was therefore no possibility of negotiation. The officer openly admitted the plan for destroying the movement. On the other hand, the Huks have been anxious to work with the army and the government. They think of the Americans as allies rather than enemies. Recently they offered two thousand men for use as labor battalions. The unique part of the offer was that no wages were asked—only meals. One thousand of these men have been accepted.

Completely misunderstanding the Huks, the C. I. C. fears an armed uprising aimed at overthrowing the present government. Another C. I. C. officer indicated that one reason the new Philippine army is being whipped into shape so quickly is to thwart such an attempt. Furthermore, the C. I. C. believes the problem has an international aspect. The Soviet Union will be a great power in the Far East and will be closer to the Philippines than the United States is. Therefore a gravitation toward the Soviet Union is anticipated if any left-wing movement gains the ascendancy here.

It may be said that these unrealistic fears have their source in the usual dread and dislike of anything leftist. But despite all charges to the contrary, the Hukbalahap is not essentially Communist. The accusation, which is also brought against the militant labor movement here, is the old trick of vested interests and collaborationists. It is true that many Communists are active in the movement and that there are Communist leaders in many areas. But labor leaders, socialists, and liberal educators also play a prominent role. The result has been a high standard of leadership. Even the C. I. C. has admitted as much and has retained some Huk mayors in office. The now imprisoned commander-in-chief, Louis Taruc, is a former labor leader. Dr. Lava, the movement's political adviser, was formerly professor of political science at the University of Manila. Most of the leaders, like the rank and file, are simply Philippine nationalists. Many have no political convictions but are anti-Japanese and want a redistribution of the land.

Filipino Communists are not simply "land-reform Communists"; they are Marxists and Stalinists. They are a militant, well-disciplined body, whose actions are politically intelligent. Immediately after the occupation they started work among resistance groups in the provinces, with central Luzon their main field. They threw themselves without stint into the complicated problems of sustained resistance, and through hard work, resolute zeal, and organizational ability—with power politics a contributing factor—some of them rose to positions of authority and leadership.

The Huks admit that military and political activities and organizations must be unified, but they want this carried out by consultation and common plan. They wish to give up their independent military organization and become part of the Philippine army but are indignant about the arbitrary plan for disarmament. And if this disarmament is undertaken by force, they may decide to resist. In the political sphere, they recognize that the Philippines cannot have separate and competing governments. What they object to is the arbitrary replacement of their democratically elected representatives and the high-handed manner in which their leaders have been dealt with. Many leaders have been arrested without charges and held without trial. Those still free assert that if the imprisoned men have been guilty of criminal acts, specific charges should be introduced at a fair trial.

In contrast to the treatment of the leftists, some collaborationists have been given clean bills of health by the United States and Commonwealth authorities—although many have been arrested. Filipino, Spanish, and American reactionaries and landowners find favor with the authorities and use their prestige against liberal or radical groups. It does not take much imagination, therefore, to see why a land-reform movement would not be welcomed and why there is strong pressure to have land previously redistributed restored to its "rightful owners." Nor is it difficult to see how any strong political movement to the left of the United States-dominated government would be looked upon as dangerous.

As far as the C. I. C. officers are concerned, they think entirely in terms of "military necessity." On May Day and at various other times Huk supporters staged huge demonstrations in the hope that the authorities would see that the movement had popular support. But while the army occasionally relaxes its policy against the Hukbalahap after such demonstrations, the respite is only temporary. Dissolution appears to be inevitable. But it will not be permanent; new plans and developments are already under way. Even in the November elections there may be significant developments.

Filipino liberals and leftists hope that progressive forces in the United States will establish and maintain relations with them and publicize and support their cause. We dare not fail them. This is the first opportunity America has had to work out, alone and unaided, the difficult problem of establishing democracy in another land. We shall be known by our acts.

[This is the first of two articles on the Philippines by Captain X. The second will give a detailed account of the issues in this summer's Presidential campaign.]

The New Statesman and Nation

England's Leading Weekly Review

may now be obtained through

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

Yearly subscription $6.50 including postage

SPECIMEN copy on request

BOOKS and the ARTS

OUR CULTURE AND ITS CRITICS

BY ERIC RUSSELL BENTLEY

BY ITS qualities and by its defects, by its subject matter and by its manner, Harry Slochower's book "No Voice Is Wholly Lost" (Creative Age Press, $3.75), an ambitious attempt to find main trends in Western culture since Nietzsche, might prompt a discussion of many controversial matters. Nietzsche died in 1900. The world is now nearly fifty years older. Such a book as Mr. Slochower's could be regarded as a pioneer attempt to characterize the twentieth century. With its clearly demarcated discussions, its straightforward procedure, its well-chosen quotations, its broad learning, and its suggestive bibliography, this is the kind of book from which a student might set out on his way around the literature of a century which is now almost half spent. Particularly where Mr. Slochower has special knowledge, as for instance of Thomas Mann and other German subjects, his guidance has distinct value. It is when criticism is pushed beyond this point that misgivings arise.

First, there is Mr. Slochower's "Stalinism." "Stalinism" is a villainous word, the anti-Communist's simple inversion of the Communist use of "Trotskyism." If the concept had reference primarily to Stalin I would be unwilling to fling it in Mr. Slochower's face, but I am told by one who makes free with the term that it now means "cultural conformity tinged with political reformism," and this description, unfortunately, describes Mr. Slochower very well. He does combine an admiration of Soviet Russia and its friends with an easygoing attitude to culture. Bad authors, one cannot help feeling, are treated as respectfully as good. Writers who defend the true philosophy of "communal personality" and "universal culture" have a very fair chance of being ranked with the best. Hence such an undiscriminated list as "Heinrich Mann and Anna Seghers, John Steinbeck and Mikhail Sholokhov, André Malraux and Thomas Mann." The list shows the political colors of the author. I have no objection to the colors, but I find the "Stalinist" way of automatically approving all the "right" books just as offensive as the anti-"Stalinist" way—now more common in liberal and literary journals—of automatically disapproving the same books. When the critic is busy ill-concealing his "Stalinist" or anti-"Stalinist" criterion, a fair-minded discussion of a Leonov, a Malraux, an Aragon, or a Brecht is impossible. It is indeed no longer attempted.

Though there is an occasional footnote in which a fervent anti-"Stalinist" such as "S. Hook" is dismissed, Mr. Slochower's book does not bring the political discussion out into the open. "Three Ways of Modern Man," which Mr. Slochower published in 1937, was a frank book resting quite openly upon the assumptions of current red criticism. "No Voice Is Wholly Lost" is not quite so lucid. Sometimes we have the strange sensation of being back in 1937 again, and we wonder how Mr. Slochower could have been so little affected by what has happened in the meantime. But we also note that Thomas Mann is no longer considered anemically bourgeois. He is included in a new and broader popular front. And so, as the title of the book indicates, is nearly everybody else.

The more narrow-minded Marxism of the thirties was at least clear. This "dialectic humanism" of the "Stalinist" Slochower of 1945 is as fuzzy and pretentious as the celebrated anti-"Stalinism" of Arthur Koestler. In the table of contents the big names glitter and the big words impress. Here we find much towardization: Toward the Communal Personality, Toward a Dialectic Humanism. A good deal of exciting travel: Cosmic Exile; In the Fascist Styx; The Promise of America: John Steinbeck; Midway Passage: Between the Lower Depths and Universal Order; and Through the Lower Depths: Clifford Odets. All accompanied by music: an Overture on Nietzsche, a Roman Prelude, and an Aryan Finale. Unfortunately the sections on individual authors into which the book is divided are often so short that either almost nothing is said—as, for instance, in the sections on T. S. Eliot and Bertolt Brecht—or the argument, when allowed to get under way, as in the section on John Dewey, is annoyingly foreshortened and we have to read such a philosophical cacophony as this: "The result is an equivocal mixture of traditional Idealism and Absolutism with a new relativistic operationalism requiring 'metaphysical' explications."

Mr. Slochower may conceivably have some reason for devoting nine pages to a Werfel and only one to a Shaw. A greater shortcoming is indicated by the contrast between pretentious titles and a thinness of actual content, a thinness that cannot be unconnected with Mr. Slochower's indifference to matters of taste. The question arises: Is Mr. Slochower interested in those parts of culture which are ends in themselves—the arts—or only in problems of means, that is, of ethics? It is true that the arts cannot be pursued purely for their own sake, that they are intertwined with other phenomena, including ethics. Yet in our time we are frequently confronted with critics for whom ethics is an obsession. Their attitude is that of Lenin infuriated by the amiability of a Beethoven quartet. Lenin we can excuse since he was busy planning a revolution. Our academic activists are not. Can one not ask these secular puritans what they will do with their good society when they get it? Can one not be suspicious of a cultural critic for whom a Proust represents "the promise of America"? Are we not back here among the frightened Philistines? Is this not the healthy, wholesome uplift of all our cultural salvationists?

The moralist as cultural historian is a bull in a china shop. The arts are for him no more artistic than for the schoolboy who extracts Latin grammar from Vergil. He extracts his uplift. He makes his pilgrimages and voyages and quests through lower depths and all the way round his cosmic transcendences, and finally he reaches his up-to-date celestial city. How could he fail to? The whole scheme is cooked up for that purpose. We begin with Nietzsche and a chaos of values, we go through the lower depths, and we end up "towardizing" for all we are worth in the direction of a synthesis of everything that is lovely and of good report. And we are such good cooks that no odd or end is wholly lost. It's magnificent, but it's not cultural history, it's not criticism, it's not cricket. It's uplift. And if these are rough words, let me append here some ideas about the alternative to uplift.

Artistic material is better, not worse, material for the cultural historian than bluebook material because in the arts, and only in the arts, can the past be apprehended in living, organic forms. But we cannot write the history of the arts merely by listing names and addresses, births, deaths, and marriages, clichés, labels, and decorative adjectives—in the manner of the "Cambridge History of English Literature." Nor can we write the history of the arts by performing operations on them and extracting ideas with the surgical violence of Mr. Slochower or his friend Kenneth Burke. The medieval mind is one thing in treatises on "the legacy of the Middle Ages"; it is quite another (it even begins to make sense) in the "Confessio Amantis" or the "Roman de la Rose." The modern mind is one thing in these precious interpretations with their high hopes and their high hats. It is another in "A la Recherche du temps perdu," and another still, alas, in "Cannery Row." In our historian's scheme the development from one to another is called progress. There must be something wrong with the scheme.

The cultural historian is either just another philosopher let loose among the arts, which he finds awfully obvious compared with Kant, or he is a man who can write the history of types of experience, of sentiment, and of sensibility. But he cannot do this unless he has had the experiences, unless he has savored the sentiment and assimilated the sensibility. Cultural history not based, or partly based, upon such first-hand experience is mere shadow-boxing. The great shadow-boxers of today are the literary Ph.D.'s who write the history of labels and the philosophers rampant who do not even write the history of their own rampages but make out of hearsay and philosophic jargon something that sounds like something.

If the test of a literary critic is what he makes of an unsigned poem, the test of the historical critic or true historian is what he makes of the only unsigned, unticketed period in history—our own time. By what touchstone shall we judge him? In my view there is no correct version of history for the government or anybody else to authorize. We need as many versions as there are competent minds to devise them. But there are at least two versions we do not need. One is the optimistic version—from the lower depths to the higher synthesis—which we have recently been fed by Lewis Mumford, Erich Kahler, and Mr. Slochower. The other is the pessimistic version, which is the prerogative of ex-Communists, neo-Catholics, egocentric refugees, all the elegant or ferocious brood of Oswald Spengler.

Optimism and pessimism are rival poses. The last post-war generation, our fathers, left us a large assortment of both. Can we not decline to accept the legacy? The question is larger than my present theme. But it is not irrelevant to it. Our culture will not be saved by historians, but the writing of cultural history can perhaps be redeemed if we discard the fads and fetishes of a generation that is coming to look antediluvian. The new post-war generation will doubtless develop its own limitations in time; meanwhile let us hope that new life will be possible. There is some little evidence, for example, that the Ph.D. octopus may be checked, and that the universities after the war will demand men who are teachers and critics of life rather than bibliographers. But now I am myself growing optimistic. I shall soon be writing that they will beat their swords into plowshares and their PMLA's into Kenyon Reviews.

The Algiers Coup

CONSPIRACY IN ALGIERS. By Renée Pierre-Gosset. The Nation. $1.*

THE English title of Mme Gosset's unbelievable but true inside story of how and why a liberation was transformed into a libel of liberty is more revealingly appropriate than the French original, "Le Coup d'Alger." For the tragedy of the North African invasion was the betrayal of the democratic French patriots into the power of the reactionary conspirators. The plot that paved the way for the American landings, says Mme Gosset, was the work of several thousand men "divided as was France by quarrels and even by political hatreds, yet associated in the common interest of the nation." But on the very eve of the landings Robert D. Murphy, who master-minded the preparations on a personal directive from the late President Roosevelt, "altered his plans and rejected the French support previously used by him. . . . At the very moment when General Eisenhower [in Gibraltar], delighted at having at last convinced General Giraud, was assuring him of fullest support . . . Murphy was signing with Admiral Darlan in Algiers." Both the liberals and democrats on the one hand and the reactionaries, monarchists, and Cagoulards on the other had shared in the preparations which Mme Gosset describes with a wealth of fascinating and accurate detail until now unavailable in this country. Then Murphy, strong in the certainty of White House approval, transformed what might have been the start of the emancipation of a people into a putsch of a palace guard, and turned aside with a smile while the backstairs intriguers, political gangsters, technicians of the coup d'état stabbed in the back the real artificers of the coup d'Alger.

Mme Gosset tells the whole ugly story—or at least as much as can be told while military-security limitations are still operative—and tells it fairly, objectively, and well. We, the Americans, "made" Darlan, created the power of Darlanism for reasons of short-term military expediency, and later, when reasons of long-term political policy as well as simple honesty and decency should have dictated unmaking Darlanism, we deliberately adopted it as our fixed policy. We treated France as though it were Nicaragua: on the day Darlan was allowed to issue an "imperial proclamation" as "Chief of State," Murphy in the name of General Eisenhower dismissed as "petty divergences" the differences between a monarchist neo-fascism and democracy.

Darlanism, comments Mme Gosset, "far exceeds the limits of a temporary expedient, of a last-minute substitute, of a clever stratagem. It falls quite naturally into the general policy of the State Department toward the whole of Europe.

---

* This book can be obtained only from The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

In the absence of principle, personality played a major role; so Mme Gosset, after setting her stage with an analysis of the political situation in Vichy and the psychological atmosphere in Algiers, combines sound journalism with keen insight in a brilliant dissection of the protagonists of the drama: General Weygand, who was Murphy's first choice but who funked when the test came; Admiral Fenard, the "key to the Darlan mystery," who weathered every political storm; General Donovan's cape-and-dagger boys—Knox, Knight, Rounds, Boyd, Pendar—who under State Department "cover" and Murphy's orders acted out a romantic thriller combining elements of E. Phillips Oppenheim and Eric Ambler with Frank Merriwell and the Rover Boys; Henri d'Astier de la Vigerie, "occult leader" of the resistance, a Royalist condottiere who was also a sincere patriot; Jean Rigault, malevolent, opium-smoking deus ex machina, and his master, the reactionary millionaire Jacques Lemaigre-Dubreuil; and scores of others. Most brilliantly successful of the portraits are the villains of the piece: Murphy, the spokesman for democracy with a taste and flair for recreating the atmosphere of the Faubourg Saint Germain and confusing it with France; Darlan, wealthy, cynical, intelligent, who early chose the ladder of opportunist politics; Giraud, "pure soldier," who twice escaped from the Germans only to surrender to the French fascists.

Mme Gosset stresses that whereas the pact with Darlan may be defended, the subsequent betrayal of French democracy was criminal and unnecessary. Months after the invasion "the worst Vichy men were still in power"; with American acquiescence, the Giraudists were outdoing the Darlanists in oppressing those patriots "who had daily risked their lives while preparing the landings." And, she concludes, two and a half years after the "liberation" the disastrous moral result of the State Department's policy is alienating the whole of Europe and creating a "European isolationism which constitutes an obvious danger for the peace of the world for years to come."

"Conspiracy in Algiers" is a book every friend of democratic freedom should read and not only because of the historical facts it so ably recounts. It is important because Admiral Leahy is now more than ever the éminence grise of American foreign policy, because Robert Murphy is still the chosen instrument of that policy, because the subordination of moral purpose to unprincipled technique of power is still draining the reservoir of American prestige throughout the world.

But lest any reader of the book assume that the responsibility for "betrayal in Algiers" was only Murphy's or even that of the State Department, the writer of these lines can give assurance that the facts—all the facts—were in the possession of the White House. On page 225 Mme Gosset says "we shall never know more" about a certain "mission to Washington." Let Mme Gosset be informed: the mission failed because Darlanism had then, and still appears to have, the approval of the White House. To paraphrase the late and unlamented Benito Mussolini, democracy does not appear to be an article of export.

PERCY WINNER

BRIEFER COMMENT

The Example of Tolstoy

TIKHON POLNER'S "Tolstoy and His Wife" (W. W. Norton, $2.75), translated from the Russian by Nicholas Wreden, is probably the best biographical study of the great Russian novelist now available in English. The relationship between Tolstoy and his wife had all the intensity and gravity of a drama wholly existential, marked throughout by experiences of anxiety, care, and significant choice. Hence this relationship provides the perfect framework for a biographical essay. Polner was a friend of the Tolstoy family, and in his account of Tolstoy's personality and career he exhibits the finest insight and mastery of the factual material. He is blessedly free of the modern biographer's mania for "coloring" and "fictionizing" the material at the expense of the facts. This is one biography where no demands are made upon us to believe things for which there is no evidence.

A good part of the book is devoted to an analysis of Tolstoy's religious experience—an experience peculiarly relevant to our time, when many people, by no means the least vocal among us, are once more endeavoring to recapture one or another form of religious awareness. The lesson of Tolstoy is not encouraging to such endeavors, however. For Tolstoy, whose conversion began with a strict adherence to Orthodox practices and dogmas, was soon compelled to think his way through to various heretical versions of the Christian faith until his search came to an end in the sharply self-limiting adoption of a few ethical precepts. Polner shows that the Gospel, too, "lost its special significance, and Tolstoy's ardor for it cooled." Finally, even the concepts of God and immortality ceased to hold any real meaning for him. In his diary he questioned himself whether he actually believed that the purpose of life was to obey God's will and to prepare for the future life. Was it really true that God desires love and unity to grow within the individual and within the entire world? He replied that "instinctively" he could not believe "anything so definite." "What, then, do I believe? I answered in all sincerity that I believe one must be good and humble, one must forgive and love." These articles of faith are of an exalted moral content, but there is nothing in them that contradicts a naturalistic reading of man's position in the universe.

Our contemporary god-seekers, so newly self-confident in their aspirations, would do well to ponder the example of Tolstoy.

PHILIP RAHV

Canada's C. C. F.

NATION READERS HAVE had a fairly good introduction to the C. C. F., but all of them would profit from reading M. J. Coldwell's "Left Turn, Canada" (Duell, Sloan, and Pearce, $2.75) to fill out their picture of a socialist coalition of farmers, workers, and middle-class liberals operating in a political scene not unlike that of the United States. The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, of which Mr. Coldwell is parliamentary leader, constitutes the government of one Canadian province, Saskatchewan, and in the recent national election increased its representation at Ottawa from ten to twenty-eight members and doubled its popular vote. It had expected to do better. In his book Mr. Coldwell presents the political philosophy and aims of the C. C. F. Much of the material is taken from parliamentary speeches and public addresses, and in consequence the reader is let in on the actual debate of such political issues as conscription, war labor policy, big business and the war, Canada and the British Commonwealth, post-war planning. The book gives a picture of Canada which is a little more balanced than official releases or the romantic blurbs of lady tourists. With respect to domestic policy there is no doubt where the C. C. F. is headed. It wants a planned economy directed toward specific social objectives, making full use of Canada's natural resources, and guaranteeing social security and a high standard of living to the majority of Canadians. Beveridge would in general approve; Hayek would hate it. In fact Hayek, through his countless big-business disciples and interpreters, was probably the C. C. F.'s most formidable opponent in the last election. Some day soon Coldwell should do a definitive political study of Canada, because, made up as it is from speeches, the present book lacks integration and focus. Moreover, badly needed is a sympathetic but objective study of the C. C. F. itself as a political party; it has made impressive gains and has numerous opportunities but, we suspect, it has still a lot to learn in the field of political strategy. Such a study would be of immense benefit to American progressives, who face many of the same post-war dangers as the C. C. F. and who also share its opportunities for post-war gains.

KING GORDON

FICTION IN REVIEW

ONE need not be entirely sympathetic to the literary method of Paul Goodman, one may indeed be opposed on principle to fiction which denies us the emotional satisfactions of more traditional writing, and still find much to admire in Mr. Goodman's collection of short pieces "The Facts of Life" (Vanguard, $2.50). Among writers of the non-realistic persuasion, Mr. Goodman is unusually well-educated, imaginative, and witty, and even though, as we follow him from piece to piece, his unremitting literacy and cleverness become a bit wearing, this virtuosity must be to some extent excused as an excess of virtue. Mr. Goodman's volume contains at least one story, the title story, which is entirely delightful, and a play, Jonah, about the prophet of doom, which is both comic and wise. The fact that the collection as a whole falls short of these two items doesn't of course diminish Mr. Goodman's stature in relation to other writers of his convention. It does, however, tend to confirm an old suspicion that even the method of non-realism cannot forfeit story-telling to disputation and still be sustaining.

A few years ago I wrote a brief notice of Mr. Goodman's novel "The Grand Piano," in which I asked why Da-Da novels were always such ma-ma novels. I was referring especially to the self-commiserating tone of that book, a tone which is happily absent from the present volume. But I also referred to an infantilism which I think is still basic to Mr. Goodman's work, however adult its preoccupations may seem. This immaturity can best be defined as a refusal to accept responsibility, an unwillingness to make any commitments.

It is an attitude toward life and art which is amusing and not even unhopeful in the very young, but which has a disconcerting way of appearing as merely a trick for trying to stay young when it persists too long and when it even evolves a form so well designed for the assertion of intellectual and moral superiority. Obviously I do not imply that all methods of non-conformity are methods of irresponsibility; I do think, however, that there is a degree of acceptance of our common responsibilities without which the dignity of protest is, if only subtly, threatened.

And perhaps a sound measure of a writer's acceptance of his environment is in the extent to which he keeps his protest within the realm of satire. Satire always suggests the possibility of the desirable, but the author of "The Facts of Life," in common with the surrealists, is much more nihilist than satirist. Even in A Ceremonial, which is about a Utopia, when Mr. Goodman names some of his good things of life—children, trees, baseball, the late quartets of Beethoven—all of which he describes with an idyllic charm, his pervasive tone is one of mocking his own utopianisms. At first glance, this turn on himself, this persistent double edge of irony, may give the impression of complexity, but actually, as we examine it, it comes to look rather more like self-protection; we get the sense, that is, of a personality determined to do the rejecting before it is itself rejected. As a matter of fact, in the story The Canoeist this is more than a sense; here Mr. Goodman's impulse to self-protection is openly, even consciously, stated.

I could wish to avoid using the word negativism to describe this dominant note of Mr. Goodman's work. The opposite of negativism is taken, these days, to mean the announcement of a program, and it is clearly one of the refreshments of "The Facts of Life" that it has no program. Nevertheless, Mr. Goodman's excessive mood of attack, his need to assert himself above our common survival and benefit, often renders his thrusts pointless—which is what we must finally mean by negativism. For instance, in the story University in Exile Mr. Goodman is describing a dinner party at an American home attended by an assorted group of refugees, and he makes the following comment on the lack of appetite of one of the foreign guests: "She was puzzled whether the meat was pork, veal, or horse. It was lamb, soaked for three days in buttermilk"; and one wonders against whom the exaggeration is intended—against the hostess for the extravagance of her culinary art, or against the guest whose sophistication is unequal to such reaches of cookery. We reach the conclusion, and not from these few lines alone, nor only from this story, but from the volume as a whole, that everyone is mocked—hostess, guest, and even reader, everyone except the author himself, who alone remains inviolate, strong in his advanced knowledge of lamb soaked in buttermilk but immune to such snobbish blandishments. The University in Exile, by the way, in its entirety is also the most blatant instance of Mr. Goodman's offense against charity. For surely the courage to write of refugees as if they were as economically and socially determined as other people would not be undermined, it could only be strengthened, by an instinct of sympathy for their displaced lives.

On the other hand, there is the title story of the book, the best piece Mr. Goodman reprints and quite exempt from this criticism. The Facts of Life is an account of what goes on in the mind of a nine-year-old upon discovering she is Jewish. Making the best literary use I know of clinical Freudian material, it is a wonderful excursion into the unconscious realm where the first knowledge of Jewishness merges with the already old knowledge of femaleness into an extremely witty and fearful elaboration of the castration fantasy. It is a fragrant story, communicating a complete fictional experience, unique in the volume for the human overtones it is able to set up. In trying to account for its quality, the idea is bound to occur to one that perhaps it is explained by the part that a familiar reality is allowed to play in its conception: the child's sex, age, religion, and class may be points of departure for the author's fancy, but they are points fixed with an unusual firmness in an accepted and acceptable world. By even this much of a fond acceptance of some dominion above the dominion of self Mr. Goodman does his gifts a great service—as he himself would seem to recognize by naming his whole volume from this single story, which is, in important ways, its anti-principle.

DIANA TRILLING

"Tomorrow's Small House"

MODERN architecture has acquired some powerful new friends—the mass-circulation magazines. Where will they carry it? They realize that they have hold of something good and are outdoing themselves to put it over in their own lavish way.

From among the countless plans, models, and color reproductions through which this purpose is being accomplished, the most convenient to study are those produced through the collaboration of the Ladies' Home Journal with the Museum of Modern Art and with an imposing list of modern architects. Here the "art work" at least, leaves nothing to be desired in its vivid and charming faithfulness. The original models, on display through the summer at the Museum in New York, have been fashioned with watch-making fidelity and love, some by Devon Dennett, some by Raymond Barger Studios, on a scale of one inch to the foot, which means that a house seventy-five feet long is reproduced at the length of an ordinary bed or long table. Each model brings to life not only a house but the surrounding grounds; the trees and shrubbery are reproduced not by the accustomed sickly green sponges but by remarkable dwarf-plant material; and the interiors are complete down to the last teacup in its tiny saucer.

The collection indicates unmistakably, first of all, that the men who set out to destroy architectural "styles" have succeeded, in the course of twenty years, in creating one. All the houses are low and sharply cut. All throw great sheets of glass to sunward. All move in the large, clear, repetitive rhythm of the standard module. All but two are a single story high, and turn themselves indoors out in such a manner that an occupant could walk out of almost any part directly on to grass—or on to ice and snow. Every example speaks in the common vocabulary, which is crisp and purged and pol-

SIX of Them

By Alfred Neumann
Author of Another Caesar, The Gaudy Empire, etc.

Six Germans — who distributed anti-Nazi leaflets in Munich—had the ability to see through fascist propaganda, the spirit to defy the Gestapo, the courage to die together. In moving human terms this novel shows why, translating newspaper headlines into flesh and blood, into the fear, love, and anguish of six individuals. $2.75

New Crops for the New World

Edited by Charles Morrow Wilson
Author of Ambassadors in White

Of utmost importance to our hemisphere are the facts told in this book—the great migration of crops from the Orient to Latin America, and the birth of an entirely new inter-American economy. Chapters by fourteen distinguished authorities. $3.50

At your bookstore
MACMILLAN

ished. The term "modern" architecture now belongs in quotes, having achieved an identity, a manner, a look, that can easily be recognized by a broad public. It is this which renders "modern" architecture eligible for the new large-scale promotion, and, indeed, the common method of working will alone make possible large-scale production.

Less fortunate than a standardized method of work is the standard attitude which is taken toward methods of family living. It is unlikely that the group of leading architects represented could all independently have arrived at so nearly the same concept, an unimaginative one. It is easier to believe that there was close supervision by some unidentified top-side editor or other public-relations man who thought that he knew a great deal more about "public acceptance" than any mere architect. At any rate, all the houses are based on substantially the same schedule of rooms: first, a living-dining-kitchen combination, thrown always into an "open planning" area; then one or more small bedrooms for children and a large master bedroom for the parents; finally, a plentitude of sanitary facilities and a garage or carport. The interpretation supplied by the architects tends, as the Museum booklet remarks, to an elongated rectangular plan. This might better be called a "Pullman" plan, with all the main rooms strung along one side of a long corridor but with the difference that one or two auxiliary spaces such as bathrooms and carports may be placed on the other side.

How might a family live in such a house? It is to be feared that this kind of plan is just as conventional by now as the stock "Colonial" plan. If the house is really small, then the social rooms in the "open planning sequence" are not big enough, for example, to fool the radio. If the noise-loving children are to occupy this area, driving out the parents, then the furniture is too good for what they will want of it. If the good furniture is to be occupied by the parents, then the children are driven either entirely out of the house or into tiny cubicles marked "children's rooms," which generally are not big enough to play in, or, upon achievement of adolescence by the children, to entertain in. The absence of any usable equivalent for the old attic and basement, so essential to family life, negates much of the aesthetic charm. "Open planning" can become an empty shibboleth.

If the magazine and the museum have fostered better style than might be expected, they have fostered poorer planning. Another note should be made on cost. Although the sponsors talk glibly about a housing program embracing 1,250,000 dwellings a year (one-fourth more than the best yet), and although they point to a large middle group of families receiving $2,000 to $3,000 annually and able to lay aside $4,000 to $6,000 for a house, the exhibit itself bears no appreciable relation to any such program. In the judgment of qualified architects, most of the models exhibited would fall entirely outside this cost range, and a client would be lucky to build the most ambitious one for a cent under $30,000 today. The Museum begs the issue; but is this wise? The Museum puts forth its exhibit as something obtainable with "full use" of our "present potentialities." "Modern" architecture should stop leaning on the invisible, or on the future. "Modern" architecture is twenty years old and should accept the responsibilities of maturity, dealing with here and now.

A bad effect of using purely hypothetical costs is that architects avoid making realistic choices in detail. For example, the typical "open" plan of the Museum show is intrinsically costly. It demands much ground, so that neighbors may not stare in at every glass wall. A single story demands nearly twice as much expensive roof as two. A spread-out arrangement involves much periphery to be maintained and, in all but the balmier climates, to be heated: like the naked Indian, some of these houses are "all face." Superimposed on the costliness of novel detailing is the cost of greater tightness required by the big exterior surface and by the fine lines. For lack of close attention to costs, the architect's own best effects can be turned against him. For example, through open planning it has been possible to obtain an expressive big social room out of an area formerly occupied by a separate living-room, dining-room, and kitchen; and by the magic of glass it has been possible to add the out-of-doors to this living space, psychologically. Yet if costs

Two Timely Books on the Roman Catholic Church:

"CRUX ANSATA — AN INDICTMENT OF THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH."
By H. G. Wellls . . . . $1.75 (Cloth binding)

"BEHIND THE DICTATORS." A fully documented analysis of Vatican-Fascist collaboration.
By L. H. Lehmann . . . $1.00 (Paper binding)

COMBINATION OFFER Both these two books in paper binding for $2.00

ORDER FROM:
AGORA PUBLISHING CO.,
229 West 48th Street New York 19, N. Y.

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street
New York 7, N. Y.

Dear Sirs:

I want to subscribe to The Nation, or the following Nation magazine combinations as listed below:

....

....

....

☐ Remittance enclosed ☐ Bill me

NAME..............................
STREET..............................
CITY.............................. ZONE...... STATE...........
7-28-45

Money-Saving
Magazine Combinations

●

THE Nation
with Harpers Magazine $6.50
You save $2.50
with Consumers Union $7.00
You save $1.50
with HARPERS & Consumers Union $9.00
You save $3.50
with Free World $7.50
You save $1.50
with Saturday Review $8.50
You save $1.50

All club combinations listed are for one year, and may be mailed to different individuals and addresses. Canadian and foreign postage extra.

THE NATION BY ITSELF

1 Year $5 2 Years $8
3 Years $11
Servicemen's Rate: $3 a Year

Canadian and Foreign Postage, $1 a Year Extra run high, there will be an irresistible temptation to shrivel the actual dimensions, putting dependence on the illusion, until in the end the psychological space and the space outside are paid for out of space inside that might have been physically real and highly useful.

Fortunately there are architects who do pay strict attention to cost relationships, and one of them, Vernon de Mars, produced the exceptional house of the exhibit. It is two stories high, saving ground and roof. At some sacrifice of cross-ventilation, neighbors economize greatly by sharing the party wall. A basement might be a help, but at least the boys have a bedroom as large as the parents'. Sanitary facilities of a not too ambitious kind are nicely related not only to bedrooms but to work spaces such as kitchen, garden, and car. The house looks very pleasant, and so does the long back garden on a modest 30x100 lot. Significantly enough, the plan is the old four-square Colonial plan, except that the family car is stowed in what would have been the library.

There are other good examples to hand, many of them, not forgetting the workable little country house designed for McCall's in June by Wurster and Bernardi. But perhaps it may be said that "public-relations modern," having achieved a clear vocabulary and the means of aesthetic charm, must begin to turn realistic about families and about costs. The only future it can count on now is what it makes.

DOUGLAS HASKELL

STAGE PLAY

MICHAEL TODD Presents

UP IN CENTRAL PARK

Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS Lyrics by DOROTHY FIELDS Music by SIGMUND ROMBERG

BROADWAY THEATRE, Broadway & 53rd Street. Matinees Wed. & Sat.

REALLY AIR-CONDITIONED

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs, Information Service, Dramatic Index. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

BLOOD DONORS NEEDED!

YOU WILL NEVER MISS the pint of blood you give to the Red Cross, or the contribution you make to the Red Cross War Fund. But the first may save the life of a fighting American, and the second will help furnish him with "a home away from home."

DO IT NOW! Give your blood to replace blood shed in your defense; telephone your Red Cross Blood Donor Center today and make an appointment for a donation. Send your check today to the Red Cross War Fund.

MOTION PICTURES

WARNER BROS.' MAGNIFICENT
RHAPSODY IN BLUE
IT'S GEORGE GERSHWIN'S JUBILANT STORY!
NOW HOLLYWOOD THEATRE

Barbara STANWYCK • Dennis MORGAN

Sydney GREENSTREET

IN WARNER BROS. NEW HIT!

"CHRISTMAS IN CONNECTICUT"

In Person! ERSKINE HAWKINS

And His Orchestra

Also In Person—THE CHARIOTEERS

BEN CARTER and MANTAN MORELAND

B'WAY AT 47th ST. STRAND

"A commanding screen biography." . . Crowther, Times.

DARRYL F. ZANUCK'S

WILSON

In Technicolor

Directed by HENRY KING Written for the Screen by LAMAR TROTTI

A 20th Century-Fox Picture

With Alexander Knox . . Charles Coburn . . Geraldine Fitzgerald . . Thomas Mitchell . . Ruth Nelson . . Sir Cedric Hardwicke . . Vincent Price . . William Eythe . . Mary Anderson . . and a huge cast of 12,000.

Popular Prices ROXY 7th Ave. at 50th Street

BETTY HUTTON

ARTURO DE CORDOVA

in Paramount's

"INCENDIARY BLONDE"

In Technicolor

with Charles Ruggles

Barry Fitzgerald • Maurice Rocco

In Person!

"The Hour of Charm"

All-Girl Orch.

Under the Direction of

Phil Spitalny

With

Evelyn • Jeannie

Francine • Viola

Mack Triplets

All American Glee Club • Imogene Coca

NOW PLAYING PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

RESORTS

Something NEW in a Summer Resort!

BILL'S VEGETARIAN HOUSE

WITH LATEST MODERN CONVENIENCES

where Nature's Food is Served to you according to the latest Nutritional Ideas in a Variety of Tasty Succulent, Nourishing Dishes, Salads and Beverages.

In the Cool Catskills, 2,300 feet above sea-level set in a panorama of woods and mountains.

Only $35 Per week and up

Write for Reservations to

BILL'S VEGETARIAN HOUSE

P. O. BOX 72 PARKSVILLE, N. Y.

PHONE, LIBERTY 104 F 2

J. FLAMENBAUM, Prop.

50 MILES TO FOREST HOUSE

VACATIONING at Forest House provides the ultimate in rest and relaxation. Superb location, two lakes, all sports. Congenial hospitality, fine food and splendid accommodations. Lake Mahopac 688.

FOREST HOUSE

LAKE MAHOPAC, N. Y., TEL. MAHOPAC 688

ARCADIA Fishkill, N. Y. Tel. Beacon 727

R. R. Station, Beacon, N. Y., 60 miles from city. ALL SPORTS, including tennis, volley ball, hand-ball, ping-pong, swimming in spacious pool, etc. Recordings. Informal social surroundings, delicious food.

Reservations only after August 12

Timberland POTTERSVILLE, N. Y.

AN ADULT CAMP IN THE ADIRONDACKS

LIMITED TO 100

ALL SPORTS • PRIVATE LAKE

DANCING • LECTURES • CONCERTS

N. Y. OFFICE: 33 W. 42 St. LOngacre 5-3674

The Rare Charm of an Intimate Congenial Group

APARTMENT WANTED

SHARE OR SUBLET, 1-2 rooms, apartment, reasonable degree of privacy. Publicity woman, highest references. Box 1542 c/o The Nation.

COUNTRY BOARD

A FEW PAYING GUESTS in exceptionally beautiful spacious Vermont home on top of lovely hill overlooking all ridges of Green Mountains. P. O. Box 86, Montpelier, Vt., or Box 1530, c/o The Nation.

FARMS AND ACREAGE

STONE HOUSE; best modern improvements; brooks; springs; cave; view; good barns; 180 acres; pine and hardwood. In N. Y., 8 miles Lenox; $12,500. Terms. Berkshire Farm Agency, Chatham, N. Y.

SUMMER RENTAL

MODERN HOUSE, 7 rooms, completely furnished. Frigidaire, fireplace, piano, screened porch, 2 baths. 18 acres, view. 2½ hours N. Y. C. AL 4-9727. Box 1539, c/o The Nation.

RESORTS

ADIRONDACKS

ESTATE providing exquisite natural charm for gracious, modest living . . .

CRYSTAL LAKE—a 60 acre natural spring-fed lake, entirely within the property of 800 acres, surrounded by rich woodland with magnificent mountain views.

Accommodations in main Residence and Cottages (steam heated), Boathouse, Tennis, Riding, Fishing. Golf nearby. Every facility conveniently located.

6½ hrs. from Grand Central Station 2½ hrs. from LaGuardia Field, Colonial Airline

Rate: Residence $100, Cottage $75

CRYSTAL LAKE LODGE
Chestertown, N. Y.

I. H. KESSLER
271 Madison Ave.
N.Y.C.—MU 5-0493

FOR FUN AND SUN
STAY AND PLAY AT

MAUD'S SUMMER RAY

NORTH BRANCH SULL. CO., N. Y.

Telephone: Callicoon 95 or 148

PRIVATE LAKE
ALL SPORTS
FORUMS
THEATRE ARTISTS

SOCIAL DOINGS
DANCE ORCHESTRA
DRAMATICS
MARIONETTES
MUSICALES

FRED BERK & DANCE GROUP

MORT FREEMAN, Popular Radio & Concert Artist

SENSIBLE RATES

Erie R. R. to Callicoon

Private cars from your house direct to Maud's

DAILY BUSES DIRECT

Mountain Transit Lines, Greyhound Terminal 50th St. and 8th Ave. • COlumbus 5-3000

Call City Information: Dickens 2-5786

RELAX, REJOICE with SUMMER at . . .

Lakecrest

On Hunn's Lake • Stanfordville, N. Y.

90 miles from N. Y. Ideal location in the heart of DUTCHESS COUNTY. Excellent accommodations. Cordial hospitality. Recordings. Library. All seasonal sports. Via N.Y.C.R.R. to Amenia, N.Y. Open all year.

WRITE OR PHONE YOUR RESERVATIONS

EVA BERG, Director Stanfordville 4108

NEW — Opened by Veteran World War II

THE COLONIAL TERRACE Hotel & Restaurant Peekskill, N. Y.

Open All Year

Swimming • Tennis • Ping Pong

Field Activities • Dietary Laws

Rates and Information on Request

PARK TERRACE HOTEL

A New Hotel for Your Pleasure

LAKE HUNTINGTON NEW YORK

Attractive rooms, Jewish-American Cuisine. Swimming, rowing on beautiful Lake Huntington. Dance Orchestra, Playhouse, Tennis, other activities. Musicales by well known concert pianist, Rebecca Luper. An ideal resting place and congenial atmosphere. For prompt reservations, call Lake Huntington 28. Directions: All buses to Lake Huntington stop directly in front of our hotel. Your train fare (Erie R. R.) includes taxi service direct to our door.

SCULPTURE

SCULPTURE by Nicholas Mocharniuk. Marquie Gallery, 16 West 57th Street, New York City.

EDITORIAL ASSISTANCE

EXPERIENCED EDITOR, researcher, rewrite, wants position or free-lance assignments. Especially successful manuscript revision. French, German translation, adaptation. Highest references. Box 1541 c/o The Nation.

Music

B. H. HAGGIN

MY ADMIRATION for Schnabel's playing has represented perception of his powers, not blindness to his weaknesses. In no other pianist's performances have we heard the sharp contours and subtle inflection of phrase, the clearly outlined structure of Schnabel's best performances; but he has occasionally chosen a tempo that was too slow or too fast, or not maintained it steadily, or pushed the expressiveness of a phrase to the point of distorting its form, or driven fortissimos beyond the limits of agreeable sound. And ever since his year's retirement for meditation and writing there have been occasional performances like the broadcast one of Beethoven's Concerto No. 3 with the New York Philharmonic on June 17, in which it was evident that he had not taken the trouble to achieve mastery of his fingers in the playing of the notes—a mastery without which there was imperfect execution not only of passage-work but of subtle phraseological inflection. The performance was like a ruin of the great performance in the Victor set.

The first of the Stadium Concerts ballet nights offered "Leonide Massine's Ballet Russe Highlights." The company is a little group of six principals: Massine, Lazovsky, Eglevsky, Baronova, Anna Istomina, Kathryn Lee; its repertory comprises bits of the old ballet repertory and a number of pieces newly created by Massine. Of the new things I saw the Russian, Polish, and Bohemian Dances, in which Massine merely arranged national steps, were engaging; but the others—whether serious, like "Vision" to Bach's Air for G string, and "The Warrior" to Rachmaninov's G minor Prelude; or humorous, like "Première Polka" and "At the Dentist"; or fanciful, like "Bumble Bee" to the Rimsky-Korsakov piece, and "Contredanses" to Beethoven's music—are rubbish.

The old things I saw were the "Nutcracker" pas de deux, danced by Baronova and Eglevsky, the "Blue Bird" pas de deux, danced by Istomina and Eglevsky, "Le Spectre de la rose," danced by Baronova and Eglevsky, the Barman's Dance from "Union Pacific," danced by Massine, and the finale of "Capriccio Espagnol," danced by the entire group.

In the performances the men stood out—each in his own style—as the great dancers they are. Eglevsky, hampered by new partners and other unfavorable conditions, did not reach his top form of last season, but did some beautiful classical dancing. On the other hand Massine's presence and subtle art exercised their effect even under unfavorable conditions. And Lazovsky's theater and dance brilliance—the ease, the incisive and continuous rhythm of his soaring and whirling—also was unaffected by those conditions.

Every score of Aaron Copland shows his technical expertness and assurance; but these do not in every instance produce a piece of music that is enjoyable or interesting; and for me "Appalachian Spring" is one of the instances in which they do not. It is, of course, music for a stage work; and it may be that what I didn't enjoy in the music was related to what I didn't enjoy in Martha Graham's choreography. I had, not long before, heard a few young ladies fresh from Vassar exclaim over the artificiality of classic ballet and its limitations as an expressive medium as compared with modern dance; but I was much more aware of artificiality and limitations in the grim, angular prancing that I saw Martha Graham's company do at Bennington some years ago, and again in the more genial "Appalachian Spring" recently; and I suggest that those young ladies look at classic ballet next time with these observations of Edwin Denby in mind: "The expressive virtue of any dancing is its rhythm, and its rhythm is felt only in continuities (or phrases) of movement that offer the audience variations of bodily impetus clearly set in relation to a fixed space. And these long phrases of movement convey the specific meaning of the ballet—its drama. As the impetus of successive phrases of music suggest to the hearer a particular quality of emotion and thought, so the successive phrases of a ballet suggest to the observer a particular quality of human action. When you watch a girl moving about a room you sometimes guess what the quality of movement 'means.' It is not that she expresses herself by making handies; she does it by the rhythm of her actions. We often understand animals that way and they us. And in love we all know how dramatic such a moment of understanding is. It seems to tell more than any words and say it more irrevocably. And this is the natural phenomenon on which the art of ballet is built as a convincing human expression."

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

Two Forms of Fascism

Dear Sirs: The present war is often called a war against fascism. This has been agreed upon by people holding a great variety of political and economic beliefs. I feel that this agreement is less complete than it seems because of the variety of connotations the term has gained in the last decade.

It seems to me that fascism as it has been practiced in Germany, Italy, Japan, Spain, and Argentina has had two phases. The first might be called the ideological phase; it has been presented to us by the ministers of propaganda of the fascist nations as Nazism, Fascism, Shintoism, and Phalangism. As an ideology fascism usually involves some or all of the following ideas and institutions—dictatorship by one party, a Führer, Duce, or Emperor, a master race, the subjugation of the individual to the state, the loss of civil liberties, a scapegoat for the ills of the country, an expansionist national policy, indoctrination of youth and early military training, the suppression of grass-roots Christianity often coupled with the substitution of some form of paganism, and the exaltation of intense nationalism. The second phase represents a situation which developed to a greater extent in Germany and Italy than in the other fascist nations. I refer to the way in which the vested interests, the land and property owners, and, in general, the privileged classes used the first phase of fascism, which was supported by a fanatical minority, as a lever with which to control the policies of the nation and suppress popular uprisings, people's parties, and other movements seeking to change the status quo. Two questions which might incidentally be considered at this point are: Was it reasonable, in the light of history, to expect that the second phase would follow the first? Are there forces in all capitalist nations which are always on the alert for a movement which might be used as a lever for the second phase of fascism?

I know some people have never included the second phase of fascism in their thinking on the subject. They see in fascism nothing more than a large-scale Ku Klux Klan or Silver Shirts organization. There are those in any country who find themselves potentially in the position of the groups who have used the first phase of fascism as a lever, and they find it easy in their own minds to justify such action. In condemning fascism they would be careful to lay all the stress on the first phase. Consequently the arrest and punishment of a Goebbels or a Himmler would be made to appear of much greater importance than that of a Krupp or a Thyssen. I myself stress rather the danger of the second phase because of its greater power for evil. I think that clearing up the haziness between these two phases of fascism would bring into the open in this country as well as among our allies the real issues of this war.

OWEN C. THOMAS

Washington, D. C., July 17

Giving Life to the Court

Dear Sirs: The prestige of the World Court must be established. Therefore when it has been set up and is ready to function, why should not an armistice be sought with Japan with the declared intention of submitting the whole question of The United States and the British Empire vs. Japan to the court for its decision?

Such a procedure would seem to be desirable for two reasons: (1) We are a people who believe in law and justice. Therefore we would derive more satisfaction from any decision handed down in a court of justice than from the most severe penalty which could be imposed upon Japan by force of arms. (2) The strength and authority of the World Court will, at the start, depend upon the willingness of the people of the world to submit to its verdicts. To have a case of the importance of Japan's aggression laid before the court at its very inception would establish a precedent that would be the breath of life to this instrument which we have conceived in order to maintain the peace of the world.

ALFRED A. KING

Lincoln, Neb., July 16

News from France

[The following letter was received by a member of the Nation staff from a former fighter in the resistance in France.]

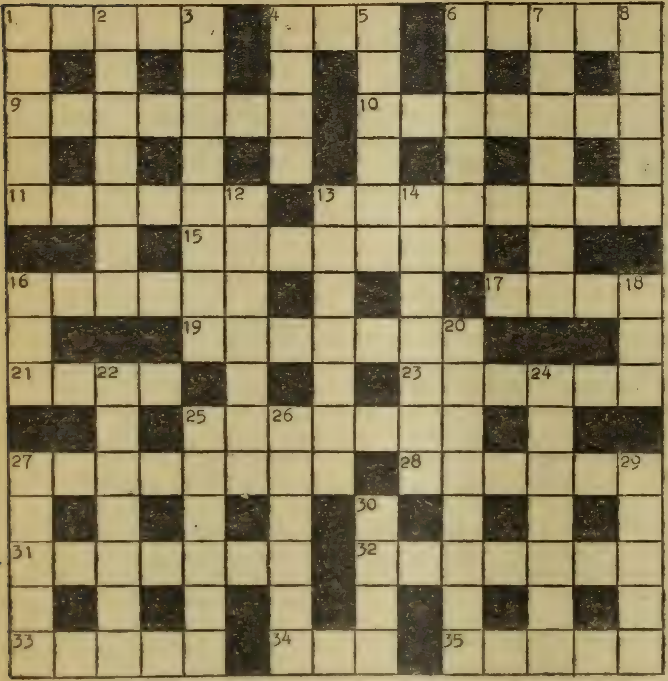
My brother Jean came home four days ago after five years in German prison camps. He would have arrived earlier but he contracted typhus en route. The

Crossword Puzzle No. 122

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 Home sweet home to someone
4 Cheek
6 May adorn a tale
9 Sounds like rain (hyphen, 3-1-3)
10 Goes to bed (two words, 5 and 2)
11 "Gorgeous Georges" Carpentier's favorite flower
13 Time indefinitely
15 He loves an argument
16 "The moving ------ writes; and having writ, moves on"
17 Has been defined as "nothing divided by two"
19 Children make chains of these flowers
21 Head down, eye on the ball, slowly back, and don't press. That's it!
23 Stuff straw hats are made of 25 "One who contends for a prize in public games" (dictionary)
27 This should reduce the swelling
28 Second tallest tower in the world
31 Out of the ordinary
32 Stuff porridge is made of 33 A European capital
34 Kind of bread, or whiskey
35 Chinese

DOWN

1 "I thought I saw a banker's clerk descending from an omnibus: I looked again and then I saw it was a -----potamus"
2 I will be found between two containers in Rome
3 Heavier on one side than on the other
4 Deceased
5 Sounds like a motor-boat (hyphen, 3-3)
6 Keeps bricks together yet keeps them apart
7 He lived in comfortable retirement for 39 years after writing William Tell
8 A change of linen for a former Russian dictator
12 Disorder
13 Mother and boys demand fruit
14 The other side includes a reserve
16 Nature's blackout
18 This horse hasn't a leg to stand on
20 More than satisfies
22 Belgian province where they make that effluvial cheese
24 A number often mentioned by cribbage players
25 Wake up!
26 He who had the care of horses at an inn
27 Symptomatic of some throat or chest trouble
29 Palely-purplish flower
30 How many legs has an octopus?

* * *

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 121

ACROSS:—1 BRAINS; 5 FLATTOP; 10 GRACE-NOTE; 11 APTLY; 12 ATHALIE; 13 SEABELL; 14 TABLE; 16 HI-JACKERS; 18 HANSEATIC; 20 SARAH; 22 MUMMERS; 24 SORGHUM; 26 OKAPI; 27 FURNITURE; 28 KISSERS; 29 TWENTY.

DOWN:—2 ROACH; 3 ICEFLOE; 4 SHOVEL HAT; 5 FLEAS; 6 ARAMAIC; 7 TO THE REAR; 8 PHYLLIS; 9 AGHAST; 15 BY NO MEANS; 17 JACK SPRAT; 18 HEMLOCK; 19 EREMITE; 20 SERVICE; 21 HAMLET; 23 SOFAS; 25 HAUNT.

Nazis made good use of his medical training: he worked in fifteen different camps! During that time he helped hundreds of prisoners to escape. Toward the end a large number of politcial deportees—Germans, Poles, Serbs, Czechs, and Frenchmen—were transferred to his camp. His job was to sort out the corpses each morning, an average of two hundred a day. Some were in a frightful state, for during the night the living had tried to eat them. Some of our friends have recently returned from Buchenwald or Auschwitz. The very sight of them makes one shiver.

When you look around, you can't help feeling a sense of disquiet about the future of this world. Where are the solutions that can keep this from ever happening again? It's high time to concern ourselves about a few of the Nazis in France, England, and the United States, as well as in Germany. There are still many in France, but they've gone underground so well that it is difficult to dig them out.

In France things aren't going too well—two million homes destroyed, no coal, nothing to eat. We'd like to explain to the American High Command that it is slightly indecent to feed German prisoners better rations than the French civilians are eating today.

The San Francisco conference seemed like a game of blind man's bluff in a dark room. What will come out of it? We're beginning to wonder whether we shan't wake up one morning five years from now to find that some of the United Nations are allied with Germany. A. R.

Paris, May 19

CONTRIBUTORS

MEYER LEVIN has recently returned from Europe, where he was a correspondent for the Overseas News Agency.

JOACHIM JOESTEN is the author of "What Russia Wants" and the forthcoming "The Nazis at Bay."

ROBERT CHANDLER is the pseudonym of a Washington economist.

UMA SHANKAR is an Indian journalist now in the United States.

E. H. JACOBY has recently returned to this country after having been interned by the Japanese in Manila during the occupation.

CAPTAIN X served as an American officer throughout the campaign on Luzon and had full opportunity to study the "People's Anti-Japanese Army."

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 161 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • AUGUST 4, 1945 NUMBER 5

Great Britain Goes Socialist

BY HAROLD J. LASKI

London, July 27 (by cable)

THE Labor Party has come to power. It has won 390 seats at least. It has majority of not less than 130 over the whole House of Commons. It has defeated 26 of Mr. Churchill's ministers, including men like L. S. Amery, Sir James Grigg, and Mr. Brendan Bracken. The Liberal Party has been massacred: its leader, Sir Archibald Sinclair, and its special aces, Sir William Beveridge and Lady Violet Bonham-Carter, were both defeated. So were Mr. Churchill's son and his son-in-law, Mr. Duncan Sandys, the Minister of Works. The left got fifteen million votes as against ten million votes for the right. Mr. Churchill, who will not return to Potsdam, resigned last night, and Mr. Attlee accepted the King's commission to form the first Labor government with a majority in the history of Great Britain. On any showing, this an epoch in our lives, perhaps an epoch in the life of the world.

Why did it occur? Why was Mr. Churchill, who two months ago seemed at the pinnacle of power, to find it taken from him by the massive and deliberate decision of the people?

The answer, I think, is threefold. First, there was widespread resentment at Mr. Churchill's effort to make this election a vote of personal confidence in himself. That seemed a Führerprinzip, a claim to indispensability which is out of harmony with the essential principles of democratic government. Second, I think I may fairly say that there was widespread disgust at the way in which Mr. Churchill allowed himself to become the instrument of Lord Beaverbrook's stunts and scares. It showed a febrile irresponsibility, if I may venture a personal word, to paint an inoffensive scholar like myself as the head of the Socialist Gestapo. Thirdly, no one believed that the vested interests behind Mr. Churchill had any serious convictions about the large-scale programs of social reform he announced. Everyone knew that they wanted to get back to normalcy as rapidly as possible. Finally, Mr. Churchill never understood—an amazing index to his mind—that with the fighting man no less than the civilian he was dealing with people who had been thinking hard for five years and were determined to be done, once and for all, with the old order.

The Labor Party in the new House of Commons will be the best party we have ever had. It is fully representative of most areas, geographical and functional—the cathedral city as well as the mining village, Tory strongholds like Dover as well as business symbols like the exchange divisions of Manchester and Liverpool. It has broken the Chamberlain tradition in Birmingham. It has an overwhelming majority in London and its suburban areas. It has won a goodly number of rural seats, its first big triumph in the countryside. Professors, lawyers, doctors, school teachers, journalists, business men, trade-union organizers, and trade unionists from the assembly line—all these have their due meed of representation. Above all, and to me best of all, it is a young party and the youth is contributed by the service candidates, rank and file as well as officers, among whom I am certain that I could name confidently at least three as the leaders of the Labor Party in the next generation.

It is a grim task upon which the Labor government embarks. First, it has to give all its energy and aid to the swift and decisive defeat of Japan. Simultaneously it must employ all its powers to evoke a new sense of hope in Europe and, out of that evocation, to make the unity of the three great powers real and unbreakable. It must end the era of support for obsolete monarchs in exile and decayed systems of privilege which have been accustomed to look to Downing Street for support. It must press forward with genuine determination to Indian freedom. It must make that pan-Arabism, so carefully cultured since 1939, understand decisively that the tragic remnant of European Jewry will not be sacrificed to make a holiday for Arab effendi in any part of the Middle East. It must give to France, yes, and to renascent Italy, the kind of friendship which gives power to their creative genius. It must use its new influence to rebuild the unity of the working-class movement all over the world. Is it too much to hope that we may look for active support from America? For there innumerable men and women organized the greatest campaign in the history of the nation to eliminate insecurity and fear and give new status to the underprivileged. Nor did the objectives of the New Deal stop at national boundaries. The vision of Franklin D. Roosevelt included a world in which the Four Freedoms had become a reality. The foreign policy of the Labor Government points toward such a goal; its fulfillment will require the active cooperation of the liberal and working-class movement of America.

On the domestic side the problems are also immense. We have at once to try and build the foundations of socialism within the structure of a society dominated by a capitalist economy, and to carry through those immediate measures like housing, the orderly demobilization of the fighting men, the reorganization for peace of the war-time economic controls which touch every phase of our national life. It will not be easy once the first excitement has died down. Privilege in Britain is strong. It has the psychological tenacity of a group of men accustomed to the habit of power. There will be relentless opposition on every inch of the road. Victory will depend upon the courage and audacity of the new Cabinet. This is not a time for half measures. It is not a time for doubt. It is a time to go forward boldly and to show in deeds the actual faith of the party in its principles. That is the way to overcome the persistent efforts the City will make, as did Wall Street with Roosevelt, to render the path a hard one. That is the way also to keep the House of Lords in its place. I think there is a real chance of this. As the country has moved left, so the party has moved left. Also there is a strong following in the new members for the policy of great experiment, boldly conceived and skilfully and resolutely exercised. This is to be a socialist government. It is by being socialist that it will hold the public opinion it has won.

The American who seeks to understand this election must compare it with the historic victory of the Whigs in 1832. After long years of reaction, the old aristocratic Toryism was compelled to give way before the advance of the middle class. The structure of bourgeois democracy was built into the foundations on which the superstructure of aristocratic privilege had been erected. In the election of 1945 the Fourth Estate, the common people, have opened the barriers which shut them out from their right to power. The Labor Party in their name will seek to make a revolution by consent. It will try to build the socialist commonwealth for the creation of which it has a decisive mandate by the processes of constitutional democracy. That ought to be possible. I hope it will be possible. But I think of the fate of the Weimar Republic, of Italy handed to Mussolini by vested interests, of Spanish democracy slain without protest from those who should have been its friends, of Austria gobbled up by Hitler while democracy in Europe and America pretended that it was not their concern. Where the rights of property are concerned, its owners lose all sense of reason and justice in their passion to make the state power the servant of their right to exploit the masses of people.

Will it be different this time? I do not know. Much depends on the courage of the Labor government. It is still true, as Pericles said, that courage is the secret of freedom. Much depends on its ability at home to make this great adventure a great training of the people in the knowledge of their power. Much depends abroad on the eagerness and the speed with which the government evokes all over Europe the half-awakened forces of democracy. They are there, waiting for the encouragement which would give them the right to cooperate with this new Britain with all their strength. There is the Soviet Union, which could, and I think will, draw the inference from the Labor party's victory that a great bastion of its military security has been gained on which a stronger friendship between our peoples can be built. There is India, with whom we can hope to write a new chapter in our common destiny.

The chance is there. The faith is there. We must organize behind them will and determination so that, out of the horror of this war, there may come—if slowly, nevertheless surely—a renovation of the human spirit which will turn it toward creativeness and plenty instead of toward destruction and suffering. This is a day, indeed, to echo the famous sentence, "We have nothing to lose but our chains and a world to win."

Let us go forward to the fulfilment of emancipation. If it is wise for us to be humble, it is not less wise for us to remember that destiny has given us a supreme opportunity.

IN THIS ISSUE

EDITORIALS

Great Britain Goes Socialist by Harold J. Laski 97

The Shape of Things 99

Revolution by Ballot 101

Enemies of the Charter 102

Japan's Choice 103

ARTICLES

Labor, Vets, and Jobs by Charles G. Bolté 104

America's Post-War Trade—II by Robert Chandler 106

Leopold III: Traitor or Patriot? by Jean E. Grosfils 108

In the Wind 109

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall 110

Apologies to Vansittart by Albert Guérard 111

Briefer Comment 112

Music by B. H. Haggin 115

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor J. KING GORDON
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Editor Political War Section
J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor J. MITCHELL MORSE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates
LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL
JONATHAN DANIELS
CAREY MCWILLIAMS
REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1945, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 818 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

THERE WERE NO DARK HORSES AMONG THOSE named by Mr. Attlee for leading positions in the new British government before he left for Potsdam. Bevin, Morrison, Cripps, Greenwood, Dalton are men of the highest standing in the Labor Party and its most experienced administrators. But in matching men with offices the Prime Minister confounded some of the prophets. True, the appointment of Ernest Bevin as Foreign Minister was generally expected; his speech at the Blackpool Labor Conference in May was a frank bid for the position. From the point of view of the striped-trousers school of diplomacy the choice of this burly, plain-spoken trade-union leader is incongruous to say the least. Let them recall how admirably Arthur Henderson, another trade-union leader, filled this office in the last Labor government. Mr. Ernest Bevin is as British as Winston Churchill, but, unlike him, internationally minded. He has excelled as a negotiator in the hard school of industrial relations, he will not be intimidated by anyone, and he will certainly not become the Charlie McCarthy of his permanent officials. Herbert Morrison, with his drive, his administrative ability, and his understanding of economics, had been considered a natural for the treasury. Instead he becomes Lord President of the Council, an office without specific administrative responsibilities, and Leader of the House of Commons. This means he will be charged with pushing the government's legislative program through Parliament, a task to which, as a skilled political strategist and a keen debater, he is well suited. With Morrison otherwise engaged, Hugh Dalton, one of the party's chief economic experts, had a clear path to the Treasury. The selection of Sir Stafford Cripps, however, as President of the Board of Trade, has been a surprise. In our view it is an excellent choice. This is a key position in the reconstruction of trade and industry, and no one has a firmer grasp than Cripps of the nature of the problems to be solved.

*

BIG BUSINESS IN BRITAIN IS STUNNED BY THE Tory defeat but, when it comes to, it will surely seek to nullify the verdict of the polls. It has lost its grip on the machinery of the state but economic power will afford it many opportunities to delay, block, and sabotage Labor's program. In such activities British business can count on the sympathy of American business men and, if we allow it, their positive aid. Already Arthur Krock has portentously declared in the New York Times that "our foreign economic policy must be resurveyed" in the light of British Labor's proposals to nationalize certain industries and "to engage in a highly expensive program of public housing and social security." (The very large Conservative pledges on this score appear to have escaped his notice; or, perhaps, he did not take them seriously.) Fearing that Labor's program may produce "a demoralized British economy," Mr. Krock says the United States must watch its commitments; "it should not underwrite State Socialism." He then quotes with approval Mr. Baruch's advocacy of measures to safeguard America against foreign socialization schemes, the promotion of cartels, and "the undercutting of human standards." This is confusing. It is the British Conservatives who have fostered international cartels, and Labor is far more likely to cooperate with the United States in their suppression. Nor do we see a British Labor Government "cutting human standards": that surely is a trick of private enterprise. Nevertheless the drift of the Krock-Baruch thinking is clear enough: to protect the American "system" our financial and economic power must be used to thwart socialism abroad. We submit that in this day and age such a doctrine is political dynamite.

*

THE TESTIMONY OF THE CHIEF WITNESSES IN the trial of Marshal Pétain has been largely a defense of their records. Pétain indeed has come to seem like a lay figure—and his stony silence reinforces the impression. Whatever prestige he had left, even upon his return to France, seems to have melted away; it is significant that whereas in a poll of French opinion last September only 3 per cent wanted him to suffer the death penalty, in May of this year the figure has risen to 40 per cent. As man and marshal of France, Pétain is finished, whatever the verdict may be. The main interest of his trial lies in the fact that it has turned into a wide-ranging examination of the reasons for the French disaster. And the examination is going on outside the court as well. Francois Mauriac, writing in Figaro, asserts, for instance, that not only Daladier but everyone in France and elsewhere who applauded the Munich pact must accept a share of guilt.

> Pétain [he writes] has assumed before God and man responsibilities of which nobody can relieve him. But we should be hypocrites if, before joining our voices with all who accuse him, each of us did not ask himself: "What did I do or write or think at the time of Munich? In what mood did I greet the armistice?"

Pétain's trial has thrown into bold relief the outlines of the civil war that was going on in France long before the outbreak of the war between the nations in 1939 and is now moving into its decisive phase. M. Mauriac's excoriation is just, but we hope the thesis that "we are all guilty" will not be carried too far. The civil war is still on. It must end not in an amnesty to misguided leaders and vicious tendencies on the ground that they stopped short of treachery, but in a clear decision—and a clean sweep of French reaction, of which Pétain was only one of the uglier manifestations.

*

THE FINAL COMMUNIQUE OF THE POTSDAM Conference will include, we hope, a definite announcement on reparations, which have been the subject of some disturbing rumors. According to one report agreement was reached at Yalta for splitting a total of $20 billion to be extracted from Germany within five years. Russia was to get half this amount, the United States and Britain $4 billion each, while "the lesser victims" would share the remaining $2 billion. Such a division, it seems to us, is based on power rather than equity. Actually no reparations within Germany's capacity to pay can begin to compensate for the devastation the Nazis have left behind them. But whatever payments are forthcoming should be allotted to injured countries in proportion to their losses. On this basis Russia would certainly rank for the biggest share—perhaps even as much as 50 per cent—but that share ought to include whatever German goods are being carried off by the Russians from their occupation zone in advance of a reparations agreement. According to reports from Paris, Moscow regards this booty as outside the general reparations pool. Such rumors are disturbing the French, excluded as they are from Potsdam, but they are likely to be even more disturbed by stories from several sources suggesting that the grand total of reparations will in the first place be distributed among the Big Three, each of which will retrocede some part to smaller nations. We trust that this report will prove entirely without foundation, for distribution on such a basis would be truly monstrous. It would place at the disposal of the big powers an enormous patronage fund with which countries pursuing policies approved by the patron would be rewarded while those that kicked over the traces would be punished. It could become a means for supporting, say, a conservative government in France or for disciplining a radical one. Justice demands that Germany's victims receive reparations as a right, not as a favor granted by one or other or all of the Big Three.

*

THE DICTATORS OF ONE OF THE UNITED Nations, Argentina, came a cropper when they launched a vilification campaign against American Ambassador Spruille Braden. In answer to the government-inspired attack on Mr. Braden, several thousand Argentines accorded him a spontaneous ovation in which shouts of "Viva Braden! Vivan los Estados Unidos! Libertad! Democracia!" filled the air. A statement signed by 362 prominent Argentines has protested the government's anti-Braden campaign. Apparently neither the repressions of their own dictator nor the recognition given him by our State Department have weakened the Argentine people's determination to get rid of Perón and restore democratic institutions. That day is not far off, as the recent action of the moderate Radical Party, Argentina's most powerful political organization, indicates. It has surmounted earlier threats of a split and stated its united and unequivocal opposition to the Perón regime, which had long sought its support. Any of its members who accepts office in the present government or collaborates with it in any way will automatically be eliminated from the party. In addition, it has called for free elections, freedom of the press, and a lifting of the state of siege. The students' strike and opposition statements issued by business men and livestock producers show that the anti-Perón wave is no longer restricted to labor, leftist, and professional groups, but includes all sections of the population. The campaign against Braden has provided an opportunity to reopen the Argentine issue.

*

THE PROCESS WE FORESAW WHEN TRUMAN inherited the Presidency is now clearly under way, only it is happening even faster than we expected. One by one the Roosevelt men are being replaced. Their resignations are being accepted without protest although with courteous "regret." Their jobs are going to persons not so very different in point of view but different enough to indicate a direction. The direction is to the right. We predict that this process will be speeded up as the 1946 elections draw near. Mr. Hannegan will want men at the head of departments and agencies who will appreciate the need of providing good jobs for good Democrats down below. But there is one impending change that ought to be prevented at all costs. Secretary Ickes should not be permitted to retire from the Department of the Interior. That he is planning to quit as soon as Mr. Truman gets back from Potsdam is generally assumed. And friends of Mr. Ickes say that the President is ready to let him go. If as good a man were available for the job we would not protest Mr. Ickes's resignation, for the Secretary is the last remaining indigenous New Dealer and he has earned a furlough. So far no appropriate successor has been suggested, and the danger is that the post will go to a political appointee. This would be a calamity; nothing less. For the Interior Department has under its heterogeneous jurisdiction such immense national assets as the great river developments—save only the TVA—and the federal oil lands. There is just one way to make sure these resources are protected and exploited for the benefit of the people as a whole, and that is by keeping the Secretaryship out of the hands of the politicians. Mr. Ickes should stay where he is until he is certain that his job will go to a man who can be trusted to stand off the private oil and power interests.

*

THE RAIL JOURNEY HOME FOR RETURNING veterans has the elements of a nightmare postscript to their combat experiences. According to one reporter they reach the end of their trip "looking a good deal like Bill Mauldin's Willie and Joe." It should not be so. Of course, with the roads carrying five times the passengers carried before the war, conditions are bound to be difficult. But planning would have avoided much of the present jam. As long ago as December, 1943, the Truman committee warned that failure to provide for the "replenishment needs of transportation agencies in terms of manpower, materials, and facilities . . . would be to run the risk of a breakdown." Nothing important was done, and today, at the very moment when troops are being deployed for a final blow against Japan, "manpower, materials, and facilities" are all lacking. Short-term planning has been even more neglected. The testimony of J. Monroe Johnson, Director of the Office of Defense Transportation, before the Mead War Investigation Committee, placed the blame fairly on the army. No inkling of the redeployment program was given out until early in May, it was revised toward the end of May, and in the months of June and July the actual arrival of troops exceeded by 50,000 and 97,000 the army's estimates. The redeployment program calls for moving 2,000,000 troops home within ten months. Clearly certain steps are needed. (1) There must be closer cooperation between the army and the ODT: this is elementary common sense. (2) The 65,000 rail workers asked for by Col. Johnson to man the existing rolling stock must be found either in surplus-labor areas or within the army. (3) Ports other than New York could be used as debarkation points, and if air transport now available were pressed into service, as Senator Mead suggests, widely dispersed landing fields in the East, South, and North could serve as terminals. And finally, civilians can still cut their travel: it is a small enough contribution toward giving returning veterans a break.

⁂

SOME MEN BY THEIR VERY EVIL SERVE THE good. Such a man, perhaps, is Senator Bilbo. The advocates of white supremacy, of Anglo-Saxon superiority, have employed all manner of specious devices to conceal the twisted quality of mind and soul behind their racial bias. Not so Bilbo—and perhaps we should be grateful. Starkly, without shame, and with no hint of camouflage he parades his ignorant contempt for the Negro, the Jew, the Italian, for all to see. When you look at Bilbo, listen to his words, read his letters, you find yourself confronted suddenly with the incarnation of evil. He is no more a representative of Southern democracy than he is of Northern democracy. He is Exhibit A of what free Americans have been fighting against throughout their history. Bilbo is a one-man chamber of horrors, an unanswerable argument in favor of elimination of an obscene evil from a society of free men.

Negrín on Labor's Victory

Mexico City, July 30
(By wire to The Nation)

"I applaud every act which strengthens the bonds of friendship between the British and Spanish people and which, in the early future, will link even more closely the Spanish Republic and the United Kingdom. From the very first day of the Spanish war the Labor Party and the British labor movement as a whole understood perfectly the universal meaning of the Spanish struggle and did everything in their power to support the legitimate regime. Had Labor been in power at the time, the outcome of our struggle would have been different. Even after the war's end and the recognition of the rebel government by the great powers, British socialism persisted in an unyielding hostility towards the totalitarian regime imposed upon the Spanish people by the now-defeated Axis. Now the road is open for an era of intimate collaboration between Spain and the British nation as soon as a constitutional regime is reestablished in my country. As a Socialist I am convinced that the Labor victory will immensely strengthen socialist and progressive forces the world over, and that its effects will manifest themselves in the internal and foreign policies of the countries of western and Mediterranean Europe. As Premier of the government of the Spanish Republic, I can say no more without unduly intruding into the internal affairs of a friendly country. Because of its historic and geographical position, and as the first country to lead the fight against fascism, Spain is destined to be an important bridge between the countries of Europe and of the American continent."

JUAN NEGRIN

Revolution by Ballot

THE British people knew what they wanted—a different kind of government to build a different kind of Britain—and they went after it in a highly practical way. Before the votes were counted it had been feared that the general election might produce a stalemate. With three major parties in the field, as well as numerous minor groups, it seemed quite possible that no one party would gain a working majority in the House of Commons. The electorate, however, thrust the minorities aside, reestablishing the two-party system on a more solid basis than in any election since 1908 when the Labor Party first emerged at Westminster. In spite of a considerable popular vote, the Liberals were crushed. Historically they had been the party of the middle class, but in this election the middle class joined the working class in backing the Labor Party, giving it, for the first time, truly national status.

Refusal to become entangled in the snares of a multi-party system is one sign of the political maturity of the British; another is the recognition that a leader incomparable in war was likely to prove insufferable in peace. Admiration and gratitude for Mr. Churchill remain strong but the voters knew they could not take him without his party. The Tories sought to submerge their record beneath the Churchillian victory smile; they attempted to make the election a personal popularity contest. But the people wanted no Führer, even if he bore the magic name of Churchill.

By using their votes purposefully, Britons have set an example to the world and have helped to revive faith in democracy. They have shown that governments can be overthrown by ballots even more effectively than by bullets. They have served notice on the vested interests that they demand radical changes in the British economic system. In 1945, as in 1832 and 1688, they have effected a revolution, all the more impressive because it is a bloodless one.

We speak of revolution without any thought that socialism will blossom in Britain overnight. Indeed, it will be well if friends of British Labor, at home and abroad, keep their expectations on a sober level. Clement Attlee and his colleagues inherit a full load of difficulties and it would be unfair to hope for too much too soon. Left governments in the past have often suffered more from the tendency of their followers to pass from over-optimism to disillusion than from the malice of their opponents. Let us, therefore, remember that politics is the art of the possible and not set utopian standards for the new Cabinet.

Before the Labor Party's domestic goals can be reached, many obstacles have to be overcome. "We have a job," said Mr. Attlee in his first statement after the election results were announced, "to build up in this country the highest standard of life that we can achieve for all." But Britain's wealth has been drained by the war and, until it has been replenished, there can be little hope of improving living standards on a broad scale. A large part of the nation's resources must be directed into exports, so that funds may become available to buy essential imports, and to put into rebuilding and improving capital equipment. That means consumption must be discouraged by the continuation of rationing and other wartime controls; it means taxes, even on small incomes, must remain high.

We do not doubt, however, that the new Labor government will push steadily ahead with the great program of social reform which has been mapped out in Britain during the war years. Although this program was indorsed by the Tories, we expect that they will seek to stymie it when it takes actual legislative form. Moreover, it will probably prove impossible to tackle such problems as housing without a direct attack on the vested interests of the landowners. At least partial nationalization of the land appears to be an essential step, if the crying demand for homes is to be met expeditiously. But such a step is almost certain to bring the Labor government into conflict with the strongly Conservative House of Lords, which retains the power to delay, though it cannot finally block, bills passed by the Commons.

The domestic policies of the new government will be of vital interest to America, as conservative commentators like Arthur Krock have instantly recognized. Successful measures taken at Westminster to promote economic welfare cannot but influence the course of legislation in this country. Immediately, however, we are more concerned with British Labor's foreign policies. During the election a great deal was said about "continuity of foreign policy," and Conservative spokesmen charged that if Labor won it would upset the international apple-cart. This was merely campaign rhetoric. The foreign policy of any country is continuous in so far as it corresponds to certain fundamental national interests. Thus Britain, under Labor direction, will certainly continue to collaborate closely with the United Nations. It will carry on the war against Japan—that was immediately made clear—and will give full support to the San Francisco Charter. No great country has a bigger stake in future peace, for to none would another war so surely bring disaster.

Again, Britain depends on foreign trade, not merely to prosper but to survive, and the safeguarding of its commerce must be a major objective of any British government. Labor, therefore, will not hasten to liquidate the Empire with which Britain's economic links are so close and vital. But we may expect a new emphasis on self-government, a speeding-up of the process of evolution from colony to commonwealth, a clearer realization that imperial trade ought to be on the basis of partnership and that higher standards of living must be achieved throughout the Empire as well as at home.

Similarly, while the main lines of policy in regard to Europe are likely to be unaltered, there is reason to hope for a complete change in methods. Any British government must concern itself with the security of the home island and of imperial communications. More than ever, Britain must seek to prevent domination of western Europe, from whose shores London has so recently been bombarded, by any aggressive power. That means closer political and economic relations with its continental neighbors, and the Labor government seems to be in a far better position to promote such ties than its predecessor. For the Tories, blinded by class interest, have tended to lose sight of national interests. Using their influence to protect property and privilege on the Continent and to thwart the leftward trend, they have succeeded only in raising suspicion and irritation.

British Tory policy has been particularly unrealistic in the Mediterranean, where Churchill sought to guard the imperial life-line with a phalanx of reactionary governments. Now we may expect an early break with Franco, whose tottering throne shook with the news of British Labor's victory. In Italy, too, democracy will surely get its chance unimpeded by Churchillian attempts to salvage a corrupt monarchy. Above all in Greece, we hope to see a sharp reversal of the policies which put fascism back in the saddle to carry out a savage reign of terror against republicans, democrats, and socialists. Only through the rise of stable, popular governments in these countries can Britain's legitimate interests in the Mediterranean be safeguarded. Dictators are always untrustworthy allies.

The British Labor Party never was tainted by any sympathy for fascists. Against their poisonous doctrines it stood firm when many British Tories fawned on Hitler and praised Mussolini to the skies. Now it has a powerful mandate to complete a victory, only half won by the downfall of the Axis, by basing its foreign policy squarely on democratic principles. The eyes of the common people everywhere are upon it; it must not fail them.

Enemies of the Charter

THE ratification of the United Nations Charter in the United States Senate by an all-but-unanimous vote was blanketed by even more momentous events in other parts of the world. But it, too, marks a major turning point. For it proclaims officially the decision of the American people to assume their full responsibilities as citizens of a great world power. This is how the people of other countries will take the vote in the Senate, and this is its real significance. The absence of open opposition, so startling in contrast to the fierce battles of twenty-six years ago, reflects the change in the mood of the country. It does not mean, unfortunately, that isolationist Senators are, as a breed, extinct; they are merely circumspect. They know that isolationism is at its lowest ebb and they are not disposed to risk their necks by appealing to it at this stage. With two exceptions, the isolationists voted to ratify the Charter. The result is a true reflection of the temper of the country and a somewhat distorted reflection of opinion in the Senate. The victory for international responsibility is a genuine one; but the battle is not over. It will take vigilance and high morale to prevent the opponents of world organization from whittling away the value of the victory later on. To get a clear picture of the stategy of the opposition—and to understand the vote itself—it is necessary to glance back at last week's debate.

Senator Connally opened with an elaborate and rather dramatic presentation of the Administration's position, recalling the "conflict that raged here in this chamber" in 1919 "where the League of Nations was done to death." He was followed by Senator Guffey and Senator Vandenberg, both supporting the Charter. Not a word was spoken in opposition. Then Senator Fulbright got up and expressed the uneasy feeling that must have pervaded the chamber. He wondered whether the apparent unanimity of opinion reflected "the true convictions of this body" and suggested that perhaps the opponents of the Charter were waiting to make their fight not on ratification but on the question of the power of the American delegate on the Council and the areas in which American troops could be used.

During the second day's debate Senator Wheeler announced his intention to vote for the Charter in a forty-four-page address devoted almost entirely to its weaknesses. And he admitted that he intended to delay his real attack until the military agreements came up in the Senate, announcing baldly that "Charter ratification is only a blind for the real fight ahead—and I want to go on record as saying that there will indeed be a fight in the future, a real fight." But in revealing his strategy Wheeler also partly stymied it, for Hatch broke into his monumental address to demand that "if anybody has any objections or reservations to the Charter, let them be offered now; let it be fought out now." So the issue was in the fire.

The supporters of the Charter argued that ratification involved acceptance of Article 43, which provides that "all members of the United Nations . . . undertake to make available to the Security Council on its call, and in accordance with a special agreement or agreements, armed forces . . . for the purpose of maintaining international peace and security." The agreements referred to would merely fix the exact numbers and types of the forces and facilities to be made available. Wheeler argued that such a commitment would "take the power away from Congress, and the President [could] send troops all over the world to fight battles everywhere." The American people, he said over and over, would never accept such a policy.

The showdown was useful if only because it brought the opposition out of ambush and indicated what sort of attack the Charter must still face. It did not reveal the strength of the isolationist forces, since Senator Wheeler conducted the skirmish alone. The danger is that the present widespread demand for active American participation in world affairs will have simmered down by the time the military agreements are presented, perhaps a year hence. Then, if Europe is still politically unsettled and unity among the big powers is still only a hope, Senator Wheeler and his cohorts may be able to win enough converts to defeat a proposal to give the American delegate on the Council power to act. This is obviously the combination of factors he is banking on; and this is why he insisted that the military agreements should be ratified by two-thirds vote of the Senate rather than by a majority of both houses. The President's message from Potsdam announcing that the agreements will be submitted "to Congress" was, of course, a direct answer to the Wheeler maneuver. We hope it will prove a conclusive one.

Many people have attacked the new security organization for its lack of effective power. The veto provisions in particular have been criticized as a means to maintain intact the full sovereign rights of the Big Five. And that is what they are. But if Senator Wheeler has his way, the United States will supplement the veto power of its representative on the Council with the power of Congress to neutralize the Council's action against an aggressor. The defenders of the Charter and of America's responsibility in the world have done well to expose the Senator's intentions. It remains to be seen whether they have also defeated his plans.

Japan's Choice

"THE tremendous air and sea bombardment of Japan of the past two weeks has already altered the situation to such an extent that the position of the enemy in the Far East is ceasing to be comparable with that of Germany before D-day and is approximating to that obtaining after the liberation of France and Belgium and before the crossing of the Rhine." This estimate by Veritas, war commentator of the British Information Services, was made before the latest smashing blow to the remnant of the Jap fleet, and before the American Twentieth Air Force began to make good its promised B-29 raids on eleven specified Japanese cities.

To this enemy, already badly mauled and facing the imminent assault of the greatest military force ever assembled, the governments of the United States, China, and Great Britain offered an ultimatum: unconditional surrender or "prompt and utter destruction." If the first alternative were chosen, Japan would be disarmed, its military caste broken, its sovereignty restricted to Honshu, Hokkaido, Kyushu, and Shikoku, along with certain minor islands, its war criminals brought to stern justice. But the Japanese would not be "enslaved as a race or destroyed as a nation." They would be left sufficient industry to support their economy but not to make war; their rights to free speech, free religion, free thought would be restored. Japan would be occupied but only long enough to insure that "there is being established in accordance with the freely expressed will of the Japanese people a peacefully inclined and responsible government."

Now this ultimatum is more than a demand to an enemy government to surrender. It falls just short of being a challenge to a people to revolt. That there is deep war-weariness in Japan and deep discontent with the militarists in power is evident from recent propaganda to the home front. Veritas quotes General Kanji Ishiwara who, after repudiating the notion that military leaders should have a dominant peacetime role, asserts that the Japanese people "must have absolute freedom of press, freedom of speech, and freedom to form associations. . . . Since the outbreak of the China affair we have been having too much officially inspired speech and journalism." Such a statement reflects the military's loss of prestige, arising from uninterrupted defeats, and the growth of popular unrest. It is a situation we must exploit. The ultimatum fails to do so because it fails to drive a sharp wedge between the Japanese people and their rulers.

The ultimatum calls for the elimination "for all time [of] the authority and influence of those who deceived and misled the people of Japan into embarking on world conquest." Does this mean the "moderates" among the industrialist Zaibatsu who are looked on with special favor by our State Department and who, as Laurence Salisbury pointed out two weeks ago in The Nation, have been involved up to their necks in Japan's war ambitions? Mr. Grew would hardly admit that they were meant. Does it mean the elimination of the Emperor? We very much doubt it. John Embree in a new book, "The Japanese Nation," declares that the "irony of the present situation is that the American government, apparently accepting the present role of the Emperor at Japanese face value, permits no propaganda to Japan that might undermine his prestige; and in the event of an occupation of Japan, our military government officers will undoubtedly, in the name of law and order, repress a revolution which might affect the imperial position." The recently revived myth of the divinely descended, divinely appointed Emperor is one of the cleverest devices of the war lords to divert the minds of the masses from social and political revolt to a mystic belief in imperishable national destiny. Our bombs are already shaking that belief. If the Imperial Palace were brought squarely into our propaganda—as well as aerial and naval—bombsights, the Japanese people might understand that when we spoke of democracy we meant democracy.

As we might have expected, the Tokyo government turned down the Potsdam ultimatum. Militarists are not in the habit of signing their own death warrants even if their refusal calls for the destruction of their nation. But the militarists of Tokyo may not have the last say. It is our obligation, in order to hasten the end of the war, to talk directly to the Japanese people, making it unmistakably clear that surrender will bring them not only release from war but also the chance to win the free life which, heretofore, Emperor, militarists, and industrialists have denied them.

Labor, Vets, and Jobs

BY CHARLES G. BOLTE

[Mr. Bolté, The Nation's military critic, joined the British army before Pearl Harbor and fought as a lieutenant under General Montgomery. He was wounded at El Alamein, and is now chairman of the American Veterans Committee.]

IT IS probably true to say that full employment is now accepted as the major goal of American domestic policy after the war, and that a majority of our citizens are prepared to have their government assume responsibility for seeing to it that this goal is reached. However, the schizoid personality of machine-age man being what it is—noble vision, feeble achievement—it is also true that many of our citizens are wondering whether we can do it. Consequently there is a general business of looking around for the air-raid shelter, and plenty of effort to make sure that the job will be there for Number One—just in case. And the two behemoths of the modern industrial era, organized capital and organized labor, are weighting their sandbags against the day when peace breaks out and they start in earnest to belabor each other over which gets the major cut of a pie they are afraid may grow smaller and smaller instead of bigger and bigger. In this impending mêlée it could turn out that the guy who made it all possible—the man with the gun who beat off the enemies of the Republic—will get the short end of a very dirty stick.

The facts are simple. Twelve million of the nation's healthiest young men, normally a considerable segment of the labor force, are engaged elsewhere. Already in something more than a trickle, and before long in a flood, they are going to be looking for jobs. Only about 20 per cent of them have a legal right to reemployment. The other 80 per cent will begin asking hard questions very quickly if they can't get jobs themselves. An appreciable sector of American management is preparing to cash in on the situation by using the veterans to smash organized labor. An appreciable sector of American labor is reluctant to let the veterans move in and get some of the gravy if it involves any loss to themselves. The Congress of the United States, having passed a law which is subject to an astonishing variety of interpretations, is showing no inclination to clarify the situation. Pressed for an answer, any one of these groups (possibly excepting some management quarters) will say: "The only solution is full employment." Check. But what happens during reconversion? We probably won't get full employment all at once; and while we're waiting, who's going to get the pay-envelopes?

As potential allies in this struggle for power and jobs, veterans are being wooed assiduously from all sides. It is a vital battle: the stakes are very high. What are the bare bones of the problem?

The trouble started, as is usually the case, long ago. In 1940 Congress passed the Selective Service Act. At the insistence of the labor unions, it wrote into the act Section 8, which specified that any person called for military training who "has left or leaves a position other than a temporary position" shall be restored to that position, "or to a position of like seniority, status, and pay," if he "is still qualified to perform the duties of such position" and applies for it within forty (later amended to ninety) days of his discharge from the armed forces, "unless the employer's circumstances have so changed as to make it impossible or unreasonable to do so; . . . and shall not be discharged from such position without cause within one year after such restoration."

That seemed fair enough. You got drafted for a year and came back to the old job just as if you'd never been away. But what happened? Pearl Harbor. The "national emergency" went on for five, six, seven years. And in 1944, four years after passage of the act, the Selective Service System issued Local Board Memorandum 190-A, setting forth its ideas of what Congress meant when it wrote the act. Declaring himself interpreter as well as administrator of the act, Major General Lewis Hershey said that any man who replaced a man already drafted was in a "temporary" job, and was therefore not entitled to protection under the act if he was subsequently drafted himself; and, further, that the word "position" in the act meant the specific job a man was drafted from, so that when he returns he must be restored to that specific job "or to a position of like seniority, status, and pay"—even if it means discharging a worker with greater seniority.

Now see the results of 190-A: an aircraft factory has eleven workers drafted off a single punch press. Only the first worker has a right to a job. Even if he doesn't take it—and many veterans say they won't return to their old jobs—none of the others has any right to it. Meanwhile the riveting department has been cut back and many old riveters have gone into the punch press department. The first man drafted from the punch press, who had six months in the plant and two years in the army, comes back. The old riveters have at least eight years' seniority; one of them—could be the union committeeman—has twelve. He is discharged to make room for the veteran. At the end of the year guaranteed in the act, the veteran is thrown out because he now has a total of only three and a half years' seniority, and the old riveter is rehired.

The American Legion has strongly endorsed 190-A, and a Federal Circuit Court has upheld this interpretation of the act. The unions, naturally, have howled murder. They say that a man is entitled under the act to "the totality of job rights" he would have had if he had never been taken into the armed forces, and therefore that an employer cannot reemploy a veteran if it means laying off a non-veteran with greater seniority. They point out that if their interpretation of the act is correct it will be possible to do away with Selective Service's artificial definition of the term "temporary position" and to treat any worker who joined the armed forces as a permanent employee entitled to protection under the act unless he was specifically hired on a temporary basis. The War Labor Board and an arbitrator have held that this interpretation of the act is correct.

Thus confusion is complete, and no one—veteran, employer, or worker—knows either his rights or his duties. The result is that the veteran "is in danger of finding himself in a law court rather than in a job," as the current Bulletin of the American Veterans Committee points out. This new organization, comprising veterans and servicemen of the current war, has therefore just called on Congress to amend the act "in such a way that all parties concerned know precisely what their rights are."

The American Veterans Committee objects to 190-A because it gives too many veterans too little and too few veterans too much ("the first man who took the job has more rights than he would have had if he had never gone into the armed forces"). In addition, A. V. C. says, "under the present law the disabled veteran has little chance of reemployment, since he is required to be able to perform the duties of his old job." A. V. C. therefore recommends amendment of Section 8 to provide for reinstatement of a veteran on the basis of seniority, including time in uniform, on a plant-wide basis, with automatic upgrading and "a rate of pay equal to or better than that received by him before he entered the armed forces." For veterans who came from establishments not using the seniority system—which would include banks, offices, shops, etc.—"the new legislation should provide that any veteran employee who was not hired on a specifically temporary basis must be reemployed in a position equal in pay to or better than the one which he had before he went into the armed forces."

In other words, more veterans would have reemployment rights, but no veteran would get more rights than he would have had if he'd never been drafted. Any veteran who was drafted out of a job would be assured one at least as good in the old establishment, provided that the employer was employing at least as many people as he was when the veteran was drafted.

What about the millions of veterans who were drafted straight from school or college or their own businesses or the ranks of the unemployed—the bulky remainder of that 80 per cent? They have absolutely no statutory rights to jobs. In an effort to help them make up lost time, the C. I. O. has been urging its member unions—with varying success—to bargain with management for the inclusion of a clause granting every veteran synthetic seniority for his time in service, once he's been hired. (The United Automobile Workers, C. I. O., put this clause into its contract with Packard, and it proved itself for five hundred veterans who would otherwise have been laid off during a cutback. Some local unions are not buying it; most of management is very definitely not buying it.)

The major auto companies have countered with proposals that no one hired since May 1, 1940, shall have any seniority whatsoever; Ford has offered to lay off any worker in the plant to make room for a veteran. The three major veterans' organizations of the last war—the Legion, Veterans of Foreign Wars, and Disabled American Veterans—have proposed that seniority for time in service be imputed for purposes of new employment, with the proviso that no one presently working be laid off to make room for a veteran, unless the lay-off is ninety days or more.

The unions are certainly not buying any of these. The motor-company proposals are obviously preposterous; the veterans'-organization proposal would make it too easy, the unions say, for management to close a strong union department for ninety days, then replace the whole department with veterans carefully screened for their union sentiments.

This is a nice dilemma, in which management has all the better of it from a public relations viewpoint: they appear truly patriotic, giving "the boys" everything; while the unions are, as usual, the ogres holding onto their ill-gotten gains. Obviously the only satisfactory solution is full employment: to which end the unions and the veterans' organizations, in common with most Americans, are now working. The dilemma remains: during transitional unemployment, do some of the men who have borne the brunt of the war go on relief, in which case they may move into some Gerald L. K. Smith's camp, or do some of the war workers go out, in which case organized labor may be weakened?

A subcommittee on seniority of the A. V. C. has thrown out to the members the following faute de mieux solution: Let there be legislation or adoption of a contract clause granting synthetic seniority for their time in uniform to veterans seeking new employment. Thus a veteran with three years in service could if necessary replace a worker with less than three years' seniority. To prevent arbitrary lay-offs of "undesirable" employees, let the worker with the least seniority be laid off. Further to prevent lay-offs aimed at affecting union strength, let every union plant official have super-seniority with respect to the synthetic seniority of any veteran. Limit the veteran's use of this synthetic seniority to one job; and limit the time after discharge in which he could exercise his rights.

Such a clause might serve to spread disorder and sorrow a little more evenly, in case there should turn out to be disorder and sorrow. It will still not recommend itself to a good many citizens, even as an admittedly faute de mieux solution (significantly enough, the National Planning Committee of A. V. C. voted against accepting the subcommittee's recommendation, and A. V. C.'s New York Chapter No. 1 voted it down two to one). Nevertheless, it can be argued strongly that the veterans should be given this opportunity to catch up a little on their more favored brethren who were allowed, perhaps even forced, to stay home. But after having said that, one must add "Amen" to the final word of the A. V. C. Bulletin on the subject:

> The conferring of particular rights on veterans with respect to jobs will not of itself provide jobs for veterans. Only if there are jobs for all is your job assured. Full employment is the prime goal for which we must fight, for without it the special benefits of today will become the breadlines of tomorrow.

America's Post-War Trade

BY ROBERT CHANDLER

II.

[Robert Chandler is the pseudonym of a Washington economist. The first part of this article appeared last week.]

PROBABLY the American business man can bring enough pressure upon his own government to get it "out of business" after the war. But other governments cannot be handled in that way, and American exporters are going to find that private trade cannot be resumed on the old terms. Suppose an American firm, having cleared all the hurdles at this end, wants to ship goods to France. Private trade between France and this country has always flourished, but today France is not interested in resuming it. France agrees in principle to permit private exports to the United States provided such exports are screened, or reviewed, by a French government agency and provided the foreign exchange goes to the French government, with payment made to the French shipper in francs, not dollars. The French government keeps the dollar. France does not agree in principle to accept private imports from the United States.

IMPORT BUDGET
$

Countries will spend carefully their limited supply of foreign exchange.

France has not gone Communist; it is simply facing the realities of the present situation. France must restore its economy. It must rebuild its shattered cities, its bridges, its ports. It must repair or replace its worn-out industrial equipment.

It must import raw materials in order to start its factories running. Above all, it must provide jobs and food for its people. Only by the most careful governmental planning and supervision can it hope to ration its small supply of foreign exchange to take care of all these needs. Moreover, the French government will not permit men to carry on their former businesses if they are suspected of having been collaborationists. And, finally, in the case of many businesses, it is not known who the actual owners are. The 1939 owners may be dead, or prisoners of war, or refugees, or in French prisons.

At every turn the French government must decide what need is most urgent. Shall it import leather shoes or leather belting for industry? Shall it sell the West African peanut crop to the United States and acquire dollars or keep the peanuts for the vital health needs of the French people, whose diet has been deficient in fats and oils for four long years? How much coal should France import, and how many pitprops which will allow French coal mines to be reopened? The French government cannot allow the individual trader to decide these things. For some time after the war whatever France buys from the United States will be bought by a government purchasing mission, and possibly, the procedure will be permanent.

Government bulk purchasing is a fighting phrase to the American business man. He thinks of it as an instrument to turn the world into one gigantic Socialist experiment. It is not; but, even if it were, what could we do about it? We have accepted the Russian system of government-controlled trade, and if other nations develop the same or a similar system, we shall have to accept that, too.

If much of our trade with Europe—which, with the British Empire, used to take between 60 and 70 per cent of our exports—must exist in a misty mid-region between private trade and "socialism"—can we not do business, on our own terms, with South America? Can we not take over the trade the Germans have lost? Perhaps—if we meet certain conditions. In our biggest year before the war our exports to South America amounted to around $700,000,000—a far cry from the billions which are talked about today. Though the Latin American countries have acquired fairly large dollar balances during the war, largely from our procurement programs, they are naturally interested in knowing how much the United States will buy when the need for critical raw materials lessens. At the Conference in Mexico City Assistant Secretary Clayton took up this point and said he thought the United States would stockpile critical materials. He could not say definitely that it would do so, for the decision would have to be made by Congress.

The Germans, whose trade we wish to capture, were wiser than we have hitherto shown ourselves. A German trader who went into a South American country to sell his goods always looked around for some local product he could buy. A German chemical company, for example, encouraged a group of men in one country to produce rotenone—an important drug used in insecticides. When we entered the war, government representatives found that we had to have rotenone and so we began to develop its production—but as a governmental project. Will the private trader continue the practice? Some of them will, no doubt, but will enough do so to build up our imports to a point where South America can buy from us? If the government buys raw materials for stockpiling, as Mr. Clayton suggested, the government will certainly be remaining in business.

German traders selling goods always looked around for some local product to buy.

Mr. Clayton recognized that the United States will have to import if it expects to export, but the remarks of most business men and government officials do not indicate any keen awareness of this fact. England must export so that it can import the raw materials it requires for its domestic economy. We must import so that foreign countries can buy from us. At the present moment, however, we seem to be making very few plans for increasing our imports, or, what is even more important, for persuading the country that we must increase them. We are accustomed to import certain basic materials—coffee, tea, rubber, cocoa, many fats and oils, most of the ferro-alloys, burlap—but we shall have to buy more than we did prior to this war if we are to sell goods abroad and permit our debtors to pay interest and principal on our loans. We could use lumber and wood products to conserve our present depleted supplies, but there is no evidence that their admission would be approved by Congress. In fact, producers of raw materials are likely to combine in a demand for even higher tariffs. Our wool growers, for instance, are already worried over the competition of synthetic fibers and of Australian wool, which can now undersell American wool even with the thirty-four-cent tariff.

All this adds up to a dangerous situation. For a time a foreign country can pay for what it imports with gold, itself a commodity, but the supply of gold is fairly limited. In the end it must pay by selling other goods, pay for shoes, for example, with wood pulp. There is no other way of doing business. We have come to feel that we made a serious mistake in not entering the League of Nations after the last war, and we are anxious to rectify that mistake. But our economic blunders after the last war were quite as serious. In fact, it might be argued that the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act and our insistence upon collecting the debts caused greater damage than our failure to join the League. They certainly led other nations to adopt economic policies which led to restriction of trade, depression, the rise of Fascism and Nazism, and finally war. It will not be enough to join a collective-security organization if we do not mend our economic ways.

We should therefore recognize a few fundamental facts now.

1. Exports alone do not create jobs. If we lend money to other countries so that they will be able to buy our goods, and this money is never repaid, exports will prove to be the biggest boondoggle of all time. They will do more than other made work. Unless exports contribute to the free flow of trade throughout the world—as any kind of buying and selling does within a country—they simply mean subsidizing one group of workers in this country, and in a foreign country, at the expense of the taxpayers.

2. If we wish to create this free flow of trade throughout the world, we shall have to take thought about how to add to our imports, and this will involve, for us as for other countries, some over-all planning. If private imports are not large enough to cover exports plus service charges on loans, the government will have to step in and increase imports by various devices—stockpiling of strategic materials, encouraging exporters to develop and procure imports which will fit into their own business, encouraging Americans to use the special products of other countries, such as Oriental rugs, foreign pottery and glass, and the like. This will require considerable readjustment in our domestic production, but if we wish to develop international trade, we shall have to make the readjustment. As a matter of fact, after England passed the Peel Act in 1844 insuring free trade, its domestic manufactures prospered, even in competition with imported foreign products. If our domestic producers prove unable to compete with an imported product, it will be cheaper and more politic to subsidize the domestic producer while he changes over to another line than to continue indefinitely to subsidize, through tariffs or other devices, an essentially uneconomic system.

3. In the modern world of technology the prosperity of one nation depends on the prosperity of all nations. When we consider the devastation caused by the war, the terrible lack of goods all over the world, the prospects for peace-time trade seem so immense that there should be room for us all. But not if we all start out by erecting barriers. Not if we refuse to accept, in the interest of peace, a minimum of the planning which we have accepted in the interest of winning the war.

The prosperity of one nation depends on the prosperity of all nations.

We know these things, but we are not translating our knowledge into action. The public needs to be educated about, say, the relation of bauxite production here and abroad to our economic well-being quite as much as it needs to be educated about the problems of international security. We are talking about exports but failing to emphasize the special problems of export allocations, of foreign-government controls, of importing, and similar matters—all things of tremendous importance to the peace and prosperity of the world.

Leopold III: Traitor or Patriot?

BY JEAN E. GROSFILS

[Mr. Grosfils, a Belgian journalist, is editor of the Brussels newspaper, La Cité Nouvelle. The recent vote in the Belgian Parliament supporting Prime Minister Achille Van Acker's stand against the King gives particular point to this cabled dispatch.]

Brussels, July 25

IT IS difficult for a Belgian to discuss the question of the King without letting passion overrule sane judgment. I shall, however, try to present it as objectively as possible and not allow personal feelings to color my interpretation.

Belgium has a constitutional monarchy—that is, the powers of the King are strictly limited. The President of the United States enjoys much greater powers than a Belgian King. When Albert I, the great King who ruled during the first World War, died, February 19, 1934, in a mountain accident, his son Leopold III became his successor and ascended the throne February 23. The sympathy of the Belgian people went out to the young King. His father had been a great national hero with an international reputation, and it was felt that a heavy task faced the thirty-three-year-old monarch. A little more than a year after his accession Leopold's wife, Queen Astrid, was killed in an automobile accident in Switzerland. Young, pretty, generous, and unpretentious, Astrid had been adored by the Belgians. The people felt a deep pity for the King and his three young children in their bereavement. Astrid became a veritable cult with the Belgian people, a part of the national tradition.

In the two years preceding the outbreak of the war the King's acts occasioned bitter debate. For example, he granted amnesty to the Belgian traitors of the first World War, who later returned to Belgium. One of these, a Dr. Martens, was awarded an honorary position after he had been pardoned.

Then, in October, 1936, the King spoke in favor of the Cabinet's policy of reasserting Belgium's neutrality. This action took place when collective security was being considered as the one safeguard against aggression. The King's decision was received with mixed emotions. Certain elements, especially the Walloons, who were sentimentally attached to France, criticized him. But the majority of the people—represented in both branches of Parliament—approved his action or made no open protest.

In the months preceding the German invasion of Belgium the King as commander-in-chief of the army remained very popular. It is true that certain elements, chiefly in the middle class, complained that the King surrounded himself with incompetent advisers; they pictured him as authoritarian, and claimed that he gave his friends special powers to the detriment of the high command. But on May 10, 1940, when the Germans attacked, all criticism of the King ceased. The Belgians, with memories of 1914, rallied behind the son of Albert I. The campaign lasted just eighteen days. The army, ill-prepared for defense—Belgium has a population of only eight million—fought valiantly. Pushed back to the sea without any hope of bettering the situation, the King capitulated. One remembers the storm of criticism evoked abroad, especially in France, by the news of the capitulation. But in the years that have passed, the King has been largely cleared of the calumnies uttered at that time. No one now questions seriously the necessity of the King's action or suggests that it represented a breach of loyalty to his allies.

At the time of the capitulation his ministers begged the King to leave the country with the government, continue the fight from abroad, and make the Belgian Congo the center of the renewed war effort. Remnants of the Belgian army were still in France. It was possible, many reasoned, to reorganize them and send them once more into battle. Despite his ministers' entreaties, the King was obdurate and decided to remain in the country. The government fled to France and later to England. In Belgium the decision of the King brought sharp criticism from some, praise from others. In London the ministers dropped the discussion, and slowly the breach, at least on the surface, was healed. The Belgian people themselves, tortured and oppressed, organized resistance against the Germans. The King was a prisoner in a castle near Brussels, and the Belgians considered it indecent while they were under the heel of the enemy for anyone to discuss his actions.

From time to time, however, unfavorable rumors spread. The King often left his residence with the permission of the Germans. He had gone abroad and conferred with Hitler in Berchtesgaden. He was even willing to form a government while the country was occupied. Most Belgians refused to believe these rumors. But now it appears that they had some substance. Prime Minister Achille Van Acker, in his recent testimony before Parliament, presented documentary evidence that the King had taken a German victory for granted and had therefore failed to take strong military measures: that he had expressed disapproval of Belgian soldiers who crossed the lines to serve with the Allies after their country was occupied, and finally that he had discussed with Hitler the possibility of a modus vivendi, with himself on the throne, after the war. Foreign Minister Henri Spaak read extracts from former Prime Minister Pierlot's memorandum of May 25, 1940. The King was asked what he planned to do if the Germans overran the whole country. He replied, "I don't know. But I can save the people some suffering. In any case the cause of the Allies is lost."

Toward the close of 1942 the King announced through Cardinal Van Roey, Primate of Belgium, that he had married a young Belgian woman, Miss Baels. The announcement created a sensation. Few approved the conduct of the King. People found it difficult to approve the marriage of a Monarch who had said: "I remain in the country to share the fate of the prisoners of war." Were the soldiers in the German prison camps getting married? In addition, the bride's father was open to criticism. It was rumored that at the time of the invasion he had abandoned his post as governor of a Belgian province. Finally, the marriage served to bring the royal question to the fore again while the country was occupied by the enemy; it brought into the open an old issue which had been a source of national disunity.

During the occupation the Germans, as everyone expected, violated all international laws. Young men and women were forcibly carried off to Germany to work, with resulting misery to themselves and their families. Some believed that in view of the conduct of the Boches the King should have cast aside his silent role and spoken out. The protest he eventually made was much too feeble, in the opinion of those engaged in the resistance movement.

But, while criticizing the King, the vast majority of the people were far from suspecting that his actions might some day raise the question of abdication. In September, 1944, Brussels was liberated. Soon the government returned to the capital. The chambers met, and under the Constitution had to name a regent since the King was not available. The King's brother Charles was chosen by an overwhelming majority, a fact which gave some indication of the Belgians' passionate devotion to the institution of the monarchy. Later the King announced that his health would not permit his return to Brussels and requested his brother to remain as regent. But by mid-June of this year the King reported such a notable improvement in his health that he was in a position to come back at once. This news brought on the political crisis which still continues. The world press has carried a full account of the King's negotiations with individuals inside Belgium and I shall not repeat the story. In the past three months he has consulted and questioned all the representative Belgian leaders. Meanwhile the chief political parties have taken their official stand. The right favors the return of the King; the left is for abdication.

Many favoring the King's return argue that he did not act wrongly and that most of the criticism is calumny. They contend that once liberated the King should come right back to Belgium and resume his reign. In addition, many of those less favorably disposed to the King have supported him, fearing that his abdication would be the first step toward a republic. The vast majority of Belgians favor the monarchy because the country is split by language and religion. The King's suporters argue that the campaign against him is directed by the Communists bent on destroying the country's strength. The partisans of the King are mainly among Catholics, rightists, the wealthy classes, farmers, and the inhabitants of the Flemish-speaking areas.

Among those who favor abdication many contend that the regent is performing his duties admirably. They say that the King's eldest son could be crowned and serve under the regent until he becomes eighteen. Thus the person of the King would no longer be subject to debate. The function of the King is to crystallize about his person a unanimity of national sentiment. It is argued that if this unity should become impossible, he should retire. The quarrel has reached a very bitter stage—a tragic event for the Belgians. But it is probably better at this point to probe deeply into the wound. Belgians can then form their opinions with all the facts before them. Heretofore in their history they have shown enough wisdom to rise above partisanship and adopt measures that will stand up to the searching light of truth. They can probably do it again.

In the Wind

CRYSTAL BALL DEPARTMENT: George E. G. Catlin, a former Socialist candidate for Parliament, forecasting the British election results in the Commonweal of July 27, concluded thus: "Laski is likely to have the . . . dubious satisfaction of being known as the man whose personal vanity lost his party their electoral chances of victory in 1945."

ADVERTISING: A survey by the Radio Council of Greater Cleveland among middle-class people shows that nearly 80 per cent prefer to take their commercials straight, without music. In fact, 59.86 per cent said they would like to see singing commercials banned, and 71.68 per cent said they had been turned against some products by the blatant manner in which they were advertised.

REAL ESTATE: A Los Angeles realtor offers "a nice clean profit" in "colored property," meaning houses in Negro areas. "The real-estate boom is now nearing normal," says one of his broadsides. "Prices in certain districts are already back to normal. Get on this Gravy Train today. . . . Cash is King. Sell your old 50-year-old houses full of bugs, termites, broken plaster, not on foundations, for all cash."

HEALTH: A booklet advertising Lake Minnewaska, New York, contains the following item of information: "Restrictions: Christian clientele. Persons suffering from tuberculosis or other objectionable diseases not accommodated. Dogs are cared for in the stables."

HERALDRY: Sir Edward Grigg, former Member of Parliament for Altrincham, Cheshire, England, was recently raised to the peerage. His choice of the title Lord Altrincham was protested by six Labor aldermen and members of the Altrincham Town Council. The mayor referred the matter to the Sewage Disposal Committee, who supported Sir Edward by a vote of five to three.

RELIGION: This advertisement appeared in the Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, Patriot on July 21: "Tonight Only: Harold G. Palmer, redeemed Hebrew and former convict, will tell 'How Christ Saved Me.' Sponsored by Youth for Christ."

LOST-AND-FOUND: A Paris warehouse full of fine furniture which Hermann Goering's agents had looted from French homes and crated for shipment to Germany was taken over by the Americans, and certain pieces were sent to Versailles to furnish Allied headquarters. The French government recently tried to recover the furniture, but learned that it had followed SHAEF to Frankfurt-am-Main, Germany.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind —either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. We will pay $1 for each item accepted—EDITORS THE NATION.]

BOOKS and the ARTS

NOTES BY THE WAY

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

SEVERAL weeks ago The Nation printed an advertisement which was also an epitaph on a way of life.

> Due to extreme age of few remaining members [it read] the famous Mt. Lebanon Shaker community property is now offered for sale. 250 acres; 3-acre lake; ski-run; woods; unsurpassed Berkshire view . . . several dormitories; 3 smaller houses; barn. Ideal for summer theater. . . .

It recalled very vividly the long morning I spent at one of the other remaining Shaker colonies—somewhere in Maine. The Shakers had a penchant for high places, and the colony I visited commanded a magnificent sweep of cultivated fields falling away and far mountains rising. There were dormitories and smaller houses, and a fine little Shaker meeting house decorated in Shaker blue. Most of the remaining members were old and it was clear that the colony must vanish, but we were guided about by a young woman who seemed to have preserved intact, against all the vicissitudes of modern life, the attitudes and character and even the appearance, or so it struck me, of the veritable Shaker. Her face had an antique look about it, a look also of calm and dignity and dedication which one seldom sees in contemporary faces. The curious thing was that this young woman seemed more in character than any of the older people we met, as if in her the Shaker idea had had a new, belated, flowering. Her elucidations of Shaker history and principles obviously came out of an unswerving belief as well as extensive knowledge. As she conducted us over the grounds and through the buildings her voice and talk, her whole aspect, recreated an earlier age—in spite of the evidence all about us of the inroads of the modern world and the modern temper. These inroads were suggested by the sense of superannuation and of emptiness which hung over the place, but they were most vividly illustrated in the furnishings of the fine buildings which the Shakers knew so well how to construct. The exquisite hand-made furniture which must once have graced these rooms was gone, except for a few stray pieces, and the elderly Shaker woman sitting placidly in an ugly machine-made rocker seemed both a physical and a spiritual symbol of what had happened not only to a religious sect but to the handicraft culture in which it could flourish.

The Shaker girl, by the way, had something to say about the reasons why the members of the colonies in earlier days were such superb craftsmen. She said they worked better than others because they felt secure—for life, she meant, as well as for eternity. They belonged to a community and their livelihood was assured. The young woman's comment on this score seemed to me profound and not at all antiquated.

THE APRIL ISSUE of Horizon contained another instalment of Augustus John's rambling autobiography, which I find delightful partly no doubt because it is so utterly disconnected from here and now. Among many other things, he touches upon the decline of taste among the descendants of people who were probably not even aware of the concept of taste but whose houses and furniture fulfilled all its requirements—in proportion, in texture, in workmanship. The sureness with which a New England builder, 150 years ago, constructed a beautiful house has always puzzled me. His models were good, of course, but that does not explain why his adaptations of fine models—for they were usually adaptations rather than slavish copies—were so right. I think it must have been a matter of a hand and eye trained to principles of proportion and texture and workmanship which were not merely the manifestations of an individual talent but the discipline of a prevailing culture.

To get back to Augustus John. He speaks of the difficulty of finding a room in the English countryside where he can paint. All he requires is "a simple whitewashed room, fairly lit and sparsely furnished in the plainest style." But where, he asks, is such a thing to be found? And he continues:

> The village inn may be perfectly situated and its bar satisfactory, but venture upstairs to view the accommodation offered there and you are likely to return, discouraged, to the bar, before moving on. The progressive degradation of popular taste in the last hundred years has now reached its nadir and has rendered travel a process of alternate elation and defeat. Who is content to sleep, let alone wake, amidst a clutter of mean junk? . . . The productions of local industry and craftsmanship which used to dignify the humblest cottage have been looted by the antique dealers and now are seldom seen outside museums, curiosity shops, or the houses of enlightened amateurs. They have been replaced by imported articles of imitation luxury turned out in monstrous centers of mass labor here or abroad. Having sold or been done out of their birthright, the people, habituated to the ensuing squalor, end, like drug-fiends, by craving for it.

One has only to enter almost any one of those simple, beautifully proportioned New England farmhouses along the highway to discover the sad accuracy of Augustus John's remarks.

"MOVIE MONEY," by which I mean Hollywood salaries, the prices paid for movie rights, and so on, is real; yet it has always seemed to me harder to believe in than stage money. The reason is simple. The amounts bandied about are so fabulous that the imagination cannot cope with them any more than it can visualize the vast sums so casually mentioned in connection with the United States Treasury. I don't expect to have to test the reality of movie money, but I'm sure that if I were faced with the necessity I would emerge from the experience, as so many people are reputed to do, with no more actual cash than I had before. Perhaps there are people who save money in Hollywood, but the classic sequence in which the indigent writer who suddenly receives $1,000 a week manages somehow, in spite of his good resolutions, to spend that much seems to me to represent the truth if not the fact about movie money.

The incident which has inspired these remarks has, however, a rather different point. A friend of mine, who has a reputation as a literary critic, recently received an announcement of the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Annual Novel Award, and an inquiry as to whether she would be interested in being a first reader of the manuscripts that would be submitted. Obviously she was asked only because of her reputation, and it is not surprising that as she studied the financial data set forth on page two of the announcement, she assumed that for once she might earn a fee commensurate with her qualifications. Here are the figures, in their mounting glory.

$125,000
Minimum to the Author

$175,000
Maximum to the Author
Contingent upon Sales

$25,000
To the Publisher upon Publication

Making a Maximum possible Total of $200,000

My friend, who is only human, indicated that she might be interested and asked what the remuneration would be. The dénouement came with the telephone call the next day. The price Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer had put on the services of a literary critic well known enough to have been heard of in Hollywood was "Seven fifty." When the figures were reported to me in this form, I thought it meant that the salary for the job of a first reader in the great Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Annual Novel Award was $750. It seemed to me adequate, though not excessive in terms of movie money. It turned out, however, that it was a matter of piece work and that Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer was expecting to get good literary critics to read manuscripts at $7.50 each.

If the award is announced, as it is supposed to be, on August 15, we may assume that readers were found. But one of my few remaining illusions about Hollywood has been punctured. I am not surprised at Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer's low estimate of the worth of literary critics. I am shocked that that great company is capable of writing a check for as little as $7.50.

Apologies to Vansittart

BONES OF CONTENTION. By the Rt. Hon. Lord Vansittart. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.75.

A FEW words about the reviewer: it is good law to cross-examine the witness, and good science to measure the aberration of the instrument. The undersigned was born and bred in the most orthodox anti-Tory tradition. He has strong prejudices, which he honestly calls principles and convictions. He has in the last forty years joined three leagues advocating reconciliation with Germany, and he would gladly join a fourth now. During the two world wars and between the wars, he has worked incessantly against hatred. So what goes by the name of Vansittartism—Delenda est Germania—was to him an abomination. He had read in the past a few lurid samples of the noble lord's eloquence. The case was clear: Vansittart and all his works should be obliterated.

It is the hardest thing in the world to confess an error. Germany in 1919 could be coerced, but not persuaded, to say Peccavi. Because we murdered the League of Nations, we still believe that the league was not fit to live. "Liberals"—Harry Elmer Barnes for twenty years, Harry Emerson Fosdick in 1939, Louis M. Boudin as late as 1945—attacked Versailles and the French policy in terms which had a Hitlerian ring: they have not apologized yet to the shade of Clemenceau, and probably they never will. Well, I too hate to acknowledge a mistake. But, to my infinite embarrassment, I found that I agreed with Lord Vansittart.

This is the first book of his that I have read in full, and I enjoyed the experience. It is written in a style which makes Westbrook Pegler's seem hesitant and flabby—but with an Eton accent. Westbrook at his Pegleriest would not quote offhand Ammanius Marcellinus and Velleius Paterculus. Vansittart's main thesis is now a commonplace, indorsed by Germany's best friends: that Germany as a nation is committed to a mad policy of ruthless domination. Not Hitler alone is guilty, but an ever-deepening and widening trend, from Frederick II to Bismarck, to William II, to Goebbels and Goering. I deeply regret that Vansittart is right. It would be infinitely more comfortable if he were not. But the Germans have proved him right, and I have to accept the evidence. The terms he suggests for Germany would have seemed crazy ten short years ago: tomorrow, they will be imposed by the victors, and be accepted by the rest of the world as just and moderate. There is surprisingly little difference between the essence of Vansittartism and Thomas Mann's message to the Germans* on the day of their surrender.

We might agree, negatively, in damning the Germany that worshiped Hitler. But, the cursing over, we do not yet part company. A great point in favor of Vansittart is that he is not swayed by class prejudices. While George N. Shuster praises "the upright courteous folk, the great ladies and gentlemen to be met . . . in East Prussia," Vansittart does not spare the highest society: nobility, general staff, bureaucrats, industrialists, church leaders—he might have added university professors: Germany will not recover her sanity until she has been decapitated. The essay on The Destiny of France is a model of intelligence and generosity compared with the attitude of Smuts, Roosevelt, and the vast majority of our journalists; I wish it could be read by millions. But most of all, I appreciate his plea for international honesty. Our treatment of the smaller nations will be the test case. Vansittart combats, courageously, the Super-Power nonsense: according to tough and realistic William T. R. Fox, indorsed by Frederick Schuman, three "elephants" with every right, and forty-seven "squirrels" with none. "From the end of 1918 onward," says Vansittart, "the great powers made great fools of themselves. . . . I have not sufficient confidence in the wisdom of great powers to believe in the duration of a world controlled by them." "The full participation of all our allies in the occupation of Germany—and in the direction of all policy toward Germany—is indispensable if there is ever to be any improvement in Germany." This chapter also I should like every American to ponder. Secret meetings of supermen—Teheran, Yalta, Potsdam—are exactly what our democracy has been fighting against. Yet there was no one to urge President Truman not to give the lie so promptly to his own promises at San Francisco. On this fundamental issue, even The Nation faltered.

---

* Printed in The Nation of May 12.

It may be that Lord Vansittart is weak on the constructive side. He admits a Federation of Europe (who does not?) but only as a distant goal. He does not seem to realize that the most propitious time is now. He wants to destroy Germany, not the Germans: he does not clearly state, as Roosevelt did, that the German people (not the German nation) must be reintegrated into the European family. All negative policies lead to frustration and despair. The triumph of our might will simply deepen in the Germans their old conviction that might is right. But any plan for genuine reconstruction, rehabilitation, reconciliation, is branded as Utopian —even if it starts with as definite a foundation as a European Zollverein and a European control of basic industries. We still believe that drifting is realistic, and steering feeble idealism. But I do not want to quarrel with Lord Vansittart about what he failed to say. With what he did say, I blush that I agree; and I tender to him my reluctant and all the more sincere apologies.

ALBERT GUÉRARD

BRIEFER COMMENT

Peace and Progress

ECONOMIC FATALISM, so prevalent in the last century, is rapidly disappearing in contemporary Western society. No longer do we blame God for booms and slumps; we believe that man can control his economic destiny. Consequently there is a growing demand for economic planning, but if this is to be fruitful, those who finally determine its directions—the sovereign people—must be able to understand and evaluate the schemes that economists draft and politicians debate.

That is one reason why Kenneth E. Boulding's "The Economics of Peace" (Prentice-Hall, $3.75) deserves more attention than it appears to have received. Mr. Boulding, a graduate of Oxford now teaching at Iowa State University, has deliberately adopted the role of "intellectual middleman" seeking to spread popular knowledge of "the silent revolution in economic thought" which has taken place in the past few decades. On the whole, he has performed admirably the task of providing a layman's introduction to Keynesian thought. Unlike most economists, he writes extremely well; he is clear, interesting, and sometimes witty. Unfortunately, he also betrays a touch of scholastic arrogance which ill becomes the student of so empirical a science as economics.

The book is divided into two sections—The Economics of Reconstruction and The Economics of Reform. In the first, Mr. Boulding reviews Europe's experiences after the last war, reminding us how reconstruction "was hampered constantly by the desire to 'return' to the golden age of 1913." That kind of nostalgia is less in evidence today; 1939 does not appear glamorous in retrospect. Consequently there may be a better chance to tackle reconstruction as part of the much vaster job of construction that faces the world.

In the second and longer section Mr. Boulding deals with the problems of distribution in advanced industrial communities, but as he does well to emphasize, it is only a minority of the world's population that is embarrassed by apparent overproduction. In most societies, the overwhelming problem is how to bring about economic progress, how to overcome chronic scarcity due not so much to exploitation as to "the sheer unproductiveness of the mass of human labor." To lift the load of poverty from Indian or Chinese backs, there must be an increase in output per head, for progress is impossible where the toil of one man barely suffices for his subsistence. This is a problem to which industrial nations, in their own interest, need to apply themselves with missionary zeal.

KEITH HUTCHISON

Thoreau's Way

NO RENUNCIATION of the world was ever outwardly less spectacular than Thoreau's retirement to a back-yard wilderness on July 4, 1845. At the same time nothing ever more forcefully demonstrated the truth of his own later statement that no place is either more or less wild than the wildness which one imports into it. His gesture has taken hold upon the imagination to an extent completely unjustified by any of its physical aspects and during recent months there has been quite a little flurry over the one hundredth anniversary of an exploit externally a great deal less spectacular than a camping trip on Bear Mountain. Even the Saturday Evening Post celebrated it with an illustrated article and, less surprisingly, an exhibit was staged at the American Museum of Natural History. After reading or re-reading "Walden" itself, those who want to know more about why its author has meant so much to a great many different sorts of people can not do better than to address themselves to George F. Whicher's "Walden Revisited" (Packard, $2). The little book is actually a general account of Thoreau's career plus an extremely acute, well-written critique of his ideas, and a more illuminating or more readable ninety-seven pages has never been written about him. Professor Whicher stops this side of uncritical idolatry but his is a thoroughly sympathetic account of one of the greatest and most stimulating of protestants. Perhaps the world has never seemed less inclined to go Thoreau's way but that is all the more reason to remind ourselves of what can be said for his protest against the assumption that Man is first of all a producer and a consumer.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Rush Job

THE READER WHO HAS NEED of a history of the war should not be misled by the publishers' claim that this book is the first "to survey the entire European war, each of its campaigns and all of its strategy, up to the point of the fall of Nazi Germany." "Unconditional Surrender" by Everett Holles (Howell, Soskin, $2.50) offers only the barest account of the war up to Montgomery's recovery in North Africa and our own landing there, and is entirely unsatisfactory on the Russian campaigns. The style is a vigorous journalese of fairly high quality. The historical narrative, somewhat confused at the outset, is enlivened—or encumbered—with ready-made, radio-type descriptions of action and that sort of characterization which consists in saying that a general is heavy-jowled. For the most part the book adds nothing to public knowledge, though here and there the author's opinions suggest that he has inside information. At other points, concerning the Arnhem disaster for example, Mr. Holles is behind the times with his explanation. Considerable disapproval of the political strategy of the war is expressed, particularly with regard to Badoglio and the Italian crown. This critical attitude, however, is not consistently maintained. The book does not come to an end but merely stops with President Truman's announcement of May 8 and Mr. Churchill's speech. Evidently "Unconditional Surrender" is a high-spirited rush job; it will give little real satisfaction to a serious reader. RALPH BATES

Baedeker to Bureaucracy

THE BUSINESS MAN—or anyone else for that matter—who is about to take an important post in Washington should read "Big Democracy" by Paul H. Appleby (Knopf, $2.75). No more useful Baedeker to the bureaucracy has been written. Mr. Appleby addresses himself to the mind of government, to the kind of thinking that policymakers in federal posts must do in reaching decisions. He makes it clear that acting "in a governmental way" is different from acting privately. He tells why it must continue to be different if we are to have a democracy.

His point is not well understood. Washington holds no more tragic figure than the executive who comes with the high resolve to make his office function in the well-ordered image of the Amalgamated Widget Company. Such men always fail. And when they do they go home convinced that politics and the Great Boyg, bureaucracy, have thwarted them. Congressional and journalistic criticism seem to them interference and persecution. Questioning of policy within their agencies seems to them disloyalty and intrigue. Resistance to policy by other agencies means that the government has no over-all policy.

During his eight years as assistant to Henry Wallace and his four years as Under Secretary of Agriculture Paul Appleby learned to navigate Washington waters skilfully. Though he has left the government for private business he looks back and finds federal processes good, efficient, and well adapted to their objective. He accepts bigness, red tape, politics, a degree of conflict, the balancing of interests. He tells why he accepts them and some of the methods of dealing with them.

Special groups of readers might profit immensely from reading selected chapters of the book. Those who go to Washington on business might well read the chapter on delegation of authority to different levels within a department: their time and the time of the officials they visit would often be saved. Chamber of Commerce committees seeking field offices might study the chapter on regional decentralization: they would find, often, that their trip was unnecessary.

The extent to which Mr. Appleby draws upon the Department of Agriculture for his illustrations may dull the book for some readers. But this department is a good laboratory, and his conclusions are general in their application. The book is meaty and cogent: it contains no tabloid formulas or Sunday-supplement solutions to federal problems.

PHILIP S. BROUGHTON

Science and History

DR. MORRIS ZUCKER'S two fat volumes of almost eighteen hundred pages on "The Philosophy of American History" (Arnold-Howard, $8.50) have been hailed, according to his publishers, as "one of the truly great original achievements of our times," and as "the most profound analysis yet made of the philosophy of history," because in it "history for the first time attains the rank of a science." With these encomiums the author appears to be in full agreement. His new historical dispensation, "the Historical Field Theory," has a mixed parentage. In it, however, a Marxist strain easily predominates, while physical scientists, particularly Einstein and Maxwell, provide false analogies and terms which help confuse. In the first volume the nature of "the Historical Field Theory" is set forth, and in the second American history is rewritten in accordance with it.

This theory is, in Dr. Zucker's words, "based upon the application of scientific principles to the analysis of history." These principles are: "(1) history is the record of events in society; (2) society is an aggregate of three component divisions—the state, the economy, and the ideological superstructure; (3) the specific form of the social structure is determined by the nature of the social continuum established by the relations of these aggregates; (4) this continuum provides the matrix for the events which history records; (5) society is progressive to the extent that it permits fuller play for the difference of social potential in its creative elements during its virile state; (6) and finally that happenings of historical significance are derived from the operation

Two Timely Books on the Roman Catholic Church:

"CRUX ANSATA—AN INDICTMENT OF THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH."
By H. G. Wellls . . . . $1.75 (Cloth binding)

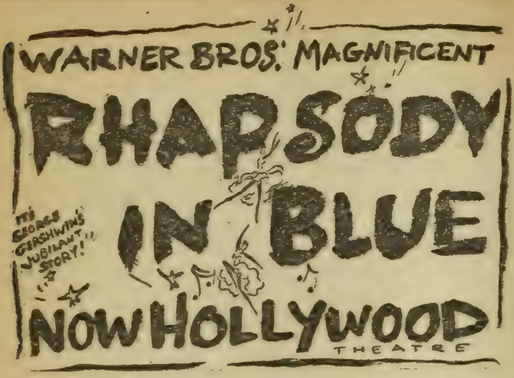
"BEHIND THE DICTATORS." A fully documented analysis of Vatican-Fascist collaboration.
By L. H. Lehmann . . . $1.00 (Paper binding)

COMBINATION OFFER Both these two books in paper binding for $2.00

ORDER FROM:
AGORA PUBLISHING CO.,
229 West 48th Street New York 19, N. Y.

The New Statesman and Nation
England's Leading Weekly Review
may now be obtained through
THE NATION
20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.
Yearly subscription $6.50 including postage
SPECIMEN copy on request

MOTION PICTURES



WARNER BROS.' MAGNIFICENT
RHAPSODY IN BLUE
IT'S GEORGE GERSHWIN'S JUBILANT STORY!
NOW HOLLYWOOD THEATRE

Barbara STANWYCK • Dennis MORGAN
Sydney GREENSTREET
IN WARNER BROS. NEW HIT!
"CHRISTMAS IN CONNECTICUT"
In Person! ERSKINE HAWKINS
And His Orchestra
Also In Person—THE CHARIOTEERS
BEN CARTER and MANTAN MORELAND
STRAND

"It is worth any dozen run-of-the-studio Academy Award winners."—TIME

Zachary SCOTT Betty FIELD

The Southerner

From George Sessions Perry's
"HOLD AUTUMN IN YOUR HAND"
with J. CARROL NAISH
Beulah Bondi - Percy Kilbride
Directed by Jean Renoir
BRANDT'S AIR-COOLED
Now Playing GLOBE B'way at 46th St.

of definite social laws which are causal in character."

If this tiresome work were less violently personal, cantankerous, prejudiced, and arrogant, the reviewer might be more inclined to commend it for even attempting to deal with theoretical questions with which few professional historians are concerned and for its occasional common-sense judgments. Throughout the two volumes Dr. Zucker conducts endless polemics against theories which meet with his disfavor, and condemns to a horrid historical death an impressive number of individuals as "lunatics" and "idiots." His substantial ignorance in the literature of the historical areas about which he fearlessly writes—ancient, medieval, modern European, and American—permits him to fashion facile generalizations, to dash off irrelevant value judgments, and to applaud his own contributions. Quite apart from other considerations, his work is all too frequently in conflict with that scientific method and spirit to which Dr. Zucker asserts exclusive ownership. "We had to destroy the lackadaisical idea," he writes, "that since this is still a free country every historian has an inalienable right to produce his own laws of social movement." HENRY DAVID

MOTION PICTURES

ALHAMBRA
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
COLISEUM
81st STREET
86th STREET
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
58th STREET
HAMILTON
MARBLE HILL
125th STREET
PELHAM
REGENT
RIVERSIDE
ROYAL
23rd STREET
WESTCHESTER
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCHELLE
WHITE PLAINS
YONKERS

NOW RKO
CLARK GABLE
LORETTA YOUNG
in JACK LONDON'S
"CALL OF THE WILD"
with JACK OAKIE
—PLUS—
FRED MacMurray • JOAN Leslie • JUNE Havoc
WHERE DO WE GO FROM HERE?
IN TECHNICOLOR

BETTY HUTTON
ARTURO DE CORDOVA
In Paramount's
"INCENDIARY BLONDE"
In Technicolor
with Charles Ruggles
Barry Fitzgerald • Maurice Rocco

In Person!
"The Hour of Charm"
All-Girl Orch.
Under the Direction of Phil Spitalny
With
Evelyn • Jeannie
Francine • Viola
Mack Triplets
All American Glee Club • Imogene Coca

NOW PLAYING PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

STAGE PLAY

MICHAEL TODD Presents
UP IN CENTRAL PARK
Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS Lyrics by DOROTHY FIELDS Music by SIGMUND ROMBERG
BROADWAY THEATRE, Broadway & 53rd Street. Matinees Wed. & Sat.
REALLY AIR-CONDITIONED

Music

B. H. HAGGIN

GERSHWIN'S career as a serious composer was based on fallacious reasoning—as fallacious as the reasoning would have been that because Johann Strauss wrote delightful Wienerwalzer he was the one to write the Viennese symphony and opera, and this on the ground that only the Viennese waltz was the proper substance for the truly Viennese symphony and opera, which was to say that because the Viennese waltz expressed Viennese feeling on the emotional level of a waltz it must be used as the substance of music which expressed Viennese feeling on the level of the symphony and opera. If Strauss had acted in accordance with such reasoning he would have produced the same delightful waltzes arranged in the formal patterns of serious music; and that was the result in Gershwin's case.

His serious works are filled with characteristic and superb Gershwin show-music, pieced together in the required formal patterns with derivative and inconsequential connective material in the idiom of serious music—show-music which communicates, in these contexts and in Carnegie Hall, exactly what it would have communicated in a musical show and in the Alvin Theater. That is true of the Rhapsodies, the Piano Concerto, and "Porgy and Bess," in which there is a further fallacy to take note of. A couple of years ago Duke Ellington presented in Carnegie Hall his "Black, Brown and Beige"—described as "a tone parallel to the history of the Negro in America," and based on the idea that since the American Negro had produced jazz, jazz was the medium in which to express in musical terms everything that had happened to him from his arrival here in slavery down to his participation in the present war. If that was absurd, what is one to say of Gershwin's expressing Negro life in Broadway show-tunes and even more glaringly incongruous material in styles borrowed from opera—for example, the recitative in which Catfish Row Negroes sing such facts as that they will have to get up at five o'clock the next morning. Only in "An American in Paris" does Gershwin succeed in inventing imaginative non-show-music material—such as the opening theme—that is on the level of the show-music; also he achieves his most successful integration of material in a continuous progression; and I find this to be the best of his ambitious works.

The occasion for this little survey is a flood of Gershwin recordings issued by Victor and Columbia to "tie in" with the film "Rhapsody in Blue." To begin with Gershwin's own "Rhapsody in Blue," Columbia offers a new recording made by Levant with the Philadelphia Orchestra under Ormandy (Set X-251; $2.50), while Victor gives new promotion (and one of its useless 25-cent showpiece "albums") to the one made some years back by Sanroma with the Boston "Pops" Orchestra under Fiedler (Set SP-3; $2.25). When I wrote about Levant's performance of the Piano Concerto last year I spoke of Gershwin's playing as I recalled it; now it occurred to me to get hold of the old Victor record of Gershwin's own performance of the Rhapsody (an abridged version) with Whiteman's Orchestra; and this not only confirmed my recollection of the deftness, lightness, and precision of his playing, but amplified it: in its simplicity of style the playing had an unfailing and subtle continuity of rhythm and phrasing. As against this, Levant's playing astonishes me again by its crude treatment of piano and phrase; while Sanroma, who has the sensitiveness as pianist and musician that Levant lacks, chooses to play the music in an unendurably affected style. Which brings me to this point: usually a composer must rely on performance-directions in the score to convey inadequately the form in sound that he has in mind, and the inadequate notation gives the performer an excuse for what he does with the music; but in this case there is a recorded performance by the composer which establishes unmistakably and authoritatively what he wanted the music to sound like; and there is no excuse for the extravagances of Sanroma and Fiedler, Levant and Ormandy. As for recording, the Victor version has the sound of the Boston "Pops" recordings of several years ago, which overemphasis of highs made shrill and hard and clangy; the Columbia is on the dull, wooden side.

Continuing with the collection of excerpts from "Porgy and Bess" that Robert Russell Bennett pieced together for Reiner, Columbia offers Reiner's performance with the Pittsburgh Symphony (Set 572; $3.50), and Victor Sevitzky's with the Indianapolis Symphony (Set 999; $3.50), which makes some cuts. Reiner's is the finer performance by miles; Sevitzky's the better recorded one by the same distance. Specifically, in the Victor sound everything is correctly placed in space, correctly balanced, cleanly defined in absolute quiet, and sensuously beautiful; in the Columbia sound things stick out disproportionately and there is a great deal of muddy confusion.

There is even more of this muddy confusion in the recorded sound of Rodzinski's performance of "An American in Paris" with the New York Philharmonic Symphony (Set X-246; $2.50). Remembering Toscanini's performance I find the performance only fair.

BOOK REVIEWERS

ALBERT GUERARD, professor of comparative and general literature at Stanford University, is the author of several books, of which the latest is "Europe Free and United."

PHILIP S. BROUGHTON is in charge of government relations at the advertising firm of Young and Rubicam. He was formerly with the War Manpower Commission.

HENRY DAVID teaches history at the College of the City of New York.

FREE to All AUTO owners

AUTOMOBILE
USER'S GUIDE with wartime suggestions

196 PRACTICAL SUGGESTIONS

that will help you to get ☞ better gas mileage

☞ longer tire life
☞ better performance
☞ lower upkeep costs

Get a FREE COPY from any General Motors dealer,—or use coupon below.

Customer Research Dept., Room 1817
GENERAL MOTORS, DETROIT 2, MICH.

Please send FREE COPY of new edition 64-page "Automobile User's Guide"—containing 196 practical suggestions on wartime operation.

Mr.
Mrs. ....
Miss please print
Address ....
please print
City ....
Zone State
Make of car
now owned ....
8 year model

Letters to the Editors

The Court's Virtues . . .

Dear Sirs: It is gratifying to read in Mr. Percy E. Corbett's interesting article on The Second League, in your issue of July 7, his measured statement that "the new tribunal can be expected to carry on its excellent work." Yet the article contains references to certain features of the Statute of the International Court of Justice upon which I should like to comment.

Mr. Corbett states that the new Statute "preserves the vices of the previous structure." He first refers to "the institution of ad hoc judges," which in his view "will be a standing impediment to the growth of a tradition of impartial detachment." As I view the record of the Permanent Court during the eighteen years of its functioning, there was no such impediment. The ad hoc judges were useful in two ways: they frequently enabled the Court to proceed with surer knowledge of local conditions and local usage in regard to the states before it, and they gave better assurance to the people of a losing state that their case was understood at each stage of the Court's proceedings. Moreover, the "institution" was in line with a whole century of development with respect to international adjudication. Instead of calling this feature a vice, therefore, I deem it a virtue of the old, as well as of the new Court.

A second "vice" was found in the exclusion of individuals as parties before the Court. At a time when the prime need of the world is for a court which will deal effectively with disputes between states, this seems to me a misplacing of emphasis. Neither at the meeting of the United Nations Committee of Jurists in Washington, nor at the San Francisco conference, was a proposal made by any delegate to correct these alleged "defects."

In referring to the "new rule" in Article 94 of the Charter concerning possible measures to be taken by the Security Council to insure compliance with the Court's judgments, Mr. Corbett seems to have overlooked the analogous provision in Paragraph 4 of Article 13 of the Covenant. Had he recalled the experience of the Council of the League of Nations—the provision in the Covenant was invoked only once in eighteen years—he might have saved himself the fear that this provision in the Charter would "engender a practice of deferring satisfaction of judgment until the winning party lodges complaint with the Council," and that the "new" procedure "could develop into a political appeal over judicial decision."

During the past winter the matters discussed by Mr. Corbett were carefully considered at twenty-five regional group conferences arranged by the American and Canadian Bar Associations, and on each of them conclusions at variance with Mr. Corbett's views were reached by the American and Canadian lawyers participating. MANLEY O. HUDSON

Cambridge, Mass., July 19

. . . And Its Defects

Dear Sirs: Thank you for sending me Judge Hudson's letter concerning my article in your issue of July 7.

After reading it, I find myself still regarding as defects those provisions in the new statute which preserve the practice of appointing ad hoc judges, and which exclude individuals as parties before the court. The first rule perpetuates an unhappy distinction between the national and international administration of justice. The second perpetuates the limitation of international law to the rights and duties of states inter se and refuses the individual a protection which he increasingly needs.

As for the third point, Judge Hudson's argument based upon Paragraph 4 of Article XIII of the Covenant of the League of Nations and the experience, or rather lack of experience, in the application of that paragraph is probably conclusive. He is quite right in saying that I had overlooked this paragraph, and I am most grateful that his correction should be added to the record.

P. E. CORBETT

New Haven, Conn., July 21

Beaverbrookism in Canada

Dear Sirs: In the article Canada Stands Pat, in your issue of June 23, Mr. Maxwell Cohen finds (in reference to the C. C. F.) that "the loss of ground during recent months is not easy to explain." He implies, however, that it is to be attributed in part to C. C. F. leaders' lack of knowledge that "this was the world of Keynes, Beveridge, and Hansen," etc.

It strikes the writer as odd that Mr. Cohen failed altogether, in his search for an explanation, to take into account the notorious pre-election pamphlet "Social Suicide," by an advertising man named Trestrail. A good deal of publicity has been given recently to Lord Beaverbrook's methods in the British election campaign. The Trestrail pamphlet was Beaverbrookism on the lowest level; in fact, by comparison the average Beaverbrookism would probably be found to be truthful, fair, and decent.

Mr. Cohen ignores this bit of popular propaganda, presumably because he considers it unimportant. Yet practically every voter must have been introduced to Trestrail through the mails; and it would seem to be a safe speculation that only a small proportion of the six millions to whom the pamphlet was delivered in the closing weeks of the campaign had ever heard or read of Keynes, Beveridge, and Hansen, or, if they had read these names in the press, had more than the foggiest notions about what their owners stand for.

Throughout the campaign the "world of Keynes, Beveridge, and Hansen" was much less vivid in the mind of the average voter than the nether world of Trestrail. GEORGE DUNCAN

Calgary, Alberta, July 4

A Matter of Emphasis

Dear Sirs: I was much interested in Coleman Rosenberger's article Is "Freedom Road" True? in your issue of July 14. But it seems to me that Mr. Rosenberger defended Mr. Fast's thesis on those points which most historians concede, that is, the fact that the Southern aristocracy could not become reconciled to the freedom of their former slaves, with all that this implied. Mr. Fast also described the growing realization of the former slaves and the "poor whites" that their interests lay together vis-à-vis the Southern aristocracy, which desired to return to the pre-Civil War conditions. It seems to me, therefore, that Mr. Rosenberger might have devoted his time to buttressing this part of Mr. Fast's thesis by pertinent quotations rather than proving what has been proved. MALCOLM BONDY

Brooklyn, July 15

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 161 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • AUGUST 11, 1945 NUMBER 5

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 117

EDITORIALS

Unfinished Business 119
The Potsdam Decision
I. Only a Beginning 120
II. Germany's Economic Future 121

ARTICLES

Negrín's Fight for Unity by J. Alvarez Del Vayo 122
Will America Go Socialist? by I. F. Stone 124
The New Labor Parliament by Aylmer Vallance 125
Background of Collaboration by Charles A. Micaud 127
Fuel, Food and Freedom by Alan Barth 128
Rebuilding Our Cities by Frank Fisher 130
In the Wind 132

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Little Places, a poem by Mark Van Doren 133
The Flemish Masters by Clement Greenberg 133
Briefer Comment 134
Verse Chronicle by F. W. Dupee 138
Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling 139
Films by James Agee 141
Music by B. H. Haggin 141

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 143

CROSSWORD PUZZLE NO. 123 by Jack Barrett 144

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor J. KING GORDON
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Editor Political War Section
J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor J. MITCHELL MORSE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates
LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS
LOUIS FISCHER CARRY MCWILLIAMS REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1945, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

MORE THAN THE ARRAIGNMENT OF AN AGED reactionary is involved in the Pétain trial; it adds up, as Charles Micaud points out on another page, to a grand inquest on the forces which for more than a century have struggled to undo the work of the French Revolution. During the past week the proceedings have been highlighted by the testimony of Laval and the letter written to Pétain by Admiral Leahy, American ambassador to Vichy from January 1941 to April 1942. It is easy to see why the defense protested vigorously when Laval was called as witness at the instance of the court. The slippery ex-Premier is concerned with saving his own skin; his evidence supports the Marshal's case only to the extent necessary for his own protection and, where the record is most damning, he seeks to place responsibility on his nominal boss. A notable instance is his admission that on June 22, 1942, he proclaimed over the radio his hopes for a German victory. "But," he adds, "that broadcast was approved by the Marshal." This damaging statement brought Pétain to his feet to break his vow of silence by a quavering denial.

*

ADMIRAL LEAHY'S LETTER STATES THAT HE first learned of Pétain's "sad predicament" on June 22 last when the Marshal's appeal to him to testify in his favor was delivered. (Is it possible that the President's chief military adviser never reads the papers?) It is clear that Pétain's request placed the Admiral himself in a pretty sad predicament. As he points out, his official position makes it impossible for him to become involved in French "internal controversy." Yet to ignore the appeal would be to turn his back on a man for whom he had frequently expressed warm friendship and to whose administration he had, by his continued presence at Vichy, lent an aura of respectability. Admiral Leahy attempts to back out of this uncomfortable corner carrying water on both shoulders—not an easy trick. He notes that the Marshal did sometimes take action "at my request in opposition to the desires of the Axis"; he recalls that on other occasions, when Nazi demands were accepted, Pétain defended this course on the grounds that refusal would result in additional suffering for the French people; he expresses his conviction "that your principal concern was the welfare and protection of the helpless people of France." On the other hand, the Admiral feels constrained to point out—he has his own place in history to consider—that at the time he urged the point that "positive refusal to make any concessions to Axis demands . . . would, in the long view, have been advantageous to France." Thus he seeks to defend Pétain's motives while condemning his judgment. The record of the Admiral's mission to Vichy, however, leaves his own judgment very open to question and, therefore, justifies skepticism about the worth of his evaluation of Pétain's sincerity.

*

FEW OF THE NAMES IN PRIME MINISTER ATTLEE'S government will be familiar to the average American but the men and women he has chosen are anything but a collection of political neophytes. Nearly all of those appointed to senior positions have had long Parliamentary records and considerable administrative experience either in previous Labor governments or in the late National government. We note with particular pleasure the appointment as Minister of Education of Ellen Wilkinson who, throughout the war, was Herbert Morrison's lieutenant at the Home Office. Miss Wilkinson has both drive and ability and her heart will be in the job of translating "equality of educational opportunity" from an ideal into a reality. A newcomer to office, though an old and skilled Parliamentary hand, is the dynamic Aneurin Bevan who, as Minister of Health, will be a leading member of the team assigned to tackle the housing problem. Lewis Silkin, Minister of Town and Country Planning, will occupy another key position in this field. He has been for years one of the most valuable members of the London County Council and, as a leading expert in real-estate law, he should prove adept in cutting through the legal tangles with which landlords so often impede public housing. The job of overcoming the British coal crisis and fulfilling Labor's pledge to nationalize the mines goes to Emanuel Shinwell, who made an excellent record as Minister for Mines in the last MacDonald government. He combines a vast knowledge of the coal problem with incisive ability as a debater. These, then, are some sample bristles from the new broom with which Britain is to undertake a stupendous job of house-cleaning. In due course, we plan to present our readers with detailed information about many more of them.

*

A STATEMENT BY THE TERRIBLE PROFESSOR Laski that public ownership of the Bank of England was the key to the Labor Party's program has toppled quotations for the Bank's stock and upset digestions in Wall Street as well as in London's "City." Mr. Laski declared: "A government which is not responsible for the operation of credit is not master in its own house." Just so, comments the Wall Street Journal: "When you can guide investment and when you can have direction over income and expenditure you certainly have mastery," and it goes on to suggest that nationalization of the Bank will be the first step to the enslavement of the British people. What it doesn't explain is why the control of British credit long exercised by the directors of the Bank did not involve "mastery" of the economy by a body responsible only to its shareholders. The answer the Labor Party would give is that the Bank did, in fact, have the power to decide how many men should be unemployed. Moreover, it ascribes the smashing of the Labor government in 1931 to the machinations of Montagu Norman, then Governor of the Bank, and it means to see that there is no repeat performance. However, the present excitement on this score seems a little disproportionate. As the Wall Street Journal's own London correspondent has cabled: "British financial observers find it difficult to see why proposals to socialize the Bank of England should be found so disturbing. Since the abandonment of the gold standard, the Bank's policies have been controlled by the British Treasury." In fact, in practically every country in the world, including the United States, control of the volume of credit has become a function of government. What British Labor now seeks is control of the direction of credit in accordance with a system of priorities which will give such necessities as housing precedence over luxuries. If the Tories had been returned to office, it is difficult to see how they could have done much less and kept their promises to the electors.

*

THE HISTORY OF WARFARE PROVIDES NO parallel for the astonishing performance of the United States Third Fleet and attached British forces along the Japanese coasts for six weeks. Carrier-based planes, ranging in number up to 1,500 or more, have taken off day after day to destroy Japanese aircraft on the ground and in the air, sink coastal vessels, shoot up trains, and bomb naval bases. Surface elements of the combined fleets have paraded off-shore to shell factories, military installations, and even a railroad line, not once but more than half a dozen times. More than 1,000 aircraft and almost as many ships have been destroyed or damaged. And all this has been accomplished without serious opposition from the Japanese. It is as if an enemy fleet had been attacking Charleston, Norfolk, Baltimore, New York, and Providence, meeting no opposition from the U. S. Navy, the Army Air Forces, or the Coast Artillery, and with anti-aircraft fire directed only against attacks on our major fleet units in the Brooklyn Navy Yard. With this demonstration of power added to the continuous Superfort raids, the odds against the Japanese have become so long that a sudden surrender would not be surprising. But their failure to give up in the face of such odds and the clear threat of still worse punishment to come, also serves to indicate that there may never be a surrender, except piecemeal after the German pattern. The power is certainly there to force such a surrender, if that is the only way to win it.

*

A FORTHRIGHT AND INFORMATIVE STATEMENT on the army's discharge policy is overdue. Secretary of War Stimson must know that his press handout on the subject last week was nothing of the sort. It was belligerent but it left unanswered the growing number of embarrassing questions hurled at the army concerning the slowness of the discharge process. "We shall not let any man go," Secretary Stimson announced, "whose going jeopardizes the life of the men who remain to fight." Does Mr. Stimson seriously imagine that anyone is asking the army to do so? The question is, when does such jeopardy really enter the picture and when is it just a rhetorical bogey invoked to help the army retain its grip on the maximum number of men for the maximum length of time? In view of the niggardly rate of discharge it is perfectly proper for citizens to ask why returned combat veterans with high point scores are engaged in picking up cigarette butts in domestic garrisons; and why we were able to discharge men over 38 to do particular types of civilian work when we were fighting a two-front war and have raised the age to 40 now that we have a one-front battle on our hands. Senator Johnson of Colorado has branded the discharge point system "a mathematical monstrosity" created "to stall, confuse, and bewilder." These are hard words, but taken on top of criticisms by Senator Downey, Secretary of the Interior Ickes, and Representative May, chairman of the House Military Affairs Committee, they are worth more consideration than Mr. Stimson has deigned to give them. Demobilization is not exclusively a G. I. problem. To drop 10,000,000 men into the country's economy with the sound of the war's final shot would obviously be disastrous. Equally disastrous, and even more cruel, would be an effort to keep millions of veterans doing close-order drill for a year or so after the war. The only way out of the dilemma is to discharge now as many as can possibly be spared without slowing the war on Japan. In the last analysis the army must be the judge on this vital point—but even judges may be called to account.

*

A CONGRESSIONAL INVESTIGATION OF THE operations of the Office of the Alien Property Custodian is not only long overdue but essential if we are to end the covert power exercised by German cartels over industry in the United States and Latin America before the war. The sensational discovery reported from Frankfurt-am-Main by a correspondent of the New York Herald Tribune in the Bosch case provides a typical example of the underhanded methods used. Army investigators found secret contracts between Robert Bosch and the Enskilda banking interests in Stockholm, ostensible owners of the American Bosch Company. These agreements provided for the secret maintenance of German ownership and control. I. F. Stone then discovered, and reported in PM, that while the American Bosch company was taken over in 1942 by the Alien Property Custodian, the company is still being run by the pre-war management. The army in Germany found a memorandum from George Murnane, the New York banker, assuring the German firm of his loyal intention to resume pre-war relations after the war was over. Stone reported that this same Murnane is today chairman of the board of the company under the Alien Property Custodian. It is time Congress found out in how many cases "seized" companies are still in the hands of the old managements and prepared to resume old cartel ties once the war is ended.

*

CONGRESSIONAL TOURISM WILL PROBABLY BE cramped by the President's directive denying service transport facilities except to traveling groups formally authorized by Congress. Anxious as we are to see our legislators' stock of knowledge about foreign countries increased, we can only approve checks to "fact-finding" expeditions of the kind that recently whirled through London. This unofficial committee of eleven Congressmen is engaged, according to its spokesman, Representative Wickersham, "in an intensive study of conditions abroad." Its itinerary calls for stays as follows, including in each case time spent in traveling: England, Scotland, and Wales, three days; Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, four days; one day each in France, Germany, Holland, Belgium, Italy, Switzerland, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, Albania, Greece, Turkey, Syria, Irak, and Iran. "Complexity of Near East problems," commented the London Evening Standard, "must account for the slow-down in the search for facts which occurs at Jerusalem, Bethlehem, Damascus, Port Said, and Cairo. For each of these towns a whole day of study is allowed." Then Casablanca, which has a fine resort hotel, is given two days, though just what is to be investigated there is not revealed. As the Manchester Guardian remarked, Phineas Fogg is the only known rival of these gentlemen and his concern was solely with beating the clock. As a contribution to international gaiety, junkets of this kind are all very well. But it is not so funny when Congressmen return to pose as "experts" on a score of countries and to deliver ex cathedra a jumble of misinformation and undigested opinion.

*

DR. GERHARD ANSCHUETZ WAS THE AUTHOR OF the Weimar Constitution and so, naturally enough, he spent ten years of Hitler's reign in a Nazi prison. During those ten years, he thought and thought about the Nazi dictatorship and how it happened. It happened, Dr. Anschuetz says, because of paragraph 54 of the Constitution, which permitted the President of the German Republic to assume all power in the event of a national emergency. Under it, President Hindenburg declared the unemployment crisis an emergency and called upon Adolf Hitler to solve it. And then one thing led to another until the Nazi state came into full bloom. Anyway that's how Dr. Anschuetz figured it out. And he promises that if he has anything to do with writing another constitution for Germany there won't be any paragraph 54 in it; instead there will be a system of checks and balances as in the American Constitution. We think all this is very sound but we wonder if it ever occurred to the good professor during his ten-year Denkfest that there were a few other things wrong with Weimar Germany besides paragraph 54; and that one of them was too many—far, far too many— Dr. Anschuetzes.

Unfinished Business

THE Senate has joined the House in a summer recess that is scheduled to continue until October 8. Under normal circumstances no one would begrudge Congressmen a two-month respite in a busy legislative year; but these are not normal times. The imminence of victory in the war carries the threat of economic catastrophe unless the government has a workable program for the transition period—and virtually no legislation has been enacted to assure smooth reconversion and adequate post-war employment. If under ceaseless bombing Japan should reconsider its rejection of the Potsdam ultimatum we would be faced with unprecedented unemployment. The Administration would be powerless to combat the combined deflationary effects of the cancellation of war contracts and the demobilization of ten to eleven million servicemen.

Senator Barkley reminded the Senate of its shirked responsibilities on the day of adjournment by listing fifteen domestic measures that had been recommended by Presidents

Roosevelt and Truman but ignored by Congress, including such major items as revision of the Social Security Act, rehabilitation and reintegration of the armed forces, public housing and highway improvement, additional valley authorities patterned after the TVA, medical insurance for low-income groups, and liberalization of unemployment compensation; to this list should be added legislation to protect the jobs of racial and religious minorities. These measures represent the minimum of esssential short-range planning to prevent a crisis.

Most urgent among the items of unfinished business, however, is legislation implementing President Roosevelt's campaign promise of 60,000,000 post-war jobs. A full-employment program is not something that can be improvised in a few days when the crisis is upon us. In view of the advanced state of the war against Japan we cannot safely wait until October to begin consideration of this indispensable program. At this stage delay is irresponsible.

The report of the Mead committee indicates that there are many vital matters in connection with the war itself that should have attention. The conflict between the army and the various civilian agencies responsible for production apparently has reached such proportions that it cannot be resolved by War Mobilizer Snyder or even by the President without Congressional aid. In his attacks on the army for hoarding men who are urgently needed in crucial sectors of the civilian economy, Senator Johnson has raised fundamental questions regarding the War Department's demobilization policy. Since the public has not sufficient information to decide what the right answer to these questions is, it is clearly up to Congress to provide it. A careful and prompt investigation is in order. We hope one of the President's first acts upon returning to Washington will be to insist that Congress get back on the job.

The Potsdam Decision

I. Only a Beginning

THE making of peace in Europe is a job that has two main parts. One is the final destruction of German military power. That part of the job was well planned at Potsdam. The other is far more elusive and difficult to accomplish. It is the creation of positive conditions which will encourage peace and friendly dealings among nations. This part of the job was only begun at Potsdam.

The smashing of German power had largely been achieved by the combined armies of the victorious Allies. What remained was a considerable industrial plant which might some day be used for the production of arms, and a lingering reluctance among certain sections of the German people to believe that they were totally and finally licked. Potsdam provided a program for ending both sources of possible future trouble.

The industrial capacity of Germany beyond what is required for peace-time needs, frugally defined by the victors, is to be carted off to build up the productive strength of the United Nations, particularly Russia. The economic details of this plan are discussed below. What it adds up to in broad terms is that Germany will be reduced to poverty. Its role as an industrial power will pass to other nations. It will not be able to plan to make war for it will have neither the resources nor the machinery to turn out modern weapons.

The other necessity was to change the attitude of the German people. It may be true, as most Germans today insist, that a majority of the people disliked the Nazi dictatorship. But whether it is true or not, no one can doubt that a dangerous proportion of Hitler's subjects accepted the twin ideas of Teutonic superiority and the omnipotence of the state. At Potsdam the German state went out of existence, formally as well as actually. This event more than any other should drive into the German mind the reality of defeat, and its meaning. For in Hitler's Reich even the army came second. It was the mighty dictator-state, personified by the Führer, defended by the Wehrmacht, that concentrated in itself all the energy and intelligence and power of the people. Now the state has been supplanted by the absolute military rule of four victorious powers which will control Germany from top to bottom until it has developed acceptable evidence of a capacity to rule itself—peaceably and under democratic safeguards. This short demonstration of the collapse of the Hitler myth was a necessary contribution to the mental and emotional disarming of Germany. The "master race" was officially interred at Potsdam in the rubble of administrative buildings.

But the crushing of German power leaves a wide area for positive measures of peace-making in Europe. In this area the victors must establish justice, social equality, political freedom, and the protection of the rights of individuals and minorities and lesser nations—for these are the only secure foundations on which peace can rest. At Potsdam they made a few hopeful gestures in this direction. As far as Germany is concerned, the most hopeful was the agreement to permit political and trade-union activity among anti-Nazi groups. The Russians have allowed parties to function from the beginning of their occupation; now the permission will be extended to the whole country. Obviously it will be a half-artificial exercise as long as foreign military control continues. But it will give democratic elements among the people a chance to rebuild organizations crushed by the Nazis and to establish lost habits of administration. Out of this will come gradually a new political life for Germany. It is too early to try to guess what shape that life will take. What must be recognized is that the German people will meanwhile be preserved in a state of artificial social and political peace—like prisoners in a well-run jail—and will therefore have no opportunity to assist actively in the purge of the fascist poison that permeated the body of their country. That job will be left to the victors; and the Germans will be robbed of what would have given them their best chance of political health.

Perhaps the most valuable positive act of the Potsdam conferees was the slap administered to Franco. This should knock out from under his regime a major prop, particularly if it is followed with the severing of diplomatic relations by Britain and the United States and an economic boycott such as was applied for a time to Argentina. Franco's reaction to the verdict shows how fully he realizes his danger. While the Spanish Republicans pull together their strong but scattered forces, the Generalissimo is hastily summoning his advisers to consider ways of circumventing the intentions of the Big Three. He will have to work fast, for this time it looks as if the powers meant business. The new British government is clearly not going to continue Churchill's tactics, and even in Washington one can detect evidences of impending change.

This move, together with the decision to make the peace promptly with Italy and Hitler's other former associates, will have a wholesome effect on the entire European situation. It will make possible the renewal of normal processes of trade and diplomatic intercourse and restore hope to peoples who have labored too long under the frustrations of military control and political intervention.

A third excellent decision reached at Potsdam was to establish a Council of Foreign Ministers to carry on from where the three chiefs of state left off. This is a long-needed change. The European Advisory Commission has never had the authority to lay down major policies. The new Council presumably will have. In view of the gap left in the settlement of Europe's outstanding problems, the creation of this Council is of immense importance.

For the gaps are enormous. They cover the larger part of the territorial claims that have been put forward by various nations and a wide range of economic and political adjustments. The start made in this field at Potsdam was not auspicious. We are particularly disturbed by the tentative decision, which will, however, almost certainly be ratified, to turn over to Poland areas of Germany west of the Oder and Neisse rivers. Changes on Poland's western frontier were inevitable, but the annexation of such vast German regions is certain to create dislocations. The history of irredentism after the last war should have been a warning to the powers at Potsdam—including Poland itself. It is to be hoped that a better solution will be reached when the questions of Germany's western boundaries and of other disputed frontiers are considered by the Council of Foreign Ministers.

II. Germany's Economic Future

THE ECONOMIC terms imposed on Germany by the Potsdam conferees are both harsher and more realistic than those of the Versailles Treaty. They are more likely to result in the actual extraction of reparations than the astronomical bill presented in 1919. That bill could be paid only by the delivery of newly produced goods (which the debtor countries were mostly reluctant to receive), and, before such goods could be forthcoming, Germany had to be supplied with credits for raw materials and for expanding its industry. This time payment is to be in the form of existing capital equipment and will be directly linked with disarmament. Germany will thus make reparation through the loss of its war potential, which, it has been estimated, includes a productive capacity in the heavy industries about four times greater than a peacetime economy would require.

For the division of the reparations taken, a rather elaborate formula has been concocted which, nevertheless, still leaves certain points obscure. Russia gets a major share, since it is to have whatever is removed from its own occupation zone plus 10 per cent of the takings in the western zone. In addition it is to get 15 per cent of the total western "removals" against payment in food and raw materials. Out of its share Russia is to settle Polish claims but apparently it retains full discretion respecting the amount and nature of the satisfaction given. Claims of the United States, Great Britain, "and other countries entitled to reparations" are to be met from the western zone and from external German assets. As we pointed out last week, the division of reparations ought to be determined by agreement among the interested states and not by Anglo-American ukase. But on this point the communiqué is silent.

While removals of reparations property are to begin as soon as possible, the amount and character of "the industrial capital equipment unnecessary for the German peace economy and therefore available for reparations" is to be decided by the Control Council comprised of the four Allied "zone commanders." The Council, however, must follow principles fixed by the Allied Commission of Reparations, which is to include France, while final approval must be given by the commander of the zone from which equipment is to be removed. It is not going to be easy to operate all this complicated machinery without friction and delays. But, at least, it is encouraging to learn that during the occupation period "Germany shall be treated as an economic unit."

"Payment of reparations," the Potsdam report declares, "should leave enough resources to enable the German people to subsist without external assistance." They must, however, another paragraph suggests, subsist mainly by means of agriculture and light industry. Their standard of living is not to exceed "the average of the standards of living of European countries"—excluding the U. S. S. R. and Britain. Just what this may mean it is hard to say. Before the war living standards in Europe varied tremendously: they were comparatively high in such western countries as Denmark and Holland, very low in the Balkan countries. That of Germany was almost certainly above the average, so that a decline, and probably a steep one, is to be its lot. On this score the Germans can hardly expect better treatment; they have no claim to more than subsistence so long as the countries they have victimized remain on short rations.

But the question does arise as to whether the arrangements made by the Big Three will permit even a low average standard to be maintained. Germany will have to grow almost all its own food since its much reduced surplus of coal and manufacturers will be needed to buy raw materials. Moreover, it will have to produce its food in an area barely three-quarters of the size of the pre-Hitler Reich if, as seems certain, the provisional assignment to Poland of territories extending to the Oder and Neisse rivers is sustained.

Moreover, this diminished area will have to provide for a much bigger population than formerly since eventually ten or twelve million Germans are to be thrown out of the Sudetenland, Hungary, and the new Polish provinces. Even after making allowances for the very heavy casualties which Germany suffered in the war, it appears certain that the country is going to be seriously over-crowded.

In time Germany may be able to intensify its agriculture—it would require a big production of fertilizer, and fertilizer manufacture is closely linked to that of explosives—and so provide the bulk of its food and employment for a larger population on the land than before the war. But it would still have to find jobs for a very large number of industrial workers. If the Ruhr remains German—the French would like to include it in a separate Rhineland state—it will still have surplus coal. But most of the raw materials it would need to operate light industries on a larger scale would have to be imported and that means it must rebuild its export trade. By means of low wages, and under the conditions being set for Germany wages will inevitably be low there, it might be able to offer consumers' goods—textiles, toys, clocks, furniture, drugs, and so on—at very competitive prices. What will this mean in terms of labor standards in other countries?

Presumably, the suppression or strict limitation of the German metal and chemical industries will mean reduced competition in world markets for America and Britain. But if Germany's selling opportunities are thus curtailed, so too will be its ability to buy. Before the war it was a very large importer of primary products from all parts of the world. In particular, it was the chief customer for the agricultural surpluses of southeastern Europe which, in turn, looked on German industry as its main source of manufactured goods. Who will now buy these surpluses and so enable the Balkan countries to obtain the industrial goods they need? Will Russia, which in normal times is likely to produce similar surpluses itself?

The fact is that Germany's change of economic status must have wide repercussions beyond its own borders and it is not clear that the Potsdam conferees have considered all the economic implications of their decisions. A poverty-stricken Germany, bottled up in a confined space, must remain an endless problem, however much its aggressiveness is curbed by strong-arm methods. Some means must be found to integrate it with the European economic system, of which geographically it forms the heart, or the penalties we impose upon it will backlash on its neighbors. From this point of view the economic section of the Potsdam report is disappointingly negative.

Negrín's Fight for Unity

BY J. A. DEL VAYO

Mexico City, August 5 (By cable)

THE Spanish issue is rapidly moving toward a climax. Developments during the week in which this dispatch appears may well prove decisive for the Republican cause. Two events have sharply accelerated the tempo. The first was the decision of the Big Three to bar Franco Spain from the United Nations. The second was the first public report to the Spanish Republicans by Dr. Juan Negrín of his stewardship as Prime Minister, delivered at the Bellas Artes Theater here on Wednesday evening, August 1. Called on four days' notice, the meeting was generally considered the most impressive and significant Republican event of recent years. It was an invitation affair, and the hall was filled to capacity. The organizers of the meeting said that the number of requests for tickets on the morning of the day it was to be held would have filled a hall five times its size. The selection of the Bellas Artes, Mexico's finest auditorium, was in itself a political event. Under government regulations the theater is barred to political meetings. The authorities made an exception for Negrín.

The address of the Republican Prime Minister was delivered in an atmosphere of great solemnity and even austerity. The hall was decorated only with the colors of Spain and Mexico. There were no introductions and no closing remarks. Dr. Negrín was the sole speaker. At eight o'clock sharp the lights went on. Dr. Negrín appeared on the platform, briefly acknowledged the applause of the audience, and launched at once into a two-hour discourse—a discourse interrupted dramatically when, for five minutes, the electric current failed and the audience, which had been following him with close attention, spontaneously lighted matches and cigarette-lighters to illuminate the stage and his manuscript. Dr. Negrín's only acknowledgment was to move forward to the edge of the platform to receive this improvised light, and the address continued. The first half was devoted to the causes which led to the defeat of the Republican forces. It was the first public speech which Dr. Negrín had made as head of the Government of Resistance since the meeting of Parliament at Figueras in 1939. During all these intervening years opponents of Negrín have represented the attempt of the government to go to Madrid and carry on the fight there after the loss of Catalonia as a heroic but futile gesture. On Wednesday, Dr. Negrín explained why continued Spanish resistance made sense, emphasizing how in the Second World War the resistance in 1940, by Russia at Moscow and Stalingrad, and by Yugoslavia, proved decisive factors in the outcome of the war. If the Casado revolt in Madrid had not taken place the Republican army could have resisted for a long time. In making this report Negrín wanted not only to justify the government's policy of resistance but also publicly to brand the British and French agents who conspired to bring about the surrender of Madrid.

At the same time he made known the limits to his own policy of unity. In the new coalition, he said, all Republicans may find a place except those who betrayed the Republic and delivered Madrid to Franco. With those there is no possibility of understanding. They had sinned against Spain as much as Franco had, and they must be excluded. He was referring to Colonel Casado and his accomplices.

The second half of his speech was a full report on the activities of the government since its departure from Spanish soil. Freed from the silence imposed upon him by the war, he recited a series of acts clearly indicating that at no time had the government given up the fight for the Republic. He received a great ovation when he said: "I do not want a Republic restored by the intervention of any foreign power. I want a Republic restored by the action of Spaniards." He stated that the policy of his government had been consistently based on collaboration with the United Nations and particularly with the United States, Great Britain, the Soviet Union, and France. Sarcastically dismissing allegations of communism, he demanded, at the same time, respect and justice in the new coalition for all the parties which through the years have fought for the restoration of the Republic.

Dr. Negrín insisted that without agreement on the part of at least a majority of the parties, if not all of them, the government was in no position to act with the authority and efficiency demanded by the decisive character of the present moment. "We can hardly ask for recognition from other governments for a government which is not recognized by Spanish Republicans." He affirmed his readiness to support any solution which would end the present stalemate, even offering to withdraw as Prime Minister if such a concession would lead to real unity and a much broader coalition than could be obtained under his leadership. Until such a solution is found he will not desert his post.

The speech has made a deep impression. Virtually every legation in Mexico has asked for the full text, and many members of the diplomatic corps were present to hear it delivered. In Republican circles the effect has been to accelerate greatly the negotiations which have been going on continuously for three weeks. Within the first forty-eight hours after the meeting Negrín saw more people than in all the days previously. If a Gallup poll were to be taken of Republican sentiment here today, Negrín would receive on overwhelming majority. The opposition boils down to the Prieto group, and there, aside from personal animosities, the basis of disagreement is objection to the inclusion of Communists in a coalition government. The tactics of the Prietists are causing defections from their ranks. El Universal "leaked" the story that when Prieto was in New York recently he refused to see Negrín and that, despite this, Negrín later called at the hospital where Prieto had undergone an eye operation, to wish him a speedy recovery. This has created a profound impression. Many Spaniards have also resented the statement, issued by the Círculo Pablo Iglesias headquarters of the Prieto group, that Negrín has no right to speak as a Socialist, although he is a member not only of the party but of its executive committee elected in Spain. Political tension is approaching the explosion point. Only the other day two Prietists were forced to leave a coffee house frequented by Spanish Republicans.

During the three weeks of his stay in Mexico, Negrín has been constantly engaged in negotiations with the political groups. He has seen the leaders of the following parties and their subdivisions: Izquierda Republicana, Unión Republicana, Socialist Party, Communist Party, Esquerra Catalana, Partido Socialista Unificado de Catalińa, Unión General del Trabajo, Confederacion Nacional del Trabajo, Partido Nacionalista Vasco, Partido Federal. From them he has sought agreement on the following four basic points:

1. Coordination of efforts inside and outside Spain to hasten the liberation of the Spanish people and the re-establishment of the Republic.

2. An amnesty which opens the way for a general policy of national reconciliation.

3. Election in Spain of a new Parliament — with the least possible delay after the liberation of the country.

4. Continuation of the policy of solidarity with the United Nations, of which the Republic feels morally a part.

Drawing by David Stone Martin

Prime Minister Negrín

By Sunday, Negrín's political conversations were practically ended. One of the longest was with delegates of the Prieto group, Otero and Albar. Negrín's position was by this time perfectly clear to all the persons with whom he had talked. But in order to put a stop to the maneuvers of those who still represent him as clinging at any price to his office, he made the following declaration to Agencia España:

"I do not know how to state matters more plainly than I have already done. It is absolutely false to suggest that I am trying to hold on to my position as head of the Republican government. I came to Mexico to request the cooperation of the parties and of public opinion in order to proceed as rapidly as possible to the selection of a president of the Republic so that the ministerial crisis can be solved in a constitutional way. That has been my desire and my will for two years, as I explained on Wednesday night. The accession of the Provisional President of the Republic will automatically produce the resignation of the government. And it is the exclusive right of the President to choose the person who will be intrusted with the formation of a new government."

Within the next few days the final results of his negotiations will be known. There is a growing belief that rapid decisions must be made. Negrín himself has in effect told the parties: "I shall accept any solution upon which you agree, if it is a constitutional solution. If we put off a settlement of the political crisis until a meeting of the Cortes can be called, it may mean a delay of two months. Do you think, after Potsdam, we can wait so long? Or might it not be wiser to settle the crisis now and submit our decisions to the Cortes afterward?" Some persons have proposed that constitutional procedures be telescoped in order to set up a broad coalition government in exile as soon as possible. This would mean appointing a Provisional President in the Person, probably, of Martinez Barrio—without waiting for the Cortes, which must eventually, of course, ratify all decisions.

In the week beginning tomorrow the parties and leaders must find the answer to Negrín's question. The masses of Spaniards agree with him that there is no time to be lost.

Will America Go Socialist?

BY I. F. STONE

THE results of the British elections pose two tasks for the Left in the United States. One is to provide American support for the program to which Attlee and his associates are pledged. The other is to exploit fully at home the political repercussions of Labor's victory in Britain. Both require that we begin to think and talk in frankly socialist terms.

I need hardly dwell on what the success of the new British Labor government means to all of us. The hope of achieving socialism without bloodshed and dictatorship, of developing a democratic socialism suited to the Western European and American peoples, of avoiding the creation of a monolithic state, of preserving elements of economic freedom and enterprise within the framework of socialist direction and planning, depend on the outcome in Britain. The failure of the British Labor government would weaken democracy and socialism throughout Western and Central Europe and revive the danger of an Anglo-American coalition against the Soviet Union.

Many of the major domestic problems which face the new Attlee Cabinet are of international importance. Effective mobilization of Britain's coal industry is almost a life-and-death matter for ravaged Europe. Socialist reconstruction of Britain's bombed-out areas would provide experience of the greatest value in the field of public housing everywhere. A full-employment economy in England, by expanding the need for basic materials from abroad, would make it easier to create full employment in other countries.

In the field of foreign policy, maintenance of Labor's power in England provides substantial basis for the maintenance of democratic regimes in Europe and their establishment in Asia. In the field of colonial policy, Labor offers the one possibility of working out a program which will realize the potentialities and satisfy the aspirations of the colonial peoples. But the attainment of these objectives will not be automatic. The realization of a socialist program in Britain will depend on the extent to which Labor's followers at home can keep the heat on their leaders, many of them rather weak-kneed men, and the extent to which Labor's friends abroad can protect them from the pressure that will surely be exerted against socialist policies by Wall Street. This is where we come in.

The new British government's severest economic difficulties would seem to lie in the foreign field. From a financial point of view, the nationalization of coal, steel, or transport is little more than the matter of exchanging the securities of new public corporations for those of the private enterprises to be taken over. It is Britain's heavy dependence on the import of materials and food from abroad that constitutes the crucial weakness of the new regime. These imports must increase sharply if there is to be adequate rehousing and full employment. Two costly world wars have largely exhausted the foreign investments which might have financed these imports. For the next five or ten years Britain will need extensive loans and credits, and these must come principally from the United States.

Openly or covertly, attempts will be made to exact a political price for these loans. The price asked will be the abandonment of socialist policies. To counteract Wall Street pressure on Britain, the Left in this country must create wide public understanding of the need for socialist measures to solve Britain's economic problems. In housing, coal, transport, credit, power, and steel, these are not a matter of theory but of economic necessity. The housing problem is too enormous for British private enterprise to handle. Britain's basic resource, coal, is in the hands of a sick industry that can be restored to health only under public ownership. The backward British steel industry needs public funds for modernization, and the cartel must be taken over by the government if prices are to be reduced to a level on which British steel can again compete in world markets and pay for British imports. This whole story cannot be told in the current fashion of lip-service to the sacred cow of "private enterprise." It requires education in socialism.

The other side of the story is to explain that, unless it is to follow a policy of suicidal reaction, American finance capital must support Britain's experiment. An economically thriving Britain is essential to an economically prosperous world. To choke off the limited socialist program to which the new Labor government is pledged is not to save private enterprise in Britain but to assure its disappearance under the combined effects of depression and the demand for more radical and sweeping measures. To deny Britain loans would be to force the new government toward intensive use of the foreign-trade controls that spell disaster for the free and expanding world market on which the future of American capitalism itself depends. It would also invite the empire and Europe to combine against us for self-preservation.

Fundamentally, and this brings us to the American home front, the future of American capitalism is not so different from that of British capitalism. It is younger and healthier and has more elbow-room than its British brother. But here as there the preservation of areas of genuine free enterprise depends on large admixtures of socialism. And here as there full employment cannot be achieved without over-all planning and direction by government. The effect of the British elections has been to bring some glimmering of this home to American conservative opinion. An example is provided by Mark Sullivan's sudden advocacy (New York Herald Tribune, August 3) of the Full-Employment bill "as doing for American capitalism what socialism promises to do for Britain." When Sullivan moves that far left, it is time for the rest of us to move over.

We need to abandon the shabby and inadequate catchwords of the New Deal, its bootstrap economics and subsidies for planned scarcity. It is time to lay the foundations for a new socialist movement in America, to analyze our problems in socialist terms, to begin a campaign of public education in them. What I am suggesting is a Marxist approach, but one which will be non-sectarian, undogmatic, and rooted in a realistic appraisal of concrete problems.

It would be good if we began with something like Britain's Fabian Society, a group of scholars and experts who could make a study of American industry and economy from a frankly socialist rather than a "liberal" point of view, but so ably, objectively, and accurately as to command respect among thoughtful men of all shades of opinion. There ought to be sources to which newspapermen, labor leaders, and legislators could go for comprehensive socialist analyses of such matters as the situation in the railroads, the farm problem, the question of steel prices. Above all we need a new examination, this time from the left, of America's capacity to produce and to consume, made in terms of each industry and each commodity, with a view to the planned expansion of production and a steady rise in living standards.

Current liberal shibboleths and leftist ignorance are an obstacle to the solution of basic American economic problems. A striking example in the former field was the anticlimactic nonsense about a return to "free enterprise" in railroading which capped Wallace's otherwise able analysis of the transportation problem in his famous speech at Dallas. A less obvious example of the latter is the current vagueness about the steel industry. It is not enough to criticize a pricing system which supports half-capacity operations. The real problem is to work out a program under which full-capacity output would be economically possible.

There are areas in the American economy, like railroading and power, where government ownership would immensely stimulate genuine enterprise in other businesses. There are other areas in which anti-trust enforcement is hopeless and only government competition can restore economic health. There are problems like full employment, the low living standards of the South, the mechanization of agriculture, which can be met only by planned cooperation between governmental agencies and private owners. These are characteristic problems of a mixed economy, and they will best be met by socialist prodding and socialist understanding. The world is moving inevitably toward socialism, and if the transition in our own country is to be brought about by democratic means, these are the paths along which we must begin to move. It is time for the American Left to follow the British example.

The New Labor Parliament

BY AYLMER VALLANCE

[Mr. Vallance, formerly editor of the London News-Chronicle, is now on the staff of the New Statesman and Nation. In 1939 he was a frequent contributor to The Nation. During the war he has been Director of Psychological Warfare for the British War Office.]

London, August 1 (By Cable)

THE ballot boxes sealed for three weeks kept hidden the fact that July 5 witnessed a silent revolution in British political life. At this Wednesday's assembly of Parliament the choosing of a Speaker presented a remarkable contrast to observers sufficiently venerable, like your correspondent, to remember 1919. Then, under the leadership of the architect of victory, Lloyd George, the government benches thronged by elderly "hard-faced men who had done well out of the war," reflected the nation's acceptance of a policy allowing private enterprise a free rein in the short-view exploitation of a profitable peace. The nation's emphatic refusal to repeat this experience is manifest today on the benches crowded by Laborites who give a vivid impression of youthfulness, vigor, and practical idealism.

In the House of Commons, now effectively reverted to a two-party system, the outstanding feature is that Labor is no longer a mere political wing of the industrial movement. Out of 390 members, whose average age of less than forty-five compares with that of fifty-five in the last Parliament, only 120 are trade-union officials, mainly from coal and transport. The remainder naturally includes a number of individual trade unionists, manual or technical workers, but these were selected by "constituency" Labor parties and therefore are not tied to trade-union apron strings. An analysis of the members shows nearly 50 per cent from the middle class—more than forty lawyers, thirty business men, twenty journalists, twenty teachers, ten doctors, a good sprinkling of economists, accountants, engineers, clergymen, architects, and farmers, not forgetting one film director, one playwright, and two barbers. The servicemen exceed one-third of the total, which includes twenty-one women and over 100 members with previous experience in municipal government.

The consequence is that Britain has, for the first time, a positively socialist Parliamentary party in power with the probability of a long tenure increased, first, by the unlikelihood of the domination of a sectional trade-union view, and second, by the support of an impressively wide cross-section of the community, rural as well as urban, as indicated by the extent to which the landworkers and traders in small market towns have defied the squires and gone left. Those who, like Herbert Morrison, have always argued that a Labor Party based exclusively on an appeal to industrial workers would be unable to secure power, can now point to a convincing black-coated conversion to the socialist cause. Labor is truly the inheritor of that popular evolutionary upsurge which brought about the Reform Act of 1832, transferring political power from a landowning oligarchy to the mercantile middle class, and which, with the Liberal victory of 1906, ushered in an era of reformed social services.

We must recognize, of course, that the voting on July 5 was in part "anti" the Tories and Churchill. The electorate was not ungrateful to its great war leader but it regarded the flagrant Tory effort to convert the election into a personal plebiscite for the former Prime Minister as a real threat to democratic institutions. When Churchill took Beaverbrook's fatal advice and sponsored an extravagantly partisan campaign of distortion, vilification, and bogey-raising stunts ("Gauleiter Laski," "Marxist," "Gestapo," etc.) he committed political suicide. "Not cricket" is a deadly verdict in England. Nearly every constituency visited by Churchill in a victory parade through cheering crowds rejected the Tory candidate, and even in his own constituency, uncontested by Labor, 10,000 votes were cast against him in favor of a "philosophic farmer" candidate. The fact is that the majority of the electorate took the election much more seriously than Beaverbrook, who never understood England, imagined. They were unimpressed by scares or appeals to "vote national: vote Churchill"—slogans of the predominantly Conservative big-circulation press. Long before the dissolution of Parliament they had reached their verdict on the domestic and international results of fourteen years of Tory rule. The men of Munich no less than the slum landlords and industrialists, who had preferred the profits of scarcity to full employment, received a delayed sentence.

Drawn from life by Oscar Berger

Prime Minister Attlee

The positive side of the polling results, however, is equally manifest. Significantly, the Liberals shared the Tory rout. The sponsoring of 300 candidates with no possibility of winning office was regarded justly as an attempt to throw a monkeywrench into the works. The electorate had doubts about a party which gave the impression that it was composed partly of camouflaged reactionaries and partly of Beveridgites afraid to face the logic of their own thinking. In addition, after the disillusioning compromises of the long coalition, the country's mood was hostile to the idea of a center party holding the balance. Liberalism still represents nearly 10 per cent of British opinion, but the party's votes were thinly scattered and the party is dead as an electoral force. Equally emphatic was the rejection of the splinter groups—Common Wealth and the Communists—illustrating an impatience with irresponsible left extremism and a sober determination to have a practical program of democratic socialism applied to everyday problems.

These problems are many and clamant, notably the appalling scarcity of houses and consumers' goods, congested trains, a grave shortage of manpower for reconversion to civilian industries, the continued separation of families due to slow demobilization, and the threatening wage disputes of the dockers and railmen. In a war-tired country irritation and disenchantment will flare up if there are any signs of the government's failure to live up to Morrison's promise of "bold, decisive, sensible" action. The difficulty will be to assign correct priorities to Parliamentary measures. Housing apart, it will be necessary to expedite bills implementing, first, improved workers' accident compensation; second, the promised Beveridge social-security plan including full national health service; third, the nationalization of coal mines and of the Bank of England, pending the formulation of plans to control transport, electricity, and land acquisition along the lines of the Uthwatt report, and the general location of industries. Die-hard opposition by the House of Lords is unlikely, but the essentially dilatory legislative procedure of the Commons must be speeded up.

Fortunately there is no Labor commitment to produce the millenium like a rabbit from a conjurer's hat; moreover, the mass of the party's supporters are neither utopians nor direct actionists but solid, sensible people prepared for patient cooperation if the government shows that it means business and demonstrates a real sense of urgency. The first appointments to the new Cabinet made a good impression. Attlee is an unspectacular Premier, analogous to Campbell Bannerman in 1906, a quiet, dignified, admirable chairman of a team. Bevin is expected to renovate vigorously Foreign Office methods rather than to revolutionize a policy in which the keynotes of friendship for the United States and the U. S. S. R. are obviously constant. Morrison's position as general coordinator of the domestic policy is important.

To sum up, Britain has voted power to a party which has successfully forged an alliance between trade unions preoccupied with bread-and-butter issues, and middle-class Socialists pledged to substitute gradually the conscious organization of the community's well-being for the competitive scramble and restrictionist polity of monopoly capitalism.

Background of Collaboration

BY CHARLES A. MICAUD

[Mr. Micaud, now an American citizen, is the author of "The French Right and Nazi Germany." He teaches French at West Point.]

VICHY and Montoire are the final links in a long chain of tragic events, Pétain and Laval products rather than causes. The French nation may find the condemnation of collaborationist leaders psychologically necessary, a gesture both revengeful and purifying, but it is not sufficient. The punishment of guilty individuals would even be dangerous if it were allowed to take the place of a purge of institutions and merely served to bolster a hopelessly out-dated social system.

For the real issue is social and political. Collaboration is only the logical outcome of appeasement, Sedan and Montoire only the results of Munich. And Munich itself?: a puerile reflex of social defense on the part of a frightened bourgeoisie, which put class interests above national interests and lost on both counts.

In twentieth-century France feudalism was not dead. Many still believed in the virtues of hierarchy, in the right of the élite—that aristocracy of birth and wealth—to govern, and the duty of the masses to obey. This Tory outlook would not have long survived the impact of the French revolution and of modern technology if the Whigs had not become Tories.

The bourgeoisie, which had made the great Revolution, began to look upon its own child with profound misgivings. After the proletarian uprisings of 1848 and 1871, and with the success of socialism at the turn of the century, these former liberals began to question the desirability of democratic procedure. The law of the majority was all right so long as it did not threaten their privileges; but if the majority wanted radical social changes, they would not hesitate to make a counter-revolution.

While in Great Britain the conservatives had the political wisdom to grant concessions at the opportune moment, the French bourgeois believed in holding the barricades as long as possible. The result was inevitable. The working class, convinced that the Republic was only a shield for the preservation of privilege, flocked to the banner of Marxism, thus fanning the fears of the bourgeois and increasing their reluctance to reach a working compromise.

The crisis came to a head in 1934 with the famous Paris riots of February 6. The coup de force did not succeed but it launched the semi-fascist leagues on their meteoric careers. While many ligueurs were convinced that they were fighting only for political salubrity, the Leftists refused to be taken in by their lofty slogans. They understood that the new collectivists of the Right were not genuine socialists, but saw in the regimentation of economy the means to an end: the maintenance of disguised privileges in a frozen, hierarchic society.

In answer to the threat, workers and petits bourgeois united, and the victory of the Popular Front postponed the showdown. But reaction was far from dead. Fear of communism was cleverly used to discredit the new government, sabotage the social reforms, and separate the petits bourgeois from the workers. The Parti Social Français—legal heir of the outlawed Croix de Feu—soon became one of the largest parties in France, while the Parti Populaise Français—Doriot's party—enrolled the most dynamic section of the Right. Only the Christian Democratic party resisted the authoritarian temptation. The field was ready for Pétain's "National Revolution."

In foreign policy the way was also made ready. The Rightists had always flattered themselves on being the only real patriots; they had consistently warned the pacifist Left that Germany could not be appeased, that "one does not mix fire and water." Yet in 1935, as the Left and more especially the extreme Left were becoming aware of the Nazi menace and urging firmness, many Rightists quite suddenly became converted to a policy of appeasement.

They successively backed Mussolini in his Ethiopian venture, Franco in Spain, even Hitler when he sent his legions into the Rhineland, and later at the time of the Anschluss and of Munich. For in their eyes the dictators were the protectors of "Western civilization" against "Soviet barbarism." A victory over them would also mean the triumph of the working classes in France and of the U. S. S. R. in Europe. And this victory had to be avoided at all costs, even at the cost of France's vassalage.

The red menace was Hitler's most successful political weapon. With the connivance of the Right he succeeded in preventing a Franco-Soviet military alliance, which alone could have saved Europe. The strategy of the reactionaries was simple: since Germany had to expand, let her expand in the Ukraine. She probably would be satisfied. If not, well, France had her own Maginot line.

Here lay the real meaning of the Munich agreement: France and Britain were implicitly giving Germany a free hand in Eastern Europe. The Right hailed it as a great victory, for Munich eliminated the bellicose extreme Left from the government of France and Soviet Russia from European affairs.

It was too late in the spring of 1939 to convince Moscow that London and Paris had changed heart. In August the pact of non-aggression with Germany was signed, opening the Western gates to the Nazi flood.

After the defeat most Rightists acclaimed Pétain as a savior, the only man with enough prestige to impose the counter-revolution they had been hoping for. While the greater number were cautiously "waiting to see," some even followed the National Socialists in demanding total collaboration with the victor. By contrast the forces of resistance, in France as elsewhere, were drawn for the most part from the working classes and the Leftist professional groups.

The former internationalists proved to be the real patriots.

This conflict between national and class interests during the decade preceding this war often overshadowed the struggle for national existence. So it is apparent that the punishment of individuals, however guilty, is far from being a complete solution. France was brought to the edge of the abyss by political and social problems that the nation was unable—or unwilling—to face and solve. These problems remain, some even aggravated by the long strain of war. The penalty for failing to find a solution may be not only a violent revolution but a third world war.

Let us not imagine that the status quo ante is possible. The choice in Europe is no longer between liberalism and collectivism. For liberalism can thrive only on an accumulated stock of optimism, and the stock is too badly depleted. Even capitalists have turned against liberal economy to look for security in a regimented society.

The choice is between three kinds of collectivism: the dictatorship of the proletariat, the dictatorship of the bourgeoisie, or a dynamic form of social democracy: a fluid evolutionary society practicing the ideas both of political liberty and of economic equality. This implies an economy of abundance based on full production and optimum distribution: essentially a new equilibrium between bourgeoisie and proletariat, until higher living standards abolish the very concept of class.

This is of course the only valid and lasting solution, but perhaps not the easiest. America can play a part in helping social democracy to triumph, even if it be only the negative one of non-interference.

Fuel, Food, and Freedom

BY ALAN BARTH

[Mr. Barth is an editorial writer for the Washington Post.]

WAR has left the economy of Western Europe in a condition which perfectly illustrates the cliché, "a vicious circle." For example France, desperately in need of sugar for the nourishment of its people and with a large sugar-beet crop on hand, cannot process the beets because of an acute shortage of coal. And French coal cannot be mined because French miners are too undernourished to work in the pits. Therefore the sugar-beet crop is not harvested or is allowed partially to rot, and the miners, left undernourished, are rendered still less capable of producing coal.

This circular deficiency is no less vicious in respect to other commodities which depend upon coal for processing. And it is no less vicious in the other liberated countries of Western Europe. France, somewhat better off than most, is a prototype. For lack of coal, utilities cannot operate, mills cannot turn the available raw cotton into clothing, railroads cannot move acutely needed foodstuffs from rural areas to urban centers. A highly industrialized civilization, deprived of its motive power, has fallen into paralysis.

Coal, in this context, is quite as important to the achievement of peace as the United Nations Charter. For the indispensable basis of peace is employment and a decent living standard in a functioning society.

It has been said a number of times that the people of Western Europe are faring worse under "liberation" than they did under Nazi occupation. Taken literally, this is probably an overstatement. In some portions of the territory they conquered, the Netherlands in particular, the Germans looted so ruthlessly as to cause widespread starvation; some Dutch civilians subsisted on tulip bulbs and many were so emaciated, when found by our troops, that they were able to receive food only through intravenous injections.

Things are somewhat better now. As John Corson reported in The Nation of July 21, "During the six months following liberation the military authorities shipped in for civilians (in France) 262,150 tons of food, clothing, medical supplies, and petroleum. This volume represented less than one-fifth of the supplies estimated to be necessary 'to prevent disease and unrest.' And the need was greater than had been estimated." Still, death as a direct result of starvation will probably be rare.

But death as an indirect result of inadequate diet, inadequate clothing, inadequate home heating, is likely to be extremely prevalent in the course of the approaching winter. Infant mortality is already at a shocking level. And people who have been "liberated" tend to expect something more than a mere change from outright famine to malnutrition. The psychological consequences of their frustrated hopes can be very serious indeed. As the Germans discovered, these are not docile people. They have been accustomed to fighting underground and in guerrilla bands. If they cannot go to work and solve their problems by orderly means, they will seek to solve them through violence. And neither disease nor unrest can long be prevented under current conditions.

The root problem is to set a disrupted industrial machine once more in motion. And the key to this problem is coal. First, Western Europe must be supplied with enough coal from the outside to ward off the worst dangers and terrors of another winter and to prime the pump of its industry. Second, it must be supplied with the means to produce coal from its own mines so that the normal system of production and distribution can again operate.

There is only one way to meet the first of these needs, and that is by the shipment of coal from the United States. Britain, which customarily supplies some of Europe's coal, is now suffering from an acute shortage at home. Harold L. Ickes, in his capacity as Solid Fuels Administrator, outlined the situation vividly in a statement on July 20:

> In the light of reports received within the last few days on the desperate coal situation in Europe, I have come to the conclusion that, beginning at once, we should permit > the shipment for civilian use in the devastated countries of approximately six million tons of American coal between now and January 1, 1946, if possible. The race in Europe today is one between coal and anarchy. Europe must have coal without loss of time if serious political and social upheavals are to be prevented. I do not think that it is going too far to say that a coal famine of such severity as to destroy nearly all semblance of law and order is certain to occur in certain countries in Northwest Europe next winter unless immediate and drastic action is taken now.

About 700,000 tons of the six million are already in transit. Mr. Ickes has made delivery of the balance conditional. It seems worth noting that the mimeographed OWI press release of his statement just quoted has the words "if possible" inserted by means of a caret at the end of the first sentence, as though they were an afterthought. And Mr. Ickes insists that coal can be produced for export only if the army will release at least 30,000 of the 130,000 miners who, he says, are now in uniform. This is a demand to which the army has already refused to accede, on the ground that it would disrupt the point system of discharge. Mr. Ickes, in turn, has threatened a direct appeal to President Truman, and has presented his case before the Mead committee in Congress. Since, at our present rate of production, we are sure to be faced with a coal deficit at home amounting to about 40 million tons, some constructive adjustment to the manpower shortage in the industry seems imperative. Perhaps miners in uniform can be furloughed if they cannot be discharged. At any rate, the delivery of coal to Europe is so vital an adjunct of our foreign policy and our real national interest that it must be accomplished even at the cost of some sacrifice here. It should be noted that the anticipated 40-million-ton deficit is in relation to a national production which, even by the most pessimistic estimates, will amount to 575 million tons in the current "coal year."

The six million tons constitute, in part at least, not a gift but a restitution. The British and American armies have been taking out of France alone, for instance, about 300,000 tons of coal a month. From September, 1944, through May, 1945, they withdrew a net amount of 1,200,000 tons of coal from French mines for the maintenance and movement of troops. And French production, normally about 60 million tons a year, today is at the rate of no more than 22 million tons.

This has left the French without even enough coal to operate their essential public utilities; last winter the electric lighting system in most French cities functioned no more than four hours a day—a condition scarcely contributory to law and order. It has left the French with little fuel for heating homes. Northern France is not a tropical region; the temperature last winter was often only a few degrees above zero. The most that can be hoped for from the six million tons to be sent from the United States is a partial restoration of these essential services plus some fuel for vital transportation.

The second urgent need for the solution of Europe's coal problem—supplying the means to produce coal from European mines—cannot possibly become effective, at best, before midwinter. The difficulty does not stem from war destruction. The mines of the Ruhr and the Saar in Germany have been only about 15 to 25 per cent damaged. The French, Belgian, and Dutch mines are in fairly good shape for the most part, although they are very much in need of mine props and mechanical equipment. Also they are in need of coal to produce coal—coal, that is, to provide power for the mine machinery.

But most of all, the coal mines of Europe are in need of miners who can do the job. Mining is tough work. It cannot be done on an empty stomach or on a stomach filled by a diet of low nutritional value. Dutch miners have been getting about 1,800 calories of food a day as compared with the 3,500 calories considered a requisite minimum for American miners; French miners have been getting only about 1,500 calories, and the Germans the same amount until their ration was recently stepped up to about 2,800.

Moreover, as our own John L. Lewis has so sententiously observed, you can't mine coal with bayonets. The mines of the Ruhr, the greatest source of coal in Western Europe, are currently producing just about 15 per cent of their normal output, the mines of the Saar only slightly better. This has been due in part, of course, to a manpower shortage. The mines were worked during the war by slave labor—mostly Poles and Czechs who wanted to go home. German prisoners of war are being released gradually to take their places in the pits, and something like the Ruhr's normal complement of about 350,000 miners are now back at work. But the output per man is scarcely one-third the normal amount.

Getting work out of these men is a difficult problem—especially in view of the fact that what they produce will be consumed by the armies of occupation or exported to the neighbors they ravaged. Perhaps it can be done, as has been suggested, by raising their rations and giving them opportunity to purchase such luxuries as soap, tobacco, and liquor with the money they earn. Perhaps it will have to be done by internationalizing the Ruhr and the Saar at once and bringing French, Belgian, and particularly Polish miners in to work under the International Coal Commission.

In a very real sense the course of history in Europe and the nature of the peace may be shaped by the production of coal in the Ruhr and its satellite, the Saar. Ten million tons of coal must be taken out of these areas for export to France, Belgium, the Netherlands, and Norway before January 1. An additional 15 million tons must be exported before the end of the "coal year," April 1, 1946. If this is done and if the mines of the liberated countries can be made to resume production, industry in Western Europe, Germany excepted, can get back on a functioning basis within another year. Without this coal, the economy of Western Europe will stay stagnant, and the civilization of Western Europe may collapse. The stake is nothing less than this.

In the meantime, certain stop-gap measures must be taken to prevent disintegration when the cold weather sets in. Even at the cost of still sharper shortages at home, we must permit the liberated countries, and UNRRA as well, to buy some of our scant food supplies. If we can ship enough wheat, the one crop the world has today in abundance, to take the liberated peoples off their bread ration, we shall give them an invaluable psychological lift. But it is of the very first importance that we grant them a share of our high-calorie foods—meats, dairy products, and sugar—to raise the dangerously low nutritional level of the diet on which they have been subsisting for so long.

Food is useless without transportation to get it into the hands of the hungry. Railroads in the liberated countries have been pretty well repaired; but they lack, in addition to fuel, engines and freight cars. A British official in the July issue of Foreign Affairs estimates that in France "of 16,000 locomotives, only 6,000 were effective, of which a high proportion had been imported by the Allied armies. In 1939 they had 450,000 freight cars. As the war ended, all freight cars in France, Belgium, and liberated Holland were pooled; there were only some 200,000 of them and on these the military have a first claim. Before the war, there were some 500,000 motor trucks in France. Today, only some 125,000 are usable and most of them are more than ten years old."

The United States Army has agreed to turn over to the liberated countries some 16,000 American trucks. But the need is for ten times this number. We have in Europe something like 500,000 trucks and jeeps—about a third of which have never been used. Trucks can haul farm produce to market; jeeps can be turned into tractors to plow fields. They should be made available to civilians in the devastated areas in the greatest numbers possible. In addition, these people need fertilizers and farm implements so that they can begin—as soon the myriad German mines have been removed from their fields—to produce food in quantities adequate to their own requirements.

The task, to repeat, is to set a dislocated economy in working order. And this task is just as essential to our war aims as the defeat of an enemy in combat. There is no liberation in the replacement of tyranny by chaos. There is no peace where men are forced to claw at one another for mere existence and to live by jungle law.

Hunger and hopelessness are still the breeders of fascism. And it is these that must be extinguished in Europe if victory there is to be real. While they remain, it is sheer fatuity to consider the war in Europe ended. Wars are waged for the attainment of peace, and they are not won until peace has been genuinely established. The continued furnishing of fuel and food to our Allies is, therefore, not one whit less germane to the winning of the war than in the days of battle.

Men are free only when they have the means to govern their own destinies. In Europe, they must have fuel and food if they are to have freedom.

Rebuilding Our Cities

BY FRANK FISHER

[Mr. Fisher is a New York economist who has made a special study of housing problems.]

THE United Nations have begun to think about reconstruction. The Germans had hardly been driven from Russian soil before the rebuilding of Stalingrad and other devastated areas was undertaken. In England, at the height of the buzz-bomb blitz, Parliament found time for an extensive debate on the question of compensation for land to be taken over for reconstruction purposes. The smaller countries, too, are perfecting their plans. All the information we have indicates that they are designed to provide their inhabitants with few gadgets but all the necessities for healthful life which good planning can produce.

This country has escaped the more obvious destructive consequences of war. But the war has accentuated our longstanding housing shortage and accelerated the disintegration of many of our cities. We expect a tremendous building boom after the struggle is over. We count on it to help prevent mass unemployment when war production ends. But there is a distinct danger that our construction effort, because it is not properly controlled, will create as many new housing problems as it solves.

The problem, actually, is greater than just "housing." Our cities overflow into the adjoining countryside, and as they expand and disperse, metropolitan life becomes less and less efficient and enjoyable. Traffic control is a major headache everywhere; transportation to and from the job often costs a worker several hours a day. Most of our large cities suffer from overcrowded schools, lack of recreation space for children and adults, and insufficient hospital facilities. Even those few services which the cities have been able to provide have brought many of them to the verge of bankruptcy. There is hardly one without chronic deficits and high taxes.

And there is something more disturbing. The average inhabitant of New York, Chicago, or Wichita is indifferent to civic affairs. He knows little about the workings of his city government and cares less, although he occasionally grumbles about corrupt politicians. Apparently he is satisfied to leave his problems in the hands of a Hague or a Pendergast, who is swept out of office only when his misconduct becomes utterly scandalous. Meanwhile, living conditions deteriorate. Tension increases until frustration and resentment explode in riots, as they did in Detroit, Beaumont, Boston, and Los Angeles. Progressive mayors then appoint commissions to look into the causes of such regrettable events. Reports are filed in the proper pigeonholes, to be resurrected only when the next riot occurs.

The responsibility cannot be laid entirely with the civil officers. The problems are simply too big for them to handle. They are looking for quick, easy solutions, while the real solution requires long-term, large-scale planning. The need for it has been rather generally recognized in recent years. Many cities have set up planning commissions, some of which work very well. But, as Fortune pointed out in January, 1944, "hundreds of city plans have come to nothing" because they have not got at the "heart of the community's difficulties—namely, overcrowding and congestion in the interior and unguided sprawling in the outskirts."

The congestion of our cities is mainly the result of excessive land values, established by speculators and confirmed by city authorities who assessed taxes on this inflated basis. Streets built for horses and buggies are hopelessly inadequate for modern automobile traffic. Skyscrapers have made dark canyons of what were once pleasant city lanes. Although the old street layout is now plainly impracticable, the prohibitive costs of land acquisition have prevented most cities from making the necessary changes.

To escape high land costs and taxes, many factories have moved out of the cities into outskirts and suburbs. At the same time, the exodus of city dwellers is increasing. New York's factories are migrating to northern New Jersey; the people of New York City are moving to Westchester County, Connecticut, and Long Island. They are trying to escape the noise of industry, the smoke and the smells, and to find a spot where they can have sun, trees, fresh air, and a little privacy. Thus dormitory and factory suburbs develop into metropolitan districts. The new communities are built up with as little forethought as the central areas, and soon pleasant residential suburbs show the same signs of blight as the cities themselves. Invaded by factories and mushrooming slums, the suburbanites move again.

The cities are forced to pay the bill for these migrations. They must extend transportation and other municipal services to the outlying sections. Moreover, with the movement of population out of the central areas, the cities lose large amounts of taxable income. Census figures show the seriousness of this development. Between 1930 and 1940, the population in the outskirts of 140 metropolitan areas increased by 16.9 per cent, while the population of the central cities increased by only 6.1 per cent, and in some cases actually declined. In other words, suburban areas grew almost three times as rapidly as the central cities, and this applies not only to New York and Chicago but to most of the medium-size cities as well.

The first step in rebuilding our cities, then, is to control the development of the suburban areas. There are a few well-planned dormitory suburbs, such as Radburn, New Jersey, or the "greenbelt" towns, but in general the unplanned dispersion of the metropolitan regions continues unchecked. Public apathy is as much to blame as the selfishness of certain private interests. If the Westchester commuter does not object to spending two hours a day on a train, it is pretty difficult to do anything for him.

There is fairly general agreement on what the pattern of well-planned communities should be. Their nuclei should be neighborhoods comprising perhaps a thousand families. Arranged around a civic center, school, recreation area, and local shopping district, they should be self-contained units, separated from and connected with other areas by parks and parkways. Though some small industries could be located near a residential neighborhood, most of the industries should occupy separate districts, easily accessible from the residential neighborhoods. A number of units, grouped around a large community center, would form a town.

A master plan would outline general directions for a number of such towns within a metropolitan area. Such plans are not made with a ruler on a map, nor do they regulate the disposition of every square foot of land. But they should provide for an orderly development of all the communities, determining the type of business and industry to be located in each, as well as the approximate size, number, and location of dwellings. This would avoid the present hit-or-miss decentralization; it would prevent the further growth of unsightly, sprawling suburbs around Detroit or Los Angeles, or across the Hudson from New York.

Many obstacles must be overcome, of course, before such master plans can be drafted and executed. Among the major difficulties is the great number of administrative barriers that must be hurdled. Rehabilitation in the central cities presents greater difficulties. In most states, if not in all, cities can expropriate land under the right of eminent domain. Many cities, however, are poor and have debt limitations which make it impossible for them to bear the cost of purchasing land now covered by slums and blighted areas. There are two effective ways of solving this problem, and both should be used simultaneously. One is to deflate excessive land values by condemnation proceedings. Real-estate owners traditionally assume a constant increase in land prices, and even the financial disasters of the late twenties did not shake their convictions, which are also reflected in many court decisions. In order to obtain this land at realistic prices, we need legislation which will define its value not on the basis of speculative hopes but by anticipating the steady decline that is the inevitable result of continued decentralization. As this will hurt some members of a very vocal group, only intensive public pressure can get such laws passed.

Even if this is accomplished, financial help by the federal government is needed. Toward what more productive purpose can the taxpayers' money be utilized? Professor Alvin Hansen, in an article in the Survey Graphic of April, 1944, recommended the two following plans: the federal government can advance the money and be repaid out of the net returns which the cities will receive from leasing land to private development companies; or the cities can issue federally guaranteed bonds for this purpose, and city and federal authorities together can make additional annual grants to acquire land which is particularly expensive.

We cannot expect such projects to repay their cost within a short time. If this were required, most cities would buy only cheap land at their outskirts or would use cleared slum areas for housing projects with an undesirably high population density. Unfortunately, that is the way the matter is being handled now, on New York's crowded lower East Side, for instance. If our cities are to provide the proper environment for their inhabitants, the population density must be lower than it is now. Not all slum areas can be converted into housing projects; adequate provision must be made for parks and playgrounds. Contrary to widespread belief, the primary function of parks is not to increase the real-estate value of adjoining properties. A park is essential to the health of the city dweller. It gives him breathing space, room for his leisure activities, and opportunities for the wholesome development of his children.

We must therefore consider the cost of rebuilding our cities as a long-term investment, part of which will be repaid only indirectly by higher working efficiency, lower accident rates, less disease and delinquency. City rebuilding costs, like expenditures for public hygiene and education, are permanent investments in our human resources.

Once the land has been acquired by the municipal authorities, there are several ways of putting it to use. It can be sold to individual builders in small units. That would probably bring quick regression to planlessness. Or the land can be leased, with the community retaining ownership. That would give the planners maximum control over the use of the land, but it would incur the risk of municipal graft and favoritism. Imagine Jersey City owning great portions of its land! Then there is a third and widely favored method whereby land would be sold in large units to private enterprise. That would bring a swift return on investment, but it might also impose the will of private monopolies upon the community. Stuyvesant Town in New York City, a project of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, is a recent example. It suffers from high density of population, it has no civic center, no school, no adequate recreation facilities, and racial discrimination is practiced.

Finally, the land can be leased or sold to cooperatives, a method which Sweden has tried very successfully. This method can achieve more orderly and less expensive development of the land than the sale of small parcels to individuals. And certainly the influence of cooperatives would be far more beneficial than that of private monopolies.

Whatever method is adopted, its successful execution depends upon one condition: the active interest of every citizen in the subject of city planning and in what his municipal government is doing about it. Let experts solve the technical problems, but let each citizen know that his tax money is being spent not on preserving old-fashioned, inefficient, costly systems of streets, houses, and services, but on rebuilding a city to serve his own best interests.

Recently, Syracuse, New York, proved that after proper preparation by newspapers and civic organizations, a large number of citizens could become interested enough in city planning to pay extra taxes for it. There is no reason why such experiments cannot be tried elsewhere. Particularly encouraging is the interest that some labor unions are showing. The United Automobile Workers' union has initiated a campaign to promote membership interest in housing and city planning, and other unions may follow.

This civic interest must be supplemented by government help. Pre-war Holland achieved good results with a law which required all cities and towns above a certain size to prepare detailed but flexible plans for their further development, to be revised every ten years. We need such legislation in America. We also need a federal agency to supervise and coordinate all local planning. Only the defunct National Resources Planning Board was equipped to handle such matters; the existing agencies are concerned only with public housing or various financial and insurance functions. In a recent speech in Chicago, President R. J. Thomas of the U. A. W. suggested the creation of a federal Department of Housing and Community Development, to play a role in this field corresponding to that of the Department of Agriculture in food production and farm work. This proposal deserves full support: if it is carried out, we shall have taken the first step toward rebuilding our cities.

In the Wind

THE CHIMES, an ice-cream parlor in Seattle, leads off its menu with a 35-cent item: "Victory Sundae—Three scoops (1 Choc., 1 Van., 1 Straw.) topped with Chimes Special Mocha Syrup, banana slices, and peanuts, garnished with a maraschino cherry." Other dishes of equally appetizing composition are named The Paratrooper, Devil Dogs Delight, Tank Corps Treat, and Sailor Boy.

JOHN W. SCOVILLE, economist of the Chrysler Corporation, in a pamphlet entitled "Collective Bargaining," offers this plan for "a more abundant life and greater justice": "(1) All federal labor laws should be repealed; (2) there should be no state laws on wage rates or hours; (3) collective bargaining and all other monopolistic practices should be made illegal by state laws."

CHARLES OF THE RITZ is one of the swankiest of hair dressers, but the employees of his B. Altman branch in New York have recently joined the Barbers and Beauty Culturists Union, C. I. O.

THE GUARANTY TRUST COMPANY of New York devotes the leading article in the current issue of its monthly bulletin, the Guaranty Survey, to the full-employment bill. "Perhaps the most dangerous feature of the proposal," it says, "is its assumption of the government's responsibility to guarantee employment. . . . Supporters of the full-employment plan are correct in stating that private business cannot provide such a guarantee. . . . The conclusion seems inescapable that full employment cannot be guaranteed in a free society."

RAOUL E. DESVERNINE, attorney and former president of the Crucible Steel Company, put it less suavely on the radio forum program, Wake Up, America, July 22. "The term full employment," he said, "was coined as a demagogic vote-catcher, used in many beguiling senses, and it is therefore difficult to know in what sense it is being used at any given time. It cannot mean anything as un-American as the employment of everyone able and willing to work. This would be reaction at its worst and a big step backward for America."

LLOYD T. BINFORD, chairman of the Memphis Board of Censors, who banned the showing of the movie "Brewster's Millions" in his city a few months ago because it showed Negroes in dignified roles, has now banned "The Southerner" because it portrays Southerners as "ignorant, low-down white trash." Mr. Binford said, "No Negro in the Arkansas swamps ever lived in such a house as the one shown in 'The Southerner.' " An Atlanta spokesman for David Loew, the producer, replied, "Perhaps not, but Mr. Binford could find several behind the state capitol in Atlanta."

HEARSTIANA, by Jack Lait, in the New York Daily Mirror of August 1: "As a reward [for scooping the world on the death of John Dillinger in 1934] I was sent to Geneva to cover the League of Nations."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. One dollar will be paid for each item accepted.]

BOOKS and the ARTS

Little Places

Such power in little places:
The petal weight a coil of jelly moves,
And snails have conquered beaches.
The worm, with neither horn nor bone,
Plows acres.

Prometheus down a cold crack:
Rainstreams freezing, and the granite
Splits; as smoke of sister water
Pushes the long piston; and a copper
Hair holds worlds.

The Yes all year awaited:
Thinnest word, and yet it peoples spring
With mighty houses, lived in; No,
Enormous night; as when the bud bursts
Or does not.

Such power; with plants depending,
Thunder, and small men, and now the spark
Whereby a town is merry.
The end, that neither feels nor sees,
Thanks nothing.

MARK VAN DOREN

The Flemish Masters

THE LAST FLOWERING OF THE MIDDLE AGES. By Joseph van der Elst. Doubleday, Doran. $7.50.

THE easel picture was prefigured in manuscript illustration and in the panels of the altarpiece. The cathedrals north of the Alps, with their skeletal structures and great windows, could not accommodate murals, only isolated pictures or sets of pictures in ornate frames. The magnates and clerical bureaucrats of Flanders found in the framed picture a proper means by which to celebrate themselves publicly in their character as individuals, for the framed picture spoke for itself and was not to be subordinated to its architectural surroundings in the role of mere decoration.

The presence of a tradition of book illumination developed in the courts of France and Burgundy also conditioned Flemish painting. By this, as well as by the general influence of Gothic style, the Flemish picture was determined as a matter more of detail and compression than of broad spatial design. The picture was arrived at by the exclusion rather than the organization of space, and aimed at retaining and fixing attention instead of catching it in flight as Italian painting did. The latter remained closer to the mural and accomplished the transition to the three-dimensional much more slowly—given that this transition began with Giotto. Derived so intimately from missal art—and to some extent, in my opinion, from the very naturalistic late medieval sculpture—the painting of Flanders in the fifteenth century remains late Gothic in its crowded, angular design, its profusion of anecdotal and other detail, and its ornamental emphasis, reminiscent of metal work.

Paying relatively scant heed to rhythm and unifying design, the Flemish painter distributed his accents with little modulation over the entire surface of his picture. This would have been fitting enough had the painter kept his handling somewhat flat, but having just discovered the ways of rendering depth and mass, he insisted on modeling all volumes boldly and with almost equal prominence. Thus the effect was one of turgidity. It was a mode more appropriate to the illustration of books than to pictures to be seen at a distance, and it constitutes a defect of the Flemish style which all its excellences cannot make us overlook.

This stricture does not apply, however, to the portraits executed by these same painters, which through clarity of design and coolness of handling acquire a monumentality their larger and more strident religious-anecdotal pictures generally lack. The psychological naturalism and impersonal intimacy of these portraits put them on a level that in some respects no later work has approached (except Goya's portraits). Here the Flemings were at their most modern—and only by anticipating the modern did they produce their greatest work.

Straddled between the Middle Ages and the Renaissance, between the aristocratic court and the bourgeois town, Flemish naturalism underwent a premature development—chiefly at the hands of Jan van Eyck, who, the first and greatest genius of all the Flemish painters, managed best at the same time to redeem this prematurity. (Van Eyck was once credited with having invented painting in oil, but it seems that he only developed it to a new point). Van Eyck transferred to the wooden panel and expanded with amazing suddenness the naturalism that Franco-Flemish manuscript illustration had incubated, and he posed and nearly succeeded in solving problems that almost none of his successors were equal to. How order the rich variety of visual phenomena the artist was cast upon once he abandoned the prescriptions of the church? How discipline the peculiarly Flemish appetite for the texture and grain of objects? It remains one of the charms and yet one of the shortcomings of van Eyck's art that it ovrpowers by a wealth of minutiae thrown into lapidarian relief. But toward the end of his career he seems to have discovered atmosphere as a selective agent that, in the absence of iconographical prescriptions, decided what was to be emphasized and what subordinated. Van Eyck, however, was too far in advance of his times, and of his lineal successors only Hugo van der Goes retrieved anything of the uses of atmosphere. Memling, thirty years after van Eyck, faced with the still unsolved problem of organizing the anecdotal picture, made a great if sudden retreat to the principles of book illustration in designing the pictures for the famous St. Ursula shrine in Bruges.

Only when the center of Lowlands trade shifted from the comparatively provincial Bruges, Louvain, Ghent, to the world port of Antwerp did Flemish painting begin to lose its peculiarly gawky character—that blending of regional Gothic with naive naturalism and brilliant physical finish. Quentin Massys is still a Fleming but one softened by cosmopolitanism. Jerome Bosch is still Gothic, but worldly Gothic, and some of his plastic means show a modernity out of all relation to the painting then around him. Bruegel, his continuator, was even farther ahead of his times than van Eyck had been; he combined a summary and far from naive naturalism with a painterly sense of the decorative and two-dimensional in a way only to be approached again by Courbet three hundred years later. (Courbet, like Bosch and Bruegel, was a peasant by origin and, also like them, hostile to the ways of the high bourgeoisie. Never elsewhere did the petty bourgeoisie express themselves in as great and as enlightened a way as in the art of these three.)

Baron van der Elst's "The Last Flowering of the Middle Ages," attempting to evoke the milieu in which they lived, describes, explains, and evaluates the work of the principal Flemish masters of the fifteenth century, including Bosch and Bruegel. Despite the fact that it very often hovers on the edge of banality, the book provides as good an introduction to its subject as I know of in English, and it does succeed in bodying forth some of the reality of the things it treats. In addition, it is well illustrated.

As Meyer Schapiro pointed out in his review of the book in View, the Baron gives too idyllic a picture of the fifteenth century in Flanders. (I would recommend Jan Huizinga's "The Waning of the Middle Ages" as an indispensable corrective.) There was something over-ripe and slightly vicious about the period, of which the noble author gives little hint. And yet the art he considers provides unmistakable evidence. A certain malaise is to be detected in van der Weyden, under and above the intense emotionalism that is restrained by the lingering decorum of Gothic gesture. That marvelous painter van der Goes was a psychotic who suffered from delusions of guilt. Van Eyck, for his part, gained his insight as a portraitist from a rather profane detachment. Commissioned chiefly by cosmopolitan courts, he expressed a worldliness that the high bourgeoisie upon whose patronage his successors were dependent were not yet ready to accept. Yet they were on their way to it, and the closer they came, the more their painters had to force religious feeling. It is this forcing that tells. And the need to do so also tells. The worldliness did not come easy, and the fifteenth-century crisis in Catholic belief was also a crisis of premature skepticism—for the middle classes had not the psychological resources to come to terms with the skepticism generated in aristocratic and intellectual circles.

There is still another aspect to the historical ambiguity of Flemish painting. The painters of Flanders, like all other trades of the time, were organized in guilds whose members constituted a sort of petty bourgeoisie. The guilds were hostile to the developing capitalism, and this made their mood, in a historical sense, reactionary. At the same time the control they exercised over their members tended to discourage innovation or experiment. In so far as painting was an intellectual pursuit—which it always is in part—it went in advance of the times; but in so far as it was a guild trade, it hung back. As rapid as seems the progress of Flemish painting in the fifteenth century, one has only to compare it with what was going on in Italy at the same time to see that it actually did little more than fill in the outlines already sketched by van Eyck. Again and again during its course it suddenly faces about toward the past as it comes up against the problems of naturalism that van Eyck failed to solve. And it only leaps forward once more with Bosch and Bruegel at a time when the great commercial expansion signalized by the ascendancy of Antwerp was giving the guild system—and with it the "primitive" tradition of Flemish painting—its quietus.

CLEMENT GREENBERG

BRIEFER COMMENT

The Cycles of Capitalism

"THE BOGEY OF ECONOMIC MATURITY" by George Terborgh (Machinery and Allied Products Institute, $3) is the most thorough and devastating critique yet to appear of the popular belief that "economic maturity" is primarily responsible for capitalist depression and stagnation. The book will have wide repercussions. It may be soberly and profitably used by technical economists; it will certainly be roughly abused by many radicals and liberals, and gleefully misused by conservative apologists for unmolested private enterprise. Therefore in the controversy that is sure to flare up over the book it will be imperative to distinguish carefully between what the author does and does not prove.

Mr. Terborgh shows, I think, that many if not most of the formulations of the doctrine that the peace-time American economy is stagnating because it suffers from economic maturity will not stand the test of historical and statistical analysis. Ratios of national investment to national saving, consumption, and income do not seem to be significantly different in the twentieth century, when our economy is supposed to have come of age, than in the nineteenth, when it was vigorously adolescent. There is thus no long-term trend toward relative over-saving and under-investment. From this point of view, the economic collapse of 1929 was just the start of another business cycle, not fundamentally different from the many others which unregulated private capitalism has suffered and survived since the Industrial Revolution. In short, while the capitalist mechanism does work faultily, and while the nation and the economy are admittedly getting older, the latter condition is not the basic cause of the former.

What Mr. Terborgh fails to show is the incorrectness of a theory of economic maturity expressed in absolute rather than relative terms. In this context, it is not the ratio of investment to income that is important, but it's absolute quantity. Despite Terborgh's findings, it is still true that the absolute volume of private investment which a technologically developed capitalist economy is capable of producing is normally not enough to achieve and maintain high-level employment. Such an economy needs extra stimulation, regardless of the ratio of national investment to national income. The reason why that ratio remains surprisingly constant is simply that when total investment goes up or down, total income moves correspondingly.

This book should have a salutary effect on the economic and political thinking of liberals. For it is not enough merely to advocate the right action. One should also do so for the correct reason. Particularly in the immediate post-war period, business prosperity resulting from a vigorous replenishment boom may make advocates of economic maturity look a little foolish. More than ever, it will then be necessary to recognize that economic intervention and compensatory fiscal action by the government are necessary, not primarily because our economy is mature, but because, young or old, unregulated capitalism suffers from a drastic cyclical instability which no civilized state will tolerate when the means to correct it are available. LEO BARNES

Plain Talk

IN "RIOTS AND RUINS" by A. Clayton Powell, Sr. (Richard R. Smith, $2), one will find a good document on the changing attitude of the Negro toward his status in American life. Mr. Powell, formerly pastor of the Abyssinian Baptist Church in Harlem, has lived long and has had contacts with the masses of Negroes as well as with their leaders both in the North and in the South. Although he belongs among the older Negro leadership and writes somewhat in the tradition of Booker T. Washington, he does not accept "segregation with equal opportunities" as a solution of the race problem. In his homely philosophy, which reveals an acquaintance with recent literature on race relations, he criticizes Negroes for their inefficiency and thriftlessness as well as castigating whites for their inhumanity and hypocrisy. His discussion of the race problem is based upon his interpretation of the riot in Harlem in 1943 and to a lesser extent on the riot in Detroit. These outbreaks are interpreted as evidences of the resentment of Negroes against the accumulated grievances which they have suffered over the years in America. Mr. Powell utilizes many of his personal experiences to impress upon the reader the meaning of discrimination to the Negro. In the recital of these experiences, the author frankly admits his anger and hatred and does not use his sacred calling as a hypocritical camouflage for real feelings. The tone of the book is indicated in the following significant sentences: "The Negro used to be the most lovable, forgivable being in America, but the white man's prejudice, hatred, and lies have changed the Negro's psychology. He is just as full of hell, hatred, and lies as the white man."

E. FRANKLIN FRAZIER

Lesson in History

IN "Woodrow Wilson and the Great Betrayal" (Macmillan, $3.50) Thomas A. Bailey reworks that bit of Americana about Wilson in the isolationist toils. Although the theme is familiar, Bailey contributes a unique twist to the dramatis personae. Following the pattern of his earlier "Woodrow Wilson and the Lost Peace," he lengthens, without malice, his indictment of Wilson and without seeming to want to do so throws in a good word about the arch-villain, Lodge.

Bailey's analysis will displease Wilson enthusiasts nourished upon the reverent biographies of Baker, Dodd, and more recently Bell. Some of his conclusions they will not be able to deny, but there are others to which they might

Farrar & Rinehart

▶ Who are the Japanese?
▶ What do they think, believe?
▶ Are they capable of democracy?

THE Japanese Nation

By JOHN F. EMBREE

THIS IS the complete, authoritative analysis of Japanese social structure—government, education, religion, family, national attitudes and behavior. It leaves no facet of Japanese life uncovered. It tells: where the Japanese came from; why the Japanese regard themselves as descendants of God; why the Japanese are one of the most regimented people on earth; why the Japanese are able to regard themselves as liberators, not aggressors.

The author of this book is a leading authority on Japanese life and customs, formerly Area Supervisor in the Far East with Civil Affairs Training School at the University of Chicago. He has traveled extensively in eastern Asia and Malaysia, and has taught at the University of Hawaii and at the University of Toronto.

Japan today is not only our enemy but has the tactical advantage of being an unknown adversary, even to our armed forces and their leaders. This book will prepare us to conquer her, not only through its great wealth of factual and statistical material but through its unique understanding of the Japanese as an individual.

Index, $3.00

Complete List OF THE WORKS OF JOSEPH McCABE

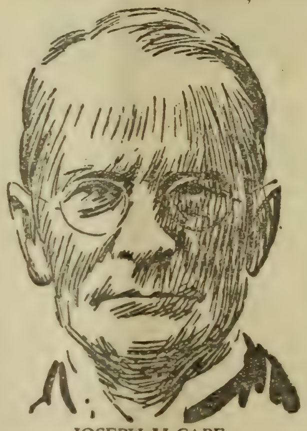
Joseph McCabe's immense scholarship is admired throughout the civilized world among those who appreciate candor, intellectual and moral courage, mind-liberating ideas, wit and humor, historical and biographical accuracy, fearless truth-seeking and down-to-earth, sound, clear writing. Below we list Joseph McCabe's writings IN FULL. First we give the titles of his larger works—all in our larger format, $5\frac{1}{2}$x$8\frac{1}{2}$ inches in size. These larger books range from 15,000 to 60,000 words. At the end of this circular we list McCabe's Little Blue Books. All prices include carriage charges, except in the case of 5c Little Blue Books, to which 1c per book must be added for packing, handling and carriage.

Outlines of the World's Great 'Isms. An Exposition of the 91 Creeds that Appeal to the Modern World. 75c.
Life of Roosevelt—His Character and Work. 75c.
Hitler and His Gang. The True Story of Greatest Crime in History. 75c.
The Picturesque and Adventurous Life of Chiang Kai-shek. 75c.
Joseph Stalin—Rebel & Statesman. 75c.
Churchill—The Man and His Creed. 75c.
Newest Discoveries in Astronomy. 25c.
The Failure of Fascism. 25c.
Economic Gains of the Soviet Union. 25c.
Nazis and the State of Germany. 25c.
History of the Civil War in Spain. 25c.
Imperialistic Japan and Its Aims. 25c.
The Emancipation of Modern Life and Letters. 25c.
What America Could Produce and Consume. 25c.
Television—What It Is and How It Works. 25c.
Man a Million Years Ago. 25c.
Economics—The Science of Getting and Conserving Wealth. 25c.
How the Talkies Talk. 25c.
Your Body and Its Functions. 25c.
What Vitamins and Diet Will Do for You. 25c.
Women Who Become Men. 25c.
Earliest Man in America. 25c.
Our Wonderful Glands. 25c.
The Human Body; How It Works. 25c.
Phallic Ancient Civilization and the Cult of Love. 25c.
What Should Be Taught About Sex. 25c.
How Man Acquires and Spends His Money. 25c.
Upton Sinclair Finds God. 25c.
Is the Philosophy of Dialectical Materialism Out of Date? 25c.
Human Morality. 25c.
The Story of Economic Ideals in Man's Social Status. 25c.
A Manual of Money and Wealth. 25c.
The Story of Human Social Ideas. 25c.
Great Writers of Antiquity. 25c.
Great Writers of the Middle Ages. 25c.
Great Modern Writers. 25c.
Today's Writers & Their Messages. 25c.
Ancient Art Explained. 25c.
Medieval Art Explained. 25c.
Modern Art Explained. 25c.
The Art of Thinking. 25c.
The Story of Philosophy. 25c.
The Story of Human Education. 25c.
The Progress of Science. 25c.
All About Psycho-Analysis. 25c.
The Morals of the Savage. 25c.
Morals of the Ancient World. 25c.
Latest Claims Supposed to Give Validity to the God Idea. 25c.
Morals Among Greeks and Romans. 25c.
Morals in Medieval Europe. 25c.
Morals in Arab-Persian Civilization. 25c.
The Moral Life of China and India. 25c.
Life in Europe in the Middle Ages. 25c.
Morals in the Renaissance. 25c.
Effect of the Reformation on Morals. 25c.
Morality in the 19th Century. 25c,
The Changing Morals of Today. 25c.
What Sex Really Is. 25c.
Christianity's Social Record. 25c.



JOSEPH McCABE

Absurdities of Christian Religion. 25c.
Truth About the Catholic Church. 25c.
Foundations of the Universe. 25c.
How the Universe Is Constructed. 25c.
The Globe We Live On. 25c.
How Life Sprang from Matter. 25c.
How Life Developed. 25c.
Marvelous Kingdom of Plant Life. 25c.
Marvelous Kingdom of Animal Life. 25c.
Does Atheism Rest on Logic? 25c.
Would a Godless World Make for Social Progress or Decline? 25c.
How Animals Are Constructed. 25c.
Man's Mastery of Life. 25c.
The Story of the Evolution of Man. 25c.
Life Among Many Peoples of Earth. 25c.
How Human Body Begins & Grows. 25c.
The Myriad Mysteries of the Mind. 25c.
Man's Story of Himself. 25c.
The Wonders of Ancient Egypt and Babylon. 25c.
The Splendors of Greece and Rome. 25c.
The Strange Civilizations of India and China. 25c.
True Pictures of Europe in the Middle Ages. 25c.
Story of the Rise of Modern Europe. 25c.
The Dawn of the New Age and the Birth of the Modern Spirit. 25c.
The History of America. 25c.
Man and His Submission to Being Ruled. 25c.
Antagonism Between the Sexes. 25c.
Woman and Marriage. 25c.
Abnormal Aspects of Sex. 25c.
Woman and the Creative Urge. 25c.
What Is the "Mystery" of Woman? 25c.
The Quest for Sexual Happiness. 25c.
Reason or Faith: Which? 25c.
Are the Latest Discoveries in Science Giving Support to God Idea? 25c.
Is Atheism Growing Stronger? 25c.
What War and Militarism Cost. 25c.
Vice in German Monasteries. 25c.
The Wonders of the Atom. 25c.
Debunking the Lourdes "Miracles." 25c.

Appeal to Reason. Vol. 1. The Fascist-Catholic Menace to Our Liberties. The Vatican and Fascist Italy. Are There Inferior Races? Rome's Record in Spain. 75c.
Appeal to Reason. Vol. 2. Roots of Anti-Semitism. Is Democracy Doomed? Political Aspects of the Vatican. When the Pope Was King. The Catholic Church and Birth Control. Psychology of the Crowd. Bacteria. 75c.
Appeal to Reason. Vol. 3. The Roman Catholic Doctrine of Toleration. The Church in Fascist Germany. The Church in Mexico and Spanish America. The Church in Ireland. How the Brain Works. Bunk About Ancient Wisdom. 75c.
Appeal to Reason. Vol. 5. The Church and Crime. The Church in Fascist Austria. The Meaning of the Policy of Celibacy. The Church in Poland and Russia. How the Church Gets Wealth and Power. Essay on Will Durant's Story of Civilization. 75c.
Appeal to Reason. Vol. 6. A Defense of Medical Science. Mexico and the Church. Crimes of the Church in Austria. The Church in Portugal. The Church & the Butchers of Naples. 75c.
Rhythm Method of Birth Control. 25c.
Getting the Most Out of Life. 50c.
Descartes' Discourse on Method. Introduction by Joseph McCabe. 25c.
The Inferiority Complex Eliminated. 75c.
How Freethinkers Made Notable Contributions to Civilization. 25c.
Futility of Basic Religious Ideas. 50c.
Ancient Great Men. Essays on Hammurabi the Pioneer of Law; Confucius, the Sage of China; Buddha, the Light of Asia; Cyrus, King of Persia; Mencius, the Chinese Democrat; Asoka, the Royal Apostle of Buddhism. 50c.
The Wonderful Greco-Roman World. Essays on Thales, Founder of Natural Philosophy; Pericles, Leader of Creative Athens; Pheidias, Inaugurator of Humanist Art; Plato, Philosopher and Sociologist; Aristotle, the First Encyclopedist; Zeno, Founder of Stoicism. 50c.
The Greco-Roman Civilization. Essays on Epicurus, the Apostle of Sanity; Ptolemy, the Splendid Patron of Science; Julius Caesar, the Genius of Rome; The Emperor Hadrian, the Royal Epicurean; Galen, the Pioneer of Medical Science; Theodoric, the Splendid Goth. 50c.
Great Men of the Middle Ages. In 3 vols. Essays on Tai-Taung, Emperor of a Glorious China; The Caliph Muavia, Founder of the Arab Civilization; Liutprand, the Civilizer of Northern Italy; Charlemagne, the Blond Giant Who Failed; Abdal-Rahman III, Most Brilliant of Moslem Caliphs; Otto the Great, Inspirer of a Modest Renaissance; Peter Abelard, Restorer of the Rights of Intellect; Saladin, the Great and Peerless Kurd; Frederic II, the Wonder of the World; Roger

(Continued on opposite page)

E. HALDEMAN-JULIUS, Box 1801, GIRARD, KANSAS

(Continued from preceding page)
Bacon, Forlorn Apostle of Science; Dante, Symbol of the New Struggle; Giotto, the Humanizer of Art; Boccacio, Symbol of a Lively Literature; Gutenberg, Megaphone of the Printed Word; Lorenzo, the Magnificent, Culture-Prince of Florence; Leonardo da Vinci, Universal Genius of the New Age; Michael Angelo, Prince of Renaissance Art; Christopher Columbus, the Enlarger of the World; Copernicus, Discoverer of the Heavens. $1.45.

The Men Who Made the Modern World. 11 volumes, 704 pages, 372,000 words. The Reformation—Essays on Wycliffe, the Morning Star of the Reformation; John Hus, the Martyr of Bohemia; Erasmus, the Genius of the Reformation; Luther, the Man of Action; Richelieu, the Iron Cardinal. The Return of Humanism—Essays on Rabelais, the Laughing Philosopher; Montaigne, the Symbol of Smiling Sanity; Cervantes, the Modernizer of Chivalry; Giordano Bruno, the Martyr for Liberty of Thought; Shakespeare, the Superb Creative Genius; Galileo, the Prophet of the Rights of Science; Francis Bacon, the Man of Scientific Vision; Descartes, Apostle of Rational Thought; Thomas Hobbes, the Scientific Politician; Cromwell, the Dethroner of Royalty; Moliere, the Satirist of Reaction; Milton, the Humanist Puritan; Spinoza, Liberator of the Jewish Mind; Newton, Inaugurator of the Reign of Science; Peter the Great, the Strong Man of Russia; Locke, the Rationalizer of Philosophy; Montesquieu, Pioneer of the Rights of Men; Frederick the Great, the Modernizer of Germany. The Dawn of the Modern Spirit—Essays on Voltaire, the Incomparable Liberator; Rousseau, the Preacher of Humane Sentiment; D'Aranda, Initiator of Humanism in Spain; Franklin, Inaugurator of Modernism in America; Diderot, the Theorist of the Revolution; Gibbon, the Father of Modern History; Kant, Destroyer of Medieval Philosophy; Adam Smith, Father of Modern Economics; Washington, Man of Action; Mirabeau, Leader of the French Revolution; Paine, the Prophet of Reason and Right; Jefferson, Leader of the New American Thought; Goethe, the Genius of Modernism in Germany; Schiller, the Poet of Rebellion; Pestalozzi, the Pioneer of Modern Education; Watt, the Enslaver of Natural Forces; Beethoven, the Magnificent Prophet of Modern Music. The Final Struggle—Essays on Napoleon, the Genius of Compromise; Byron, the Poet of Freedom; Shelley, the Impassioned Visionary; Bolivar, the Liberator of Spanish America; Robert Owen, Leader of Social Reform; Pushkin, Russian Leader; Mazzini, the Liberator of Italy; Victor Hugo, the Romantic Idealist; Karl Marx, Creator of Scientific Socialism; Carlyle, the Historian of Revolution; Heine, Satirist and Liberator. The Dawn of the Era of Accomplishment—Essays on Lincoln, Leader of Racial Emancipation; Wagner, the Genius of Modern Music; Darwin, the Greatest of Great Apostles; Ibsen, the Thor of Modern Scandinavia; Renan, Humanizer of Scholarship; Spencer, the Philosopher of Science; Nietzsche, the Destroyer of the New Dogmatism; Pasteur, Symbol of the Humanism of Science; Lester F. Ward, the Sanest of American Thinkers; Haeckel, the Scientific Iconoclast; Burbank, the Scientific Creator; Anatole France, Prophet of the Modern Spirit. $4.85.

Great Ideas Made Simple. 50c.

Rise and Fall of God Idea. 6 vols. $1.45.

The True Story of the Catholic Church. In six Double Volumes. 768 large pages. 394,000 words. An immense historical work. Documented. Accurate. Scholarly. Not a dull page. $2.85.

The Catholic Index of Forbidden Books—The History and Meaning of the Index Expurgatorius. 75c.

A Book of Popular Superstitions. 50c.

Outline of Today's Knowledge. 75c.

The World's Oldest Profession—the History of Prostitution. 75c.

Joseph McCabe: Fighter for Freethought. By Dr. Isaac Goldberg. 25c.

Talks with Joseph McCabe—His Life and Works. By Marcet Haldeman-Julius. 75c.

LITTLE BLUE BOOKS BY JOS. McCABE—5¢ Each, Plus 1¢ Per Book for Packing, Handling, Carriage

Please order by number. Remit at 5c each, plus 1c per book for carriage, etc. To Canada and other foreign countries, 7c per copy, prepaid:

122 Debate on Spiritualism vs. Conan Doyle
297 Do We Need Religion?
354 Absurdities of Christian Science
365 Myths of Religious Statistics
366 Religion's Failure to Fight Crime
439 Joseph McCabe's 12 Years in a Monastery
445 Fraud of Spiritualism
446 Psychology of Religion
477 Nonsense Called Theosophy
841 Future of Religion
1007 Revolt Against Religion
1008 Origin of Religion
1030 World's Greatest Religions
1059 Myth of Immortality
1060 Futility of Belief in God
1061 Human Origin of Morals
1066 Forgery of the Old Testament
1076 Morals in Ancient Babylon
1077 Morals in Ancient Egypt
1078 Morals in Greece and Rome
1079 Phallic Elements in Religion
1084 Did Jesus Ever Live?
1095 Sources of Christian Morality
1102 Pagan Christs Before Jesus
1104 Myth of the Resurrection
1107 Legends of Saints and Martyrs
1110 How Christianity "Triumphed"
1121 Evolution of Christian Doctrine
1122 Degradation of Woman
1127 Christianity and Slavery
1128 Church and the School
1130 The Dark Ages
1132 New Light on Witchcraft
1134 Horrors of the Inquisition
1136 Medieval Art and the Church
1137 Moorish Civilization in Spain
1140 Renaissance: European Awakening
1141 Reformation and Protestant Reaction
1142 Galileo and Medieval Science
1144 Jesuits: Religious Rogues
1145 Religion in French Revolution
1150 Churches and Modern Progress
1203 Seven Infidel U. S. Presidents
1205 Paine's Revolt vs. Bible
1211 Conflict Science vs. Religion
1215 Ingersoll, Great Agnostic
1218 Christianity and Philanthropy
1224 Religion in Great Poets
1229 Triumph of Materialism
1237 Beliefs of Scientists
1243 Failure of Christian Missions
1248 Lies of Religious Literature
1262 Is Evolution True? vs. Prof. Price
1762 What Is Wrong With the World
1763 How An Ape Became a Man
1764 The Evolution of Animal Life
1765 The World We Live In 1766 The Body Machine and How It Works
1767 The Mysteries of Embryology and Heredity
1768 The Plant World Simplified
1769 Has Man a Mind?
1770 Man the Creator
1771 The Wonders of Modern Chemistry
1772 How Religion Began
1773 Philosophers and Their Dreams
1774 Real and Unreal Moral Law
1775 How Christianity Grew Out of Paganism
1776 The Ancient World
1777 The World of the Greeks and Romans
1778 The Middle Ages
1779 The Historical Truth About the Rebirth of Civilization
1780 Asia's Great Atheist Religions
1781 Skeptics the Great Leaders of Progress
1782 The Making of the Modern World
1783 Lies and Bunk About Racial Superiority
1784 Asia and Its Problems
1785 Japan and America
1786 Russia in the Light of the War
1787 Socialism and Capitalism
1788 Evolution or Revolution
1789 Can We Change Human Nature?
1790 Sham Fighting About Matter and Spirit
1791 Freethought and Agnosticism
1792 The Literature of Myths and Legends
1793 Great Poets and Their Creeds
1794 The Theatres and the Cinema
1795 Pessimism in Modern Literature
1796 Modern Fancy Religions
1797 The Futility of All Mysticisms
1798 Fundamentalists and Superior Believers
1799 Is Our Age Degenerate?
1800 The Crying Need of School Reform
1801 This Question of Democracy
1802 The Man and the Woman
1803 What Is the End of Life?
1804 Bunk About Marriage
1805 Should the World Federate?
1806 H. G. Wells and His Creed
1807 Is America Religious?
1808 Death Control and Birth Control
1809 Bunk About Free Will and Strong Will 1810 The Materialistic Determination of History
1811 Man Today Faces His Greatest Opportunity

In all, there are 103 Little Blue Books by Joseph McCabe. Remit $6.18 and all 103 titles by Joseph McCabe (in Little Blue Book form) will be shipped prepaid. Order by mail. Remit by check, postal money order, express check, or postal note. Orders sent from Canada or other foreign countries should be accompanied by international postal money orders or drafts on a U. S. bank. Canada and all other foreign orders for complete set cost $7.21.

If you want all 103 Little Blue Books, remit $6.18 (Canada or other foreign country, $7.21.)

If you want all 144 larger volumes listed on these pages (the books measure 5½ x 8½ inches in size) remit $49.50. (Canada and other foreign countries, $54.50.)

If you want all 103 Little Blue Books and 144 larger volumes, remit $55.68. (Canada and other foreign, $61.71.)

E. HALDEMAN-JULIUS, Box 1801, GIRARD, KANSAS

well take exception. Perhaps Wilson has been too much admired for those traits which made his course all the more difficult—his unwillingness to compromise, especially when a moral issue was involved, and his stubborn clinging to principle in the face of a reality that demanded more moderate tactics. Bailey, however, seems to have overemphasized their role in bringing about the League's defeat.

His cogent arguments cannot be summarily dismissed, and his reputation as a student of foreign policy in relation to domestic issues will lead the scholarly journals to embark on lengthy debates. Bailey will be accused of placing too much faith in the good intentions of Lodge and of crediting him with too much independence from the Senate irreconcilables who were opposed to a League, reservations or not; of underestimating the strategic significance of reservations imposed upon the treaty as an isolationist tactic to draw Wilson in; of being too harsh with Wilson on many occasions throughout the volume. There can be no doubt that Bailey's reasoning from hindsight takes unfair advantage of Wilson. In its striving for point and its anxiety to assess blame, this is less a history than a lesson in history—lest "we have to do the ghastly job a third time." EDWARD N. SAVETH

VERSE CHRONICLE

"THE POETRY OF FREEDOM," edited by William Rose Benét and Norman Cousins (Random House, $3), is a big anthology of political and patriotic verse, a really global affair, covering the ground from ancient India to defunct Montenegro and quoting all the great spirits from Demosthenes to Robert Nathan. Never mind if the editors are a little undiscriminating as to poetic quality, or if the idea of freedom which governed their choices was so broad as to constitute a truism and you might as well be reading verse that celebrated the pleasures of breathing.

"The War Poets," edited with an introduction by Oscar Williams and containing, in addition to the verse, a number of statements on poetry and war by various poets, is a more inviting specimen of the topical anthology (John Day, $5). Instead of including the heroic war verse of past centuries, it sensibly confines itself to modern poets, for most of whom, as Mark Van Doren observes in his statement, war is simply calamitous. Growing out of the terrors of one conflict and then obliged to endure another, the present attitude has produced a poetry nearly always exasperated, sometimes indignant, seldom really resigned. Modern individuality is slow to give up its life and will shrink to a mere eye, looking hard but not expressing much of anything, rather than accept complete annihilation. From Wilfred Owen to Karl Shapiro the war poets remain craftsmen and observers, even when, as sometimes happens, they are unable to be much else. They proscribe generalities; they cultivate a technique of revelatory details and moments that tell their own story; what they write is often so personal as to be simply a versified diary. It is a species of war poetry in which the heroism and the poetry are in despite of the war.

Among English poets of a few generations back—the so-called Georgians—the influence of William Blake was very strong. It led to a great deal of pretty talking to animals—so much of it, indeed, that subsequent poets have mostly revered Blake from a distance. Richard Eberhart is one of the few contemporaries whose secular mysticism and casual style, as of children making angels in the snow, owe a great deal to Blake. Eberhart has not always succeeded in relating this influence to ourselves; but the small body of work in "Poems New and Selected" (New Directions, $1) is in part more substantial. The ambitious dialogue Triptych suffers from Eberhart's incapacity to imagine human situations, but there are several first-rate lyrics inspired by his experiences in the war. Blake's power of being at once didactic and lyrical is increasingly Eberhart's own possession; and out of war and metaphysics, visions and hard facts, he now makes a curious and very personal music.

> And long were days and tall were tremble-trees,
> The symbol of the self lost in a haze.
> And errors of sentience, O senses sweet! sour! sweet!
> That raveled out your substance quizzically . . .

Not many poets today would call a messenger boy a "blue-capped functioner of doom," as John Crowe Ransom does in one piece in his "Selected Poems" (Knopf, $2). And such a phrase may serve as an artifact in helping to assign him to a particular stage of literary culture. In Ransom's case a little archeology may really be needed, since he stopped publishing books of verse in 1927 and has in recent times become much more the critic and editor. In any case, the "blue-capped functioner of doom" clearly belongs to a stage of poetry earlier than Auden, earlier even than the dominant period of Eliot and Pound. It is characteristic, perhaps, of what Cyril Connolly has called the mandarin style—Cabell, Hergesheimer, Elinor Wylie, and Wallace Stevens being a few American examples of it. Unlike as the mandarins were in other respects, some of them good writers and others very bad, they all tried to combat the middle-class world by being superior to it. Elegance, artifice, a disposition to smile at the misplaced ardors and perverse ignorance of people who refused to live and love, in short a habit of making sophisticated irony out of modern life—all this entered into the styles and attitudes of such writers. Ransom does it all magnificently. Most of his poems are brief dramatic narratives about people: the woman whose devotion to flowers ruins her summer, the girl whose dedication to principle robs her of her lover, the crusading male who loses item after item of his anatomy in endless futile encounters with scamps and worldlings. Ransom's erotic strain is one of his great assets, since from his point of view the life of passion is particularly rich in folly. The well-known Piazza Piece, concerning the "gentleman in a dust-coat trying" and the "lady young in beauty waiting," is both a funny and a terrifying expression of the irony of hopeless passion.

> But what gray man among the vines is this
> Whose words are dry and faint as in a dream?
> Back from my trellis, Sir, before I scream!

Indeed Ransom's poetry ought to be studied entire by those who know him only through an occasional anthology piece. It is true that his mandarinism is not as complicated as that of, say, Henry James, and is apt at times to look a little fixed and glassy, particularly amid the mea culpa cries, the confessions of universal guilt, of contemporary writers. But he is certainly a master of the attitude, whatever its limitations. Whereas Cabell and Hergesheimer are all plush and bric-à-brac, Ransom achieves elegance by means of a few fine objects together with some cleverly placed mirrors. Hardly any other poet has so delicately exploited the humor latent in the feminine rhyme.

F. W. DUPEE

FICTION IN REVIEW

ALTHOUGH none of the novels that have appeared in recent weeks invites extended comment, here are brief notations on some of the books about which you may have developed a certain curiosity.

"Farewell My Heart" by Ferenc Molnar (Simon and Schuster, $2.50): The celebrated writer of sophisticated comedy makes obeisance to the seriousness of the times in the rather grim tale of a fifty-two-year-old man brought to his death by the love of a young girl. The lovers are refugees and Mr. Molnar sprinkles their story with topical references to dead soldiers, the Maginot line, and kindred world sorrows. None of which enriches either the emotional or social texture of Mr. Molnar's book but, instead, appears as something of an offense against taste. One can hope Mr. Molnar will soon see his way clear to resuming his charming fiddling. An excellent job of translation from the German by Elinor Rice.

"The Trojan Brothers" by Pamela Hansford Johnson (Macmillan, $2.50): Also a story of the sad outcome of unwise love, this time the scene England in the twenties; the ill-starred pair, a music-hall performer (the forequarters of a talking horse) and a gilded lady of the better classes who turns out to be his cousin. Genuinely entertaining, at least before it enters the realm of tragic consequences, Miss Johnson's novel is another example of the crisp wit and easy literacy which are so commonly at the disposal of the English light novelists.

"The Wayfarers" by Dan Wickenden (Morrow, $2.75): A modest, hard-working record of family life in a small mid-Western city in which a middle-aged newspaperman pulls himself out of the long doldrums following his wife's death to discover, first, that his four children also have lives and problems, and second, that there is now little he can do to help them. More intelligent than most homely novels, "The Wayfarers" is also a refreshment after the pretentiousness of most fiction that claims our literary interest.

"Lili Marlene" by Ruth L. Yorck (Readers' Press, $2.50): An account, in diary form, of one German woman's slow awakening to the true meaning of Nazism, a conscientious attempt to cope with the perplexing riddle of the relation of the decent German individual to the indecent social order. Credible and even suggestive up to the point where Miss Yorck's protagonist becomes an active worker in the underground; lapsing, from there out, into familiar melodrama.

"The Happy Time" by Robert Fontaine (Simon & Schuster, $2.50): The initial offering of a new publishing institution, the Venture Press, which, as its name and parents proclaim, is dedicated to the new and untried in literature. But what says:

The NATION
"Stalinist!"

NO VOICE IS WHOLLY LOST

By HARRY SLOCHOWER

We feel The Nation's readers should also be acquainted with other, less "labelous," criticism of this important book.

New York Times (Francis Hackett) says: "Anybody who wishes to think hard should possess himself of Dr. Harry Slochower's book . . . His worst critic must admit it is brain fodder, definite in philosophy, organized in argument and, within the limits it proposes, a weighty piece of work."

Thomas Mann says: "I believe it is your best work up to now, revealing extraordinary critical sensibility and fairness."

Chicago Daily News says: "The artist in criticism, the creator through the critical power, with this epic work . . . Slochower has established himself as the most truly profound critic in America."

Saturday Review of Literature (Joseph Freeman) says: "Learned, solid, wide in scope, intense in analysis, often wise, always ethical, it is the first wartime attempt—and a very stimulating one—to understand contemporary chaos and chart emerging roads to the organic, creative possibilities ahead."

Chicago Tribune (Edward Wagenknecht) says: "This is Harry Slochower's most important book . . . he has provided an exciting survey of contemporary thought."

PM (Alfred Kreymborg) says: "Slochower's valiant book . . . has all the fascination of a philosophic adventure story . . . It deserves to be read for its healthy attitude as well as for its wealth of inspiration."

$3.75, at your bookstore

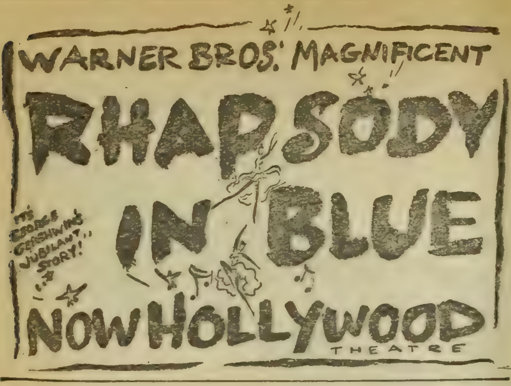
CREATIVE AGE PRESS . 11 E. 44 St., N. Y. 17

MOTION PICTURES



WARNER BROS.' MAGNIFICENT
RHAPSODY IN BLUE
IT'S GEORGE GERSHWIN'S JUBILANT STORY!
NOW HOLLYWOOD THEATRE

Barbara STANWYCK • Dennis MORGAN
Sydney GREENSTREET
IN WARNER BROS. NEW HIT!
"CHRISTMAS IN CONNECTICUT"
In Person! ERSKINE HAWKINS
And His Orchestra
Also In Person—THE CHARIOTEERS
BEN CARTER and MANTAN MORELAND
STRAND

BETTY HUTTON
ARTURO DE CORDOVA
In Paramount's
"INCENDIARY BLONDE"
In Technicolor
with Charles Ruggles
Barry Fitzgerald • Maurice Rocco

In Person!
"The Hour of Charm"
All-Girl Orch.
Under the Direction of Phil Spitalny
With
Evelyn • Jeannie
Francine • Viola
Mack Triplets
All American Glee Club • Imogene Coca

NOW PLAYING PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

20th Century-Fox presents
FRED MacMURRAY
in
Captain EDDIE
The Story of Rickenbacker
Now Playing ROXY 7th Ave. at 50th St.

STAGE PLAY

MICHAEL TODD Presents
UP IN CENTRAL PARK
Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS
Lyrics by DOROTHY FIELDS
Music by SIGMUND ROMBERG
BROADWAY THEATRE. Broadway & 53rd Street. Matinees Wed. & Sat.
REALLY AIR-CONDITIONED

is new or untried or, for that matter, literature about Mr. Fontaine's innocuous reminiscences of a Canadian boyhood, it would be hard to say. There being nothing more sure-fire these days than making gay with one's family eccentricities, the first publication of the new Simon and Schuster press scarcely insures the promised hearing for the worthy and experimental. So far, nothing venture, everything win.

"The World, the Flesh and Father Smith" by Bruce Marshall (Houghton, Mifflin, $2.50): The author of "Father Malachy's Miracle" in another educated and gracious demonstration of the charms of the Catholic religion. The way of Father Smith, in Protestant Scotland and through four decades of this century, is distinctly of a more traditional order than the way of "Father" Bing Crosby, but Mr Marshall's witty pen can quicken the appeal of even a Church of sacraments and doctrine. Can be recommended as superior entertainment even for heretics. DIANA TRILLING

CORRECTION: Because of the inadvertent omission of a line, one sentence in the essay, Our Culture and Its Critics by Eric Russell Bentley in The Nation of July 28, read, unfortunately, as follows:

Can one not be suspicious of a cultural critic for whom a Proust represents "the promise of America"?

It should have read as follows:

Can one not be suspicious of a cultural critic for whom a Proust represents only a false "aesthetic redemption" while a Steinbeck represents "the promise of America"?

MOTION PICTURES

Manhattan
ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st ST.
86th ST.
58th ST. near Lex.
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENT
RIVERSIDE
23rd ST.
Bronx
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL
Westchester
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

RKO NOW
'FAST, ACTIONFUL TEMPO'—N. Y. Post
PEARL BUCK'S
CHINA SKY
Based on the Best-Selling Novel
STARRING
Randolph SCOTT • Ellen DREW
Ruth WARRICK
— Plus —
'BODY SNATCHER' BORIS KARLOFF BELA LUGOSI

Brooklyn
BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYOU Coney Island
Queens
Keith's FLUSHING
Keith's RICH. HILL
STRAND Far Rockaway

CLARK GABLE
LORETTA YOUNG
in JACK LONDON'S
"CALL OF THE WILD"
with JACK OAKIE
— PLUS —
FRED MacMurray • JOAN Leslie • JUNE Havoc
WHERE DO WE GO FROM HERE? IN TECHNICOLOR

Films

JAMES AGEE

I SEE no reason why any of the following films should be reviewed at length. "Anchors Aweigh," a musical about two sailors, a girl, and José Iturbi, is thoroughly happy-spirited and enjoyable; but once I have paid my particular respects to Gene Kelly, who dances and acts excellently, and to Frank Sinatra, a singer, I might as well move on. The March of Time's issue about teen-age girls is worth seeing in the sense that one might examine with interest a slide of cancer tissue. These girls may be no worse than the teen-age girls of any other country, class, or generation, but I would be sorry really to believe that, and am sorrier still to imagine their children.

Another powerful horror short, "The Fleet That Came to Stay," is a record of Kamikaze, cut for thrills, but productive rather of dread, pity, and awe in any imaginative spectator. (I felt uneasy, by the way, not to say disgusted, when the narrator dismissed the Japanese fliers as "the men who want to die.") "Captain Eddie" combines some unpersuasive suffering aboard the Rickenbacker raft with extensive flashbacks to Rickenbacker's youth. These contain some pretty uses of detail and evocations of atmosphere, but the picture is at its mild best in its obsession with the comedy of pre-Pershing popular tunes, dance steps, and ground and flying machines.

Alcoholics ARE Sick People

ROBERT V. SELIGER, M.D.
Assistant Visiting Psychiatrist
JOHNS HOPKINS HOSPITAL
(An educational pocket-size monograph sent in a plain envelope.)

Book Dealers' Agent
REMINGTON PUTNAM CO.
Baltimore 1, Md.

ALCOHOLISM PUBLICATIONS
2030 Park Avenue, Baltimore 17, Md.

Please send: ALCOHOLICS ARE SICK PEOPLE.
☐ copies $2.00 cloth bound
Name...
Address...
....

The heroine of "Incendiary Blonde" bears the name of Texas Guinan, and at least once she shouts an obligatory "Hello, Sucker." From then on out the picture successfully ignores every one of the thousands of fine possibilities offered by its nominal subject, in favor of entirely conventional noise and music. Betty Hutton just about saves it, but no more, for those who like her, and I do. "Jealousy," a Republic picture, was made by Gustav Machaty, who made "Ecstasy." The story is of domestic misery, involving a disintegrated refugee, and developing into murder melodrama. It is intelligently cast, and well played by Nils Esther, the extremely attractive Karen Morley, a fine, warm-hearted actor named Hugo Haas, John Loder, and Jane Randolph. The music is by Hans Eisler. I doubt that "Jealousy" will have any great success, either critical or commercial; but it is a sympathetic film, and in spite of its over-all failure, contains enough sincerity and enough artistry to make most of the other films mentioned here look sick.

I must catch up, too, on some more of the older films I have failed to review.

"A Medal for Benny," after a rather mawkish start, turns into a broad but furious and well-filmed piece of invective against the attempt of some small-town boosters to exploit the death of a proletarian war hero. There is a first-rate performance by J. Carroll Naish. "Wonder Man" has little good in it beyond Danny Kaye—who, however, is almost continuously on screen. At his best Kaye suggests that he might be a much better comedian than he has yet become; at his loudest and blurriest he suggests that he may never become that good; but even at worst he is more than good enough. "Conflict," another domestic murder piece (Humphrey Bogart and Rose Hobart), is quite well done, but its story is so fancy that it becomes tiresome. "Those Endearing Young Charms," the story of a habitual seducer and his Waterloo, is well played by Robert Young and Laraine Day, well directed by Lewis Allen, and not quite interesting enough to be worth the time it takes. "Where Do We Go From Here?", a fantasy in which Fred MacMurray strolls through American history to music by Kurt Weill and lyrics by Ira Gershwin, is nine parts heavy facetiousness to one part very good fun. "That's the Spirit," a fantasy in which Jack Oakie, a ghost, leaves heaven to watch over his daughter Peggy Ryan, is clumsy but mildly enjoyable. I will not bother to speak of "The Singing Fool" or the latest Annette Kellerman waterwing, on the assumption that they are no longer in circulation.

Music

B. H. HAGGIN

A READER who says he got interested in jazz through me has written me about the subject as he has come to see it. The term "jazz," he contends, is properly applied only to the original type of ensemble performance by the three melodic instruments "playing independently conceived variations on the theme and the rhythm rather than harmonic 'parts,'" and not playing as soloists. In "what appear to be interludes of solo" one intrument—while the others of the polyphonic ensemble rest—"carries on what is actually an integral part of the ensemble expression rather than a true solo. . . . When a number becomes a succession of solos with interludes of ensemble rather than continuous ensemble it is no longer jazz, and while it may or may not be good music it has taken the first step toward the complete degradation we hear in most of our popular music." For my reader claims that when the emphasis shifts from ensemble to solos the performance presently becomes a series of exhibitionistic solos by one musician after another during which "the others provide harmonic or merely 'riff' backgrounds. From there it is but a very short step to Goodman, Basie, and 'swing.'"

Thus, in my reader's opinion, even the good performances that emphasize solos rather than ensemble—those of the Louis Armstrong Hot Five and Seven, or the "Wild Man Blues" of the Johnny Dodds Blackbottom Stompers—are not really jazz. "And they are the first step toward the later Armstrong performances on Decca, and those performances whose only redeeming feature is a sensitive and imaginative solo by Buck Clayton, Teddy Wilson, or Bix. And from there it is only another short step to Glenn Miller." Things like "Shim-Me-Sha-Wabble," moreover, are merely good per-

RESORTS

YOURS! A little more than EVERYTHING!

Pamper vacation whims with over 25 ways to have fun, including Tennis, Swimming, Boating, Handball, Riding, Recorded Musicales, Dancing, Arts & Crafts, and All Other Sports. Indoor Recreations. Entertainment Gaities. Good Eating. Merry Company. Cheery Quarters, Regular-and DeLuxe. Write or 'Phone.

SUGGESTION: Conditions being what they are, we urge you to MAKE RESERVATIONS NOW!

WOODBOURNE, N. Y. Tel. WOODBOURNE 1150

CHESTERS ZUNBARG

A DELIGHTFUL HIDEAWAY IN THE MOUNTAINS

"Fore" the Golfer

Newly Conditioned Course
A Grand "Pro"
New Clubhouse
. . . await your pleasure.

28 miles of beautiful private trails. Also — excellent tennis, boating and fishing on our private 7½-mile lake, swimming, golf, game rooms, cocktail lounge, dancing, really fine food . . . congenial atmosphere.

Only 51 Miles from New York

The Glenmere

CHESTER, N. Y. Chester 200 (N. Y.) RE 2-5047

ARCADIA Fishkill, N. Y. Tel. Beacon 727

R. R. Station, Beacon, N. Y., 60 miles from city.
ALL SPORTS, including tennis, volley ball, hand-ball, ping-pong, swimming in spacious pool, etc. Recordings. Informal social surroundings, delicious food.

The Fieldstone

On Round Island Lake

A place of unexcelled beauty for rest and relaxation. One hour from New York

ALL SPORTS — OPEN ALL YEAR

MONROE, N. Y. Phone 7965

BREEZEMONT PARK
ARMONK, N.Y.

35 MILES FROM NEW YORK CITY

"A Country Estate in the Scenic Hills of Westchester County"

The nearest of all nearby resorts. Exclusive location. Luxuriously furnished. Dignified. All sport activities. Excellent cuisine

OPEN ALL YEAR Phone Armonk Village 955

Tall Pines

High in the Dutchess County hills. 100 acres of beautiful rolling country . . . land and water sports . . . a design for leisure. N. Y. Central or Hudson River Day Line to Poughkeepsie.

ATTRACTIVE RATES

PLEASANT VALLEY, DUTCHESS CO., N. Y.
Phones: 2741 or 5511

MERRIEWOODE

A CAMP FOR ADULTS STODDARD, N. H.

FOR YOUR ENJOYMENT: Beautiful Highland Lake, 10 miles long, with good fishing and free use of boats and canoes. Interesting hiking objectives thru woodland trails. Fine tennis and handball courts, badminton, shuffleboard, archery, riflery, croquet, ping-pong, square dancing. $45 & $50 WEEKLY.

OLIVE H. G. BARON, Director

formances by "the jazz imitators like Beiderbecke, Teschmaker, and Spanier."

I recently objected to what my reader has done—to the defining of jazz by one type of performance that excludes any deviation from it, and that causes him to regard even the Armstrong Hot Fives or the Dodds "Wild Man Blues" as not really jazz, and the Chicago performances as only good imitations; and I don't agree that there is the difference he says there is between the solos in his real jazz and the ones in these other performances. And I disapprove of his "only-a-step" argument. If the Dodds "Wild Man Blues" or the Chicagoans' "Shim-Me-Sha-Wabble" is good, it does not become less good because something bad has followed from it: only the bad thing that followed is bad; and of course his argument also leaves out of consideration the good things that have continued to follow. My reader's letter has made me feel more strongly about the preoccupation with developments and tendencies: it is the individual work of art that is important and that is good or bad, not by its relation to developments and tendencies, but by its own particular qualities as a work of art.

As it happens, another reader, beginning with approval of my attack on the preoccupation with developments and tendencies, has written to point out that a composer's music does have a relation to other music, and to ask whether complete understanding of his music does not therefore require knowledge of that relation. This is an instance of how, beginning with truth, one may end up with error. It is true that the pictorial elements which appear on a Cézanne canvas have relations to the work of other painters, to their ideas, to general intellectual currents, to social conditions; it is not true—though the musicologists contend it is—that one must know these relations in order to understand the Cézanne painting. That understanding consists in experiencing the effect, the impact, of the pictorial elements as they are placed and related on the canvas, and of nothing else; the related things outside the canvas enter into this experience only insofar as they are "digested" in what is on the canvas—to borrow a term from Tovey, who remarks that "what the finished [work of art] cannot digest must be ignored or regarded outside it." To know the relations of the work of art to the things outside it is to understand not the work of art but certain facts in the history of art and general culture. And this distinction is abundantly illustrated by the musicologists who, as I have pointed out, reveal knowledge of everything about a piece of music, but no insight into the piece itself as an artistic communication; and on the other hand by the people who do have this insight, without any knowledge about the music. But the public's mind has been so poisoned that a reader who wrote me recently about his "pleasure and little insight into great works of genius" found it necessary to confess that he wrote as "a mere listener" who had gained this insight only "by ear." That is why I keep hammering away on the point.

Merely to listen, and in this way to gain pleasurable insight into Mozart's music—that is considered so inadequate as to require apology. For complete understanding one must read something like the review of Einstein's "Mozart" in Kenyon Review—a full-dress musicological demonstration that Mozart as a composer was "one of the most prominent exponents of the revolutionary second half of the eighteenth century." This is achieved by the following steps: (1) the period was that of the revolt of the middle class; (2) the object of the revolt was not only equality but even superiority; (3) "the middle class tried to accomplish this by sublimation of human nature . . . through the cultivation of the three functions of man: intellect (it was the period of Enlightenment), will (it was the period of the English autonomic moral philosophy, and of the moralization of the arts and literature), and feeling (it was the period of sentimentality)"; (4) Mozart was sentimental—by the evidence of a description in a letter of his weepy behavior under the influence of homesickness; (5) "no art, of course, is more appropriate to the expression of sentimental feelings than music"; (6) "and no composer of this period has set greater value on Expressivität than Mozart"—by the evidence of specified letters; (7) "Mozart's enormous expressivity was his greatest contribution to the fundamental change of the theretofore aristocratic society to a bourgeois society"; (8) therefore he was a revolutionary.

Note the method: the line of reasoning about sentimentality; the unobtrusive shift, in the sixth step, from sentimentality to expressiveness, quite as though they were the interchangeable equivalents they are not; so that, in the next step, the argument may embrace Mozart's music, which is intensely expressive but not sentimental. What I think of the method, the purpose, the complete, detailed piece of writing, I have not been able to find polite language for.

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

Sweatshops for Veterans?

Dear Sirs:

In your issue of July 7, Edward M. Maisel advanced the thesis that government efforts to limit and ultimately abolish industrial homework will "cripple the disabled veteran." Mr. Maisel admits that industrial homework has developed into a system of chain sweatshops in which "able-bodied as well as disabled workers are widely employed"; that "the wages and hours of the unorganized homeworkers are often far below standard and constitute a standing threat to workers employed in factories." Yet he sees no solution for the badly handicapped veteran except industrial homework. This, however, would only help to perpetuate an admittedly vicious system.

Why should men who have fought so gallantly for the economic and social institutions of our democracy be condemned to sweatshop slavery in their homes? As Mr. Maisel points out, the severely disabled may now secure special homework certificates provided they are under the supervision of a state vocational-rehabilitation agency or a sheltered workshop; and this rule is relaxed in cases of "unusual hardship." But Mr. Maisel wants complete freedom for disabled veterans to find employment in this "antiquated" system. He argues that "to insist that they remain under a government-rehabilitation agency or a sheltered workshop is to condemn them to a state of perpetual training without graduation"—"graduation" to what? To the exploitation and underpayment of industrial homework?

The disabled veteran's claim upon society, great as it is, must not be repaid by measures injurious to society as a whole and to the veteran himself. Indeed it would be a grave injustice to attempt to discharge our obligation to the disabled veteran by condemning him to a lifetime of industrial homework. Sheltered workshops would provide a more wholesome environment for the individual than confinement to his own home making artificial flowers, carding buttons, or assembling jewelry, to cite only a few of the traditional homework industries. Under these conditions he would not receive lower rates than those paid to factory workers in the same occupations.

The problem of assimilating disabled veterans into industry is not easy to solve. Private industry must be challenged to do its utmost to make the necessary adjustment. Some heartening progress is being made by conscientious employers. The sheltered workshop is not the only answer to the problem of employing disabled veterans. Much constructive thinking and planning is required to deal humanely and intelligently with the social and economic problems of the seriously disabled whether veterans of the armed services or of the civilian work force.

Increasing the army of industrial homeworkers is no solution. A recent study by the New York State Department of Labor shows that despite the department's efforts to control and curtail homework, the war years have brought an 86 per cent increase in industries where homework is not restricted by homework orders. Because workers flocked to war industries, employers producing civilian and luxury goods turned to the pool of homeworkers. The New York report shows that control of homework is almost impossible. During the first five months of 1944 there were almost as many violations as for the total year of 1942. Most of the violations involved the illegal distribution of homework. So long as homework distribution is permitted at all, violations will be widespread and largely undetected because of the inherent difficulties of enforcement and policing.

The New York report offers convincing evidence of the lower earnings of industrial homeworkers. In 1943 two-thirds of the state's homeworkers were earning under 50 cents an hour—which the War Labor Board characterized even then as "substandard." Homeworkers in the embroidery-on-dresses industry, the highest paid group of homeworkers, received an average of $18.20 for an average work week of 30 hours; an average of $41.57 per week was earned by factory workers in the dress industry during the same period.

Must disabled veterans be condemned to employment in a system so "badly exploited" and generally unrewarding? The answer is "NO."

(MRS.) ELINORE M. HERRICK
Vice President, Consumers' League of New York

South Norwalk, Conn., July 15

RESORTS

ADIRONDACKS

ESTATE providing exquisite natural charm for gracious, modest living . . .

CRYSTAL LAKE—a 60 acre natural spring-fed lake, entirely within the property of 800 acres, surrounded by rich woodland with magnificent mountain views.

Accommodations in main Residence and Cottages (steam heated), boathouse, Tennis, Riding, Fishing. Golf nearby. Every facility conveniently located.

5½ hrs. from Grand Central Station 2½ hrs. from LaGuardia Field, Colonial Airline

Rate: Residence $100, Cottage $75

CRYSTAL LAKE LODGE
Chestertown, N. Y.

New York Office
MUrray Hill 5-0493
I. H. KESSLER

45 Miles from New York City

Zindorest ★Park Monroe N. Y.

Telephone 4421

A Resort for Adults Only

Exclusive location. 150 acres of unusual beauty. All sports. Lake and Pool on premises. Delicious food, relaxing atmosphere, dancing, modern accommodations.

Greyhound, Adirondack Trailway and Short Line Buses stop at our Entrance. ★

FOR FUN AND SUN
STAY AND PLAY AT

MAUD'S SUMMER RAY

NORTH BRANCH SULL. CO., N. Y.

Telephone: Callicoon 95 or 148

PRIVATE LAKE
ALL SPORTS
FORUMS
THEATRE
ARTISTS

SOCIAL DOINGS
DANCE ORCHESTRA
DRAMATICS
MARIONETTES
MUSICALES

FRED BERK & DANCE GROUP
MORT FREEMAN, Popular Radio & Concert Artist
SENSIBLE RATES
Erie R. R. to Callicoon
Private cars from your house direct to Maud's
DAILY BUSES DIRECT
Mountain Transit Lines, Greyhound Terminal
50th St. and 8th Ave. • COlumbus 5-3000
Call City Information: Dickens 2-5786

INVITATION TO RELAX

Enjoy the serenity of Plum Point. Gorgeous countryside, roaring fireplace, delicious food — and fun. Only 55 miles from New York

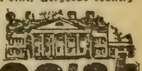
MAKE RESERVATIONS EARLY



Plum Point
"Year-Round Vacation Resort"
New Windsor, N.Y. Tel: Newburgh 4270

WESTERN VIEW FARM

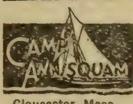
26th Season

Rate: $9 a day — $49 a week

TED OHMER

New Milford Connecticut

Telephone: NEW MILFORD 440



Gloucester, Mass.
ABRAM RESNICK
Director

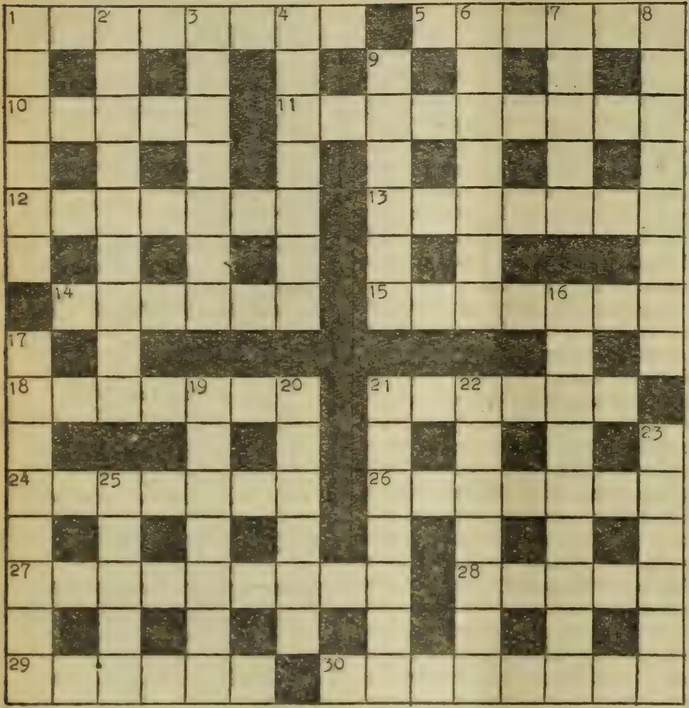
This Adult Camp...

in sheltered cove near picturesque Gloucester. Salt water swimming, sailing, boating and fishing on premises. Dancing, tennis, trips and all sports. Six hours by train from New York.

Write for booklet and rates.

Crossword Puzzle No. 123

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 He died by request, in the song
5 Not a hot water bottle
10 Worthless English castle
11 Observation an astrologer might have made when you were born
12 Devil take the fellow! (two words, 4 and 3)
13 It dulls the pain a little
14 As the Scotsman remarked after counting it: "It's right, but it's only just right!"
15 The fugitive's refuge, perhaps (hyphen, 4-3)
18 Adjective that can truthfully be applied to only one New York skyscraper
21 The performers in this have to be on their toes
24 One who takes what isn't his right
26 A love story would naturally include a man
27 The one who told you the news
28 American humorist (born Clemens)
29 Its meaning is kept secret
30 What should a man do when nothing comes his way? Take to music?

DOWN

1. Mr. Hyde's alter ego
2 A major-domo
3 Character in Falconer's Shipwreck—a pallid Scotsman from the look of him
4 Deprive of support
6 An able-seaman starts to quit the country
7 No gay newspaper column
8 Fire, air, earth and water
9 Looks a peaceful Irish county—there's only one weapon in it!
16 This takes in everybody (three words, 3, 3, 3)
17 Might describe one who has a "middle-aged spread"
19 Purify
20 A couple of sailors are likely to prove a bit of a handful
21 The "Bounding Basque" of the tennis world
22 Most British companies are thus restricted
23 This flag seems to urge us to continue writing
25 "When do we eat?" might be the cry of those who are this

* * *

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 122

ACROSS:—1 HOVEL; 4 LIP; 6 MORAL; 9 PIT-A-PAT; 10 TURNS IN; 11 ORCHID; 13 DURATION; 15 DEBATER; 16 FINGER; 17 KISS; 19 DAISIES; 21 GOLF; 23 RAFFIA; 25 AGONIST; 27 COMPRESS; 28 EIFFEL; 31 UNUSUAL; 32 OATMEAL; 33 HAGUE; 34 EYE; 35 SINIC.

DOWN:—1 HIPPO; 2 VATICAN; 3 LOPSIDED: 4 LATE; 5 PUT-PUT; 6 MORTAR; 7 ROSSINI; 8 LENIN; 12 DERANGE; 13 DAMSONS; 14 REVERSE; 16 FOG; 18 SEA; 20 SATIATES; 22 LIMBURG; 24 FIFTEEN; 25 AROUSE; 26 OSTLER; 27 COUGH; 29 LILAC; 30 NONE.

Disney Paisanos

Dear Sirs: John Steinbeck's old California paisanos—as they are called by no one today—have become stock fictional characters. Kindly, humble, full of the sweet dignity of man untainted by high-pressure commercialism, etc., etc., they wander through several of Mr. Steinbeck's books and are immortalized in "Tortilla Flat."

Now comes "A Medal for Benny," the screen version of the old familiar song. Its characters are kindly, humble, lovable—but they are a bunch of imposters. I doubt that John Steinbeck has ever been within speaking distance of the Mexican American he chooses to call a "paisano." Certainly he seems to know nothing of their psychology.

To my knowledge, the only worthwhile character study of the type that Steinbeck unsuccessfully depicts was made by Harvey Fergusson in his "Blood of the Conquerors." Fergusson is dealing with a real human being in this book, not a lovely, kindly, homely set of Disney characters. He makes us understand that the kicking around which the average Mexican has received in this land of the free has scarcely tended to promote those human traits so fondly depicted by Mr. Steinbeck.

Steinbeck has created a myth. His paisano is pure baloney.

JOSEPH A. BABANDO

Yuma, Ariz., July 13

CONTRIBUTORS

CLEMENT GREENBERG is The Nation's art critic.

LEO BARNES, director of economic research for the Research Institute of America, wrote The Anatomy of Full Employment in The Nation of May 26.

E. FRANKLIN FRAZIER, head of the Department of Sociology at Howard University, is the author of "The Negro Family in the United States."

EDWARD N. SAVETH, now engaged in research in New York, formerly taught history at the City College of New York. He has contributed to the Political Science Quarterly and the New York Times Book Review.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 161 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • AUGUST 18, 1945 NUMBER 7

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 145

EDITORIALS

The New Asia 148
One World or None by Freda Kirchwey 149

ARTICLES

Negrín's Policy is Winning by J. Alvarez Del Vayo 150
Washington Faces Peace by I. F. Stone 151
The Trial of Pétain by Pertinax 152
When H. G. Wells Split the Atom: A 1914 Preview of 1945 by F. K. 154
Progress in Yugoslavia by Hal Lehrman 156
In the Wind 157

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall 158
Poets of Republican Spain by Rolfe Humphries 159
Briefer Comment 159
Music by B. H. Haggin 163
LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 164

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY
Managing Editor J. KING GORDON
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL
Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]
Editor Political War Section
J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO
Assistant Editor J. MITCHELL MORSE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON
Director of Nation Associates
LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS
CAREY MCWILLIAMS REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1945, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

WE GO TO PRESS AT A MOMENT OF TENSION and confusion while Japan's formal answer to our surrender terms is breathlessly awaited. The Japanese offer of capitulation, coming on the heels of the atomic bomb and Russia's entrance into the Far Eastern war, stirred expectations of immediate peace. These culminated in wild celebrations after a mysterious report by the United Press that Japan had finally surrendered. The report itself is under investigation by the FBI and the FCC, and is just conceivably the work of a Japanese agent in an incident as fantastic as anything in the latest whodunit. But it is more probable that events in Japan delayed an answer to the Allied peace terms. In any case peace cannot be long postponed. The swift advance of the Soviet armies in Korea, Manchuria, and North China, on top of our terrific bombings, makes prolonged resistance unlikely, though a series of suicide and surprise attacks is possible. Whether by design or not, the surrender reports already represent a psychological set-back for us, and unless peace comes within the next few days it will be difficult to keep war workers at their task and to prevent a serious let-down in the armed forces.

*

THE TERMS OF THE THREE-POWER DECLARATION to Japan before Russia's entrance into the war implied the continuance in power of the Emperor. Japan's surrender offer, while accepting the Potsdam-Cairo terms, asked an "explicit indication" that "the prerogatives of His Majesty as a sovereign ruler" would not be prejudiced. The Byrnes reply, on the behalf of the four powers, made no direct answer. The Emperor is to remain on the throne subject to the orders of the Allied military commander, but "the ultimate form" of the Japanese government is to be determined by "the freely expressed will of the Japanese people." There are advantages in using the Emperor to make peace and in leaving his future to the Japanese people. The danger is that if MacArthur is made Allied commander in Japan, with Under Secretary of State Grew and his former Counsellor of Embassy Eugene Dooman as political advisers, our military power may be used to keep the Emperor on the throne and to suppress popular movements against him. The Nation's recent revelations of the policies followed by MacArthur in the Philippines indicate what is to be expected from him in Japan.

*

ONE OF THE FEW POINTS IN PRESIDENT Truman's broadcast not previously covered by the Big Three's report was his disclosure of an American proposal to place Europe's waterways under international control. It seems probable that discussion of this question was inspired by Russian demands on Turkey for a revision of the Montreux Treaty so that its warships and merchant vessels will have an unobstructed passage from the Black Sea to the Mediterranean in peace or war. On American initiative this delicate issue has been broadened to cover all European water-routes in which more than one country has an interest. "Selfish control" of such routes, Mr. Truman said, "has been one of the persistent causes for war in Europe." He suggested that in future there should be free and unrestricted navigation of the Danube, the Black Sea Straits, the Rhine, the Kiel Canal, and all other waterways which border upon two or more states. Their development and regulation, he urged, should be intrusted to international agencies on which the United States, Britain, Russia and France should be represented as well as the riparian states. No definite action was taken on this proposal at Potsdam; it was referred to the new Council of Ministers, where the United States intends to press for its adoption. Certainly our representatives can find plenty of good arguments for the principle of curbing national monopolies of international traffic arteries. But would not their arguments be stronger if they recognized that the principle had universal, not merely European, validity; that it applied to the Suez and Panama canals as well as to the Dardanelles?

*

THE PRESS SCREAMED "ESPIONAGE" WHEN The Six were arrested on State Department orders for disclosing "confidential" information on the Far East. But minor stories on the inside pages carried the news that a federal grand jury in the District of Columbia had refused to indict three of them and indicted the other three not for espionage but merely for "purloining" government documents. State Department hysteria and anxiety to silence critics of its Far Eastern policies have thus succeeded in smearing without cause John Stewart Service, one of its own foreign-service officials; Kate Mitchell, co-editor of Amerasia, and Mark Gayn, a free-lance writer on the Far East. No indictments were returned against them. At the same time the grand jury's action indicates that the stigma of "spy" was equally unjustified when applied to Andrew Roth, former lieutenant in the navy; Philip Jaffe, editor of Amerasia; and Emanuel Sigurd Larsen, another State Department employee. It remains to be seen how much can be proved against these three at their trial. It becomes clearer than ever that the case of The Six was an attempt by the Grew-Dooman crowd to discredit its opponents in the department and in the press by underhanded and dishonorable means. We demand Service's reinstatement with formal public apologies and again ask that the Senate Foreign Relations Committee investigate this whole shameful affair.

*

WE HAVE HAD A THUNDEROUS REMINDER IN the past week of the lag between scientific invention and social thinking, but apparently it was not loud enough to awaken some of our Rip Van Winkles. Take, for instance, Herbert Hoover, who, six days after the first atomic bomb was dropped, made a speech about the "free American system" which would have seemed dated even when he was President. Mr. Hoover is alarmed about the spread of communism and the fact that "half a dozen once liberty-loving nations are shifting to socialism," with Britain the most recent example. To him these foreign systems are forms of collectivist tyranny presided over by bullying bureaucrats, but, for all their unattractiveness, he fears the invasion of the Western Hemisphere by their propaganda. Therefore he calls upon us to defend "economic freedom," without which "all the freedoms of the mind and spirit will perish." We know, he continues, "that discovery, invention, competition, and skills can never come from government officials." This is a curious statement to make in the face of the terrific collective enterprise that made possible the splitting of the atom. True, the results of that enterprise have appalling potentialities for evil, but they also offer to mankind tremendous opportunities. Is it conceivable that these opportunities will be realized if the development of this revolutionary source of energy is left to private enterprise?

*

AMERICAN MERCHANT SEAMEN, WHO BY THEIR courage and endurance have made so great a contribution to victory, "enjoy" a basic wage rate of only 34½ cents an hour —no more than before the war. For the men who have carried our soldiers and weapons to all parts of the world, risking their lives continuously, there has been not even the 15 per cent increase provided by the "Little Steel" formula. True, bonuses have been paid for duty in war zones which have sometimes made take-home pay at the end of a voyage double or treble the basic wage, but against this must be set such facts as the stoppage of a man's pay if his ship was sunk, as so many were. From the beginning, these additional payments have been treated by the ship operators as ample compensation for the increased cost of living. But now that European waters are no longer considered dangerous, bonuses are being reduced without reference to the price level. Today a seaman on Atlantic routes can expect to earn no more than $125 a month, including all extras. Soon after V-J Day bonuses are likely to be wiped out altogether. The National Maritime Union, therefore, has asked the War Labor Board to approve an increase in wage rates to 55 cents an hour— the minimum established for all other American workers. There should be no hesitation on the board's part in complying with this demand. The union has steadfastly kept its pledge against war-time strikes; it intends to do all it can to speed the job of bringing the troops home. But low wages are encouraging individual seamen to leave the merchant service in droves—8,000 a month on the average—and it is increasingly difficult to man the ships.

*

CIVIL WAR IS THE "ONLY SOLUTION" TO THE present situation in Argentina, according to dictator Perón himself. This extraordinary statement seems to be the regime's answer to the growing opposition of democratic forces. In an interview with Dr. Pedro Cué, director of the Cuban daily, El Mundo, Perón said: "I do not fear civil war because I am prepared for it. . . . I have at my disposal 300,000 soldiers and 4,000,000 workers armed with clubs." Shortly after this interview, free elections and the lifting of the state of siege were announced. But no people was ever freed by a tyrant's edict and these apparently conciliatory gestures are in truth a Perónian provocation to internal strife. Argentina's major political parties, the Socialists, Radicals, and Conservatives, representing all shades of opinion from left to right, view as an immediate threat the amended political-parties statute which became effective on August 1. For it enables government-appointed commissions to convoke and control the national assemblies of political parties which, dissolved since 1943, are now permitted to function again. According to the statute present party leaders must be dropped and new ones chosen under the aegis of committees named by federal electoral courts appointed by the present fascist government. The moderate Radical Party, Argentina's most powerful political organization, is in immediate danger of being captured and used by the Perón clique to support the dictatorship's candidate for President, who may turn out to be Perón himself. Thus the promise of free elections is coupled with the imposition of measures that make free elections impossible. Perón has presented the Argentines with the alternatives of giving his detested regime a vote of confidence or fighting in the streets. The spontaneous pro-democratic rally of 15,000 Argentines in Buenos Aires last week, which led to rioting and demonstrations against Perón when the police attempted to intervene, show what their answer is likely to be.

*

PIETY AND PURITANISM ARE OLD PARTNERS, and they are intimately linked with political reaction. In Spain the triumvirate is very busy these days. Within recent weeks Rome has sent instructions to the Spanish hierarchy to intensify its campaign against the reestablishment of the republic. And simultaneously the church is trying to turn Spain back to the dark days of the nineteenth century when friars and nuns dominated the court and dictated the laws of the country. The Archbishop of Valencia, the Most Reverend Prudencio Melo, has recently issued a pastoral letter laying down for Spanish parents severe instructions, supported by the government and heralded by the press department of the Falange. Parents are warned "not to allow their daughters to wear décolleté dress that would reveal too much of their figures, or to leave uncovered the greatest part of the legs." The letter deals firmly with the problem of picnics and parties; parents must make sure that their daughters take no part in excursions with men, "especially if the excursion is by bicycle." Archbishop Melo does not explain the clerical opposition to the bicycle, but presumably it arises from the danger that in pedaling the "greatest part of the leg" will be exposed. Unmarried men and women are not to be allowed to bathe from the same beach unless there are "separate sections for each sex." Especially strong censure is directed against the custom of "engaged couples" walking hand-in-hand in the street. Cinemas should not be frequented unless the films have been expressly approved by the ecclesiastical censorship. The Archbishop is convinced that only by such measures as these, and by the maintenance of the fascist regime, can Spain be saved from the moral ruin that threatens Europe.

*

THE NATION ENTHUSIASTICALLY INDORSES THE proposal by the National Lawyers Guild for the appointment of William H. Hastie to the judicial post left vacant by the resignation of Thurman W. Arnold from the Circuit Court of Appeals in the District of Columbia. As judge of the District Court for the Virgin Islands from 1937 to 1939, Mr. Hastie was the first Negro to sit on the federal bench and would be the first of his race on the Circuit Court of Appeals. But The Nation supports him for the vacant judgeship not merely out of a desire to give recognition to the Negro, but because it believes Mr. Hastie well qualified for this position by training, legal accomplishment, and social outlook. The dean of the Howard University Law School is not only a lawyer of distinguished professional attainments but a man of consistently progressive views and courageous temperament. The District of Columbia Court of Appeals is in some respects the most influential appeals court in the country and its decisions play a role second only to that of the United States Supreme Court in molding American law. It is important that the judges on this court, in the crucial post-war years, should be men of liberal philosophy and instinctive sympathy with the underprivileged. We know of no one who fills those requirements better than Dean Hastie.

*

THE NAME OF THE UNITED NATIONS WILL BE A mockery in Europe unless more help is quickly provided, Herbert Lehman said last week. He pointed out that up to the close of June UNRRA had not received many officially allocated foodstuffs urgently needed overseas. In this connection an item in Le Figaro of July 27 has special interest. Under the heading "American Troops Burn Material and Food They Cannot Take With Them," it tells the story of what happened at the Villaroche camp, where large quantities of more or less used linen, preserves, fats, etc., were thrown into a huge fire. "Inhabitants of nearby villages who had salvaged foodstuffs and other articles spared by the flames were surprised to have these things confiscated and burned." In another camp bundles of clothing, slightly used, were cut to pieces and then sold to a rag merchant. Figaro philosophically comments that if Allied military authorities 'are afraid of supplying the black market by disposing of certain items, they could, with the help of local authorities, supervise their distribution. In any case it would be highly unfortunate to continue to offer to people without anything the spectacle of such wanton waste." This puts the case much too mildly. Any waste by our army in Europe is scandalous at this time, and we look to the Commander-in-Chief to give stringent orders to prevent a recurrence of such incidents. The soldiers would appreciate it too; the New York Times reports that they carried out their orders with visible repugnance.

*

IN A REPORT TO CONGRESS ISSUED JUST BEFORE he left Washington Mr. Morgenthau made some suggestions about the federal budget which deserve careful consideration. "To me," he said, "the outstanding weakness in the management in federal fiscal business is the absence of a single, responsible officer to whom the President may look for complete and comprehensive policy direction over the entire field of borrowing, lending, spending, and insuring. . . . In actual practice the area of control and influence exercised by the Secretary of the Treasury is largely limited to one side of the ledger. He is not in a position to exert proper influence over the use and disposition of the funds he must raise and account for to the nation." At present fiscal planning is diffused both at the administrative and the legislative level. The budget is prepared by the Budget Bureau, which is directly responsible to the President, while detailed suggestions for raising the money required are submitted to Congress by the Treasury. On Capitol Hill four committees—Ways and Means and Appropriations in the House, Finance and Appropriations in the Senate—consider separately national financial policy. Thus at no point is the budget reviewed as a whole and in relation to its total effect on the national economy. Mr. Morgenthau wishes to see the Budget Bureau brought under the Treasury. He also suggests the establishment of a National Committee for Fiscal Affairs, with the Secretary of the Treasury as chairman, and representatives of eight subcommittees covering (1) industrial finance; (2) agricultural finance; (3) foreign finance; (4) maritime finance; (5) money and credit; (6) housing finance; (7) public works finance; (8) federal budget. It seems probable that this program will commend itself to Secretary Vinson. Post-war fiscal problems are going to be extraordinarily hard to handle in any circumstances. A complete overhauling of the machinery should be undertaken immediately Congress reassembles in September.

The New Asia

WITH the surrender of Japan, new and incalculable political forces have been unleashed which will affect the destiny of all nations bordering the Pacific. For more than a generation the shadow of a militaristic, power-loving Japan has hung over Asia. Ambitious young men from China, Burma, India, and other parts of the East have flocked to Japanese universities and accepted Japan's doctrine of force as Asia's answer to the West's technical superiority. Hundreds of millions of people in Korea, Manchuria, and Southeast Asia have passively bowed before Japanese power because there seemed to be no hope of liberation. Now that this malignant power has been destroyed by the United Nations, we may anticipate rapid and profound changes throughout the Pacific area.

Of greatest concern to us will be the effect of the defeat on the Japanese themselves. No one really knows today just what their reaction will be. Will they turn against the political and business leaders who led them to disaster? Or will they sullenly accept Allied dictation while plotting revenge? Much depends on the kind of peace that is imposed on Japan. The Potsdam surrender terms are too general to give us much of a clue. The Allied governments face an extraordinarily delicate task in seeking to eliminate the industrial basis of Japan's military power without destroying the source of livelihood of millions of Japanese families. Their ability to find a solution to this problem will hinge largely on who is to be permitted to control Japan's remaining industry. Will the Zaibatsu, whose close link with the militarists was shown in a recent article in The Nation by Laurence Salisbury, be allowed to retain their stranglehold over Japanese economy? Or will the United Nations encourage the creation of a popular government which will control the country's major industrial resources? Had the Japanese surrender come a week earlier, the chances are that the Grew-Dooman policy of cooperating with the Zaibatsu would have prevailed. But Russia's entry into the war may tip the scales the other way. Judged by its attitude in Germany, Russia can be expected to favor the development of trade unions and anti-fascist political parties in the Japanese territory it will doubtless occupy. As in Germany, the Americans will probably have to follow suit. If the Japanese people are helped to escape from the domination of their industrial and agricultural overlords, they may themselves get rid of the Emperor and the feudal heritage which the militarists used so successfully in promoting the war.

Korea will undoubtedly present many problems. The Cairo Declaration guarantees Korea's ultimate independence, but difficulties may crop up in arranging an interim government. Korea is one of the few countries in Asia in which the Communists are strong. In the absence of any other important political group, the Korean Communists might readily seize power, especially if the occupying force were Russian. Just how Washington would react to such a development is not clear. A definite five-power understanding on Korea's future is urgently needed to prevent a conflict between Russia and the United States.

With the end of the war, the future of China hinges more than ever on the outcome of the talks which have been going on in Moscow between Premier T. V. Soong and Marshal Stalin. Professional Russia-haters have been busy painting a frightening picture of Russia's intentions in the Far East. The Soviet Union is supposed to be planning to swallow the whole of Manchuria, Mongolia, and large sections of China proper. But reports so far available on the Soong-Stalin negotiations provide no basis for such allegations. It is true that Russia has important interests in Manchuria. Having occupied this region, the Russians would undoubtedly be reluctant to hand it over to an unfriendly Chinese regime. China and Russia also have conflicting interests in Outer Mongolia and Singkiang. But if the reports coming from Chungking and Moscow on the Soong-Stalin talks are to be trusted, these problems are in process of being solved. China is said to be willing to grant Russia transit rights to Vladivostok across Manchuria, as it did before the Japanese conquest, together with a warm-water naval base on the Liaotung Peninsula. China is also probably prepared to accept Russian influence in Singkiang and to recognize the independence of Outer Mongolia in return for specific Russian guaranties regarding Chinese sovereignty in Manchuria. While minor territorial adjustments may be made to protect Vladivostok, there is no hint of extensive territorial demands.

But a final political settlement between China and Russia will be impossible until the long-standing feud between Chungking and Yenan is ended. The Japanese surrender has created a new crisis which may result in a bloody conflict. Doubtless this is what Japan has been hoping for, and Chiang Kai-shek is playing into its hands by his present tactics. He forbade the Chinese Eighth Army to continue disarming Japanese soldiers and then warned the Japanese that they would be held "accountable" if they gave up their arms to the Chinese Communists. But a Chungking attack on Yenan would probably bring Russia to the aid of the left-wing Yenan regime. Should this happen, the United States would be placed in a difficult position, particularly in view of the Grew-Hurley policy of supporting Chungking. It is reported that American military equipment has already been used against the Communists by Chiang Kai-shek's forces.

Chiang's atttitude parallels that of certain circles in our own State and War departments which were opposed to Russian participation in the Far Eastern war and have been hoping for peace with Japan before the Soviet armies establish themselves too strongly in Manchuria and Korea. What is now needed is closer liaison with the Russians, swift measures to end the Chungking-Yenan tension, and new men and policies in dealing with the problem of post-war Japan.

One World or None

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

THE bomb that hurried Russia into the Far Eastern war a week ahead of schedule and drove Japan to surrender has accomplished the specific job for which it was created. From the point of view of military strategy, $2,000,000,000 (the cost of the bomb and the cost of nine days of war) was never better spent. The suffering, the wholesale slaughter it entailed, have been outweighed by its spectacular success; Allied leaders can rightly claim that the loss of life on both sides would have been many times greater if the atomic bomb had not been used and Japan had gone on fighting. There is no answer to this argument. The danger is that it will encourage those in power to assume that, once accepted as valid, the argument can be applied equally well in the future. If that assumption should be permitted, the chance of saving civilization—and perhaps the world itself—from destruction is a remote one.

Solemn official talk is going on in Britain and here about controlling the use of the new force. But the talk is unconvincing. The atomic bomb represents a revolution in science—the greatest revolution ever accomplished. It calls for a comparable revolution in men's thinking and in their capacity for political and social readjustment. Not a hint of that has so far emerged in high places, either here or in Britain. And so far no leader of one of the lesser states, from which the new knowledge has been withheld, has presumed to open his mouth. No one has spoken the simple truth that the exploding atom has exposed to the whole world.

President Truman announced that he would recommend to Congress "the establishment of an appropriate commission to control the production and use of atomic power within the United States." He has promised that the secret of the bomb will ke kept by the three nations that hold it until "means have been found to control the bomb so as to protect ourselves and the rest of the world from the danger of total destruction." Secretary Stimson says that "substantial patent rights" have been assured to the American, Canadian, and British governments to prevent independent exploitation of the discovery. Do these plans and promises mean anything? Or are they conventional, official, high-sounding nonsense?

First, if anything is sure about the atomic bomb it is that no physical protection against it will ever be possible. The bomb dropped on Nagasaki was far more advanced than that dropped two days earlier on Hiroshima. Both were crude beginnings. We have already been promised that their successors will be enormously improved. Soon they will be propelled by rockets—similar to Hitler's V-2s—and directed exactly to their destination by radar. When this is achieved, not only will armies and fleets and island bases and strategic frontiers all have been made obsolete, but widespread annihilation can be accomplished by any power, or even group of men, that can command atomic energy.

And that leads to the absurdity of an attempt to limit control of this force to the nations that now hold it. President Truman is whistling to keep our courage up. He knows that other nations are working on atomic explosives. Before its defeat Germany was on the edge of success. Sweden and Denmark are carrying out intensive experimentation. It is not likely that Russia—which knows how to keep a secret better than any other country—has lagged behind the rest. Are we to be asked to believe that the Anglo-Saxon peoples have alone been granted the god-like power to crack atoms? The secret was guarded long enough to enable us to smash Japan. It will not last much longer. The present "trustees" of this force had better stop thinking in terms of control by themselves and begin to figure how a world is to be run in which every nation equipped for research and modern production will soon be able to make and propel atomic bombs.

So what sense is there in setting up an American commission "to control the production of atomic power"? Perhaps a little. Already certain private interests in this country have let it be known that, while they recognize the government's present right to monopolize the manufacture of atomic bombs, they are not prepared to accept government control over future use of the new energy. And Secretary Stimson's phrase, "substantial patent rights," is at best equivocal. It suggests that certain less substantial but perhaps highly valuable patents may already be in the hands of Du Pont or General Electric. And so a commission may be of some value, at least as an interim safeguard. But it will be well for us to remind Congress that the men it appoints will be dealing with a source of power discovered through the expenditure of $2,000,000,000 of public money—taxpayers' money. That power belongs to the people if no other ever did.

Suppose the United States, Canada, and Britain attempt, as they seem prepared to do, to corner the knowledge of atomic power even for a brief period. What will be the effect of this monopoly? First, it will convert the three Anglo-Saxon nations into a monstrous threat to the rest of the world. Are other countries likely to accept with equanimity the fact that we and the British hold the secret of total destruction? Who but ourselves is going to trust us with such fantastic power? It would be healthy if Americans, just for a moment, would put themselves in the position of, let's say, the Russians or the Chinese, and try to see what this "democratic trusteeship" looks like from the vantage-point of Moscow or Chungking. No nation shut out from our closely guarded knowledge can possibly do other than speed up its own collective effort to gain the same ground. The policy announced by the President is power politics raised to a cosmic degree; if continued it will insure an era of desperate competition in destruction, which can have only one outcome.

Atomic energy should no more be controlled by a few sovereign nations than it should be by a few private companies. "Free enterprise" for nations has been wiped out by the discovery. When President Truman went to the microphone to explain the agreement reached at Potsdam, the first atomic bomb had already exploded. So he discussed the Potsdam arrangements side by side with his proposal for controlling atomic energy. The fantastic incompatibility of the two items apparently did not strike him. But it is clear as water that no collective arrangements can stand in the face of the power held by America and Britain. Even the modest, halfway security measures adopted at San Francisco and written into the United Nations Charter can hardly be expected to survive such a situation. At the very minimum, the United Nations must be made trustee of the atomic bomb. Otherwise the idea of collective agreements to keep the peace may as well be abandoned.

But this minimum is far too small to provide any serious measure of safety. For the San Francisco charter is itself a collective agreement based on power. As Edward R. Murrow said the other day, the big nations have "created an organization and made laws from which they are exempt." In other words, there is no rule of law to which all nations are equally subject. The authority of the United Nations rests in the coalition of great powers which form its core. How much value can such an organization now have even if the control of the atomic bomb should be vested in it? It cannot dominate the world, for a single nation, small or large, possessed of the facilities to make the new explosive, would have as much power to threaten peace and terrorize other nations as one or all of the Big Three—or Four—or Five. And any one of the large nations, ruled by a new Hitler, could reduce the world to slavery—or to dust. In the space of a day the World Security Organization grew from childhood to senility. Now it must be replaced.

If we are to survive our new powers we must understand their full meaning. We shall have to move fast, both internationally and within each country. No longer can we afford a world organized to prevent aggression only if all of the great powers wish it to be prevented. No longer can we afford a social system which would permit private business, in the name of freedom, to control a source of energy capable of creating comfort and security for all the world's people. This seems self-evident, and so it is. But it calls for changes so sweeping that only an immense effort of will and imagination can bring them about. A new conference of the nations must be assembled to set up a World Government, to which every state must surrender an important part of its sovereignty. In this World Government must be vested the final control over atomic energy. And within each nation the people must establish public ownership and social development of the revolutionary force war has thrust into their hands. This program will sound drastic only to people who have not yet grasped the meaning of the new discovery. It is not drastic. We face a choice between one world or none.

Negrín's Policy is Winning

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Mexico City, August 12

ON WEDNESDAY, August 8, the long-desired agreement between the Spanish Republican parties and organizations in Mexico was finally reached. Republican leaders agreed on a procedure which will make all the institutions of the Republic operative in exile. Having joined with Dr. Negrín in virtually all the discussions of the past three weeks, I know what skill and patience were required to bring the factions together; and in the two meetings held last week, Dr. Negrín surpassed his own previous record of successful conciliation.

The first meeting of the representatives of the parties took place on Tuesday. Twenty-six parties and organizations were represented, exactly the number of all the political groups in Mexico. A sensational fact was the participation of two representatives of the Prieto faction, Otero and Albar. The meeting was called on twenty-four hours' notice under the pressure of the news from Spain itself, indicating that Franco might replace himself with a new military government created in his own image. When word of the meeting leaked out to the Spanish colony, the general comment was, "Negrín has accomplished what nobody else has been able to do in six years." The same view, in almost identical language, was expressed the following day by Martinez Barrio when a formal agreement was confirmed and signed in the presence of Dr. Negrín.

Under this agreement a meeting of the Cortes is to be called to formalize the parties' choice of a provisional President of the Republic, in the person of Martinez Barrio. This will make it possible for the present government to submit its resignation and a new government to be named in accordance with the constitutional procedure.

Only two groups failed to sign the agreement. These were the Socialist fraction gathered around Prieto and a small fraction of the syndicalist organization, the C. N. T. Four sections of the latter organization did sign. The representatives of the Prieto group failed to appear at the meeting of August 8 but sent instead a letter in which they raise three points: First, they doubted that there was such urgency as Negrín claimed for reaching an agreement in twenty-four hours. Second, they challenged the right of some of the groups invited by Negrín to participate, to demand recognition as regular political organizations. Third, they opposed any solution not based on the sanction and participation of the Cortes.

The first objection is not shared by other Spaniards here or in Spain. On the contrary, everyone has been counting not the days but the moments until an agreement could be reached. The second objection has an ironical flavor, for the Prieto group, organized in Mexico at the instigation of Prieto, is only a dissident fraction of the Spanish Socialist Party which has put itself outside the control of the party executive elected in Spain. The third objection, the only substantial one, has been met by the agreement signed by the other parties: the Cortes will assemble and elect a President. It should be emphasized that at no time did Dr. Negrín favor a solution which would exclude the Cortes. What he wanted was conservation of time, with the understanding that whatever agreement was reached among the parties should be subject to final ratification by Parliament. If the Prieto group is logical, it must inevitably participate in the coming meeting of the Cortes. And it is reasonable to expect that it will do so.

The Cortes probably will meet this Thursday. The session will be limited in its functions. Its sole purpose is to formalize the installation of Martinez Barrio as President of the Cortes and, therefore, as acting President of the Spanish Republic. It will then adjourn. Immediately thereafter Dr. Negrín will hand the provisional President his own resignation and that of his Cabinet, and the President will request one of the party leaders to form a government.

Speculation is rife, of course, as to the composition of the new Cabinet. To the majority of Republicans only one person is capable of steering the Republic through the difficult days which lie ahead. The statesmanship shown here by Dr. Negrín offers further assurance that he is the man most capable of heading the government. Dr. Negrín himself has adopted the most austere attitude toward the succession. He has declined all undertakings designed to honor him on his success in reaching an agreement and has refused all engagements that could be interpreted as capitalizing on his immediate achievement and old-time popularity. He came to Mexico for a single purpose—to unite the Republicans, to give them a President, and thus to make possible a legally reorganized government as an effective instrument of action within and without Spain. His accomplishments are already historic fact.

Washington Faces Peace

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, August 10

BY THE time these lines appear in print the war will almost certainly be over. The prospect of sudden victory has created anxiety here as well as jubilation. For with the coming of peace, the classic crutch of war is kicked out from under American capitalism. The United States faces not only the same old problem but the same old problem in a more intense and exacerbated form. We emerge from the war the Midas of nations. While other countries rise from the ruins appalled by their poverty, we are baffled by our wealth. Our power to produce has increased by 50 per cent since 1940, and the task of raising living standards to match that output is of such magnitude that only government, and business men willing to cooperate with government, can accomplish it. A glimpse of what lies ahead is provided by "Post-War Markets" (Public Affairs Press, Washington), a business guide based on official information prepared by the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce. If post-war output should be no greater than it was in 1940 (when our economy was already stimulated by war orders) "there would be the 9,000,000 who were unemployed in 1940 plus the 2,500,000 added to the civilian labor force between 1940 and 1946 plus 8,000,000 who would be displaced by improvements in efficiency over the six years—a total of over 19,000,000 unemployed."

The figures are terrifying, but the only hope of arousing sufficient public pressure and Congressional concern is to step up such statistical bombardment. The lag between technological capacity and social organization is an old story, but the dimensions of that lag have nowhere and never before been so great as in the United States of 1945. The Mead committee, in its new report on reconversion problems, estimates that we must find 11,000,000 more jobs than in 1929, which is 6,000,000 more than our present civilian labor force. But employment in manufacturing industries last year was already 5,000,000 greater than in 1929 or 1939. "We must not only hold these productive gains," the Mead committee says, "but we must find productive work for 6,000,000 additional persons." Without strong countervailing pressure, the drift will be toward resumption of business on pre-war levels, with the government providing made-work for the jobless. The danger is made graphic by a War Production Board survey cited by the Mead committee. In seventy-two industries, the "break-even operating rate" would be reached at a point where employment would be 25 per cent less than at present. Large sections of business could operate profitably enough for the owners on considerably less than capacity production. And no doubt many would prefer that to "government interference."

In a sardonic sense, the sudden surrender of Japan may well be regarded as its reprisal for atomic bombing. We were poorly enough prepared for a slow and comfortable period in which we could devote half our energies to the war in the Pacific and half to the resumption of large-scale civilian output. We are completely unprepared for a Japanese collapse, and unless we act quickly and wisely may face an economic collapse ourselves. The President's letter last night to Chairman J. A. Krug of the War Production Board has already been overtaken by events. There is immediate need for a program which will smooth the transition from war to peace, and a longer-range, if hardly less urgent, need for a program which will insure that industry reconverts to a full-employment level. No government agency has been authorized to tackle the second job, though some headway is being made in Congress by the full-employment bill. But even the simpler and more immediate task of reconversion has yet to be mapped out adequately. Mr. Krug, an ex-TVA man with an N. A. M. mind, believes that the problem can be met by hoopla; he would remove all restrictions as rapidly as possible and let industry scramble back to civilian output pretty much on a hit-or-miss basis. The OPA, the War Labor Board, and the Office of Economic Stabilization feel that controls must be retained and used during the transitional period if it is to be negotiated successfully.

Mr. Truman, whose Senatorial experience made him conversant with the problems of industrial mobilization for war and peace, had to decide between these two points of view, and his letter is a victory for those who fear too quick a removal of restrictions. But unfortunately it leaves Krug and the WPB crowd at the controls, and they are already interpreting the President's letter to suit themselves. The WPB is as much big-business as ever and cannot be trusted to handle reconversion on a basis fair to the smaller business man and the consumer. The big fellows would like to grab off materials quickly at the expense of the smaller. There is quick profit to be made in turning swiftly to production of higher-price items. The health of business enterprise requires a fair distribution of scarce materials during the transition, and the welfare of the consumer requires the allocation and channelling of materials into badly needed low-cost goods. The nation's economic safety depends on continued price controls during the transition and planning on an unprecedented scale for a higher level of output.

All this is repugnant to the WPB crowd, and Mr. Truman should know from past experience that it will handle these problems its own sweet way, irrespective of White-House directives. New agencies, new men, new ideas, new directions are necessary—and quickly—if we are not to suffer a relapse into chronic mass unemployment now that war's blood transfusions will no longer be available to an ailing capitalism.

The Trial of Pétain

BY PERTINAX

[Pertinax, greatest of European diplomatic correspondents, is the author of "The Gravediggers of France." He is now living in Washington.]

THE double charge brought against Pétain is that he was in intelligence with the enemy and attacked the safety of the state, i.e., overthrew republican institutions. I have been investigating the doings of Pétain for five years and I don't doubt that those two main charges can be substantiated. But Pétain did not go to Berlin to cash a sum of money and he was not caught with a load of dynamite in the vaults of the French Parliament. The story is a complex one and there is need of an energetic hand to pick up all the threads. Moreover, the crime of high treason is perhaps more narrowly defined in French law than in English law. At any rate, in the unprecedented circumstances of 1940, high treason took a form of which no French legislator had ever dreamed. For that reason, the task which devolves upon the public prosecutor, an onerous one anyhow, calls for great legal ingenuity. The prosecutor must translate into the terms of an out-of-date penal code Pétain's numberless faults of omission and commission which, but for the resistance of England, for the mighty intervention of Russia and the United States of America, would have led to the final subjugation of France.

To succeed in that endeavor, an intimate knowledge of the political happenings in France and in Europe during the last ten years is needed. I can hardly bring myself to believe that Public Prosecutor André Mornet lays any claim to this knowledge. His selection of witnesses, his haphazard way of cross-examining them, the free rein left for so many irrelevant speeches feed a suspicion that he does not know for sure what he is seeking to prove and to disprove. He is casting his net right and left in the hope that somehow he will make a catch. "Justice is a fight," a French philosopher once wrote. Prosecutor Mornet has not properly planned his action. Mornet, as a prosecutor, shone on that level of treasonable offenses associated with the name of Mata-Hari, the Javanese dancing girl. But in a discussion which bears fundamentally on the implications of perhaps the greatest political drama of all time M. Mornet is out of his depth. And for that matter, the same remark may apply to Presiding Judge Mongibeaux.

From the start, Mornet's business was to discover the line of advance along which the prosecution could turn, with a minimum effort, the obstacles interposed by the defense. It is in relation to the fate of the French fleet in June, 1940, that the deadly responsibilities of Pétain can probably be put in the strongest possible relief. That in June, 1940, the French army could not continue to battle on metropolitan soil, nobody ever denied. That to go on with the war in North Africa was a doubtful venture may be argued not very convincingly but perhaps with a veneer of plausibility. However, for not ordering the French fleet, a considerable force, to join the British fleet, even before the request for an armistice was forwarded to Berlin via Madrid, what sort of excuse can be found? None whatever, except the terrible delusion that by imperiling England and the cause of freedom all over the world a strong bid could be made for the favor of Hitler and that Hitler's favor might redeem France out of the abyss. Today we are aware that the fate of the civilized world hung in 1940-1941 on the narrow margin of a few cruisers. Pétain created the terrible odds which British naval power had to face.

An explanation of his obstinate refusal to part with the fleet before the armistice is only to be found in the stupid belief that the French state, once an alliance with Hitler had been cemented, could be rebuilt on the foundations of the old monarchy. The officials who saw Pétain at close quarters, in the summer and the autumn of 1940, bear witness to his deep sense of contentment and gratification. This certainty was his—that he would go down to posterity as the successful reformer of the French state, as the exorcist who had driven out of French hearts the revolutionary spirit. When Paul Baudouin told him, one fine morning, that the Duc de Guise, the head of the house of Bourbon-Orleans, was dead, he exclaimed: "Then, it will fall to the Count of Paris to succeed me."

Such are the central facts in the record of Pétain. All other charges must be held additional to that count. To outward appearances, Mornet does not grasp it firmly enough.

All pleas for Pétain necessarily revolve on two main themes. In the first place, Laval was the evil genius of his regime and many objectionable steps with which Pétain is reproached must be ascribed to Laval. Then, on the whole, the policy of Pétain was dictated by the necessity to convince the Germans that he was on their side. In short, the defense of Pétain is that he played a double game, that he longed, through it all, for an American if not for a British victory. To refute that argument does not call for superhuman exertions. But, here again, no prosecutor can cut any ice unless he has solved for himself the psychological problem of Pétain. Mornet, so far, has not given any hint that he understands the terms of that problem.

In the Pétain-Laval marriage, Laval was the male and Pétain was the female. Pétain came to hate Laval as early as the summer of 1940, but, had not Laval held all government controls, Pétain's rule would never had been set up. This must be added: but for the moral indorsement he got from Pétain as early as the spring of 1934, Laval would never have had a chance to assert his power. Following on the dismissal of Laval (December 13, 1940) did the policy of collaboration with Germany show any change? Hardly. From Vichy officials who seem to have retained some independence of judgment we hear that Darlan, with the unstinted support of Pétain, proved as daring as his predecessor. As to Pétain's supposedly concealed intention to prepare for an Anglo-American victory, the following point deserves to be stressed. All the defeated generals of 1940, all the supporters of the armistice and collaborationist policy, all the officials willingly or unwillingly harnessed to the Vichy dictatorship, all the men who had to swear loyalty to the head of the state or part with their livelihood, have no choice today but to proclaim loudly that Pétain, behind the screen of his official deeds and words, behaved as an artisan of Allied victory. They must stand by that thesis or implicitly confess that they stood for a Nazified Europe and be shamed.

To rebut their interpretation of the working of Pétain's mind, many witnesses are available. To this day, Mornet has failed to bring them in. To my direct knowledge, a French ambassador in active service had an opportunity to ascertain the whole outlook of Pétain in the winter of 1940. The old fellow was convinced that Germany could not fail to win the war. Speaking of the appointment of Admiral Leahy to the American embassy in Vichy, Pétain said: "I see very well where President Roosevelt intends to lead me. He will not make me swerve an inch from my policy." When Gaston Henry-Haye, Pétain's Ambassador to the United States, arrived in New York in the autumn of 1940, his first words to Jacques Truelle, the French Chargé d'Affaires who received him at the LaGuardia airfield, were: "It is high time for the Americans to understand that France and England took the initiative in attacking Germany." Henry-Haye, a servile man, carried out, in his clumsy manner, the instructions received from Pétain two or three days before. What did such words mean if not that German victory had to be wholeheartedly accepted?

The logical process is inexorable. Pétain took the German triumph for granted. He therefore followed a course which was bound to draw upon him the reprisals of French patriots if the Allies, in the end, had the better of the fight. Consequently, at the bottom of his heart, he could not but dread a reversal of Hitler's military fortune: everything points to that cerebral itinerary of Pétain. For lack of space, I leave aside the North African episode in November, 1942. But this can be said. The military leader who was closeted with Darlan in the fateful hours and days when Darlan reached his great decision has heard of some cryptic messages sent to the Admiral by naval officers in Vichy, in which the men who wanted to join hands with the Americans could read some halting encouragement. But that military leader does not say that those cryptic messages reflected the personal attitude of Pétain. And certain strange moves made by Darlan give food for thought. Why was that confidant of Darlan left outside the trial? Mornet is baffled at every turn by the tangled skein.

The other day, Laval, banking on the ignorance of the judges and the public, boasted of having concluded a military treaty with Mussolini in 1935. Military treaty there was none, but a military protocol was indeed offered to Laval by Mussolini for the definite purpose of enlisting Laval's and Gamelin's good-will and assistance on the eve of the aggression against Ethiopia. Nothing could come of that protocol anyhow, as long as Italo-Yugoslav problems had not been solved, and Mussolini did not want those problems to be solved until Prince Regent Paul had renounced the friendship of France. Mornet had never heard of the incident. He did not rebuke Laval. This is one example among many.

Because of the helplessness of the prosecutor, the Prime Ministers of the 1936-1940 period, Léon Blum, Edouard Daladier, and Paul Reynaud figured in the proceedings more prominently than was fitting and desirable. Against Pétain they became the protagonists of the prosecution. Of Léon Blum it can only be said that he behaved as he always does—with a deep sense of his own dignity, with perfect reverence for truth. But Daladier and Reynaud had axes to grind. Reynaud, particularly, made the most of the opportunity at hand. His preoccupation was not to enlighten judges and jury about Pétain but to explain away his own grievous failings in 1940. With Reynaud on the stand the trial became a wrangle between France's gravediggers. The account given by Reynaud of his appointment to the Washington embassy in June, 1940, sets very low the degree of credence he deserves to be given.

As the result of those loosely conducted procedings, the guilt of Pétain may remain a controversial issue for an active minority. It was not to be expected that this active minority would ever disarm. But, however flimsy the ammunition to be gathered in the trial for use against the French Republic of tomorrow, even this slender advantage ought to have been denied to the disciples of Charles Maurras (who packed the court on the first day) and to the zealots of social conservation.

When H. G. Wells Split the Atom

A 1914 Preview of 1945

OF COURSE it was H. G. Wells who first perfected the atomic bomb and put it to work. And not only did he put it to work, demolishing most of the world's capital cities and destroying governments, but then he got busy and built an entirely new society. In less time than you can imagine after the last bomb fell, everybody was settling down nicely in a global socialist community under a World Republic; atomic energy, internationally controlled, was performing all the necessary jobs of production, transportation, heating, and such, and the creative energies of mankind were being applied to higher things. In 1914, when "The World Set Free" * was published and no bombs of any sort had been dropped it all sounded fantastic and even funny.

Mr. Wells's first atomic bomb dropped during the final war between the Allies and the Central European powers. Hostilities started, dramatically enough, with an air attack on the headquarters in Paris of the Allied High Command. It demolished the War Control Board, and you might have thought that would have put an end to the fighting. But not at all. What it did was to encourage the "rather brutish young aviator with the bullet head," who was in charge of the French special scientific corps, to go ahead and run the war the way he wanted to. He was pleased to have the War Control out of the way.

> He slapped his second-in-command on the shoulder. "Now," he said, "there's nothing on earth to stop us going to Berlin and giving them tit-for-tat. . . . Strategy and reasons of state—they're over. . . . Come along, my boy, and we'll just show these old women what we can do when they let us have our heads." . . . He looked at the sky and noted with satisfaction a heavy bank of clouds athwart the pallid east.
>
> He was a young man of infinite shrewdness, and his material and airplanes were scattered all over the countryside, stuck away in barns, covered with hay, hidden in woods. . . . But that night he only wanted one of the machines, and it was handy and quite prepared under a tarpaulin between two ricks not a couple of miles away; he was going to Berlin with that and just one other man. . . . He had in his hands the black complement to all those other gifts science was urging upon unregenerate mankind, the gift of destruction, and he was an adventurous rather than a sympathetic type. . . .

Presently the airplane, which was a model far in advance of those recently sent over Japan for it had a noiseless atomic engine, flew across Westphalia and Saxony toward Berlin. The young aviator was at the controls. His face "had something of that firm beauty which all concentrated purpose gives, and something of the happiness of an idiot child that has at last got hold of the matches."

> His companion, a less imaginative type, sat with his legs spread wide over the long, coffin-shaped box which contained in its compartments the three atomic bombs, the new bombs that would continue to explode indefinitely and which no one so far had ever seen in action. Hitherto carolinum, their essential substance, had been tested only in almost infinitesimal quantities within steel chambers imbedded in lead.

It wasn't until he had passed Potsdam and was approaching the palace and the government buildings that he was attacked by a German plane which "slanted down like a sword swung by a lazy man" and then began to shoot. The French plane had no bomb-sight, it seems, but the pilot was flying low enough to see his objectives. The bombardier was ready.

> The gaunt face hardened to grimness, and with both hands [he] lifted the big atomic bomb from the box and steadied it against the side. It was a black sphere, two feet in diameter. Between its handles was a little celluloid stud, and to this he bent his head until his lips touched it. . . . Very quickly he bent forward, bit the stud, and hoisted the bomb over the side.
>
> The bomb flashed blinding scarlet in mid-air and fell, a descending column of blaze eddying spirally in the midst of a whirlwind. Both the airplanes were tossed like shuttlecocks, hurled high and sideways; and the steersman . . . fought in great banking curves for a balance. . . . When he could look down again it was like looking down upon the crater of a small volcano. In the open garden before the Imperial castle a shuddering star of evil splendor spurted and poured up smoke and flame toward them like an accusation. . . . Suddenly the façade tottered and crumbled before the flare as sugar dissolves in water. The man stared for a moment . . . hoisted out another bomb and sent it down after its fellow. . . . Then that bomb had exploded, and steersman, thrower, and airplane were just flying rags and splinters of metal and drops of moisture in the air, and a third column of fire rushed eddying down upon the doomed buildings below. . . .

Now the mechanism of Wells's bomb may sound a little primitive, but its action was more advanced than that of the bomb that wiped out Hiroshima—for it operated on the principle of continuing explosion. We won't try to explain it to you here; it is enough to say that the radio-activity of the bombs dropped on Berlin was "never entirely exhausted," so that for years afterward "the battlefields and bomb-fields of that frantic time" were "sprinkled with radiant matter and so centers of inconvenient rays."

Perhaps it should be mentioned that Mr. Wells's book, although written in 1914, chronicled a war that took place about forty years later, in the words of a man living in the World Republic that was established after the peace. We wouldn't want our readers to get their dates mixed up. Because we now present that man's backward glance at the social and political impact of the first atomic bombs.

> Certainly it seems now that nothing could have been more obvious to the people of the early twentieth century

---

* Published by E. P. Dutton and Co.

> than the rapidity with which war was becoming impossible. And as certainly they did not see it. They did not see it until the atomic bombs burst in their fumbling hands. Yet the broad facts must have glared upon any intelligent mind. All through the nineteenth and twentieth centuries the amount of energy that men were able to command was continually increasing. Applied to warfare, that meant that the power to inflict a blow, the power to destroy, was continually increasing. There was no increase whatever in the ability to escape. Every sort of passive defense . . . was being outmastered by this tremendous increase on the destructive side. Destruction was becoming so facile that any little body of malcontents could use it; it was revolutionizing the problems of police and internal rule. . . . These facts were before the minds of everybody; the children in the street knew them. And yet the world still, as the Americans used to phrase it, "fooled around" with the paraphernalia and pretensions of war.
>
> It is only by realizing this profound, this fantastic divorce between the scientific and intellectual movement on the one hand and the world of the lawyer-politician on the other that the men of a later time can hope to understand this preposterous state of affairs. Social organization was still in the barbaric stage. . . . The community as a whole was aimless, untrained, and unorganized to the pitch of imbecility. Collective civilization, the "modern state," was still in the womb of the future.

But even the atomic bomb did not immediately wake people up. The great war went on. One of Mr. Wells's lesser heroes was fighting in Holland when the Central Europeans dropped atomic bombs on the dikes. He describes in his diary the thunder, the flaring trail in the night sky, the tremendous pillars of fire, the roaring wind. Then the awful moment when he knew the dikes were gone and the sea was coming in. (He and his men barely escaped destruction in their landing barges.) The catastrophe wiped out most of the population and most of the invading armies. His barge made a "strange overland voyage among trees and houses and churches by Zaandam and between Haarlem and Amsterdam to Leiden."

> "I do not think any of us felt we belonged to a defeated army, nor had we any strong sense of the war as the dominating fact about us. Our mental setting had far more of the effect of a huge natural catastrophe. The atomic bomb had dwarfed the international issues to complete insignificance. When our minds wandered from the preoccupations of our immediate needs, we speculated upon the possibility of stopping the use of these frightful explosives before the world was utterly destroyed. For to us it seemed quite plain that these bombs and the still greater power of destruction of which they were the precursors might quite easily shatter every relationship and institution of mankind."

Just as men are thinking and saying today. But then the bombs kept falling and war went on interminably, it seemed, until eventually, on a mountainside overlooking Lake Maggiore, "away from burning cities and starving multitudes," there gathered "the conference of rulers that was to arrest, if possible, before it was too late, the debacle of civilization."

They did it too, though not without dispute, and conflicts of interest, and the final, climactic danger that they might all be blown to eternity, along with their plans, by the cunning King of the Balkans, known as the Slavic Fox, who had a few atomic bombs secreted near the meeting place. They did it because they dared not do otherwise. Some of them wanted a limited form of international control, a sort of United Nations Charter. But this, of course, was nonsense, as young King Egbert pointed out. "There's got to be one single government for the whole world," said the King over his shoulder to his adviser, Firmin, who had taught politics at the London School of Sociology, Economics, and Political Science. Firmin protested.

> "Yesterday," said the King by way of explanation, "the Japanese very nearly got San Francisco."
>
> "I hadn't heard, sir."
>
> "The Americans ran the Japanese airplane down into the sea, and there the bomb got busted."
>
> "Under the sea, sir?"
>
> "Yes. Submarine volcano. The steam is in sight of the California coast. It was as near as that. And with things like this happening, you want me to go up this hill and haggle. . . ."

Enthusiasm gripped the conference as the meetings went on. King Egbert's youthful optimism spread among the older statesmen (there was no Big Three). They set up a World Government, which, for the moment, was themselves; they took over all the plants and materials for the production of atomic explosives (nobody even suggested separate control when the obvious price was cosmic disaster); and then they set to work to plan the administration of the world. There was little disposition to argue; too much needed to be done too fast. Mr. Wells describes "the condition of mankind at the close of the period of warring states, in the year of crisis that followed the release of atomic power." The huge, overcrowded cities which, "under the shock of the atomic bombs," had been emptied largely of their population so that masses of people were "dispossessed and scattered disastrously over the surrounding areas." The countryside "disordered by a multitude of wandering and lawless strangers." Hunger. Disease. Large areas of China "a prey to brigand bands." And huge danger zones, in which fires burned and explosions continued.

Obviously the new government had to "act greatly." "From the first they had to see the round globe as one problem"—one world. Nothing could be done on a small scale or country by country.

Of course all this meant socialism, although the Council had been predisposed to reconstitute the system that prevailed before the coming of atomic energy. They soon realized that capitalism had been rendered obsolete by the character of the disaster as well as by the onset of limitless energy. A new society and a whole new concept of man's place in the world became inevitable.

> Once the world was released from the hardening insecurities of a needless struggle for life that was collectively planless and individually absorbing, it became apparent that there was in the vast mass of people a long-smothered passion to make things. . . . The majority of our population consists of artists and the bulk of activity in the world lies no longer with necessities but with their elaboration, decoration, and refinement. . . . Property was never more than a means to an end, nor avarice more than a perversion.

Karenin, the dying Russian sage, described very well the period through which the world had passed and the role the atomic bomb had played in setting it free.

> "Our age," he said, "has been so far an age of scene-shifting. We have been preparing a stage, clearing away the setting of a drama that was played out and growing tiresome. . . . If I could but sit out the first few scenes of the new spectacle. . . .
>
> "How encumbered the world had become! It was ailing with a growth of unmeaning things. It was entangled, feverish, confused. It was in sore need of release, and I suppose that nothing less than the violence of those bombs could have released it and made it a healthy world again. I suppose they were necessary. . . . We've had unity and collectivism blasted into our brains. . . .
>
> "You know, I've got a fancy—it is hard to prove such things—that civilization was very near disaster when the atomic bombs came banging into it, that if there had been no Holsten and no induced radio-activity, the world would have—smashed—much as it did. Only instead of its being a smash that opened a way to better things, it might have been a smash without a recovery."

F. K.

Progress in Yugoslavia

BY HAL LEHRMAN

[Mr. Lehrman, The Nation's correspondent in the Mediterranean area, has worked for the Associated Press, Havas, and the OWI.]

Belgrade, August 9 (By cable)

THE men who created Partisan Yugoslavia are engaged on their most constructive work since the liberation of Belgrade. Up to the time of this writing, Marshal Tito has delivered two major addresses which have locked the door on the royal house of Karageorgevich and reorientated Yugoslav foreign policy in the direction of speedy national rehabilitation with aid from the Allies and from reparations. A wide amnesty and reprieve for all those who were led by compulsion or confusion to work for the enemy during the occupation has already opened many jails—six hundred prisoners were released yesterday from the Kragujevats internment camp alone—and relieved many thousands more from the threat of arrest by the OZNA, the secret police agency which quaintly decodes itself into "Department for the Protection of People." The abolition of censorship of outgoing dispatches has given startling proof of the regime's growing self-confidence and makes Yugoslavia—which claims never to have rejected a single application for entry—the one country in Central and Eastern Europe where foreign correspondents are restrained only by discretion and professional integrity.

The separate National Liberation fronts in the six federal states have been welded into a united People's Front modeled on the central Belgrade government's federative relationship to the autonomous governments of Yugoslavia's distinct nationalities. The new over-all party adopted a charter of principles infused with a spirit of unity among the Yugoslav peoples, and with a program of Balkan peace, democratic republicanism, and far-reaching social welfare.

AVNOJ—the Anti-Fascist Emergency Parliament—which developed out of the resistance committee in the early days of the occupation, has made room for new deputies from groups outside the People's Front in line with the Yalta agreement providing for full democracy. The AVNOJ is now sitting to consider bills for agrarian reform, suffrage, freedom of the courts, of the press, and of public meeting, and the mechanism for the October election of a Constituent Assembly which will write AVNOJ out of existence by devising a constitutional government.

Some of the AVNOJ projects are still in the form of preliminary drafts and have not yet been approved by the Cabinet, let alone Parliament. No authoritative data on the bills concerning the courts and public meetings is available, for example. Enough has been divulged by cautious officials, however, to permit the following preview of the most important impending and epochal legislation:

Suffrage. Both sexes, eighteen years of age and over, will have the right to vote as well as soldiers and ex-guerrillas under eighteen. (There is a sub-lieutenant, aged thirteen, walking around Belgrade with a revolver and gold stripes; he used to crawl through the German lines carrying dispatches.) Members of the reactionary cabinets between the 1929 Zivkovich and the 1939 Cvetkovich governments will not vote, with the exception of those who fought against the occupation. Barred also are collaborators with the Germans or Chetniks, and political or criminal fascists and their families unless the latter can prove anti-fascist activity. The extent to which this week's amnesty will affect the political rights of the reprieved in borderline cases has not yet been clarified.

Electoral procedure. The parties inside or outside the dominant People's Front will be able to put up lists of candidates in any department if they obtain merely 150 petitions from half of the constituencies within it. Departments range in population up to 400,000, with a parliamentary seat for each 40,000. Secrecy of elections is assured: ballot tokens are concealed by hand and dropped into one of a series of ballot boxes. This technique, invented for a largely illiterate peasantry, was scrapped by the dictatorship during the controlled elections of 1931, 1935, and 1939, when balloting was open. The methods of voting and of legalizing candidacy lists were the most crucial points in the recent Cabinet discussions. Persistent but unconfirmed reports said that the moderate members even considered resigning rather than yield to the Communist pressure for a less secret voting system and for a requirement that parties must secure petitions on a nation-wide basis, which would have shut out numerous strictly regional parties.

Agrarian reform. The large estates will be expropriated without compensation, also church and monastery lands. The latter will be left five hectares each except in the case of monasteries of historic value, which will retain twenty hectares. (A hectare is a little less than two and a half acres.) The maximum limit of landholdings per person is unspecified, but it is known that the so-called middle peasant with medium properties above the maximum will be compensated for the section expropriated.

The most momentous single development of the week is the unequivocal position taken by Tito and the all-powerful People's Front coalition against the return of the monarchy. Marshal Tito's denunciation of Peter for complicity with the Chetniks has finished the Subasich truce which suspended discussion of the regime until a plebiscite could be held. Speaker after speaker in the later sessions of the Front congress and AVNOJ hammered more nails into the royal coffin. The press campaign is wide open. The leading Communist organ, Borba, even linked Peter's name with the current trial of twenty-five Mihailovich followers here which has aroused the entire country with the details of large-scale massacres by the Chetniks and their chief's betrayal of Yugoslavia to the Axis.

It is now disclosed that there will be no separate plebiscite on the issue of monarchy versus republic. The voters will indicate their choice by the selection of deputies to the Constituent Assembly. The verdict is easy to predict—and Peter's cashiering of the regency shows that he, too, can read the handwriting on the wall.

The major emphasis of this historic week has been on internal reconstruction, but Yugoslavia's determination to reconstruct beyond its frontiers as well has not been hidden. The newspapers continue to be filled with complaints about the treatment of Yugoslavs and anti-fascists in Trieste, Carinthia, and other irredenta under Allied occupation. Vice-Premier Edvard Kardselj told the Front's congress, amid ecstatic cheering, "We do not want anything belonging to others but we will not renounce what belongs to us." The Macedonian leader, Dmitar Vlahov, charged the Greek government with a deliberate drive to exterminate his compatriots in "Aegean" Macedonia and demanded "adequate measures to stop these criminal acts once and for all." The President of the AVNOJ, Ivan Ribar, spoke of the nation's hope that "in the new democratic federative Yugoslavia, all our territories will be united with us and the possibility of enslavement will be ended for those regions we rightfully desire."

Tito himself, after paying tribute for the first time to the "Anglo-American fliers who, in greatest danger, supplied our fighters with materials and food," expressed confidence that "the suffering and sacrifices and contribution of the Yugoslav peoples to the Allied cause are so incontestable that our legitimate claims will not be disputed at the peace conference."

The Marshal, however, gave a significant turn to this policy by linking losses and aspirations in a new formula. Taking sixty-one billion dinars as the measure of Yugoslavia's war damage, he revealed his intention of presenting a bill for extensive reparations for the consideration of the Allies. His demands include transportation from Germany of "entire factories necessary for the rehabilitation of our country." As for the Italians, the Marshal thundered, they, like the Germans, have not yet paid a dinar of compensation; nevertheless "reactionary elements in Italy today are transforming themselves from accused into accusers and slanderers of our peoples. The tens of thousands of our slaughtered can never be compensated for, but the burned villages, the destroyed towns, and everything which has been stolen must be compensated for at the expense of these reactionaries. It is a matter for the Italian people to decide."

In the Wind

GET TOGETHER, BOYS: Charles W. Kellogg, president of the Edison Electric Institute, told the New York Times on August 8 that atomic energy would have little effect on the electric light and power industry, since its fuel costs were relatively small anyhow, and intimated that prices would not be materially reduced. In the same story an unidentified "representative of the electric companies" was quoted as asking, "What's the use of the government embarking on further expensive hydro-electric projects when the future of power production is about to be revolutionized?"

P. T. WONG, an American of Chinese descent and a veteran of World War II, recently tried to buy a laundry at 3325 Geary Boulevard, San Francisco. He met the requirements of the City Health Department for operating a laundry, and Dr. J. C. Geiger, Health Officer, granted him a permit. But the purchase was never made, because the Geary Boulevard Merchants Association and the Park-Presidio Improvement Club protested. The secretary of the Club said it had "tried to keep this a nice district," and added, "What's Geiger trying to do, anyway?" The secretary's name is C. E. Rankin.

A WASHINGTON FIRM of speech-writers sends us a catalogue of its wares. It features two "Special Political Addresses: 1550—Anti-New Deal—A sizzling appraisal of the New Deal; facts, humor, sarcasm. Over 3,000 words. $3. 1551—Pro-New Deal—The other side of the question. Answer to the critics. Campaign thunder and lightning that really strikes. $3. Both addresses for $5."

"READERS OF the Chicago Tribune are best informed about events in Washington and thruout the world," says the Chicago Tribune, "because they read the dispatches of seasoned correspondents who know how to get at the real facts of the news and who write from the American viewpoint."

THIS IS FROM the June issue of the Improvement Era, an official publication of the Mormon Church: "When our leaders speak, the thing has been done. When they propose a plan—it is God's plan. When they point the way, there is no other which is safe. When they give direction, it should mark the end of controversy. God works in no other way."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. One dollar will be paid for each item accepted.]

BOOKS and the ARTS

NOTES BY THE WAY

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

AS THE NATION POINTED OUT two weeks ago, in discussing the trial of Pétain, the civil war which has been going on in France for the past decade or more is still in progress and is moving into its decisive phase. One of its most vivid manifestations is the debate about the purge—a debate which began with liberation and has been refueled by the Pétain trial. Everyone agrees that proved traitors should be executed. The important question is whether those whose behavior, before and during the occupation, contributed to the fall of France should be held to strict account or forgiven in the name of unity and reconciliation. François Mauriac, who writes in Figaro, has been a leading exponent of the thesis that "we are all guilty" and that the divisions within France, between men and parties, should be dissolved in the crucible of Christian charity. His comment on the Pétain trial, reported at length in the New York Times, was merely a restatement of his position.

Christian charity, reconciliation, unity are beautiful concepts and they make good copy. The appeal to these abstract sentiments, however, is also a well-known device for confusing issues and warding off unwelcome decisions. Mauriac is a spokesman for the Catholic Church, which maintained a "charitable" attitude toward fascism until it became a menace to the church itself but is now busily proving that it always abhorred fascism. That being so, one has the right to wonder if his eloquent appeal is not, in part at least, an attempt to counter and confuse the popular demand for a clear decision against the old order in France of which the church was both stay and beneficiary.

A correspondent who thinks it is just that has been kind enough to send me a copy of an article by Mauriac, The Year of Reconciliation, which presents his thesis, along with a copy of a reply to that thesis by Albert Camus which appeared in Combat, one of the resistance papers. The two articles appeared last January but they are still relevant, for the great debate is still going on and the future health of France depends upon the way in which it is resolved. A few excerpts from Mauriac's article are sufficient to give its point, for it is not only eloquent but vague and long-winded.

> I do not wish to write a single word here [he says] which might add to the heat of passion.... But let us realize this: never did the words of the Gospel, "He that is without sin among you, let him cast the first stone"—never did they seem more timely than today.... Have you never at any moment, at least in a certain measure, committed the fault with which you reproach your adversaries? Has ideological passion never spoken more strongly in you than the interest of France, has the defense of the nation never been subordinated to your political partisanship?... Each of us can find in his past enough errors to be able to understand a graver error on the part of others, and to forgive them when the time comes.... May this year of victorious peace carry another name in history and remain forever in the memory of our sons the blessed year of reconciliation.

Camus is not tempted by this elegant invitation to hit the sawdust trail. I quote his reply at length, for several reasons: it seems to me excellent and right; his view, as my correspondent says, is "far more representative of the young, poised, and exacting France of the resistance"; and this view has had very little press in this country.

Camus asserts that he would not have replied to Mauriac if he had not felt that "this discussion, of which the subject is our very life," was beginning to turn into confusion. Then he continues:

> Each time, apropos of the purge, I have spoken of justice, M. Mauriac has spoken of charity.... We are of those who reject both the cries of hatred reaching us from one side and the tearful entreaties rising from the other. We seek that just voice which will give us truth without shame. ... For this we do not need to be clear about everything; we need only to want clarity with that fervor of heart and intellect without which neither M. Mauriac nor ourselves can accomplish any good.
>
> That is why I can say that charity has no relevance here. ... M. Mauriac does not wish to add to the store of hatred, and I willingly follow him in that. For my part I do not wish any increase of error, and on this point I await his approval. In sum, I wait for him to say openly that there is today a necessary justice.... I see two roads to death for our country (and there are manners of survival that are no better than death). These two roads are those of hatred and pardon.... I shall openly grant pardon when the family of Velin, when the wife of Leynaud have told me that I may do so. But not before, never before....
>
> As a man, I might admire M. Mauriac for knowing how to love traitors, but as a citizen I should deplore him because this very love would bring upon us a nation of traitors and mediocrities and a society we no longer want.
>
> I believe I have a just conception of the grandeur of Christianity, but some of us in this persecuted world have the feeling that if Christ died for certain people, he did not die for us. And moreover, we refuse to despair of man. Without having any exaggerated ambition to save him, we hold at least to the idea of serving him.... On this point I may say to M. Mauriac that we shall not be discouraged and that to the last we shall reject a divine charity that would deprive men of the justice which is their due.

"While no mention of the Catholic Church is made either in Mauriac's article or in Camus's spirited reply," writes my correspondent, "it is, I venture to say, the attitude of the church which is at the burning heart of the question.... It will be interesting to see if the 'moral aspects of the purge' do not in the end reduce the épuration to a conflict between the Catholic and the non-Catholic elements in France, or even in Europe—and I am not forgetting De Gaulle as I write this. In fact I am waiting—with some trepidation—for him to prove that political justice is not a question for the church to decide upon."

It may well be that the exchange between Mauriac and Camus should be subtitled The Trial of the Vatican, but the secular vaticans, economic and political, also have a stake in the moderation Mauriac pleads for. It will be interesting to see what verdict is contained in the French elections.

Albert Camus, by the way, is one of the two outstanding playwrights who have recently come to the fore in France, the other being Jean-Paul Sartre. Horizon for May contains a long and extremely interesting essay on these two writers whose plays "are the proof that in France the fourth wall of the theater is still, as it has always been, a triumphal arch of the mind."

OVERHEARD on one of New England's "best" beaches: "But my dear, couldn't the King just appoint Churchill again?"

Poets of Republican Spain

CONTEMPORARY SPANISH POETRY: SELECTIONS FROM TEN POETS. Translated by Eleanor L. Turnbull, with Spanish Originals; and Personal Reminiscences of the Poets, by Pedro Salinas. The Johns Hopkins Press. $3.50.

THE Spanish Republic had other poets besides García Lorca, and Miss Turnbull has performed a useful service in making selections of their work available to the English-reading public. Of the nine who have survived Lorca, only two, Gerardo Diego and Vicente Aleixandre, are today living—who knows on what terms?—in the land of their birth. Pedro Salinas and Jorge Guillén are teaching in the United States, the former at present on leave from Johns Hopkins at the University of Puerto Rico; José Moreno Villa, Emilio Prados, and Manuel Altolaguirre are in Mexico; Rafael Alberti is in Buenos Aires; Luis Cernuda is in England, teaching at Cambridge.

Each poet is represented by ten to twenty poems, in the original and in translation; each is given from twenty-five to fifty pages. Miss Turnbull's translations do not err on the side of ambition: she has eschewed rhyme, almost entirely; done little with assonance; followed the text closely, though sometimes transposing lines; in general, she has been content to convey the statement of the original, with not too much concern for the effects. The language in which the poems come out does not sound too translationish; one would recognize the originals for poetry, or sometimes rhetoric, rather than for prose.

The Lorca items momentarily excepted, the most interesting work in this anthology seems to be that of José Moreno Villa and Luis Cernuda. The space allowed Jorge Guillén, I think, might have been reduced; nor would I object to having Gerardo Diego eliminated altogether in favor, say, of Miguel Hernandez or José Herrera Petere. Miss Turnbull says that her choice of items has been conditioned largely by the ease with which poems lent themselves to English translation: has she not, perhaps, leaned rather heavily on Gerardo Diego's anthology as her primary source of material? It does not seem quite right that with so many of these poets living in exile, so few of the poems written during the Spanish war should be included. Luis Cernuda's beautiful Impression of Exile is about the only poem here that refers even to the aftermath of that anguish; yet most of the other poets contributed abundantly to the "Romancero General de la Guerra de España," published in Madrid and Valencia in 1937; and Alberti, Altolaguirre, Cernuda, Villa, and Prados are all found in "Poetas en La España Leal," published, likewise, in Madrid and Valencia in the same year. To represent Alberti without the Hymn to the International Brigades, or Madrid, Capital of Glory; to represent Villa without Madrid, Frente de Lucha or El Hombre del Momento; to omit all of Prados's balladry of the war—these seem like acts of injustice and distortion.

As for Lorca, Miss Turnbull, knowing that Lorca has been translated by a number of English and American poets, has deliberately refrained from reading any of those translations, "not wanting to be influenced by them in any way." This, I think, was a mistake; for of the eighteen Lorca items presented, only half a dozen short lyrics have not been previously published in English. However inadequate former translations may have been, there is still so much of Lorca untranslated that it seems a pity to repeat so many more or less familiar items, especially as some of them are not in themselves very important, and have attracted translators in the same way that Miss Turnbull has been attracted, by their ease of rendition. Of the Lament for the Death of Ignacio Sanchez Mejías Miss Turnbull presents only the first two sections.

The personal reminiscences of the poets, written by Pedro Salinas, are characterized by intimacy, affection, and sprightliness. The biographical notes include some summing up of poetical works by each author. ROLFE HUMPHRIES

BRIEFER COMMENT

The Old Lady Shows Her Medals

THE Bank of England is unique in many ways. No other financial institution combines its age, authority, resources, and influence. None has been more revered as a temple of the financial virtues; none more reviled for alleged economic machiavellianism. As the subject of a book, therefore, the Old Lady of Threadneedle Street has glamorous possibilities, but Sir John Clapham has written "The Bank of England—A History" (two volumes, Macmillan, $7.50) chiefly for his fellow economic historians. Having enjoyed access to the archives and account books of the Bank, he has produced a mine of information in which many other writers will quarry profitably. The general reader, however, will probably find the book hard going and its pages overladen with figures.

Nevertheless, this work is particularly welcome today when the Bank of England seems about to suffer a sea-change as a result of the rising tide of socialism in Britain. Indeed, one wonders whether the directors, when they asked Sir John to undertake this history in celebration of the Old Lady's two hundred and fiftieth birthday, were not moved by a desire to improve their public relations in anticipation of some such dangerous development. I do not wish to suggest, however, that there is any taint of propaganda about the book; the author is far too scrupulous a scholar for that. But he is also conservative in outlook and inevitably emphasizes the way in which the Bank, "broadening from precedent to precedent," has evolved from a somewhat speculative money-making venture into a semi-public institution, untrammelled by sordid motives.

It has, he says in his epilogue, finally moved into the position "of an organization functioning in close contact with those in political authority but not controlled by them continuously or in detail. . . . After two centuries and a half it was a non-competitive public institution with world-wide connections and influence, not eager for profit but anxious—in the adapted words of . . . the Declaration made by all its directors—'faithfully and honestly to demean itself according to the best of its skill and understanding' and to be 'indifferent and equal to all manner of persons.' "

In urging nationalization of the Bank, the Labor Party is unlikely to argue that its directors have been false to these ideals. The issue is not their integrity but the danger of concentration of financial power in the hands of a small body of men not representing the total interests of the community or directly responsible to it. Now that Britain can no longer afford an unplanned economy, its government must, of necessity, take over an organization which has the power to thwart its plans. KEITH HUTCHISON

The Fight for the Forests

CONSERVATION OF FORESTS and soil resources in America is no longer an academic matter. The TVA, our many soil conservation districts throughout the nation, and the work of the United States Forest Service have brought into actual operation the dynamic principle of river and forest restoration for multiple use, with human welfare as the ultimate object.

In "Behold Our Green Mansions" (Chapel Hill, $4) Richard Boerker has written an authoritative and up-to-date book on the state of our forests throughout the country, and he has also outlined the fascinating story of the growth of forest conservation from its early beginnings. The author has served with the United States Forest Service for many years, has written extensively, and is a teacher. His book is the result of a long and valuable experience. It is beautifully made, thoroughly documented, and filled with fine photographs.

Unfortunately, "Behold Our Green Mansions" is not written in a style which will have great popular appeal, and this is a pity. Moreover, the last chapter, which should have brought together the author's really valuable information and sound arguments and arrived at some conclusions, tends to leave the reader confused. At one point, for instance, he makes an excellent case for government ownership for at least 60 per cent of commercial forest land, and implies that private ownership in this sphere has failed, and is likely to continue to fail, to meet national requirements for timber products. A little farther on he comes out strongly for public regulation of private forest management, which seems to imply that he believes that there is a large place for private forest ownership. And the last section indicates that the privately-owned forest industries are doing an excellent job and can be depended upon to take care of the whole situation, and that all the the government need do is provide a little fire protection. If this means that he has here swallowed, hook, line, and sinker, the propaganda of the forest products industries which is directed against public ownership and regulation, it is out of keeping with the general character of the book. "Behold Our Green Mansions" is, on the whole, a reliable and valuable addition to our literature on American forestry and its importance to American citizens. If it is at times undecisive on a matter of public policy, it is definitely convincing as to the need for public understanding of this important problem. P. ALSTON WARING

Moronic Revelations

FILIPPO BOJANO, author of "In the Wake of the Goosestep" (Ziff-Davis, $2.50), is an Italian journalist who worked for Mussolini's Popolo d'Italia and the Agencia Stefani from 1926 to the bitter end. His book promises "to reveal the inside story of the most infamous partnership the world has ever known." Signor Bojano was close to the leading figures of this partnership. As correspondent in Berlin he was honored by the mission to write special reports for the Duce himself; he travelled with Hitler and Ciano on official journeys. Nevertheless, he reports nothing new in his so-called revelations. The little incidents in his personal career, the loss of his job in Berlin, seem to have been Signor Bojano's most exciting experiences in those tremendous years. "In the Wake of the Goosestep," at best, "reveals" the inferiority of those writers who, like Signor Bojano, were used by the Fascist leaders for important duties. JOSEPH BORNSTEIN

Russia: An Optimist's View

IT IS GOOD to see Edgar Snow's calm opinions about Soviet Russia attaining wide circulation, especially after snap-judgments such as W. L. White's. "The Pattern of Soviet Power" (Random House, $2.75) is based on a series of articles written for the Saturday Evening Post. Mr. Snow is explaining Russia to Americans in a simple and convincing way, rather than attempting any profound new analysis of what makes the U. S. S. R. click.

Admittedly, Mr. Snow is an optimist about Russia on nearly every count; he is not, however, a supine flatterer, being a conscientious newspaperman of long experience in Russia and the Orient. He believes that Russia wants stability, not revolution, in neighboring countries. The presence of the Red Army has set free the Communist forces in Rumania, Poland, Bulgaria, Hungary, and Yugoslavia; but in his opinion the Communists have "behaved cautiously" and "contented themselves with fewer positions of power than the real relation of forces might justify." This particular optimism may seem a bit strong in view of the way Russia has sealed off eastern European states from world observation.

In ten or fifteen years, Mr. Snow thinks, Russia may attain the world's highest mass living standard outside the United States. Although still suspicious of capitalistic Europe, Russia has, he believes, no militaristic or aggressive designs. And when the Soviet Union becomes prosperous and feels wholly secure from outside peril, "it may become possible for the Russian people to enjoy the freedoms of political democracy . . . side by side with the Soviet system of economy."

MARCUS DUFFIELD

Four-Dimensional Planning

ONE OF THE BEST BALANCED STUDIES I know on the protean subject of city planning is Henry S. Churchill's new book, "The City Is the People" (Reynal and Hitchcock, $3.) The volume takes up Antecedents, Precedents (a distinction with a difference), Approach, Problems, Efforts, and Trends, a program which ought to satisfy the most exacting. The author is not an Ayn Rand Superman, but a practical architect with culture and no crotchet.

It would be easy enough to pick flaws in the historical part. Churchill takes the conventional view of Napoleon III: "a despot and a fool." But the reconstruction of Paris—a grand achievement, in spite of all flaws—was the Emperor's idea; the plan was drawn by him. He picked out Haussmann as a very efficient instrument.

Churchill is no angry prophet of social righteouness. But he believes firmly that society as a whole is responsible for the chaos of our cities, and that society should bear the cost of clearing up the mess. What with the extreme division of property and inflated land values, it is exceedingly difficult for private initiative to correct the crying evils. Even large-scale operations like Stuyvesant Town, if subjected to the necessity of definite returns, will fall far short of the goal: a grand opportunity missed, and a deplorable example. Churchill would have the cities clear up the blighted core, and keep control of the land: not "communism," but inevitable "collectivism" where rugged individualism has signally failed. Our first concern should be for men, not for property: "The City is the People." The illustrations are extremely varied, from El Greco's Toledo to Churchill's own plan for Acquackanonk Village. I wish I could discuss at length Churchill's conception of four-dimensional planning. There is a fifth dimension, Money, and it should be kept in proper perspective.

ALBERT GUERARD

Northwest Recaptured

JAMES GRAY, literary editor of the St. Paul Dispatch and author of "Pine, Stream, and Prairie: Wisconsin and Minnesota in Profile" (Knopf, $3.50), is not a tiresome regionalist. He does not insist too much on a locality, as do the professional Southerners, nor does he subject us to the blasts of a Hamlin Garland or a Sinclair Lewis. And yet he never provides fodder for a business man's banquet. Instead, he thoughtfully summarizes a one-hundred-year record, seldom scanting either failures or accomplishments, and thus convinces the reader that he has seen his community whole while preserving his attachment to it.

But the balance of his approach is fortified by his literary competence. While devoting at least nine of his twenty-four chapters to resources and population waves and the habitat of "Sky-blue Water," and five more to such topics as vacationing, the local arts, and colleges, he never does so in the road-map style of the usual tourist book. He is the capable newspaperman with an assignment, and he fulfils it. But Mr. Gray surpasses this level in his ablest chapters—notably on such agrarian leaders as Ignatius Donnelly, the first and honorable Charles A. Lindbergh, and that magnificent lion from Wisconsin, Robert M. La Follette, Sr.—and again in his treatment of such thinkers as the late Thorstein Veblen and Frederick J. Turner, and the architect Frank Lloyd Wright. And he certainly etches the profiles of the major cities. He might have discussed Superior, Wisconsin, that blighted ore port at the head of the Lakes. He could well have included such figures as Thomas Boyd, Angna Enters, and Georgia O'Keeffe, all natives of the region he describes. Yet the general picture stands—this undoubtedly because its truth and shapeliness are supported by the long-standing pledge of this modest writer to his community.

JEROME MELLQUIST

"Chin Music"

AMONG THEIR OWN KIND cowboys are seldom "hogtied when it comes to makin' chin music." Ramon F. Adams, a business man who has made the study of the folklore and history of the cattle country a lifelong hobby, has written an unusual and delightful book—"Western Words: A Dictionary of the Range, Cow Camp, and Trail" (University of Oklahoma Press, $3). Writers, semanticists, and scholars will find this book invaluable. The general reader will find it fascinating. Mr. Adams gives the meaning—and often the derivation and pronunciation—of thousands of words and phrases ranging from "ace in the hole" to "zorrillas." The author demonstrates scholarship, wide familiarity with the men of whom he writes, and a sense of humor.

RALPH ADAMS BROWN

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street
New York 7, N. Y.

Dear Sirs:

I want to subscribe to The Nation, or the following Nation magazine combinations as listed below:

....

....

....

☐ Remittance enclosed ☐ Bill me

Money-Saving
Magazine Combinations

●

THE Nation

with Harpers Magazine $6.50
You save $2.50

with Consumers Union $7.00
You save $1.50

with HARPERS & Consumers Union $9.00
You save $3.50

with Free World $7.50
You save $1 50

with Saturday Review $8.50
You save $1.50

All club combinations listed are for one year, and may be mailed to different individuals and addresses. Canadian and foreign postage extra.

THE NATION BY ITSELF

1 Year $5 2 Years $8
3 Years $11

Servicemen's Rate:
$3 a Year

Canadian and Foreign Postage, $1 a Year Extra

NAME..............................

STREET..............................

CITY.................. ZONE...... STATE..........

8-18-45

MOTION PICTURES

WARNER BROS.' MAGNIFICENT
RHAPSODY IN BLUE
IT'S GEORGE GERSHWIN'S JUBILANT STORY!
NOW HOLLYWOOD
THEATRE

Barbara STANWYCK • Dennis MORGAN
Sydney GREENSTREET
IN WARNER BROS. NEW HIT!
"CHRISTMAS IN CONNECTICUT"
In Person! ERSKINE HAWKINS
And His Orchestra
Also In Person—THE CHARIOTEERS
BEN CARTER and MANTAN MORELAND
B'WAY AT 47TH STRAND

. . . IT IS WORTH ANY DOZEN RUN-OF-THE-STUDIO ACADEMY AWARD WINNERS —TIME

DAVID L. LOEW presents
The Southerner
A Jean Renoir production
starring
ZACHARY SCOTT
BETTY FIELD
Now playing at
BRANDT'S GLOBE
BROADWAY AT FORTY-SIXTH STREET

STAGE PLAY

MICHAEL TODD Presents
UP IN CENTRAL PARK
Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS
Lyrics by DOROTHY FIELDS
Music by SIGMUND ROMBERG
BROADWAY THEATRE, Broadway & 53rd Street. Matinees Wed. & Sat.
REALLY AIR-CONDITIONED

CONTRIBUTORS

ROLFE HUMPHRIES translated Federico García Lorca's posthumous collection of poems, "The Poet in New York," and edited with M. J. Benardete the Loyalist anthology "And Spain Sings."

P. ALSTON WARING is a Pennsylvania farmer and co-author of a book on the small farm, "Roots in the Earth."

JOSEPH BORNSTEIN was for many years managing editor of the Tagebuch in Berlin and later became editor-in-chief of the Pariser Tageblatt.

MARCUS DUFFIELD writes the weekly summary of the news, History in the Making, for the Sunday edition of the New York Herald Tribune.

ALBERT GUERARD, biographer of Napoleon III and a frequent contributor to The Nation, is the author of "The Future of Paris," a book on city planning.

JEROME MELLQUIST, a native of Minnesota, is the author of "The Emergence of an American Art." He is now writing a new book on American art.

RALPH ADAMS BROWN is now an instructor in the Coast Guard Academy Preparatory School. He has written for the Yale Review, the Survey Graphic, and other publications.

MOTION PICTURES

NOW RKO
BROOKLYN & QUEENS
ALDEN Jamaica
BUSHWICK
DYKER
Keith's FLUSHING
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
Keith's RICHMOND HILL
STRAND Far Rockaway
TILYOU

'FAST, ACTIONFUL TEMPO'—N. Y. Post
PEARL BUCK'S
CHINA SKY
Based on the Best-Selling Novel
STARRING
Randolph SCOTT • Ellen DREW
Ruth WARRICK
— Plus —
'BODY SNATCHER' BORIS KARLOFF BELA LUGOSI

BETTY HUTTON
ARTURO DE CORDOVA
In Paramount's
"INCENDIARY BLONDE"
In Technicolor
with Charles Ruggles
Barry Fitzgerald • Maurice Rocco

In Person!
"The Hour of Charm"
All-Girl Orch.
Under the Direction of Phil Spitalny
With
Evelyn • Jeannie
Francine • Viola
Mack Triplets
All American Glee Club • Imogene Coca

NOW PLAYING PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

RED CROSS plasma is saving the lives of hundreds of wounded soldiers and sailors. But thousands of additional blood donors are needed. Give a pint of blood to save a life.

Music

B. H. HAGGIN

FRANCK'S Prelude, Chorale, and Fugue for piano is one of his best works, though not without certain of the characteristics that one dislikes in other works. The Prelude and Chorale are very beautiful; it is the Fugue that begins with arid formula and pushes on to bombast. Victor has issued a performance by Artur Rubinstein (Set 1004; $2.50), which is satisfactory only in some parts of the work, for others are played in Rubinstein's mannered style that is more appropriate to Albéniz than to Franck, and there are erratic changes of pace in the Fugue. The performance is recorded with clarity and fidelity to timbre; but the sound has the characteristics of the Debussy recordings I described a few weeks ago: the treble is weak, and the climaxes don't achieve their correct volume of sound. The surfaces of my copy sputter and crackle.

"Tod und Verklärung" is one of Strauss's early works, with some imaginative and beautiful passages, but one which needs a plastic sense like Toscanini's to mould its episodes into a continuous, unified progression. What we have on records instead is Stokowski's hectic, spasmodic, and lurid performance —this time with the New York City Symphony (Set 1006; $3.50). This is not a great orchestra; but it is disciplined and plays well. As for the recorded sound, which is spacious and natural, there are sides like the second on which it is hard but clear and well-balanced, and there are sides like the third on which it is somewhat confused, as though by reverberation, and the violins have an exaggerated, piercing intensity.

On a single disc (11-8848; $1) is Iturbi's performance of Chopin's A flat Polonaise—full of vulgar affectations, and its recorded sound not only poor but with a lot of hash mixed in on the first side. And on another single disc (10-1173; $.75) are Brahms's popular "Wiegenlied" and Reger's "Marienwiegenlied," beautifully sung by Blanche Thebom—but why in English, and why with string orchestra instead of piano, only Victor knows.

The muddy confusion in the sound of certain Columbia orchestral recordings that I discussed a couple of weeks ago is to be heard in the recording of a performance of Saint-Saëns's Piano Concerto No. 4 in C minor by Casadesus with the New York Philharmonic under Rodzinski (Set 566; $3.50). I have the impression that if the performance could be heard clearly it would turn out to be good; but it would still be unnecessary.

I am reminded of Shaw's comment on a performance of "Samson et Dalila" in 1893. "Who wants to hear 'Samson et Dalila'? I respectfully suggest, Nobody. In Paris that is not a reason for not producing it, because Saint-Saëns is an illustrious French composer, and the opera a national institution; consequently Saint-Saëns must occasionally compose an opera, and the director produce it. . . . In the same way, we produce specially composed oratorios at our English festivals. We cannot sit them out without wishing we had never been born; but we do sit them out for all that. . . . Now I am strongly of the opinion that each nation should bear its own burden in this department of life. We do not ask the Parisians to share the weight of 'Job' with us; then let them not foist on to us the load of 'Samson.'" I respectfully suggest that this wisdom be applied to the case of Roy Harris and Shostakovitch: we would still have to listen to Roy Harris, but not to both Harris and Shostakovitch.

This is by no means the only passage in Shaw's criticism of fifty years ago, which I reread recently, that remains enlightening and profitable today. During the intermission of a piano recital, for example, I read a paragraph about Giulia Ravogli's singing of an excerpt from Vaccai's "Giuletta e Romeo," which ended with the observation that the music was "for an age, but most emphatically not for all time." And this turned out to be the correct comment on Copland's Piano Variations, which was performed after the intermission.

And some time ago, writing about a bad recording, I quoted these remarks of a shrewd editor I know: "A record company thinks it's smart to sell a recording like that if people are willing to buy it; but it's stupid. Thousands of people are led to buy the recording because it's Beethoven—the 'Moonlight' Sonata—Serkin—Columbia, which means that it's good music; they hear something that sounds terrible and that they don't enjoy; and so thousands of people now have the idea that good music sounds terrible and is not for them, and enormous damage has been done to the cause of good music and to the record business." This was the very point made by Shaw in a review of a shoddy East End production of a West End opera: "When the [orchestra's] feeble and mistuned scraping got very bad . . . doubtless the packed pittites said reverently, 'This is classical music. This is above our heads, this is.'"

RESORTS

50 MILES TO
FOREST HOUSE

VACATIONING at Forest House provides the ultimate in rest and relaxation. Superb location, two lakes, all sports. Congenial hospitality, fine food and splendid accommodations. Lake Mahopac 688.

FOREST HOUSE
LAKE MAHOPAC, N. Y., TEL. MAHOPAC 688

"Fore" the Golfer
Newly Conditioned Course
A Grand "Pro"
New Clubhouse
. . . await your pleasure.

28 miles of beautiful private trails. Also — excellent tennis, boating and fishing on our private 7½-mile lake, swimming, golf, game rooms, cocktail lounge, dancing, really fine food . . . congenial atmosphere.
Only 51 Miles from New York

The Glenmere
CHESTER, N. Y. Chester 200 (N. Y.) RE 2-5047

CHI-WAN-DA
ON THE HUDSON
ULSTER PARK, N. Y. Phone Kingston 1329
Excellent Location, overlooking the Hudson River. Beautiful Lake on premises. All Water and Land Sports, Dancing, most modern improvements.
DIRECTIONS:
TRAIN—BUS—BOAT to KINGSTON
J. I. DOROSHKIN, Dir. 545 Fifth Ave.
N. Y. Office Phone: MU 2-4217

OAKWOOD
NEW WINDSOR, N. Y. Newburgh 4477
Delightful...swimming & boating on private lake.
Different...the colonial atmosphere.
Delicious...our unexcelled cuisine.
Diverting...recordings for listening & dancing.
All this only 53 miles from New York City
A Resort for Adults Only

NEW — Opened by Veteran World War II
THE COLONIAL TERRACE Hotel & Restaurant Peekskill, N. Y.
Open All Year
Swimming • Tennis • Ping Pong
Field Activities • Dietary Laws
Rates and Information on Request

SHADYBROOK
MAHOPAC, N. Y. Tel. Mahopac 2320
50 miles from N. Y. 140 acres rustic country, secluded, restful, homelike. Unexcelled American cuisine. Sports, Movies. Beautiful walks, $45.
Mrs. G. Popper

Letters to the Editors

To the People of Mississippi

Dear Sirs: A recent issue of the Stars & Stripes has brought to our attention the statement of Senator Eastland that the Negro soldier in this war has been "an utter and abysmal failure." This statement was made by a man in high government office who is supposed to help carry the torch of liberty. Many of us are alarmed and saddened to know that the people of the state of Mississippi have entrusted to this man the honor and responsibility of representing them in the government of the United States.

By this statement, and the attitude behind it, Senator Eastland demonstrates that he neither comprehends nor believes in the principles behind this war. Otherwise he would realize that service toward the cause of human liberty can be, and is, performed just as ably by a black man as it is by a white man.

Senator Eastland has betrayed us. He has not represented the cause for which we sent him to Washington. He is not interested in human liberties and promoting human freedom. He is not interested in understanding and helping to eradicate the causes of war. What does he care about the young men of America who have died in Europe, and Africa, and the Pacific, in the past few years? What does he care about the cause of liberty and freedom for which they fought and died, for which men and women of all races and colors gave their lives? Their victories and their heritage are for everyone—for men and women of all races and colors.

We fought the Nazis and Fascists because they represented a threat to our freedom and to the freedom of all people. We fought them because they tried to put one group of people above all others. They were interested in freedom not for all peoples, but for the "Nordic" few. In America we have people like that, too. They also preach a doctrine of racial superiority—the superiority of the white man over the black man—and seek to curb the freedom of the man who does not belong in their little world of hatred and prejudice. These men are fighting America and what she stands for just as much as any Nazi who ever uttered "Heil Hitler" or turned an "88" on American soldiers. These men are just as much enemies of human freedom as were the Hitlers, the Goebbels, and the rest. Some of these men even manage to get into high government positions. Perhaps Senator Eastland is one of them—the people of Mississippi will be able to tell. Other Americans, and the millions of soldiers overseas, have faith in what the people of Mississippi will do to help the cause of free men everywhere.

SERVICEMAN FROM MISSOURI
Somewhere in Germany, July 12

Military Caste and Civilian Jobs

Dear Sirs: Douglas Smith, Scripps-Howard Washington correspondent, has uncovered a War Manpower Commission directive to give "the greatest assistance to young officer veterans" in their survey of available executive positions in business, industry, and government. The Commission has published a booklet, conspicuously labeled "Enlisted Men," listing all the types of army and navy duties and the corresponding civilian jobs for which these duties fitted the men. As Smith notes, WMC "apparently is trying to help carry the military caste system into civilian life by giving officers the first crack at the best jobs."

Since when has a government agency earned the prerogative to destroy a democratic principle that millions of Americans have left their homes to defend?—namely, the right of every man to qualify for a job on his individual merits, regardless of rank, creed, or color.

WMC's argument is that "many of these officers have married since they were called into service. They and their families are accustomed to living on an officer's income and they understandably do not want to alter their standard of living." This is true. But what consideration is being given to the far greater number of enlisted men and women who have accepted their lesser lot while fighting the concept of a Super Race? They do not begrudge their military officers an equal chance in competing for worthwhile civilian positions. As American citizens, they in turn do not expect to be denied that chance.

CORPORAL
San Francisco, Calif., July 29

A Test for FSA

Dear Sirs: The Farm Security Administration is on trial. On August 24 it will decide whether the Delmo Labor Homes are to be sold to the large planters or to the present occupants and other low-income farm families in southeast Missouri.

The sale of the Delmo Labor Homes to the people was made possible after hearings in Washington before the House Committee on Agriculture on the Hook bill, H. R. 3071. As an alternative to the attempt to get legislation through Congress, the committee, composed of Chairman W. R. Poage of Texas, Orville Zimmerman of Missouri, and Jerry Voorhis of California, proposed that the residents pool their money and with the support of a group of St. Louis financiers purchase all ten of the Delmo housing projects. Farm Security Administration agreed to postpone the sale date until August 23. In the meantime, the residents and other prospective buyers have been gathering their money, each family raising $100 as a down payment. A non-profit corporation is about to be formed by Bishop William Scarlett and several business men in St. Louis.

Whether or not the tenants through the non-profit corporation will become home owners, depends on the officials of the Farm Security Administration. Will they decide to satisfy the powerful planter interests? Or will they consider the human value of the plan whereby the residents and others like them may purchase their homes and pay for them in five years?

You can aid by writing a letter to Mr. Frank Hancock, Administrator of Farm Security Administration, Washington, D. C., stating your desire to have the Delmo residents become home owners. The time is short, the opposition powerful and sometimes ruthless. Strike a blow for freedom now.

DAVID S. BURGESS
Independent Tenants Committee
Memphis, Tenn., July 31

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS
THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 161 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · AUGUST 25, 1945 NUMBER 8

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 165

EDITORIALS

Churchill Bearing Gifts 167
Occupying Japan 168
Speed the Murray Bill! 169
Notes on the War's End by Freda Kirchwey 170

ARTICLES

Shake-up in the State Department by I. F. Stone 171
China's New Danger by Maxwell S. Stewart 172
British Labor Goes to Work by Aylmer Vallance 174
The Last War Front by Charles G. Bolté 175
The Story of the PC 1264 by Eric Purdon 177
In the Wind 178

POLITICAL WAR

Exit the Marshal by Frederic Pottecher 179
German Unions under Military Government 180

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

F. Scott Fitzgerald by Lionel Trilling 182
Briefer Comment 184
Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling 187
Music by B. H. Haggin 189
Films by James Agee 189

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 190

CROSSWORD PUZZLE NO. 124 by Jack Barrett 192

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor J. KING GORDON
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Editor Political War Section
J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor J. MITCHELL MORSE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates
LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS
CAREY MCWILLIAMS REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1945, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

THE DEMOBILIZATION PLANS OF THE ARMED services sound impressive until they are subjected to close analysis. It has been announced that from 6,500,000 to 7,500,000 servicemen are to be released in the next twelve to eighteen months. In view of the requirements for the occupation armies and the logistic problems involved in getting millions of men home from the four corners of the globe, many persons have taken this to be a wholly satisfactory program. But is it? Demobilization of 7,000,000 men would leave nearly 4,000,000 in the services. President Truman has indicated that 50,000 additional young men will be drafted each month. Thus, under the army and navy program we shall have approximately 4,500,000 men under arms a year from V-J Day. What useful purpose will be served by such a force? The size of the occupation army for Germany has been set at 400,000 men. The maximum figure mentioned for the Japanese occupation force is 1,000,000. Half that number would be more reasonable for a year from now. What of the remaining 3,000,000 to 3,500,000? Do the army and navy authorities honestly believe that they can keep millions of war veterans in American camps and outposts for more than a year after the termination of hostilities? If they try it they will be faced with the greatest disciplinary problem in history—to say nothing of tremendous political pressure from the home folks.

*

HONGKONG IS ONE OF THE MANY AREAS IN the Far East which have been left in an anomalous position by the sudden Japanese surrender. The Chinese have indicated that they intend to occupy the island; the British, although disclaiming "a race" to get there first, say they mean to return. While the Chinese have no legal claim to the colony, they point out that British control is equivalent to foreign domination of Manhattan. In reply the British assert, with some justice, that Hongkong was little more than barren rock before the British transformed it into one of the busiest ports of the world. China itself unquestionably benefited from British protection of this great harbor during the long years of civil strife. While Churchill remained as Prime Minister, the retention of Hongkong was largely bound up with matters of imperial prestige. It is to be hoped that the Labor government will take a more practical view and agree to negotiate with China. Britain's legitimate interests in the port could be safeguarded under Chinese sovereignty if China would agree to the establishment of a free port and recognize existing British property rights in the colony. A quick settlement is desirable so that the port may be opened to relieve the appalling conditions of destitution which exist throughout South China.

MARSHAL PETAIN, SENTENCED TO DIE, HAS BEEN reprieved by General de Gaulle, who accepted the Court's recommendation of clemency. We believe that the death penalty was justified and that its commutation is wise. As Pertinax pointed out in last week's Nation, the trial was conducted in an unsatisfactory manner by a prosecutor who did not fully understand the political background of the Marshal's crime. M. Pottecher, in a cable from Paris on page 179 of this issue, confirms this point and stresses "the air of ambiguity" which hung over the whole proceedings. The fact is that Pétain's crime could not be neatly fitted into any legal category. There may be a doubt about whether he committed treason in a technical sense; certainly he managed in his senile way to rationalize his actions and to persuade himself that he was acting in French interests. His real crime was defeatism, the use of his prestige to drag his country down, his attempt—happily unsuccessful—to degrade the spirit of France. For one guilty of so grievous a wrong to his compatriots there may be clemency; there can never be forgiveness.

*

FRENCH SOCIALISTS HAVE EMPHATICALLY rejected proposals for "organic unity" with the Communists. Unity of action on specific measures remains possible, but, said Jules Moch, well known to Nation readers, who presented a motion on the subject to the party's National Congress, "organic unity" depends on the fulfillment of three conditions. First, he said, there must be frank statements of policy, unmasked by opportunism; second, respect for true democracy and individual liberty and insistence on equal rights for nations both large and small; third, exclusive devotion to the cause of labor, no ties with any foreign government, and full liberty of criticism and judgment. Clearly, the Communists cannot meet such terms so long as they retain their monolithic party structure and accept their cues, even if they don't receive actual orders, from Moscow. Continued division of the left, therefore, appears inevitable, but in a country with the democratic traditions of France that may be preferable to a situation in which the citizen is forced to choose between a Communist-dominated United Front and sheer reaction. Anglo-American attempts to preserve the status quo in Western Europe gave the Communists their best arguments. If the only alternative to Churchill was to be Stalin, left-wingers were likely to plump for Stalin. Labor's triumph in Britain, however, has revived the spirits of the many Europeans who hope to combine socialism with political freedom.

THE SPIRIT OF PETAINISM

The old Marshal has been legally pronounced a traitor by the High Court in France. But Pétainism was not a crime of one man. It infected a whole generation of reactionary politicians who, bit by bit, before the war and after the French capitulation, bartered away their nation's integrity to serve the interests of their class and even their own private interests. Wherever they held power they worked to defeat democracy and destroy its defenders. One of their last open stands was made in North Africa when the Americans landed. The plots and counter-plots that made possible the landings, the role of Darlan and Giraud, of our democratic friends in Algiers, of young royalist patriots, of Robert Murphy and his flock of consuls, of other Americans with other ideas . . . all this makes an adventure story in which the real villain is the spirit of Pétainism.

That story has been written by Renée Gosset and published by The Nation under the title "Conspiracy in Algiers." It is sold without profit and we recommend it warmly to our readers as an unequalled source of information on the events and men that crowd its pages and as an indispensable key to the political struggle in Europe today. You will find an order blank on page 187.

*

COMPETENT FRENCH POLITICAL OBSERVERS ARE of the opinion that before long France will break with Franco Spain. The National Assembly has, on several occasions, declared itself in that sense and recent events have done much to crystallize opinion. It may be true, as Mr. Churchill has declared, that the Potsdam condemnation of the Franco regime was decided upon by the Big Three before the British election results were publicly known. But there can be no doubt that the Labor victory, despite Mr. Attlee's failure to mention Spain in his first speech in the new Parliament, will have done much to convince French democrats that the Potsdam declaration can now be supplemented. The French Socialist Party Congress put itself unmistakably on record. In his opening speech the chairman went so far as to express his conviction that Spanish Republicans "would be back home in a few months, if not weeks." And the entire sense of the Congress must have been encouraging to the Spanish Republic in exile. Probably, however, two events will precede a French decision in this matter. If the elections, to be held on October 21, confirm the common belief that the left is destined to be the major influence in French affairs, then a rupture with Franco is almost a certainty. And, if the Spanish Republicans succeed in setting up a broad coalition government in exile, it will probably be given hospitality and early recognition by France.

*

A UNITED SPANISH REPUBLICAN GOVERNMENT now seems certain. With the warm support of the Mexican authorities an extraordinary session of the Cortes was held last Friday in Mexico's City Hall and Martinez Barrio was unanimously chosen provisional President of the Republic. For the occasion the City Hall and the surrounding streets were officially declared Spanish soil, under the principle of extra-territoriality, and Mexican troops guarded the area. Full Presidential honors were accorded Señor Martinez Barrio by the Mexican government and the Cortes session was attended with all possible ceremony. Diplomatic representatives of many countries were present, including those of France and Russia. The British and the Americans were noticeably absent. Immediately after the Cortes adjourned Dr. Negrín and his Cabinet submitted their resignations to the provisional President but, as we go to press, no decision has been reached as to the composition of the new government. Only one thing is certain. The laborious efforts of Dr. Negrín to reunite the Spanish Republican parties and organizations have been completely successful. Readers of The Nation who have followed the accounts of his negotiations by his colleague, J. Alvarez del Vayo, know with what patience and good will he has gone about the essential task of bringing divergent groups together behind the simple program of agreeing upon a President who should reconstitute the government through consultation with all the party leaders. The Cortes meeting was a dramatic tribute to his statesmanship.

*

IN AN ILLUMINATING DISPATCH ON PAGE 174 Aylmer Vallance singles out the Labor government's proposal to repeal the 1927 Trades Disputes Act as one point in its program likely to provoke particularly bitter opposition from the Tories. One New York paper, we notice, featured this proposal as a plan "to legalize general strikes"—a good example of editorializing in the headlines. The Trades Disputes Act, in fact, was a punitive measure which followed the General Strike of 1926. It did outlaw general strikes, and sympathetic strikes as well. In addition, it circumscribed severely the right to picket, introduced the injunction as a weapon against trade unionism, compelled unions of civil servants to disaffiliate from the Trades Union Congress and the Labor Party, and sought to hamstring the political activities of unions by making it as difficult as possible for them to collect contributions from members for their "political funds." Ever since this act was passed its repeal has been a primary objective of the British trade-union movement. There was angry disappointment when Ramsay MacDonald failed to take action during his administration in 1929, pleading his lack of a majority in the Commons. Now that Labor is really in power, the continuance of this crass piece of class legislation on the statute books is unthinkable.

*

THE BLANKET OF SILENCE WHICH MAYOR EARL Riley imposed on the discussion of racial problems in Portland, Oregon, has finally been lifted with the release of a comprehensive report on "The Negro in Portland" by the Portland City Club. During the war the city's Negro population increased from 1,900 to approximately 20,000 and, the report declares, a large proportion intends to remain. Dangerous racial tensions have resulted, which the Mayor has attempted to ignore. The City Club confirms what everyone else has long known about the problems Negroes face in Portland and adds some piquant details. It calls attention to Article 24 of the Code of Ethics of the Realty Board of Portland: "A realtor should never be instrumental in introducing into a neighborhood . . . members of any race or nationality . . . whose presence will clearly be detrimental to property values in that neighborhood." It would be difficult to imagine a more elastic use of the word "ethics." The case for the adoption of a Civil Rights Act in Oregon—one was defeated at the last session of the legislature—is abundantly established by a finding that a majority of restaurant owners in Portland refuse to serve Negroes. Special significance should be attached to another finding—that insurance agencies are generally unwilling to insure Negro lives and that, in the writing of casualty insurance, considerable discrimination exists. The City Club recommends appointment by the Governor of a state-wide committee on racial matters, to be integrated with a similar local committee which Mayor Riley is urged to appoint in Portland, adoption of a non-discriminatory policy, and support of a permanent FEPC.

*

A STRONG SMELL OF OIL WAS APPARENT IN THE opposition marshalled by the State and War departments last year to passage of a resolution by Congress in favor of a Jewish national home in Palestine. We are happy that President Truman has reversed past policy in this respect and has let it be known that at Potsdam he urged establishment of a Jewish commonwealth in Palestine and the immigration of as many Jews as it could support. The President's statement and the British Labor Party's past opposition to the White Paper raise our hopes that, with the coming of peace, justice will at last be done to Jewish aspirations in Palestine. To open the gates of Zion to all those Jews who do not wish to return to countries whence they were driven by Nazi policies is the least the victorious Allies can do for those who suffered most from Axis oppression.

Churchill Bearing Gifts

THE British Labor government will, we imagine, beware of Winston Churchill when he comes bearing gifts. In his first appearance as Leader of the Opposition, the former Prime Minister made no attacks on the proposals his successor had announced through the medium of the King's Speech. Instead, he devoted most of his speech to reviewing the affairs of Europe in a manner carefully calculated to embarrass the new ministers, to whom ostensibly he offered support. It was an utterly irresponsible performance, which, having regard to the nature of some of Mr. Churchill's remarks, we are forced to describe as fooling with a cyclotron in the presence of Uranium 235.

When he turned to the domestic scene, Mr. Churchill's tones were friendly, if more than a trifle condescending. Adopting the role of the complete democrat, responsive to the people's will, he promised cooperation in forwarding the program laid by the government before the House. He did not quarrel with Labor's proposals to nationalize the coal industry and the Bank of England, declaring he would approach such schemes "in a sympathetic spirit." Speaking of other items in the King's Speech he said: "Here and there may be differences in emphasis and view, but in the main no Parliament ever assembled with such mass-agreed legislation as lies before us."

Mr. Churchill, who is unexcelled as a parliamentary tactician, was undoubtedly wise not to revive the savage attacks on the government's socialist policies in which he had indulged so freely on the hustings. The clear mandate from the electors to carry out those policies was reflected in the King's Speech, which, for all its stilted phraseology, set forth a radical and ambitious program for the new session. In view of the government's majority a frontal assault on this program would be doomed from the start. The Tories must therefore reserve their strength until legislation reaches a stage where guerrilla warfare with amendments and points of order becomes practicable.

No one will deny that, within the limitations of his class, Mr. Churchill is a good democrat—at home. But, in the past, he has been inclined to deprecate the export of democracy to lands lacking "the British genius." Now, putting behind him former encomiums for Mussolini and Franco, he has adopted a Lincolnian pose. He stands, he declares, for government of, by, and for the people everywhere or at least everywhere within the Russian sphere of influence.

In his Commons speech last week, Mr. Churchill admitted that in the war-torn countries there is need for a time of "authoritative government" as an alternative to anarchy. What distressed him was that in Eastern Europe such governments were dominated by Communists. He went on to charge that in many countries—he named Poland, Czechoslovakia, and Yugoslavia—secret police have instituted a reign of terror. It was the duty of the British government, he hinted, to take a strong line against such outrages.

That the four freedoms are a long way from being attained in Eastern Europe—and in some other places too—cannot be gainsaid. Secretary of State Byrnes has just protested vigorously against the way elections are being conducted in Bulgaria, and with reason. For the procedures being followed appear to give voters little more than the privilege of indorsing a Parliament pre-selected by the government now in office. But Bulgaria is not the only offender. In Greece the opposition has been subjected to terrorism and discrimination ever since the British Army intervened last December. A handful of foreign observers will not, as Mr. Churchill claims, insure there a "free, honest expression of the popular will."

For ourselves, we are opposed to terror and gerrymandered elections whether they occur in British or Russian spheres of influence, and we are sorry that Prime Minister Attlee, in following Mr. Churchill, passed over the subject with a reference to "limitations on the amount of interference we can make in other states." The Tory opposition evidently intends to needle the Labor government on the subject of Communist dictatorships. The most effective retort would be to adopt a firmer line against all dictatorships, and challenge Churchill and his followers to support it. When the British government (and our own) breaks diplomatic relations with Franco, it will be in a stronger position to withhold recognition of the Bulgarian regime; when it insists on an end to the terror in Greece, it can protest more effectively against its continuance in Poland.

We are sorry too that Mr. Attlee did not immediately repudiate his predecessor's remarks about the atomic bomb—the most mischievous part of a mischievous speech. Disclaiming any wish for "arbitrary power," Mr. Churchill applauded President Truman's proposals to keep the bomb as an Anglo-American secret. Before other nations catch up with us, he said, "we must remold the relationships of all men of all nations in such a way that these men do not wish or dare to fall upon each other for the sake of vulgar, outdated ambition, or for passionate differences in ideologies."

This is very fine rhetoric, but what exactly does it mean if not the use of the bomb as a diplomatic "persuader"? We agree with the New York Herald Tribune that the juxtaposition of Mr. Churchill's references to the bomb and his inferential criticisms of Russian policy was "hardly accidental." We agree, also, that atomic force "is far too explosive a weapon . . . to be hastily applied to the international scene." Mr. Churchill is light-heartedly playing with cosmic forces. We hope the Labor ministers will trounce his irresponsibility and dissociate themselves emphatically from his views.

Occupying Japan

AMIDST the general rejoicing over the surrender of Japan there has been an undercurrent of uneasiness in all the Allied countries. Although Domei dispatches report that great crowds gathered outside the Imperial Palace weeping unrestrainedly when the news of the surrender was disclosed, Japan's actions have not been those of a nation which has accepted defeat. The Japanese government has consistently delayed the carrying out of MacArthur's orders; Japanese planes repeatedly attacked Allied ships and bases after the Imperial cease-fire order; Japanese propagandists have been telling the people that they have had to bow to the material force of the Allies but that they did not lose the war "spiritually." In his rescript to the Japanese people, the Emperor boasted that the "structure of the Imperial state" had been saved and would be maintained. And in line with this boast, he appointed an arch-militarist, Higashi-Kuni, a prince of the royal line, to take over as Premier in place of the moderate Suzuki. None of the news from Japan tells of indignation against the leaders whose lust for power brought disaster to the country. Instead, the people are alleged to have given their approval to the view, expressed in various ways, that Japan would do better next time.

While a legitimate cause for uneasiness, the Japanese reaction should come as a surprise to no one. Japan did not suffer the overwhelming military defeat that Germany did. When the end finally came in Europe, the Nazis had lost all capacity for organized resistance. Japan, on the other hand, had not been invaded and the bulk of its army had never even come in contact with our forces. True, the navy had been destroyed, the air force rendered impotent, and vast industrial areas reduced to rubble. But conceivably Japan could have maintained resistance for many more months. Thus, it was inevitable that we should find the Japanese spirit relatively unbroken.

What the Japanese war lords may say in the first hours of defeat is not nearly as important as what kind of Japan we shall have one year or ten years from now. That will be determined largely by the wisdom and firmness of our occupation policies. In many respects the responsibilities of the occupying force are far heavier and its problems far more complicated than those faced by the Four Powers in Germany. Because Japan has not been physically vanquished in the sense that Germany has, it will be the duty of the occupying force to bring home the reality of defeat without resort to inhumanity. The task of taking possession of the Japanese islands and setting up an effective governing force will be arduous and delicate. And, as all the fuss over the Emperor indicates, we are woefully ignorant about Japanese psychology and the realities of Japan's social and political structure.

Neither the terms of the Potsdam Declaration nor the note sent to Japan in response to its inquiry about the status of the Emperor provide any guaranty that Japan will be handled with proper firmness. According to these statements the occupying forces have the full authority to do whatever is necessary to destroy Japanese militarism, even if it involves the ultimate abolition of the monarchy and the trial of Hirohito and Higashi-Kuni as war criminals. They will have sufficient power to abolish Japan's feudal industrial and agricultural system and provide channels whereby the Japanese people can set up modern social and political institutions. But we have no assurance that any of these things will be done. The Japanese leaders apparently do not expect any drastic interference with the institutions upon which their rule has been based. They expect to be able to take up where they left off as soon as, or possibly before, the occupation ends.

There is little in General MacArthur's background that suggests that he has either the intelligence or the understanding that is necessary to attack the roots of Japanese militarism. His record in the Philippines is one of subservience to powerful economic interests similar to those that constitute an ever-present menace in Japan. It is possible, however, that MacArthur possesses the firmness needed to deal with the Japanese leaders, provided he is given the assistance of competent political advisers who understand Japan.

It will not be easy to find men with Japanese experience capable of providing MacArthur with the insight necessary for his great task. Most of the State Department men who have served in Japan have become involved with the very groups that need to be destroyed. The missionaries who have lived in Japan are, for the most part, sentimental toward the Japanese people. There are, however, a few experts on Japan available. An outstanding one is Herbert Norman of the Department of External Affairs of Canada. We should not hesitate to use him because he happens to be a Canadian. Even if the occupation is under American direction, it is in theory a joint operation and we should draw freely on our allies for personnel. In this country we have men like Owen Lattimore of Johns Hopkins and Laurence Salisbury of the Institute of Pacific Relations. Choice of any of these men would indicate that we were on the right track.

If, however, former Under-Secretary Joseph Grew or his associate Dooman is chosen, as has been rumored, we will know that the Japanese war lords have indeed won a soft peace. For both men have made it very clear in repeated statements that they favor restoring power to the big business leaders, landlords, and princes who profited by the top-heavy social structure that is fundamentally responsible for the war. They have taken this position, partly because they have many friends and associates among Japanese of this type, but primarily because they fear that disorder and chaos would develop if the restraining power of the Zaibatsu and monarchy were destroyed.

We do not deny that the elimination of Japanese economic as well as political war criminals might result in a considerable amount of confusion. There might be strikes and disorders; possibly the Japanese state would collapse into anarchy. But the very fear of disorder is recognition of the possibility that the Japanese are fed up with militarism and dictatorship. Without guidance this discontent may easily deteriorate into aimless anarchy. But it is also a power that could be directed into highly constructive channels, if our occupation authorities were ready with a program of political and economic democracy. One thing is certain: we must not allow the fear of social change to trick us into setting the stage for a new, and more terrible, Pearl Harbor in 1961.

Speed the Murray Bill!

THE NATION applauds President Truman for making the Full-Employment Bill the first "must" legislation of the post-war period. The Murray-Wagner-Kilgore-Pepper-Patman measure offers the only current plan for avoiding a post-war slump, a recurrence of chronic unemployment, a return to pre-war conditions under which the United States dragged along half prosperous, half depressed. The press conference at which the President announced his support of the Full-Employment Bill marks the third step taken by the new Administration to back this historic measure. On June 30 last it was given unqualified indorsement by Fred M. Vinson, now Secretary of the Treasury, in his final report as Director of the Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion. Less than two weeks ago the Full-Employment Bill was placed on the emergency legislation list by Senate Leader Barkley after a conference at the White House. The President's statement makes it a key Administration measure for the early post-war period.

Given full support by progressive and labor forces, we believe that the bill can be enacted into law. From a political point of view, it is very hard to vote against full employment. From an economic point of view, no other measure promises to be at all adequate in coping with the basic problem of expanding output and employment to match our expanded productive capacity and manpower. The opposition to the bill, led by Taft of Ohio, falls back on as astounding an argument as was ever advanced by conservative opinion in a changing world. It is that full employment is impossible under capitalism, an extraordinarily subversive and defeatist "line" for conservatives to take. They may be correct—Karl Marx agreed with them—but the experiment is worth trying, and they are completely deluded in the conclusion to which they think their argument leads. To tell the masses that full employment is impossible under capitalism is to invite them to give up capitalism, not full employment. Taft forgets that he is addressing ordinary folk, not a bankers' convention.

If the Full-Employment Bill is to get a fair chance, it should be passed as rapidly as possible. For the day-to-day decisions being made in the course of reconversion are rapidly adding to the difficulty of attaining the objective of the bill. The President is for full employment but too many of the men at the reconversion helm are willing to let business find its own course and set its own speed. It is significant that the President's statement in support of the Full-Employment Bill was elicited by a question about the "From War to Peace" report made public the day before by John W. Snyder, Vinson's successor in the Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion. Snyder's report, unlike Vinson's, indorses neither the Full-Employment Bill nor the view that primary responsibility for full employment must necessarily fall upon government. The key to his thinking lies in the statement that "our peace-time goal of maximum production can be best attained by relaxing controls as early as the supply situation permits." This is no more than a dangerous half-truth. Relaxation of war-time controls, without new planning and directives for full output, can only lead us back to mass unemployment.

Snyder, like Chairman Krug of the War Production Board, is guided by a mystic faith in "pent-up demand" as a solvent of reconversion problems. Krug's press conference on August 15 indicated that he was still depending on high-power sales talks to see us through. The contrast between the carefully-prepared WPB report on reconversion, which had to clear through higher agencies, and the loose over-optimism indulged in by Krug in his oral statements is revealing. The controls of reconversion are in the hands of men unsympathetic to planning for full employment. Much ground may be lost, many costly errors of policy made, before the Full-Employment Bill passes, unless the President tightens up existing reconversion machinery and shakes up its operating personnel.

Notes on the War's End

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

The Emperor's Rescript

I HOPE the Japanese people have learned to decode the intricate double-talk of their rulers. Otherwise they can have no way of knowing that their country has been conquered and their leaders are headed for the scrap-pile—if they are. The Emperor's broadcast to his subjects on V-J Day was one of the trickiest bits of imaginative writing that ever came out of Tokyo. Indeed, the ordinary Japanese, if he had no other facts to go by, must have decided after switching off his radio that his Emperor had, quite voluntarily and for the good of all mankind, agreed to end the war in order to pave the way for a "grand peace for all the generations to come." The Emperor never once uses the word surrender; instead he says he is effecting "a settlement of the present situation by resorting to an extraordinary measure." That measure is an order to the government to accept the "provisions of the joint declaration" of the Allied powers. But nowhere does he explain what those provisions provide. Instead he solemnly recalls his Imperial obligation "to strive for the common prosperity and happiness of all nations" including his own, and only remarks in passing that "the war situation has developed not necessarily to Japan's advantage." This, I think, is one of the nicest phrases an Emperor ever turned. He admits that the emancipation of East Asia didn't pan out just as he had hoped and goes so far as to allude to "the dictates of time and fate" and the atomic bomb. He even warns that the "grand peace" toward which the country is heading will involve "suffering what is unsufferable," but what it is that is "unsufferable" he forbears to tell the people who must suffer it. And he goes directly on to reassure them by pointing out that he had been "able to save . . . and maintain the structure of the Imperial state."

I cite in detail this example of Imperial trickery not because it is funny, after the Japanese fashion, but because it sums up and exposes in a few sentences the political problems awaiting us in Japan. For the Emperor's rescript is a bland defiance of his victorious enemies and an attempt to establish before the occupation forces arrive the innocence and virtue of Japan's war aims, a basis for future claims that Japan never met defeat, and the continued authority of the Imperial throne and the nation's military leaders.

This statement must not be allowed to go uncorrected. The truth should be put before the Japanese people immediately. General MacArthur should insist that the Emperor himself expose his own deceptions. Hirohito should be ordered to tell the people that the imperialist aims of his regime were responsible for the disastrous war now ending; that Japan has been totally defeated, shorn of its conquests, and driven to unconditional surrender; that the Imperial Throne itself and all other former sources of authority in Japan are henceforth subject to the orders of the Allied occupation. MacArthur should order that the terms of surrender be printed in full and distributed throughout Japan. If we mean business when we talk about abolishing everything "that contributed to the militarist tradition in Japan," this is the least we can do. And the sooner we do it, the better.

More About the Atom

People are talking easily, too easily, about the momentous economic and political consequences which must follow the release of atomic energy. By assuming in broad terms the inevitability of revolutionary change, one somehow absolves oneself of the need of doing anything about it. If we were honest most of us would admit, I think, an inner resistance to tackling the implications of the new discovery. We really don't like it: it is too big, too monstrous in its demands upon our intelligence and courage, too hard to understand.

Some writers have brushed off the need for concrete thinking by assuring the world—and themselves—that a generation may well elapse before atomic energy can be harnessed to industrial tasks. Others have opened vistas of wealth and effortless comfort without bothering to consider what alterations in our society these rewards imply. But the fact is clear, behind all this talk, that soon, too soon for our fuddled social thinking, we shall have available a source of power which must ultimately be cheap if only because it is inexhaustible. What difference does it make whether this power is to be harnessed to planes and factories and heating plants ten years from now or twenty-five? The time in either case will be insufficient to prepare adequately for the impact of the split atom.

And before it arrives we shall already be faced with a fight. For if one thing is sure, it is that the application of atomic energy is going to involve a major social and political struggle. Don't let's fool ourselves that because the government today holds the basic patents for the production of atomic bombs, private business will peaceably permit public exploitation of atomic energy for industrial purposes. In the control of that energy lies a source of infinite, incalculable wealth. If business does not try to corner it, or at least chisel off a substantial share of it, then the profit motive has lost more of its push than I believe it has. Certain business interests will also have the most intimate reasons to try to delay the production and limit the use of atomic power. Over night vast capital investments in water power, in coal, in transportation may be wiped out; and before that happens those interests will fight. If the energy should first be developed for industrial use in other countries, we shall see a hopeless but bitter attempt to shut out the cheap products that will result from cheap power; then a determined effort either to outstrip foreign competitors or come to terms with them through cartel arrangements.

To meet the sure and organized efforts of business to turn atoms into profits, progressive groups should begin to do some hard thinking about the economic world that will result from this revolution. Studies should be undertaken immediately to discover in advance ways of utilizing the new power so that the people will reap the whole benefit of its discovery. Possible methods of control should be carefully considered: mixed versus straight-out socialist economy, for example. The international aspects of a world linked by atomic energy should be examined. (Is there any longer an excuse for American excursions in oil imperialism in the Middle East?) And such acute specific problems as the fate of great regional power developments like the TVA and of whole industries like coal and oil should be studied separately and as part of the over-all economic picture.

I believe our American labor organizations should promptly put money and attention into an analysis of these problems. I believe the C. I. O. and the Citizens Political Action Committees should set up a joint research group to study them in broad national terms. I believe smaller progressive associations should reconsider their functions in the light of the new knowledge; the Union for Democratic Action, for example, might give up its ad hoc political efforts and constitute itself as a deliberative and research body working along the lines of the Fabian Society.

Atomic energy is more than a remote and disconcerting threat; it is an imminent fact to be dealt with bravely and realistically—and without delay

Shake-up in the State Department

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, August 17

IT WOULD be pleasant to believe that the resignation of Joseph C. Grew as Under-Secretary of State indicated that President Truman and Secretary of State James F. Byrnes had begun to understand what a mistake they made in following Grew's advice on the Japanese Emperor. It is possible to state with assurance only that Grew's successor, Dean Acheson, sharply disagreed with our former Ambassador to Tokyo on the question of how far we could rely on Hirohito. In intra-departmental conferences, the new Under-Secretary was signally un-crushed by Grew's favorite retort, "Have you ever lived in Japan?" To be succeeded by Acheson must be a bitter pill for Grew, as for the whole inside clique in the State Department.

For Acheson has been in the minority on issues other than that of the Japanese Emperor. He has been pro-De Gaulle, anti-Franco, strongly opposed to the admission of Argentina to the United Nations, and friendly to the Soviet Union. He is not at all likely to be frightened by a Labor government in England, even if it carries out its socialist program. Of all the men now in the department, Acheson was by far the best choice for Under-Secretary, and it is no small advantage to pick a man who already knows a good deal about the inner machinery.

By all superficial marks, Acheson would appear to be a natural member of the snobbish clique which generally runs the department. He is a man of wealth and social standing, a Grotonian, a successful corporation lawyer. But his intellectual horizons and human sympathies transcend this background. He was once private secretary to Brandeis. He took time off from his corporate law practice to argue the constitutionality of minimum-wage legislation in the United States Supreme Court. He is not at all stuffy, and at fifty-two still has plenty of ginger in him.

There are differences of opinion in Washington as to how "strong" a man he is. He is strong enough to do a good job in the department if he is sufficiently supported by Secretary Byrnes and the White House. The job of Under-Secretary is as important as its holder and his chief choose to make it. He can be the actual administrative head of the department, or, as Sumner Welles was, he can be by-passed and rendered ineffective by the inside clique.

One of Acheson's assets lies in his relations with Congress. He deserves a generous share of the credit for the passage of the Bretton Woods legislation, and he played no inconsiderable part in the Senate's approval of the Charter. His ability to make friends and influence people in Congress is the kind of quality that impresses practical politicians like Truman and Byrnes. Within the department, Acheson's closest alliance has been with MacLeish and, among the new men brought in by Byrnes, with Benjamin V. Cohen. Cohen and Acheson laid the groundwork for the destroyers-for-bases deal with England, and have long been close friends.

Acheson disliked the "new team" put in charge of the department last year by President Roosevelt and submitted his resignation in January. He was persuaded to stay on to help put Bretton Woods through Congress and then to aid the Charter fight in the Senate. The strangest thing about Acheson's appointment is that it was obviously a surprise to him, and came three days after the New York Times reported that Byrnes had accepted his resignation as Assistant Secretary

One of these days it is likely that the various agencies of government dealing with foreign economic and propaganda matters will either be merged into the State Department or brought closely under its control. This policy has much to recommend it from the standpoint of neat administrative arrangements, though not from a realistic point of view—so long as the department remains what it is. Under such circumstances it would be most useful to have as Under-Secretary a man with Acheson's knowledge and experience in handling foreign economic problems.

It would be well, however, not to expect too much. A real overhauling of the department has been long overdue but it is unlikely to be obtained from a Secretary of State as conservative as Byrnes. The resignations of Archibald MacLeish and Julius Holmes can hardly be fitted into any consistent pattern. The progressive MacLeish has worked hard under difficult circumstances to improve the Department's public relations and did an excellent educational job on the San Francisco Charter. The departure of Holmes is welcome news, for he is a combination of brass hat and cookie pusher, and as Assistant Secretary in charge of personnel was likely to multiply the snobs in the Department and the Foreign Service. I hope that Chase National Bank boy scout, Nelson Rockefeller, will follow him into retirement.

One of the discouraging factors in the situation is that Byrnes assigned the Budget Bureau to make a study of the State Department. The Budget Bureau is at best formalistic and academic, and at worst a nest of reactionary wire-pullers and intriguers. The task of finding out what is wrong with the Department should not have been intrusted to pundits who specialize in neat little blueprints.

The ideal way to prepare for a reorganization would be with a thorough series of hearings before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. Congress and the country ought to hear from the men in other divisions of the government who have had to do business with the State Department, from the men who have left it in disgust, and if possible from some of the younger men within it. Only a full airing of policies and personalities could provide enough knowledge and arouse enough interest to establish the basis for a real housecleaning.

China's New Danger

BY MAXWELL S. STEWART

[Mr. Stewart, an associate editor of The Nation, lived in China for six years. He is author of "War-Time China."]

A SITUATION of utmost gravity has arisen in China as a result of Chiang Kai-shek's determination that the Communists shall not share in the victory over Japan. After ordering the Eighteenth Group Army (the Communist forces) not to disarm the Japanese in their sector, Chiang arranged to use American transport planes to rush his troops to areas where the Communists were prepared to take over. At the time this article is being written it is impossible to foretell the outcome. But local clashes between the Kuomintang and Communist troops have already been reported. General Chu Teh, commander-in-chief of the Eighteenth Group Army, has rejected Chiang's order on the ground that it contradicts a simultaneous order to all Chinese armies to summon the Japanese to surrender and because it "runs contrary to the national interest of China." Since the Communists dominate virtually the whole of North China and important areas in Central China, it seems certain that they will be able to force the surrender of enough Japanese to obtain control of large supplies of arms.

Local skirmishes between Kuomintang and Communist forces need not necessarily lead to a general civil war in China. It is possible that after a certain amount of sparring and testing of strength the opposing forces will settle down into a sort of armed truce. If so, we shall have, in effect, two Chinas nearly equal in size and strength. The undesirability of such a development need hardly be stressed. If China is to assume the great responsibilities and opportunities the peace has brought, it must, above all, achieve internal unity.

But there is grave danger that the local clashes will precipitate an immediate general civil war. The arms and ammunition which both sides are obtaining from the surrendering Japanese make such a conflict possible despite China's exhausted condition after eight years of war. For years Chungking has been preparing for a final liquidation of the Communists at the end of the war with Japan. Hu Tsung-nan's armies, which have been used to blockade the Communists for the past five years, are among the best trained and best equipped in China. If Chungking is to be restrained from seeking an immediate showdown, the restraining force will have to come from outside. Russia's entry into the war and the more recent Soong-Stalin agreement in Moscow provide the chief hope of averting a conflict. For in gaining possession of Manchuria, Russia is in a position, for the first time, to give direct material or military assistance to the Chinese Communists and will have in its possession vast quantities of first-class military equipment taken from the Japanese Kwantung armies. It is to be hoped, therefore, that the Soong-Stalin agreement contains a formula for the settlement of the Kuomintang-Communist controversy. The urgent invitation which Chiang Kai-shek has sent to Mao Tse-tung, leader of the Communists, requesting a conference, may be a direct outcome of this agreement. But even if internal affairs are not covered in the formal agreement, Chungking must know that if it attacks Yenan it risks a conflict with the powerful Red Banner forces now established in Manchuria and Inner Mongolia.

This would seem to be a sufficient guaranty against civil war. But it will be largely nullified if Chungking feels that it can count on American aid to offset possible Russian assistance to the Communists. While the idea of American intervention in a new war in China, even before the smoke of the last war has cleared away, will be repugnant to the average American, the rising militancy in Chungking's attitude toward Yenan suggests that it is banking on support from Washington. Recent arrivals in this country from Chungking confirm this judgment. The effort to play off the United States against Russia is a direct and inevitable outcome of the policies which Ambassador Hurley has followed since his arrival in China last fall. Although sent to China by President Roosevelt for the specific task of obtaining a Kuomintang-Communist settlement, Hurley has favored Chungking from the beginning. He abandoned the Stilwell policy of making military considerations the sole criterion in apportioning war supplies and has turned all lend-lease shipments over to Chiang Kai-shek on the ground that his was the only "legal" government in China. No conditions were imposed regarding the use of American-supplied arms, and some equipment is reported to have been used recently against the Communists. Finally, as a logical culmination of this policy, Hurley has put American planes at the disposal of Chiang Kai-shek in his race to keep the Communists from obtaining Japanese arms.

In making this dangerous foray into power politics, Hurley has completely reversed the Gauss-Stillwell policies which came so close to achieving unity in China last fall. Stilwell maintained that America's only concern was in obtaining the maximum Chinese contribution to the war. He knew there were elements in Chungking that were content to sit back and let the United States assume the burden of defeating Japan. He felt that Chiang Kai-shek ought to be willing to root them out as a condition for American material assistance. And he maintained constant pressure on both Chungking and Yenan to end the wasteful internal conflict. In the latter part of 1944 American pressure, combined with the effects of the Japanese advance into Kweichow, nearly resulted in the establishment of an all-party national government. But this opportunity was lost when Hurley replaced Gauss and quickly allowed himself to be taken into the Chiang Kai-shek camp. The Chinese are accustomed to the give-and-take of bargaining. They are masters of the art of compromise. And when it became evident that Hurley was prepared to give Chungking the help it required without exacting substantial concessions in return, all hope of a settlement went aglimmering. Hurley further weakened his position by dismissing from responsible posts on his embassy staff all the men with long China experience. General Wedemeyer, who replaced Stilwell as head of the American military forces, has frequently been at odds with Hurley, but he has not sufficient background in China to play an important role in shaping policy. And there is no one with extensive experience in the State Department at a high enough level to restrain Hurley.

Perhaps the most tragic aspect of the present policy lies in the fact that it has served to strengthen the most reactionary and irreconcilable clique in Chungking at the expense of groups that have been trying to bring about democratic reforms within Kuomintang China. These latter groups have never been politically strong either in the army or in key party posts. But they undoubtedly speak for the vast majority of the Chinese people in demanding a reconciliation of all factions and an end to the restraints of dictatorship. A few weeks ago, before Chiang and Hurley had combined in an attempt to thwart the disarming of the Japanese by the Communists, the middle groups in the Kuomintang seemed to be gaining. The People's Political Council, which contains some non-Kuomintang representatives, voted unanimously to ask the government to postpone the scheduled National Assembly so that a settlement might be reached with the Communists. The decision to send Premier Soong to Moscow implied a willingness to reconsider the country's internal as well as external policies. But the sudden ending of the war upset all previously laid plans. War lords, political groups, and other interests are participating in a mad scramble to gain control of as much of the occupied sections of the country as possible in order to enhance their power. In placing American planes at the disposal of the central government,. Ambassador Hurley may have tipped the scales decisively against the democratic forces which were emerging in Kuomintang China.

Chiang Kai-shek

China's future as a world power depends upon its ability to evolve a strong national government, truly representative of the people and sufficiently progressive to adopt modern forms of social, political, and economic organization. Short of revolution, this can be achieved only if the present ruling group consents to a broader representation in the government. The United States could hasten this process by offering substantial economic assistance once a democratic government is formed. But it will never be achieved as long as American influence is invariably on the side of the ruling clique. Liberal Chinese insist that there can be no settlement of the problem as long as Ambassador Hurley remains. They charge that he is guilty not only of bias and lack of understanding of the Chinese situation but of bad faith in dealing with minority groups. The Communists declare that he has repeatedly shared confidential information, which they furnished to American representatives in Yenan, with high Chungking officials. These charges may or may not be true. But regardless of their accuracy, it is obvious that Ambassador Hurley has failed in his mission. The rival Chinese factions are farther apart today than when he arrived. No Ambassador, regardless of his ability, can succeed if he is distrusted by substantial groups within the country to which he is accredited. For the sake of America's good name and the welfare of countless millions of Chinese, let us bring Hurley home at the earliest possible moment.

British Labor Goes to Work

BY AYLMER VALLANCE

[Mr. Vallance, formerly editor of the London News-Chronicle, is now on the staff of the New Statesman and Nation. In 1939 he was a frequent contributor to The Nation. During the war he was Director of Psychological Warfare for the British War Office.]

London, August 16 (By cable)

THE King drove to Parliament yesterday through a London whose population, under a thin veneer of rejoicing on the part of exuberant, youthful crowds, faces soberly the grim problems that have broken out with peace. The session opened with the usual quaint pomp, suggesting that Labor was deliberately emphasizing the continuity of tradition in a parliamentary democracy. Delivered from the time-honored gilded throne in the Peers' chamber, the speech contained few surprises and little stimulating phraseology. Its program, outlined with the same shrewd caution that characterized Prime Minister Attlee's choice of ministers, represents not an inspiring five-year plan but simply the Cabinet's estimate of the maximum legislation possible within a single year's session. In this connection it is important to appreciate the fact that, deducting the time absorbed by essential debates on the budget and routine business, barely ninety parliamentary days are available in a year for discussion of new legislation. Even for the relatively modest beginning which this session proposes to make on the full election program, it will be necessary to expedite parliamentary procedure. The government, I predict, will remit bills increasingly to separate committees sitting simultaneously.

The outstanding feature of the domestic program is the priority given to measures to consolidate the control of finance. Considering the high degree of control the Treasury already exercises over the Bank of England, nationalization of the Bank is less important than the promised "machinery for effective planning of investment." This foreshadows a national investment board with the function of canalizing savings into socially desirable projects, including both housing and selective industrial reconversion and reequipment. Informed circles in the financial district expect a policy of reducing the interest on money, with perhaps a rate of 1 per cent by the Bank of England, thereby facilitating the flotation of a big 2 per cent housing loan. However that may be, the government evidently considers the direction of capital essential as the basis for the implementation of reconstruction, including both the nationalized industries and trades like cotton which, while remaining in private hands, have been promised government assistance by Sir Stafford Cripps, provided the costly machine replacements, making possible higher wages, are undertaken.

LASKI: "LADIES AND GENTS, DALTO THE GREAT WITHOUT MORE ADO WILL NOW BALANCE THE BANK OF ENGLAND WITH ONE HAND."
DALTON: "HALF A MO. HAROLD. LEMME GET WARMED UP"

STAR TURN IN THE CITY

The remainder of the domestic program, announcing the expected nationalization of coal and a unified social-security system based on the Beveridge plan, includes one item, namely the outright repeal of the 1927 Trades Disputes Act, which will challenge bitter opposition by the Tories. They will argue that the government's readiness to tolerate "labor indiscipline" contrasts flagrantly, from the Tory standpoint, with its intention to discipline the freedom of capital investment.

There are several noticeable omissions in the domestic field. First, there is no hint of the establishment of an over-all Ministry of Housing. Without any indication of what scope is to be alloted to private enterprise, effective mobilization of building resources is promised but handicapped by the continuance of three overlapping departments, those of Health, Town Planning, and Public Works, sharing responsibility under the vague direction of Arthur Greenwood. Second, there is no promise to improve the current rates of old-age pensions to conform with increased living costs, a promise to which many Labor members are individually committed. This, however, may be included in the social-insurance bill. Third (this is presumably to be explained by a consideration of this session's congested parliamentary time-table), there is no specific reference to the intention to nationalize the railways, electricity, and steel. Air transport will be vaguely "reorganized," the power industry "coordinated," and measures taken to facilitate the acquisition of land needed for social purposes. This may create an impression of a studiously moderate, almost pedestrian, program, but the Labor Party will approve the policy of advancing slowly but surely. Provided the administrative use of existing statutes and powers is really energetic, the new legislation, coupled with the announced determination to retain needful price and supply controls, to organize national resources and expand exports, suffices to give promise of an orderly, practical, and nonrevolutionary approach to socialism.

If disappointment with any part of the King's speech is justifiable, it is in the matter of external affairs. It is conceded that the good points in this field are the explicit promise of early and full self-government for India, and the reference to the absolute need to abolish war in an atom-ridden world by firm cooperation with peace-loving peoples desirous of freedom and social justice. Possibly more specific proposals will be elicited in the early debate on ratification of the United Nations Charter, but many here hoped that the speech would contain a more forthright and dramatic declaration of Labor's willingness to abandon national armaments in favor of a really effective international security council monopolizing the control of the atomic bomb. The inference is that Cabinet policy on this overmastering issue is still undecided and warily watchful of developments in the political strategy of Russia. The slow formulation of the Cabinet's foreign policy is likely to disappoint left and resistance movements in Europe, which will listen vainly for the voice of comradeship. Significantly, Bevin is emphasizing with some astringency that Laski speaks only for himself in foreign affairs. On the Bretton Woods agreements and Britain's economic relations with the United States, the silence is discreetly unbroken.

The Last War Front

BY CHARLES G. BOLTE

[Mr. Bolté, The Nation's military critic, joined the British army before Pearl Harbor and fought as a lieutenant in North Africa. He is now president of the American Veterans' Committee.]

THE first global war in history has ended, abruptly and before we had any right to expect it to end, with total victory over our enemies. It was an unprecedented war: in the number of nations involved, in the number of fighting men who contested with one another, in the extent to which civilian populations were drawn into it, in the degree to which it was mechanized and made technological, in the number and degree of new weapons and tactical innovations, in its cost, in its brutality, in the refinements of its tortures, in the agony and suffering it caused, in the extent to which it dislocated the previous arrangements of civilization, and in the enormity of the problems of reconstruction and settlement of still unresolved conflicts it has left as legacy.

Now, after the flush of our first exultation in the magnitude of our victory, our thoughts turn naturally to the manifold problems of peace. Yet it may be useful to consider the manner of our victory. Much may depend on how well we study the lessons set forth by, or concealed within, the progress of the war.

To begin with, it must be said that Japan was not in any long-term sense a first-class power, and that in the long-term sense there was no real prospect that it could win the war. It lacked the industrial complex on which to base offensive blows powerful enough to defeat the United States alone, much less the combined might of the Anglo-American alliance, and still less the overwhelming combination of that alliance with the great strength of the Soviet Union. Yet, because of a very special set of circumstances unusually favorable to it, Japan in less than a year after Pearl Harbor was able to win its war. Winning its war meant for Japan the establishment of control over the great sweep of islands through the central and southwest Pacific to the East Indies, over the domain of Southeast Asia, and over the key industrial, agricultural, and commercial areas of northern and coastal China. Thus it achieved the empire which gave it the things it so sorely lacked in the home islands: space, raw materials for war, and a massive population which might be used in furthering its imperial aims.

But the winning of these things, grandiose and awe-inspiring as the accomplishment seemed at the time, represented merely the successful waging of a war of limited objective. That kind of war, in which the intention is to wrest some particular advantage or advantages from an enemy state or combination of enemy states, could be fought and won in the old days. In the middle of the twentieth century it is an impossibility in fact and a contradiction in terms. Total war involving the total resources of the nation, natural, human, and spiritual, can end only in total victory or total defeat. It was possible for Japan to win its war; it was not possible and never could have been possible for Japan to consolidate its victory. This may be set forth as a rule arising from the experience of this war: that wars of limited objective are no longer possible, and that the gaining of any ends through warfare can be accomplished only by totally defeating the enemy.

Japan was enabled to win even its limited objectives because of its enemies' preoccupation on the other side of the world. There were lesser contributing facts: Allied unpreparedness, the remoteness of the battlefield from the sources of Allied strength, the failure of white imperialism in the Far East (the one objective which the Japanese may have achieved permanently is a social, political, and economic rather than a military one: the expulsion of the white man from his position of overlord to brown and yellow men). These, except for the last, were temporary advantages. Germany was the more immediate threat, had more nearly won its war, and might yet have denied us our chance of getting onto the Continent; so the great military and political decision was made to concentrate on Germany first. Nevertheless, American resources and technological skill proved so abundant that the Japanese were halted and then started on the backward road even before the peak of our European effort was reached. It is probable that victory in Europe would have been won more quickly and cheaply if General Eisenhower had had at his disposal the landing craft, airplanes, and troops which were flowing in an ever-increasing stream to the Pacific; but it also seemed at the time, before the atomic bomb was a reality, that to follow this course of European concentration would have left the Japanese so much freedom to consolidate their gains that the eventual Pacific victory would have been long delayed. The event has proved the wisdom of the policy of concentrating on Germany while simultaneously pushing Japan's outposts back; it has also proved the unwisdom of Japan's hazard that its enemies would be too long occupied in Europe to interfere with its plans.

The flexibility of a well-integrated and diversified technological system, plus the resourcefulness of free men in a democratic society, quickly corrected the situation of Allied unpreparedness in the Far East. One of the greatest Japanese miscalculations, as it was one of the greatest German miscalculations, was the estimate of the democracies as being soft and decadent. Pearl Harbor put iron in the American fiber as Dunkirk put it in the British fiber: in both cases the psychological jolt set the wheels of production in motion, and turned non-militaristic peoples into most valiant fighting men.

Linked with production of matériel and activation of good fighting units, was transportation. Distance was the greatest enemy in the Pacific, and those who knew something of the problems of logistics felt very gloomy in the early years of the war when they looked at maps revealing the mileage between Detroit and Tokyo. A colossal effort in the field of civilian and military transportation, rail, sea, and air, and a revolution in the field of naval logistics, surmounted the barrier of mere miles. The radical innovation was the fleet train: the convoy of oilers, supply ships, and repair ships which followed the fleets into action, kept them in fighting form, and allowed them to stay in action thousands of miles from their bases for weeks at a time.

Thus Japan's initial advantages were overcome. As the war progressed, fatal flaws in its over-all war machine became apparent. Its troops, despite extraordinary devotion and a widespread belief that they went to some Japanese heaven quickest by dying for their Emperor, were almost invariably over-matched in battle with more inventive, better trained, and better equipped American troops who wished above all else to remain alive. Its aircraft, once they had lost the initial advantage of being more maneuverable, were easily destroyed, and had eventually to inflict their most serious damage by being piloted directly into their targets, in that strange and anti-human phenomenon we came to call kamikaze. The enemy's ships, for a time almost unchallenged on the Pacific, were out-maneuvered, out-fought, and finally almost eradicated by the sea-air forces of the United States Navy which, as the war drew to a close, was incomparably the most powerful navy the world has ever seen or will ever see again.

Despite the gains made in the middle years of the war, gains made possible by the great productive and transport power of the United States, and by the almost routine and universal bravery and skill of Allied fighting men engaged in the Pacific, Japan presented a formidable appearance as the European war ended. It had, considering the size and strength of the forces being marshalled against it, the appearance essentially of a power which needed to be mopped up, because it was severely weakened in important respects and possessed no military resources which would stave off defeat; yet its remaining resources—of which geography was still one of the most important—were such that the mopping up gave promise of being arduous and protracted. Its holdings were so far-flung that three relatively uncoordinated campaigns—the spearhead at Okinawa; the consolidation of our earlier gains in the southwest Pacific which had left many thousands of enemy troops by-passed; and the sprawling campaign in the Southeast Asia Command—were being waged against Japan. On the mainland of Asia the Japanese were just being pushed out of the most advantageous position they had ever held, with a land corridor from Korea to Singapore. Chinese forces were slowly staging a comeback, thanks to American training and the impetus of American supplies flowing in over the arduous hump route; but China, weakened by aggression and by savage internal discord, gave no promise of a major contribution for a long time. The best and most numerous Japanese troops were concentrated in the unweakened Kwantung Army in Manchuria and north China. The home islands, lashed by ever-larger fleets of B-29's, bombarded and strafed at close range by the guns and aircraft of the unchallenged Pacific Fleet, interdicted from communication with the southern empire and the mainland by an increasingly stringent air and sea blockade, were still relatively untouched by war: their difficult terrain and strong military forces forecast a savage and bloody battle against the imminent invasion from the American sea.

This was the situation when the Potsdam ultimatum was issued. The Allied leaders cannot seriously have thought that it would be accepted. Defeat was inevitable for Japan; it was inevitably bloody and costly for the Allies to achieve that defeat. When the ultimatum was spurned, the order went forth to drop the atomic bomb. With its use, every military consideration of ages past was made subject to drastic review, the political organization of the world was made obsolete, the social orientation of mankind was radically altered, and the moral imperatives we have accepted were put to their gravest test. The least effect of the use of atomic energy was the immediate Japanese surrender. The entry of the Soviet Union into the war, pledged at Potsdam and likely hastened by the affair at Hiroshima, was only the capstone on the event. No nation has yet shown itself prepared to accept self-immolation, even though some less final solution involves a diminution of national honor.

So the war ended: but it ended so soon and with so little material cost to us only because we accepted the consequences implicit in setting in train the vastest and most unpredictable revolution of our troubled planet.

The Story of the PC 1264

BY ERIC PURDON

FIFTEEN months ago a lean new submarine chaser lay moored to Pier 42 in New York City. A little less than 180 feet long, she awaited the dedication that would make her the newest unit of Uncle Sam's fleet. The ship's company of sixty-six men stood rigid at salute, and with their friends and families on the dock watched the bright new ensign raised smartly to the flagstaff. The United States Ship PC 1264 was commissioned: the first minor warship to be manned by a predominantly Negro crew.

It is natural that this ship was destined to be watched with interest as a lesson in race relationships, not only by the navy, to whom it can mean a new source of manpower, but by all who want democracy to work. For here was a chance to see whether the familiar generalizations about the Negro are true. Basically the question early in 1944 was: "Can Negroes make good seamen?"

The "good" is important, for seagoing Negroes are not new in the history of the world. One made the first transatlantic crossing with Columbus; others fought in the embryo Continental navy—but how good they were as seamen I don't know. As commanding officer of the U. S. S. PC 1264, however, I know what a representative group has done in almost a year and a half of operations in all sorts of weather, in all sorts of sea, performing the duties of ships of our class: patrolling the sea lanes to search for and attack submarines, riding herd on the fat, slow, heavy-laden merchantmen plying the convoy routes.

When I assumed command on April 25 last year our complement consisted of five white commissioned officers, eight white leading petty officers, and fifty-three colored ratings and seamen. Geographically we were a typical American crew: there were men from the plains of the Middle West, the forests of the North, the cotton fields of the South, the ranches of the Far West; farm boys, garage mechanics, fishermen, mail clerks, stevedores, warehousemen—the oldest forty-four, the youngest seventeen.

The eight white petty officers were ordered to the ship primarily as instructors, for the strength of any fighting organization is in its non-coms. At that time Negroes hadn't held general rates long enough to have seagoing experience, irrespective of the lack of ships for them to serve in. For after the last war, when the armed forces were cut to peacetime strength, the only branch of the navy in which Negroes could enlist was the stewards'. General rates, such as boatswain, gunner's mate, and machinist, were closed to them until 1942. It was realized that experienced white men would be needed at the start; later, if Negroes were found to qualify as leading petty officers, the white personnel could be transferred and Negroes promoted to replace them. Within six months I was able to recommend that this change be effected. Today all petty officers and one commissioned officer are colored.

Of course, a few months' sea duty doesn't make a rounded seaman. There is always a lot to be learned, not only by the enlisted men but by the officers. The expansion of the service necessitated rapid learning, and I consider that the greatest secret weapon our country produced in this war was the development of intensive teaching methods that enabled us within a short time not only to man ships as they should be manned but to operate the many new scientific devices of modern warfare. Education is the secret of the PC 1264's success. Generalizations such as "Negroes haven't the capacity to learn" are nonsense. Give them the opportunity and they'll learn. In all the services the men who have caused disciplinary problems are largely those from poor communities where educational facilities—particularly for Negroes—are few or non-existent. When they have the opportunity and the incentive to learn, discipline takes care of itself.

When I was ordered to the ship, the racial problem was something with which I had not concerned myself. Enjoying the quiet life of an editor in a Northern publishing house before being called to active duty early in 1941, I had had practically no contact with Negroes. I knew there was a problem, just as I knew there was an Arab-Jew problem in Palestine and a Serb-Croat problem in the Balkans. All were beyond my personal orbit. I was perhaps typical of many white Americans. My duty aboard this vessel has convinced me that it is just this lack of knowledge that is the root of misunderstanding between the two peoples. When they are engaged in a common purpose misunderstanding disappears, and a new, usually surprising, realization takes its place—a realization summed up in the words of a Southern officer full of arguments for "white supremacy," who was a passenger for a short while: "Halfway through the trip I forgot they were black."

On the PC 1264 we learned to judge each other only as individuals. I remember a youngster I restricted to the ship for returning late from liberty. The following day he requested a transfer, because, he claimed, the crew was picking on him. I discovered that the crew had laughed at him for believing that he had been restricted because of his color. Soon he was laughing himself.

At one time we had delivered a convoy and were in a port awaiting the formation of a returning convoy. In a bar, some white sailors from a ship in our task group overheard some local civilian drunks discussing plans for an attack on "that nigger ship down at the dock." Quietly leaving, the sailors returned to their vessel, gathering shipmates en route and alerting the duty section aboard. Without a word to us, they made arrangements for what undoubtedly would have been an annihilation of any attacking force. Fortunately, nothing materialized, but the signficance is there, especially when you consider that no one on our ship even heard of the incident until six months later.

We have had a few unpleasant experiences, all but one caused by civilians, and all, strangely enough, during our first few months of duty. In each case it has turned out that the cause of the trouble did not lie with my men. A typical incident occurred when we were fueling from an oil dock: the manager disliked being advised of the positions of the intake valves by a thoroughly competent Negro engineer. All the incidents were similarly petty but none the less outrageous in terms of human feeling. I confess that they infuriated me far more than they appeared on the surface to hurt my men.

But respect for the U. S. S. PC 1264 has grown. We have done our duty well. We have great pride in our ship, the pride every sailor feels in a smart ship that can respond to the banshee wail of the general alarm and have every gun firing in a matter of seconds. Our pride was enhanced a few weeks ago by the tough inspection made by our frontier commander. In one short day, the inspection board flung problems at us; individual inspectors queried different men about their jobs; simulated battle situations were presented one after another. How the men reacted can best be illustrated by the answer a signalman made to the question: "What do you do when the ship is so badly iced up that the signal lights cannot be operated?" Without a moment's hesitation the signalman replied, "On this ship, sir, we never allow our lights to get in that condition."

The terse summation of the report was the answer to the question whether Negroes can make good seamen: "The response of the crew to Battle Stations and all Emergency Drills was outstanding. . . . The PC 1264 is reported to be in an effective state of readiness." Speaking for myself, I know of no other crew I'd rather have in combat.

In the Wind

REPRIEVE: The August 11 bulletin of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States had this to say about the splitting of the atom: "With the knowledge that this energy cannot at once be used for purposes other than destruction, immediate jeopardy to our economy is not in sight."

PUBLIC RELATIONS: Tide, an advertising trade publication, reported in its issue of August 6 that the National Association of Manufacturers, "which abandoned its last advertising campaign after a very short run, is considering a new series on a different subject." The old subject was Private Enterprise. It was dropped in February of this year, after a storm of protests from the public.

VISION: George Coppock of Detroit made this suggestion in a letter to the Windsor, Ontario, Star on August 8: "With proper organization and timing, from the bones of the Conservative Party and the futility of the Labor Party the British Fascist Party can come to power. 'Britons, myriad voices call thee, come be wedded each and all into one imperial whole!' There is a slogan for an imperial Fascist Party, a force which can save us from the night of communism. Conservatism is willing but ineffectual. Hail to an imperial Fascist Party! The stalwarts of the empire salute you!"

DRAMA: Harriet Van Horne of the New York World-Telegram, doing a post-mortem August 13 on Clare Luce's appearance in "Candida," reported that many rehearsals were held at Mrs. Luce's home. "Now and then, despite good intentions all around, a political note would creep in. Some of the actors were said to have suffered slight indigestion when the hostess—so goes the story—expressed concern over the fate of her old friend, M. Pierre Laval. But generally, everybody, including Candida herself, put up a gallant, nonpartisan front."

DETAIL: The Prague radio reports that at his preliminary questioning Karl Hermann Frank, former Gauleiter of Bohemia and Moravia, said Lidice was exterminated without his knowledge or consent. "Another question was, 'What do you know of the second act of extermination at Lezaky?' He replied that he remembered 'only vaguely.' 'After all,' he said, 'that was only a very small community.' "

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. We will pay $1 for each item accepted.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

POLITICAL WAR EDITED BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Exit the Marshal

BY FREDERIC POTTECHER

[M. Pottecher, before the war a member of the staff of Paris-Soir, was a prisoner in Germany in 1940; later, after escaping, he became editor of a clandestine newspaper in Corsica. He is at present in charge of shortwave broadcasts beamed from Paris to the Middle East.]

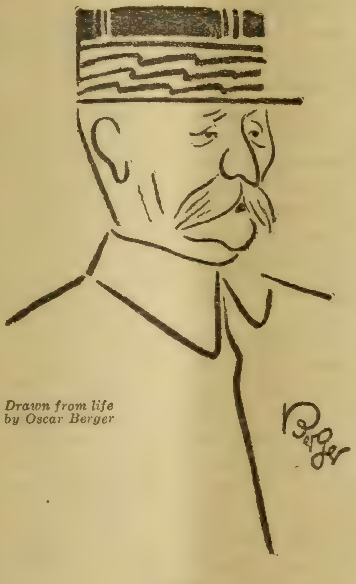
Paris, August 16 (By cable)

SO HE stands condemned, this man of fine demeanor. But we had heard too much about his blue eyes—blue like France's sky—his military bearing, his shrewd good sense. We heard too much when he reigned in Vichy of his habits of order, his method, his simplicity. We saw it was true during the long sessions of his trial. When he came into the packed chamber of the High Court with his quick step and impeccable marshal's uniform, he lived up to his legend. He took his place in the armchair reserved for him, placed his gloves, his gold-embroidered kepi, and his watch, ten minutes fast, on the little table, and waited. He listened closely, but dozed when the lawyers, witnesses, jurymen, and judges quarreled over a word or a minor point of procedure. So it was during each day of the trial.



Drawn from life by Oscar Berger

Pétain

His physical appearance, so unequivocal, made his presence the more tragic, for the Pétain trial was a trial of treason veiled with ambiguity. The witnesses for the prosecution were the most important. Reynaud, Daladier, Lebrun, Jeanneney, Herriot, all accused Pétain but had themselves to explain certain of their acts. When they stepped down all was not clear. The affair of the 1940 National Assembly? The coup d'état? The crime against the Republic? The arrest of Mandel? Yes, these facts are known, but agreement on the circumstances is impossible. Ambiguity had its place in the trial from the beginning.

Only Blum destroyed momentarily the Verdun legend. For a moment we felt delivered from the remains of the Pétain myth and hated this man whose blue eyes hid so well his black soul. We looked him in the face again, a face without lines as though cast in a mold of wax, a face that almost resembled the mask of a man already dead. He was listening, still cupping his ear. He had repeatedly denied hearing what was said, but one had the feeling that he heard what he wanted to, although sometimes he seemed to fall asleep. No one could be certain; there was ambiguity even there.

When the witnesses for the defense were called to the stand the second act of the drama began. Generals, admirals, former ministers, even Prince François Xavier de Bourbon-Parme, came to proclaim their varying degrees of attachment to "the Marshal." But between the first and second acts an apparition had appeared: Pierre Laval. A frightful spectacle was offered by the two men who then confronted one another: one was for many present the very image of the old and glorious French army—Pétain wore the Médaille Militaire, highest decoration conferred by the Third Republic on general officers—the other the very image of a suspect parliamentarian of the old regime. Laval was indeed the symbol of former parliamentary trash, ugly, flabby, unclean; his singsong voice the more unpleasant for its strong and vulgar regional accent. Laval pleaded neither for nor against Pétain but solely on his own behalf. "I am a good republican," he cried; and again, "I thought the best way to serve my country was to negotiate with the conqueror." He kept harping on his "negotiations." Apparently he believes sincerely that one can negotiate for anything. Honor and national pride are concepts of which Laval is unaware. His testimony was to have been sensational, but it was not.

The Court, awakened by the novelty of his appearance, turned glumly to the witnesses for the defense.

All these military men, and former Vichy ministers, except perhaps De Brinon, are still haunted by the Pétain myth. Certain of them displayed great sincerity. They asserted that the Marshal saved not only France but Russia, America, and the world. The fanatic General Lacaille in particular tried to convince the Court that the Marshal's double game saved North Africa from German occupation which would have prevented Allied landings in Algiers. Lacaille maintained that the Marshal was, therefore, the great artisan of victory. The speciousness of this reasoning is evident. Lacaille, who until recently commanded a division in the army of General de Lattre de Tassigny, was clearly incapable of understanding the meaning of the resistance movement: he could conceive only the supposed "tacit" resistance of Pétain. Thus the question came up of the "official secret army" of which Lacaille and other generals of the armistice army were the principal leaders. Questioned closely by the resistance jurors, Lacaille claimed he had cached enough arms to equip twenty-four divisions—"36 milliards' worth," he said. "For what or for whom did these arms serve?" His replies were unsatisfactory. One-third were captured by the Germans, one third may have been used by the Maquis, the rest are still hidden. In any case this general, like so many of his colleagues, clings to the belief that it was an official army with uniforms, cadres, and gold braid which saved France. He said nothing about the real resistance movement, the underground and the men who fought in it. Nor did he admit that the Vichy army did nothing or almost nothing to boot the Germans out of France. But Lacaille, like Prince François de Bourbon-Parme, who was interned in Dachau, like Monsieur Pinelli, former Deputy and municipal councillor of Paris, believes in good faith what he said.

Laval

Again the old ambiguity. Did Pétain really encourage this secret army? It is to be noted in any case that all witnesses for the defense defended chiefly the reactionary caste to which they belong, for it is certain that all the adulators of Pétain, whose patriotism cannot be denied, cling desperately to the Right. France's salvation affects them deeply; democracy's not at all. This is why they refuse to believe Pétain could have betrayed his country.

The prosecuting attorney general's indictment brought us out of these fictions back to realm of truth. He asked for the death penalty knowing what he risked by so doing, for like the resistance jurors he had received letters threatening him with death if Pétain should be condemned, letters signed "Franc-Garde du Maréchal." The indictment was precise, dignified, well thought out. So was the first speech for the defense delivered by M. Payen. There was a conspiracy against the Republic, said Attorney General Mornet. There was no conspiracy, retorted M. Payen. Again it is slightly ambiguous. M. Lemaire, third attorney for the defense, used another method; with wide gestures and in a loud voice he tried to play upon the emotions of the jurors. Unfortunately for him the jurors were former Maquisards, former F. F. I. section-leaders—not very sentimental. Next day M. Payen delivered his second speech, this time defending Vichy's foreign policy. His colleague, M. Isorni, second attorney for the the defense, endeavored to justify Pétain's internal policies. It was a clever job but still unconvincing. The president of the High Court, M. Mongibeaux, magnificent in red robes and ermine cape, smiled. His sentiments were easy to guess. As for Pétain, although remaining impassive he started once when he thought the defense had given up trying but quickly fell back to his enigmatic silence. At nine o'clock last Tuesday evening the defense rested its case. Defendant, judges, jurors, everyone was thoroughly tired. The jury's deliberations were about to begin. All eyes were fixed on Pétain. Will he speak? Pétain, who was thought to be at the end of his strength, rose and spoke. Once again he declared that his conscience was clear and that he believed he had served France well.

After seven hours of deliberation the jurors returned with the verdict. Pétain listened to their judgment but did not hear the words, "is condemned to the penalty of death, to national unworthiness, and to the confiscation of his worldly goods." He was led out and in the early hours of Wednesday morning one of the world's great trials was over. Today he occupies a cell, once Georges Mandel's, in the Fortress of Portalet in the Pyrenees. Since the jury recommended leniency Pétain will probably not be executed, but he has disappeared for good. Do those who were his followers realize now the wrong he did to France? It is not at all sure they do, for the Pétain legend even now has not been entirely extirpated.

German Unions Under Military Government

[Reprinted from The Tribune, London, July 27, 1945.]

EVIDENCE is accumulating on the extent to which German trade-union committees and Socialist and Communist groups survived the Hitler regime and the war. And the survival is on a far larger scale than official handouts and newspaper correspondents have led us to believe. Such groups have been found in literally all cities and industrial centers within the Anglo-American zone of occupation, and in many cases they have proved to be surprisingly coherent and well organized.

The trade-union committees consist generally of local pre-Hitler trade-union officials and shop stewards. Most of the latter were blacklisted and lost their jobs when the Nazis came to power; many of them spent long periods in jails and concentration camps. Those who remained free managed to eke out a precarious existence in new occupations— as soap or tobacco vendors, as gardeners, street cleaners, and the like. But throughout the years of the Hitler regime and the war they succeeded not only in maintaining local contacts with one another but in many cases even in maintaining national contacts.

In Frankfurt, for instance, thirty-five former trade-union officials were found to have survived and to have made full preparations for the reorganization of the unions. Of their former colleagues, 139 were killed either by the Nazis or by our bombs. A number of the survivors maintained secret contacts with the Berlin underground center of the Metal Workers' Union until as late as last September. Many of them had been closely associated with Leuschner in the preparation for the abortive attempt on Hitler's life a year ago.

Most of these men were former members of the free trade unions, but some of them come from the Catholic unions or the (democratic non-socialist) Hirsch-Duncker unions. They had already decided, at a secret conference held two years ago, that in the future post-Hitler Germany there should be a single non-political and non-denominational trade organization with membership open to all workers, employees, and civil servants.

Extensive and detailed plans have been worked out for the reorganization of the new united trade-union organizations and for the re-acquisition of the large funds, properties, and subsidiary organizations (such as workers' savings banks, building societies, etc.) which the Nazis stole from the unions. Whether or not any of these plans can be carried into practice depends, however, almost exclusively on the decisions of Allied Military Government.

In the absence of an agreed and sane Allied policy for Germany, a great deal is left to the discretion of the Military Government officers on the spot; and almost everything depends on the hazards of their individual ability, understanding, and political inclination. The result is their encouragement of trade-union reorganization in some areas and the gravest discouragement, if not actual suppression, in others.

In one case it happened that the pre-Nazi chairman of the shop-steward organization of one big factory—who throughout the last twelve years had maintained contact with the workers there although he was fired in 1933—approached the managing director of that firm on V-E Day plus one with the request that all Nazis in his firm should be immediately dismissed. He handed the managing director, who was not a Nazi, a list of 700 people—workers and clerks as well as managers—who were all active Party members. The managing director immediately complied and reinstated the old shop-steward leader. Military Government officers were unaware of what had happened until many weeks later.

In other cases, by contrast, Nazi managers and owners of factories, now working for the Military Government at reduced capacity, exploit this position systematically to dismiss leading anti-Nazi workers who have come into the open. And they suffer no interference from Military Government officers. The blackest spots in this respect are Bavaria, in the American zone, where a totally reactionary Catholic regime has been installed and all progressive anti-Nazi movements suppressed; and Westphalia, in the British zone.

The situation in Westphalia is particularly serious because of its importance as a coal-mining area. The chance of survival in the coming winter of probably millions of men and women all over Europe will depend, to a large extent, on our capacity to revive German coal production. Yet the rich Ruhr mines in Westphalia are producing very little coal, although they are technically more or less intact.

There are two chief reasons for this. One is the physical weakness of the miners, who are too hungry to be able to do much work. The other reason is their unwillingness to continue work under the hated Nazi owners and managers. There have been several miners' strikes since May, not against the occupation authorities, but against the Nazi bosses who continue to function as colliery managers under British protection. Chiefly responsible for this state of affairs is Lieutenant Colonel Thompson—known among his colleagues as Colonel "Blimp" Thompson—who has been put in charge of labor administration in Westphalia. His qualicatifion as administrator of miners and mining problems probably derives from his pre-war speculations in gold-mining shares.

The vast majority of the Ruhr miners have remained staunchly anti-Nazi. Many of them were known to the Nazi authorities as anti-Nazis, but they remained at liberty because they were indispensable to the German war effort. Many of them had their labor books stamped by the Nazis with the word Wehrunwürdig. That meant they were too dangerous politically to be allowed or forced to join the army. So strictly were they supervised that they were not allowed even to visit a friend or relative without previous permission from the police or without a Nazi escort. Yet now, after the Nazi defeat, they are supposed to work under the same bosses who were responsible for and organized their oppression.

It is certainly wrong that the job of dealing with such problems is left to various military Blimps who know nothing whatever about labor problems. The Americans have at least some trade unionists among their Military Government officials who deal with these questions, whereas, to our knowledge, there is not a single British trade unionist attached to the Military Government in the British zone. It is true that officers on the spot can deal only with local problems and have no influence on Allied over-all policy; but they could at least prevent such absurd and dangerous decisions as that originally made by the aforementioned Lieutenant Colonel Thompson, who wanted to ban all but the Catholic trade unions because, in his opinion, these were the only "non-political" ones.

There are even more serious issues at stake. Allied military authorities are at present considering plans to reinstate the big Ruhr industrialists as owners and responsible managers of their properties—men like Krupp, Stinnes, Thyssen, and others whose names have become symbols all over the world of German war-mongering and imperialism, of treachery and ruthless exploitation. If we want to smear the good name of Britain beyond repair this is exactly what we should do. If we want to make sure of a coal crisis in Germany—with all its consequences to Europe this winter—we could indeed not do better than to reinstate Thyssen and Krupp and Stinnes.

COMING IN THE NATION

THE NEW FRONTIERS OF SCIENCE
By J. D. Bernal, F.R.S

One of Britain's most distinguished scientists discusses the scientific and social implications of the atomic revolution.

CALIFORNIA LOOKS TO 1946
By Carey McWilliams

The Nation's* West Coast correspondent reports on the end of "the Hiram Johnson era" and reviews the interesting collection of candidates mentioned for the Senate election next year, including Orson Welles and Colonel Evans Carlson of "Carlson's Raiders."

BOOKS and the ARTS

F. SCOTT FITZGERALD

BY LIONEL TRILLING

"So be it! I die content and my destiny is fulfilled," said Racine's Orestes; and there is more in his speech than the insanely bitter irony that appears on the surface. Racine, fully conscious of this tragic grandeur, permits Orestes to taste for a moment before going mad with grief, the supreme joy of a hero: to assume his exemplary role.

THIS heroic self-awareness—André Gide speaks of it in his essay on Goethe—was granted to Scott Fitzgerald for what grim joy he might find in it. And perhaps it is a seal set upon his heroic status that he could utter his vision of his own fate, publicly and aloud and in Esquire, not only with no lessening but even with an enhancement of his dignity. Edmund Wilson has gathered together the several essays in which Fitzgerald examined his life in crisis and has published them, together with Fitzgerald's notebooks and some letters, as well as certain tributes and memorabilia, in a volume called, after one of the essays, "The Crack-Up."* It is a book filled with the grief of the lost and the might-have-been, with physical illness and torture of mind. Yet the heroic quality is so much here that it occurs to us to say, and not merely as something we would like to feel, but as the true expression of what we actually do feel:

Nothing is here for tears, nothing to wail
Or knock the breast, no weakness, no contempt,
Dispraise, or blame, nothing but well and fair,
And what may quiet us in a death so noble.

It is not what we may fittingly say on all tragic occasions, but the original occasion for these words is strikingly apt to Fitzgerald. Like Milton's Samson, he had the consciousness of having misused a gift of strength—"I had been only a mediocre caretaker . . . of my talent." And the parallel carries further, to the sojourn among the Philistines and even to the maimed hero exhibited and mocked for the amusement of the crowd—readers of the New York Evening Post of September 25, 1936, will remember a front-page feature story in which the sick and incoherent Fitzgerald was "interviewed" in a Southern nursing home, and they will find a special pleasure in the recovered poise and fortitude which marked Fitzgerald's words in the few but vindicated years that were left to him.

The root of Fitzgerald's heroism is to be found, as it often is in tragic heroes, in his power of love. Fitzgerald wrote much about love, he was preoccupied with it, but it is not merely where he is being explicit about it that his power appears. It is to be seen where eventually all a writer's qualities have their true existence, in his style. Even in Fitzgerald's early, cruder books, or even in his commercial stories, and even when the style is careless, there is a tône and pitch to the sentences which suggest his warmth and tenderness and, what is rare nowadays, his mildness without softness. In the equipment of the moralist and therefore in the equipment of the novelist, aggression plays an important part, and although it is of course sanctioned by the writer's moral intention and whatever truth of moral view he may have, it is often none the less fierce and even cruel. Fitzgerald was a moralist to the core—his desire to "preach at people in some acceptable form" is the reason he gives for not going the way of Cole Porter and Rogers and Hart: let us always remember how many real choices he was free and forced to make—and he was gifted with the satiric eye, yet we feel of him that he is more drawn to the celebration of the good than to the destruction of the bad. The satire is there, the attack is made. But Fitzgerald, we feel, did not attach himself to the good because that attachment would sanction his fierceness toward the bad; his first impulse was to love the good—and we feel this the more surely because we must be aware that he loved the good not only with his mind but also with his quick senses and his youthful pride.

He had but small impulse to blame. "Forbearance, good word," is one of the jottings in his notebook. When it came to blame, he preferred, it seems, to blame himself. He even did not much want to blame the world. Fitzgerald knew where "the world" was at fault. He knew that it was the condition, the field, of tragedy. He is always conscious of "what preyed on Gatsby, what foul dust floated in the wake of his dreams." But he never made out that the world imposes tragedy, either upon the heroes of his novels, whom he called his "brothers," or upon himself. When he speaks of his own fate, he does indeed connect it with the nature of the social world in which he had his early flowering, but he never finally lays it upon that world, even though at the time that he was most aware of his destiny it was fashionable with minds more pretentious than his to lay all personal difficulty whatever at the door of the "social order." It is his fate—and as much as to anything else in Fitzgerald, we respond to the delicate tension he maintained between the sense of personal free will and the sense of circumstance: we respond to that moral energy. ". . . The test of a first-rate intelligence," he said, "is the ability to hold two opposed ideas in the mind, at the same time, and still retain the ability to function."

The power of love in Fitzgerald, then, went hand in hand with a sense of personal responsibility and perhaps created it. But it often happens that the tragic hero can conceive and realize a love that is beyond his own prudence or beyond his power of dominance, so that he is destroyed by the very thing that gives him status and stature. From Proust we know about a love that is destructive by its corrosive nature. But from Fitzgerald's two mature novels, "The Great Gatsby" and "Tender Is the Night," we learn of a love—perhaps, in its ideal, peculiarly American—that is destructive by its tenderness. It begins in romance, sentiment, even "glamor"—no one, I think, has remarked how innocent of mere "sex," how charged with sentiment is Fitzgerald's description of love in the jazz age—and it takes upon itself reality and permanence and duty discharged with an almost masochistic scrupulousness of honor. In bright dreams begins the responsibility which needs so much prudence and dominance to sustain; and Fitzgerald would seem not to have been a prudent man and he tells us that at a certain point in his college career "some old desire for personal dominance was broken and gone." He connects that loss of dominance with his ability to write and he set down in his notebook the belief that "to record one must be unwary."

---

* The Crack-Up. By F. Scott Fitzgerald. With other Uncollected Pieces, Note-Books and Unpublished Letters, Together with Letters to Fitzgerald from Gertrude Stein, Edith Wharton, T. S. Eliot, Thomas Wolfe, and John Dos Passos, and Essays and Poems by Paul Rosenfeld, Glenway Wescott, John Dos Passos, John Peale Bishop, and Edmund Wilson. Edited by Edmund Wilson. New Directions. $3.50.

The phrase from Yeats, the connection of the "dreams" with the "responsibility," reminds us that we must guard against dismissing, with easy words about its immaturity, Fitzgerald's preoccupation with the bright charm of his youth; for Yeats himself, a wiser man and wholly fulfilled, kept to the last of his old age his connection with his vanity of youth. A writer's days must be "bound each to each" by his sense of his life, and Fitzgerald the undergraduate was father of the best in the man and the novelist.

His sojourn among the Philistines is always much in the mind of everyone who thinks about Fitzgerald and indeed it was always much in his own mind. Everyone knows the famous exchange between Fitzgerald and Ernest Hemingway (Hemingway refers to it in his story, The Snows of Kilimanjaro, and Fitzgerald records it in his notebook) in which, to Fitzgerald's remark, "The very rich are different from us," Hemingway replied, "Yes, they have more money." It is usually supposed that Hemingway had the better of the exchange and quite settled the matter. But we ought not to be too sure. The novelist of a certain kind, if he is to write about social life, must always risk a certain ambiguity in his social attitudes. The novel took its rise from a sense of a disrupted society and from the interpenetration of classes, and the novelist must still live by his sense of class differences and must be absorbed by them, as Fitzgerald was, even though he despise them, as Fitzgerald did.

But the "very rich" were more for Fitzgerald than a field of social observation. They were all the aristocracy that America could offer him and we cannot be too simple about what a critic has recently noted, the artist's frequent "taste for aristocracy, his need—often quite open—of a superior social class with which he can make some fraction of common cause—enough, at any rate, to account for his own distinction." And despite the immunity to all worldly considerations which is of course the free privilege of every reader, must we not admit that there is a special charm in the writers who snatched at social establishment, in those risen gentlemen, Shakespeare and Dickens, in those fabricators of the honorific "de," Voltaire and Balzac? Their snobbery—let us call it that—is of a large and generous kind and we cannot be entirely wrong in connecting their peculiar energies of mind in creation with whatever it was they wanted from gentility or aristocracy. Yeats, to mention him again, spoke of the falseness of the belief that the "inherited glory of the rich" really holds richness of life—"Mere dreams! mere dreams!" he said:

> Yet Homer had not sung
> Had he not found it certain beyond dreams
> That out of life's own self-delight had sprung
> The abounding glittering jet. . . .

And Henry James, at the threshhold of his career, allegorized in his story, Benvolio, the interplay that is necessary for some artists between their creative asceticism and the bright, free, gay world, noting at the same time the desire of the bright world to destroy the asceticism.

With a man like Goethe the balance between the world and his asceticism is maintained, and so we forgive him his often absurd feelings (but perhaps absurd only in the light of our present opinion of his assured genius) about aristocracy. Fitzgerald could not always keep the balance true; he was not, as I have said, a prudent man. And no doubt he deceived himself a good deal in his youth, but certainly his self-deception was not in the interests of vulgarity, for aristocracy meant to him a kind of distinction of personal existence which, presumably, he was so humble as not to expect from his art. That this was so we can learn from the hero of one of his Saturday Evening Post stories for whom "it was not so bad—except that when the infantry came limping back from the trenches he wanted to be one of them. The sweat and mud they wore seemed only one of those ineffable symbols of aristocracy that were forever eluding him."

I am aware that I have involved Fitzgerald with a great many great names and that it might be felt by some that this can do Fitzgerald no service, the disproportion being so large. But I think the disproportion will seem large only to those who think of Fitzgerald chiefly through his early, public legend of heedlessness; those who have a clear recollection of the mature work or who have read "The Crack-Up" will at least not think of the disproportion as one of kind. Fitzgerald himself did not, and it is by a man's estimate of himself that we must begin to estimate him. For all the engaging self-deprecation which was part of his peculiarly American charm, he put himself, in all modesty, in the line of greatness, he judged himself in a large way. When he writes of his depression, of his "dark night of the soul" where "it is always three o'clock in the morning," he adduces Wordsworth, Keats, and Shelley. A novel with Ernest Hemingway as the model of its hero suggests to him Stendhal portraying the Byronic man, and he defends "The Great Gatsby" from some stricture of Edmund Wilson's by comparing it with "The Brothers Karamazov." Or again, here is the stuff of his intellectual pride at the very moment that he speaks of giving it up as he had given up the undergraduate dreams of valor: "The old dream of being an entire man in the Goethe-Byron-Shaw tradition . . . has been relegated to the junk heap of the shoulder pads worn for one day on the Princeton freshman football field and the overseas cap never worn overseas." And it was by no means, in its magnitude, an unjustified dream. To take but one great name, the one that on first appearance seems the least likely —between Goethe at twenty-four with "Werther" and Fitzgerald at twenty-four with "This Side of Paradise" there is really not so entire a difference as piety and textbooks might make us think, both young men so handsome and ridiculously successful, both rather more interested in life than in art, each the spokesman and symbol of his restless young generation.

It is now twenty years since T. S. Eliot said of "The Great Gatsby" that it was "the first step that American fiction has taken since Henry James"; and although "Tender Is The Night" is not in every way a success, it is another step and it embodies the great conception of the novel to a degree that few American books can match. To read the notebooks that Fitzgerald kept—indexing them in the manner he had learned from Samuel Butler's—and to perceive how closely they make us apply our mind to our life, or to read his letters to his daughter (they are among the best and most affecting letters I know) and hear his tone as he writes about literature, the tone of a master among equals, is to be happily sure of his quality.

He lacked prudence, as his heroes did, lacked that blind instinct of self-protection which the self-fulfilling writer needs and which the American writer seems to need in a double measure. But that is all that he lacked—and it is the generous fault, even the heroic fault. He said of his Gatsby:

> If personality is an unbroken series of successful gestures, then there was something gorgeous about him, some heightened sensitivity to the promises of life, as if he were related to one of those intricate machines that register earthquakes ten thousand miles away. This responsiveness had nothing to do with that flabby impressionability which is dignified under the name of "the creative temperament"—it was an extraordinary gift for hope, a romantic readiness such as I have never found in any other person and which it is not likely I shall ever find again. No—Gatsby turned out all right at the end; it is what preyed on Gatsby, what foul dust floated in the wake of his dreams. . . .

And it is so that we are drawn to see Fitzgerald as he stands in his "exemplary role."

BRIEFER COMMENT

Where Realists Meet

THERE IS ONLY ONE THING WRONG about David J. Dallin's very readable book, "The Big Three" (Yale University Press, $2.75). It is the first paragraph: "There shall not, there must not, be a Third World War. The piled-up corpses already reach the sky," etc. After this outburst of wishful thinking and tear-drenched sentimentality, Dallin reverts to sound realism of the Homer Lea, Halford Mackinder kind: there is nothing in this world but power, and power leads inevitably to armed conflict. The book simply lists a large number of sore spots, each likely to infect the whole body.

Dallin has no remedy to offer. He came to us after a long and tragic experience abroad. He met, I surmise, a number of tough journalists, and maybe a few Yale or Columbia professors, tougher still. They confirmed him in his "muscular" thinking. He does not know us well enough to realize that in due course the people will have the last word, and that the American people want peace and justice, not empire.

The limitations being granted—the book is elementary in thought and information—the presentation of the facts is both fair and clear. Every state is presented in the sharp and morose light of Realpolitik, and Russia is no worse than ourselves. In cauda venenum: in the conclusion, there is more than a hint that the disturbing element is the U. S. S. R.; and that it is high time for England and America to take up the work of Hitler and Franco, so unfortunately interrupted. But this is a strong hint, not a thesis.

At any rate, it is not the logical conclusion of the book. The final paragraph should be a complete reversal of the first: "There shall be, there must be, a Third World War, and so ad infinitum." But the book is thoroughly honest in its narrow way; the style is pleasing, half-way between the journalistic and the historical. As I enjoyed "The Big Three," I should like to close this dubious appraisal with two points which I whole-heartedly indorse (realists of various schools do meet in the end): "Europe needs German industry; without the economy of her most industrialized nation, Europe will be the poorer." "The predominance of the Big Three cannot be durable. A wartime combination, it will end soon after the war."

ALBERT GUERARD

Latin-American Writing

AT LEAST SINCE the moment when cultural relations with South American countries became of official interest to the American government, it has been considered a sign of intellectual immaturity to talk of the Southern continent as a whole. The recognized mark of wisdom in these matters has become an insistence upon differentiation between the various nations. Not only do the knowing refrain from mentioning Mexico and Argentina in the same breath, they even distinguish between types of folk songs, for instance, in such neighboring microcosms as Honduras and Costa Rica, or between the development of prose styles in Colombia and Ecuador.

Now comes the distinguished scholar Pedro Henríquez-Ureña and reverses the process in his "synthetic" history, "Literary Currents in Hispanic America" (Harvard, $3.50) which his publisher sub-titles "A cultural survey of Latin America from the time of the Conquistadores to the present." Perhaps because Señor Henríquez-Ureña was born offshore, in the small island republic of Santo Domingo, he prefers to look at the Latin-American portion of the hemisphere whole. Even the fact of its two languages, Spanish and Portuguese, fails to shake his calm consideration of its literary currents in terms of "our America," "our literature," "our development." Separate countries he treats as chance geographic units whose borders are matters of historical accident. The important thing to him is their common Hispanic background and the currents related to a common "search for expression."

The result of this heresy is an urbane, scholarly, and seasoned work of a quality hitherto unknown in English writings on this subject. The author treats of Latin-American literature as though it was as much a part of the stream of world literature as anything written in England, France, or Russia. He presents Hispanic-American writers not as clever children or sublime geniuses—two classifications hitherto favorites among critics—but as talented men seeking the forms of expression suited to their needs. His history has form, substance, wit, authority. It gives literature its proper status as a generic part of the development of civilization in the southern hemisphere.

The book is made up of eight lectures delivered at Harvard during the winter of 1940-41, given at the invitation of the university as the Charles Eliot Norton lectures. The author then spent two and a half years rewriting them, enlarging their scope, adding valuable notes which form more than a quarter of the book. The fact that the chapters were first written to be read before a specific audience of intelligent and literate listeners may be responsible for a certain directness, vigor, and simplicity of address which are too seldom found in books on this subject.

Perhaps, considering all that Don Pedro has given us here, it is ungrateful to ask for more. Yet this book, with its sound background, broad vision, and brilliant understanding, merely whets one's appetite. MILDRED ADAMS

The Conditions of Peace

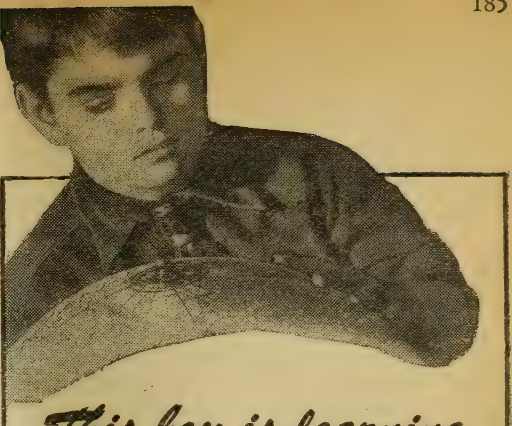
"TOTAL WAR AND THE HUMAN MIND," by Major A. M. Meerloo (International Universities Press, $1.75), is another of the Ersatz miscellanies that the war has produced; but, aside from its extreme brevity, it has a good deal to recommend it. The major, a medical officer in the Dutch army, was in Holland during two of the agonizing years of German occupation, and his book is a mixture of reminiscences, exhortations, and rather interesting reflections on the psychological aspects of the war. He has nothing particularly new to say, and he cannot in such brief compass deal adequately with any of the topics he treats. He furthermore goes in on occasion for the self-assured, dogmatic oversimplification that mars so much psychiatry. Nevertheless he writes for the most part with the clarity, simplicity, and temperateness that denote an exceptional command of one's subject; and he offers a number of salutary reminders: "The criminal hankers after his own punishment. . . . If this is applied to Germany, the inference must follow that before there can be any question of reformation or reeducation, there must be punishment. . . . The world [may be] lost through the vicious circle in which fear inspires aggressiveness, aggressiveness brings a sense of guilt, and guilt seeks an outlet in more aggressiveness."

Major Meerloo seems to subscribe to William James's view that the best way to learn about the normal is to study the abnormal, for he says that "to the psychologist abnormal circumstances are in the nature of experiments which history applies to humanity." The experimental situation is of necessity—that is, by definition—an abnormal one, and it is obviously true, however regrettable, that war is the best lesson in the nature and conditions of peace. The Major steps out of character, therefore, when he quotes some Dutch lawyer to the effect that "one should at no time discuss the law with a criminal." Prudent as it is, this is hardly in the spirit of James, nor is it consistent with the Major's commitment to "science."

If the book has a thesis, it is the astute, highly liberal one that the best mithridate against fanatical or obsessive behavior of any sort is the maximum voluntary intercourse of free people; for "when thinking is isolated and can no longer expand, delusion may follow." The book should be read on that account alone. MARTIN LEBOWITZ

Roadway to Brooklyn

IN "THE BUILDERS OF THE BRIDGE" (Harcourt, Brace, $3.50) D. D. Steinman tells the story of one of the



This boy is learning to live democracy!

He is a typical youngster from Springfield, Massachusetts, where —for the past ten years—people of many national and racial origins have been making democracy work. This is their exciting story, told in sparkling text and sixty-one beautiful action photographs.

"The Springfield plan has given us a great American invention, as American and as vital to world progress as the steamboat, the telegraph or the electric light. Now, in this book, we have the blueprint from which each of us can build the new 'democracy-machine' which is the Springfield plan."—REX STOUT.

At all booksellers $2.50

BY

Alexander Alland and James Waterman Wise

THE Springfield Plan

THE VIKING PRESS

seven wonders of the world with easy-to-read authority. Since he is an accomplished engineer himself, Mr. Steinman is in a position to appreciate the work of John A. Roebling and his son August and their almost insurmountable difficulties in building the Brooklyn Bridge. In addition, there are enough photographs, drawings, and engravings to make an interesting visual commentary on the great amount of material gathered. J. S.

Farmers and Industry

THE PROBLEM of food and farmers is admittedly difficult and complicated. The public mind has been confused by the behavior of the farm bloc, in wartime and earlier, and by the crop-reduction program of the government when faced by the severity of the great depression. For crop reduction in the face of hunger is one of the curious phenomena of our scarcity economics. In "The Farmer and the Rest of Us" (Atlantic Monthly Press Book, Little, Brown, $2.50) Arthur Moore goes to the root of the matter, bringing considerable order into the growing popular discussion of food and agriculture.

"The Farmer and the Rest of Us" is based on the assumption that farming is making its adjustments to the predominantly industrial culture of today, and because of this overall concept of the problem, the book comes clean on such difficult matters as the relation between farmers and organized labor, the wasteful and destructive use of soil resources in America, our growing tenancy, the growth of bigness on the one hand and poverty on the other, and the sense of insecurity among farm people even under the conditions of wartime profits. As a farmer I began Mr. Moore's book with a good many misgivings. I felt his judgments would be based too largely on his experience among the large corn growers of Illinois, and that he would see the situation in terms of price and profits as does the leadership of the farm organizations to which these growers often belong. I have finished it, however, feeling that Mr. Moore has presented not only a very fair and reasonable discussion of the farm problem in modern America, but an exceedingly provocative one.

The author asks the question: "Shall we learn to balance our food account with our permanent resources, land and human?" We must develop a permanent agriculture if we are to feed ourselves adequately and remain a great nation. And I take it he means by a permanent agriculture not only a system of farming the land which will maintain its fertility, but likewise an integration of the rural and urban people in an industrial society which will bring them security and a higher standard of life.

Human Events reprints

ROBERT M. HUTCHINS'

two vitally important addresses

V-E DAY: Delivered May 8, 1945. A courageous plea for a morally sound intelligent approach to the proposed New World.

THE NEW REALISM: Delivered June 15, 1945, before the graduating class of the University of Chicago. An indictment of the current "realism," with a clear definition of the truly real, basic issues at stake today.

Now available in a single convenient pamphlet. . . .

Single copies twenty cents, eight for one dollar, twenty for two dollars, one hundred for eight dollars, postpaid. Prices for larger quantities on request.

Human Events, Inc.

2100 South Jefferson Street Chicago 16, Illinois

Mr. Moore knows that this will not be easy to achieve, and he goes into a great many phases of the problem from public policy to a discussion of the farm organizations as pressure groups. His viewpoint is from the city and he is talking to city people in the main about a subject on which there is need for understanding. Moreover, the clear, easy, and lively style of the book should make it available to a large number of Americans who know now, after their war experience, that food is important and, for a great complexity of reasons, often difficult to get.

P. ALSTON WARING

Without the Law

DR. W. E. B. DU BOIS'S "Color and Democracy: Colonies and Peace" (Harcourt, Brace, $2) is timely and important in that it draws attention to a problem which has received far too little attention from liberals and which, one feels, was given scant attention at San Francisco and preceding United Nations conferences. There can be no secure foundation for peace, the author argues, unless the rights of colonial peoples are given effective status. It is not simply a question of supporting all national struggles for independence, but of deliberately and freely granting constructive aid to the colonial peoples so that they may become truly free. A simple maintenance of the old hypocritical mandates policy would be fatal.

Dr. Du Bois argues with much cogency, though many of his statements, as isolated assertions, are unacceptable to this reviewer. The author's indeterminate philosophy is responsible for this. He addresses himself to the reader in two polemical languages, one inflected by the author's warm and somewhat uncritical admiration for the U. S. S. R. and its policies, the other being the natural language of a vigorous, non-revolutionary liberal of native stock. But this criticism should not be allowed to obscure the fact that the book's message is fundamental, not merely to an honest liberalism but to any lasting solution of the problem of war and peace.

RALPH BATES

Milton and Eliot

T. S. ELIOT AND HIS SATELLITES effected a revolution in taste as well as poetry. In the last few years such assured stars as Goethe and Milton have paled under the glorification of Dante and Donne. Goethe is called a great man who aside from a few lyrics did little to prove it, and Milton is said to have manufactured beautiful music around a mythology that should have stayed in the Book of Genesis. Douglas Bush in "Paradise Lost in Our Time" (Cornell University, $2) analyzes some of the reasons for this and gives us a critical defense of Milton.

The book is in part a polemic against Eliot. In the first place, modernist taste for metaphysical poetry, "poetry which simultaneously embraces diverse planes of experience," is chiefly an apologetic for modernist poetry, which attempts the same thing. Certainly Eliot's poetry needs no such apology, and why, Mr. Bush asks, does appreciation of one kind of poetry demand rejection of another? Many modern poets, Allen Tate and John Crowe Ransom, for example, have expressed a great admiration for Milton, and Eliot himself coupled Milton and Shakespeare as our two greatest poets.

In the second place, the anti-Miltonists reject "Paradise Lost" because upon misreading it they find its morality and theology odious. It all starts with Satan's first speech, which a satanic modern society interprets as a bit of magnificent heroism. Mr. Bush insists that quite the contrary is true. Satan is not a hero but the seven deadly sins personified. Perhaps Milton thought so, but to me Satan is a tragic hero despite Mr. Bush's careful textual analysis to prove the contrary. That kind of analysis is a dangerous thing anyway; it reminds me of—I think it was Samuel Butler, who proved that Lucy Grey was someone Wordsworth had murdered.

I must take issue with Mr. Bush on another, more important point. One of the leaders of the anti-Milton movement is Ezra Pound. Mr. Bush uses this as a weapon in Milton's defense with a syllogism that runs something like this: Ezra Pound hates Milton, Ezra Pound is a fascist, therefore Milton is good. Mr. Bush should be ashamed of himself. That Pound is a foolish man politically has nothing to do with the fact that he is an astute critic and one of the major poets of our time.

For the most part the book is intelligent, healthy counter-criticism to the current praise for the modern metaphysical school of poetry.

JOHN SENIOR

FICTION IN REVIEW

ROBERT HENRIQUES, author of "No Arms, No Armour" and "The Voice of the Trumpet," has a new novel, "Home Fires Burning" (Viking, $2.50), about the post-war world. It is a theme we can no doubt expect to see explored very frequently in fiction, now that hostilities cease. But as a matter of fact, Mr. Henriques's story doesn't even wait on the termination of hostilities to set the wheels of domestic trouble in motion: victory is still only in sight when his England faces the difficulties of adjusting her fighting population to her civilians, her civilians to her fighters. The main thread of the novel is concerned with the reunion of a nice girl, Jane, a war nurse, with her childhood sweetheart, David Sloane, a distinguished writer before the war and a distinguished soldier in the war—until he was shot in the leg and head. The leg wound has healed but the head wound has laid bare the other side of David's personality; a brain concussion turns a seeming liberal into a dangerous fascist, and it is the point, of course, of Mr. Henriques's book that the returning troops are potential fascist material. Happily, at the end of the story, a sounder political thinking than David's is shown to prevail—that of David's unglamorous brother, Robert, and of Bill, the natural leader of the four returned soldiers with whom Jane has taken up on a railway platform. Of this symbolical quartet (they remind us of the drifting spirits that people a Prokosch novel), only another head-wound case is willing to follow David, but we are given to understand that even the mentally ill will also eventually prefer the direction of the Roberts and Bills of England to that of the Davids.

What Critics Say

about "Conspiracy in ALGIERS"

"'Conspiracy in Algiers' . . . is the most complete and informative report we have yet had. And though it reads like a detective story with bizarre plots and counter-plots and as fine an assortment of rogues, condottieri and ignoramouses as you are likely to find in a dozen books of fiction, Mme. Gosset manages skillfully to keep the emphasis in her book on the political significance of the events she describes. . . . For a dollar, it is the buy of the season."

WILLIAM L. SHIRER
N. Y. Herald Tribune, Aug. 12, 1945

"This book is the first to explain what really went on in Algiers. Why was Darlan brought to the spot? Why was he allowed to order resistance of American troops? Why was he condoned as the scion of Vichy? Why was he allowed the privilege of not only saving his neck, but ruling North Africa when every sane citizen expected him to be shot for a double traitor the morning after the landing? President Truman should read this book and act."

STERLING NORTH
New York Post, Aug. 2, 1945

"The war has provided some examples of pretty good history written at full gallop. 'Conspiracy in Algiers' belongs in any selection, whether for readability or for content."

EDWIN H. BLANCHARD
New York Sun, July 27, 1945

"As a novel the story Renée Gosset tells in 'Conspiracy in Algiers' would seem incredible. As history, spiced with gossip and Gaullic wit, it is at once convincing and important. . . . Robert Murphy is today directing American policy in Germany. That gives Mme. Gosset's story, so excitingly and intimately told, more than dramatic significance. I hope President Truman and Secretary Byrnes read it."

LEWIS GANNETT
New York Herald Tribune, July 26, 1945

The Nation's limited edition of "Conspiracy in Algiers" is rapidly selling out. If you act at once you may still be able to secure a copy of this exciting and significant book, at the cost price of

Only $1

POST PAID

Use This Convenient Order Form

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

Please send me, postpaid, ... copies of "Conspiracy in Algiers," at the cost price of $1.00 per copy. I enclose my check of $..

Name..

Street..

City.................................... Zone............ State....................

8-25-45

MOTION PICTURES

WARNER BROS.' MAGNIFICENT
RHAPSODY IN BLUE
"IT'S GEORGE GERSHWIN'S JUBILANT STORY!"
NOW HOLLYWOOD THEATRE

Barbara STANWYCK • Dennis MORGAN
Sydney GREENSTREET
IN WARNER BROS. NEW HIT!
"CHRISTMAS IN CONNECTICUT"
In Person! ERSKINE HAWKINS
And His Orchestra
Also In Person—THE CHARIOTEERS
BEN CARTER and MANTAN MORELAND
B'WAY STRAND

ALHAMBRA
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
COLISEUM
81st STREET
86th STREET
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
58th STREET
HAMILTON
MARBLE HILL
125th STREET
PELHAM
REGENT
RIVERSIDE
ROYAL
23rd STREET
WESTCHESTER
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCHELLE
WHITE PLAINS
YONKERS

NOW RKO
"A supreme production . . . both beautiful and good." —PM
BETTE DAVIS
"THE CORN IS GREEN"
with
John Dall • Joan Lorring • Nigel Bruce • Rhys Williams
From the stage play by EMLYN WILLIAMS
—PLUS—
"HITCHHIKE TO HAPPINESS" with AL PEARCE

BETTY HUTTON
ARTURO DE CORDOVA
In Paramount's
"INCENDIARY BLONDE"
In Technicolor
with Charles Ruggles
Barry Fitzgerald • Maurice Rocco

In Person!
"The Hour of Charm"
All-Girl Orch.
Under the Direction of Phil Spitalny
With
Evelyn • Jeannie
Francine • Viola
Mack Triplets
All American Glee Club • Imogene Coca

NOW PLAYING PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

So brief a synopsis of "Home Fires Burning" is sufficient to indicate, I think, its diagrammatic program—its proper democratic intention and its not very fresh approach to a persisting political problem. In itself, program writing of this sort is not to my fictional taste, and I find even less attractive the over-poetical atmosphere in which Mr. Henriques projects his problem—the fancies of prose and the tangle of time-sequences which is a device for suggesting complications of thought which aren't actually there. Nor do Mr. Henriques's observations upon the mood of the homecoming soldiers coincide with my own admittedly limited observation of their emotional temper. It is not at all my experience that the returned soldier is bitterly antagonistic to civilians or lawless in his personal social behavior; quite the contrary, he seems to me only to be modestly eager to resume his place in the world he left behind. And although I can easily imagine divergences from this observed attitude, my imagination is not fortified by either Mr. Henriques's particularizations or his implied generalizations.

DIANA TRILLING

CONTRIBUTORS

LIONEL TRILLING, assistant professor of English at Columbia University, is the author of "Matthew Arnold" and "E. M. Forster."

ALBERT GUERARD is professor of comparative and general literature at Stanford University. Among his books are "Literature and Society" and "The France of Tomorrow."

MILDRED ADAMS, a close student of Spanish and Spanish-American literature, has translated a number of political works into English.

MARTIN LEBOWITZ has contributed to the Journal of Philosophy and the Kenyon Review.

P. ALSTON WARING is a Pennsylvania farmer and co-author of a book on the small farm, "Roots in the Soil."

STAGE PLAY

MICHAEL TODD Presents
UP IN CENTRAL PARK
Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS
Lyrics by DOROTHY FIELDS
Music by SIGMUND ROMBERG
BROADWAY THEATRE, Broadway & 53rd Street. Matinees Wed. & Sat.
REALLY AIR-CONDITIONED

The New Statesman and Nation
England's Leading Weekly Review
may now be obtained through
THE NATION
20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.
Yearly subscription $6.50 including postage
SPECIMEN copy on request

Music

B. H. HAGGIN

INCREASING age has not affected Toscanini's powers as conductor and musician. Not only did last year's performances with the N. B. C. Symphony have the same unique qualities of sharpness of contour, exquisite inflection of phrase, transparency of texture, and organic coherence, but some of them, like the one of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, showed further development and reached new heights of effectiveness and power. And at the New York Philharmonic Pension Fund concert—at which he chose to repeat the program of his very first concert with the orchestra in 1926 and his last Thursday-Friday pair in 1936—it was, miraculously, as though one were sitting in Carnegie Hall in January, 1926, or April, 1936, and hearing what one had heard then, but with the wonderful qualities of the performances even more wonderful than they had been. The mercurial darting about of Haydn's mind in the finale of the "Clock" Symphony was pointed up by even greater sharpness of inflection; the organic proportions of the Siegfried's Death music from "Götterdämmerung" were molded in a way that achieved an even more shattering climax.

Also one heard again the great New York Philharmonic Orchestra of 1936, miraculously brought to life for this one concert. And in this way Toscanini once more proved Virgil Thomson's statements about the Philharmonic to be the fantastic nonsense they have been.

It was Thomson's contention, in 1941, that the Philharmonic musicians had been "so thoroughly guest-conducted for twenty years now that they have become temperamental, erratic"; and the "twenty years now" made it clear that he did not mean only what had happened in 1940-41, when Barbirolli, after three seasons as full-time permanent conductor, had shared the season with Bruno Walter, Mitropoulos, and Damrosch, or what was going to happen in 1941-42, when the season would be shared by Barbirolli, Stokowski, Walter, Rodzinski, Mitropoulos, Fritz Busch, Koussevitsky, Damrosch, and Goossens. No, Thomson meant the years when the orchestra had been conducted for long periods of the season by Mengelberg and Furtwängler, then by Mengelberg and Toscanini; even the few years when it had been conducted for twenty weeks of the season by Toscanini. And his contention was that not even Toscanini, conducting the orchestra for ten years, anywhere from ten to twenty weeks each year, had been able to mold it into an instrument expressive of himself, to impose on it a discipline, a style, an individuality which it would retain, as did Stokowski's Philadelphia or Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony, when it played under other conductors. Only in the last two years, Thomson has maintained recently, has this been achieved at last by Rodzinski.

Now Toscanini's recordings with the New York Philharmonic give evidence of his having made it an instrument expressive of himself; for they reproduce the characteristic and unique contours, inflections, and textures that are to be heard in any performance of his with any orchestra. But with no orchestra that he has conducted since 1936—not even with the greatest of them, the Philadelphia—has he produced the Toscanini style raised to the point of sheer incandescence that one hears in his recorded Philharmonic performances of the Overtures to "Semiramide" and "L'Italiana in Algieri." That is because his years with the Philharmonic created a hand-in-glove relation between them that he has not been able to create to the same degree with any orchestra since —the kind of relation that existed between Stokowski and the Philadelphia and Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony. The Philharmonic was sensitized to Toscanini's direction in exactly the phenomenal way the Philadelphia was to Stokowski's, the Boston Symphony to Koussevitzky's; and under this direction it had a discipline, a style, a sound as individual as those of the Philadelphia under Stokowski, the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky. True, whenever Toscanini was away the Philharmonic lost its identity in a way that the Philadelphia did not; but that was because in Stokowski's absence the Philadelphia played with a sense of responsibility to its greatness, whereas one could see as well as hear the Philharmonic sit back and take things easy (and if it merely took things easy it was treating the conductor well).

The relation between Toscanini and the Philharmonic was demonstrated in breath-taking fashion in the first minutes of the first rehearsal of the Beethoven Festival in 1942, when he stepped on the podium and with no preliminaries simply began to conduct the orchestra for the first time after six years, and the orchestra at once began to play as though the interval had been only one day—to produce the razor-edge attacks, the radiant sonorities, the transparent textures of balanced woodwinds or strings that his movements had elicited from it in 1936. But even more impressive was the demonstration at the rehearsal of the "Götterdämmerung" music this year. In 1942 he had returned to an orchestra only slightly changed in personnel; in 1945 he was conducting an orchestra in which Rodzinski had made a considerable number of replacements, and which had had two years of drilling by Rodzinski that, according to Thomson, had given it a definite and unchangeable style and individuality; yet consider what happened. Having first devoted a few minutes to working out the cross-rhythm at the climax, and the balance of the wind instruments in the opening chords, Toscanini then simply led the orchestra through the piece, and produced with it every sound and contour of the performance of 1936 —quite as though there had been no interval of years, no changes in personnel, no other conductors.

It was his way of saying, as he had said in 1942: "This is my orchestra."

Films

JAMES AGEE

IT MAY be unforgivably decadent of me, but I cannot get much excited about incest, nor do I feel that any great victory has been won because a story about incest, "Uncle Harry," has escaped from the Hays office in still fairly recognizable condition. I am, however, definitely excited by watching characters in conflict with themselves and with others; by the beauty, intelligence, and ability of Geraldine Fitzgerald; and by seeing her after years of criminal neglect in a role which, though not by a long way good enough for her, does give her room to move around in and things to do, and ought to guarantee her roles as good or better, from now on. Though he bats his eyes too often, as a sign that he is a simple soul, George Sanders is generally good as Miss Fitzgerald's infantile brother. Ella Raines is very handsome and effective as the woman who tries to make him grow up. I also like Angela Lansbury's mother, Moyna Maggill, as the gentler sister. The small New England town and its inhabitants are well-detailed, too—especially a set of witnesses at the murder trial, and the perfect dressing of Miss Raines' semi-permanent room in the hotel. I imagine the two people most to be thanked for so intelligently casting, specifying, and bringing to life this generally superior movie are the producer, Joan Harrison, and the director, Robert Siodmak. Nobody is to be thanked for the asinine ending. But if you will take care to hurry for the nearest exit as soon as Miss Fitzgerald tells her brother that that is the way things are, "Uncle Harry" can be recommended.

"Over 21" is Ruth Gordon's story of the liberal newspaper editor who joined the army and was joined by his wife and his former boss in a crowded and flimsy Miami cottage. Some of the congestion and despair is amusing, especially a catastrophic cocktail party at which the ex-editor tries to entertain his Colonel and the Colonel's two ladies. I don't feel that Irene Dunne has quite the right kind of humor to play the wife, but Alexander Knox is very proficient as the editor, even when he is required to be impossibly silly. Towards the end of the film, resuming his impersonation of Wilson, he reads a most sincere editorial in which the creation of the post-war world is compared with the creation of an apple pie. In either undertaking, if disaster is to be averted, all the ingredients have got to be good. Since all the world is not apple pie, but is composed of atoms which have just begun to learn that they are many, and that we are few, I found this editorial unbearably discouraging.

"Bewitched," which is derived from an Arch Oboler radio play, is Oboler's first movie. It is a melodrama about double personality, and uses mental voices and dialogue as profusely as if it were on the air. When these interior voices are expressive, carefully timed, and counterpointed with any discretion whatever, Oboler manages the first persuasive imitations of stream-of-consciousness I know of in a movie. Much more often, he bores to desperation with the vulgarity and mere violence of his "effects." As a moving picture "Bewitched" is at moments vigorous and at all times essentially lifeless. But the sensitiveness and charm of Phyllis Thaxter and the honesty and force of Horace McNally make it worth seeing.

I must apologize for postponing even the attempt to review "The Story of G. I. Joe"; the secondary radiations of the atomic bomb render me still unfit to consider a piece of work I so deeply admire. My apologies also for careless proof-reading, meaning none at all. The Nils Esther mentioned in the issue of August 11 is, of course, Nils Asther.

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

Jim-Crowed Heroes

Dear Sirs: Captain Charles L. Thomas, commander of a tank-destroyer contingent, is the first Negro officer to be awarded the Distinguished Service Cross for extraordinary heroism in action. He holds an air pilot's license and when he gets out of the army intends to study mechanical engineering in order to become an aeronautical engineer. But it's almost certain he won't get a job unless the federal Permanent Fair Employment Practices Committee bill is passed. It is not now the practice of the airline companies to hire Negroes as pilots or engineers, or indeed in any other capacity than as porters.

I wonder whether Captain Thomas's white fellow citizens will help make it possible for him and others like him to have a fair chance at decent jobs in the post-war world. If so, we will need the full-employment bill as well as the Permanent Fair Employment Practices Committee bill. Thus far both are stalled in the mazes of Congressional opposition such as that voiced by Senator "Dear Dago" Bilbo.

CONSUELO C. YOUNG
National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

New York, July 27

Foremen and the U. A. W.

Dear Sirs:

Irving Richter's article, Detroit Plans for Chaos, in the June 30 issue of The Nation, is uninformed on a very vital point. Mr. Richter states:

> The General Motors Corporation has recently issued to all its foremen an order which strikes at the heart of established procedure for collective bargaining. The order requires the foreman to refuse to call a union committeeman to hear an aggrieved worker unless the worker has first given the complete story of his grievance to the foreman. It further orders the foreman to remain present at all times while the worker and the committeeman discuss the grievance. Obviously this will discourage all but the toughest union men from reporting a grievance. And if the union cannot be used for handling grievances, the natural reaction of the worker will be to balk at joining or paying dues to the union.

Mr. Richter fails to state that the General Motors department of the U. A. W.-C. I. O. had promptly informed the General Motors Corporation that it would refuse to recognize the order which it had issued to its foremen. Following our protest, we entered into negotiations with the corporation on this matter. When the corporation declined to rescind its order, we took the matter to the War Labor Board. On the insistent petition of the General Motors department of the U. A. W.-C. I. O., the War Labor Board, on May 10, 1945, issued the following directive order:

> When the employee, after thus stating his grievance (to his foreman), asks for his committeeman, the foreman shall send for the committeeman without discussing the grievance with the employee until the committeeman arrives.
>
> After the arrival of the committeeman, the employee shall have the right, if he so desires, to discuss the grievance privately with the committeeman before it is discussed with the foreman.

This directive order of the War Labor Board completely voids the order which the corporation had sent to its foremen. Those who know the policies of the General Motors department of the U. A. W.-C. I. O. might have known that we would never accept without challenge the order which Mr. Richter describes in his article.

ELWIN J. CORBIN,
Chairman, National General Motors
Council, U. A. W.-C. I. O.

Detroit, Mich., July 14

Italy Today

Dear Sirs: We who fought fascism were but a few of pure faith, full of enthusiasm, and without means of our own; yet we helped each other and supported the underground press. There were never more than six persons at our meetings so that if one was caught and talked under torture, he could give the names of no more than five persons. I was the public-relations man of the ——— Brigade. There were only three of us in 1944. When the insurrection broke out we numbered over twenty thousand. We too would have liked to proclaim a republic during the twenty-four hours that followed the insurrection. It was not possible. But we shall have a republic yet. All the popular mass parties of Italy are for it. It was not possible to ask further sacrifices and lives of our tragically tried people. We shall come to a republic through persuasion. I am positive of this. We refuse to have anything to do either with the Regent or the Regency. We have great hope in Parri's government. He is a man who has given his all to his country and he is paving the way for a new Italy that will be free and independent. His successor will reap the laurels and fruit of what is being done today.

We must be prudent and calm. There has been too much suffering, too much horror, too much abuse. We must not repeat past mistakes. We must succeed, but through persuasion. Let us not forget that the youth of Italy was born and reared in a completely Fascist climate. We have become a people without political education. Only the man who has suffered is sufficiently balanced to have a clear understanding of the times he is living in. He is athirst not for blood and vengeance, but for justice.

I was arrested in September, 1944. They knew that I was connected with Parri. But they never got a shred of information from me. They found a picture of the Maestro [Arturo Toscanini] in my pocket. For the first time I was hustled before a firing squad. They fractured my skull and bashed in my ribs on the left side and broke two on the right side. They held lighted cigarette and cigar butts to my chest and then doused me with alcohol. I was beaten from head to foot almost to a pulp. My fingers were slashed with razor blades and my hands gashed in the form of a cross. I could not wash. I could not even blow my nose. I had to sink my face into my plate to eat. They subjected me to other unnameable kinds of torture which left me impotent for six months. Brought before the Special Tribunal, I was twice condemned to death. I sometimes wonder how I lived through it all.

There are still men and women with courage in Italy. Unfortunately, we must still fight, especially those who succeeded in filtering into our ranks. They are the same ones we knew twenty years ago. We must be calm and serene. Our brothers overseas must follow us and not handicap our very hard work which can assume a dynamic character if the need should arise. Only through our own efforts will Italy again be free and independent. Italy is eager to start upon its reconstruction. Justice will prevail everywhere sooner or later.

ITALIAN ANTI-FASCIST

Italy, June 23

RESORTS

Year 'Round in the ADIRONDACKS
ESTATE providing exquisite natural charm for gracious living.
CRYSTAL LAKE—a 60-acre natural spring-fed lake, entirely within the property of 800 acres, surrounded by rich woodland with magnificent mountain views.
Accommodations in Lodge and Cottages (steam heated), boathouse, Tennis, Riding, Fishing. Golf nearby. Every facility conveniently located.
5½ hrs. from Grand Central Station
2½ hrs. from LaGuardia Field, Colonial Airline
Rates After August 31:
Lodge $75, Cottage $50
CRYSTAL LAKE LODGE
Chestertown, N. Y.
New York Office
MUrray Hill 5-0493
I. H. KESSLER

"Fore" the Golfer
Newly Conditioned Course
A Grand "Pro"
New Clubhouse
. . . await your pleasure.
The Glenmere
28 miles of beautiful private trails. Also — excellent tennis, boating and fishing on our private 7½-mile lake, swimming, golf, game rooms, cocktail lounge, dancing, really fine food . . . congenial atmosphere.
Only 51 Miles from New York
CHESTER, N. Y. Chester 200 (N. Y.) RE 2-5047

CHI-WAN-DA
ON THE HUDSON
ULSTER PARK, N. Y. Phone Kingston 1329
Excellent Location, overlooking the Hudson River. Beautiful Lake on premises. All Water and Land Sports, Dancing, most modern improvements.
DIRECTIONS:
TRAIN—BUS—BOAT to KINGSTON
J. I. DOROSHKIN, Dir. 545 Fifth Ave.
N. Y. Office Phone: MU 2-4217

WESTERN VIEW FARM
26th Season
Rate: $9 a day — $49 a week
TED OHMER
New Milford Connecticut
Telephone: NEW MILFORD 440

MERRIEWOODE
A CAMP FOR ADULTS STODDARD, N. H.
FOR YOUR ENJOYMENT: Beautiful Highland Lake. 10 miles long, with good fishing and free use of boats and canoes. Interesting hiking objectives thru woodland trails. Fine tennis and handball courts, badminton, shuffleboard, archery, riflery, croquet, ping-pong, square dancing. $45 & $50 WEEKLY.
OLIVE H. G. BARON, Director

BREEZEMONT PARK
ARMONK, N.Y.
35 MILES FROM NEW YORK CITY
"A Country Estate in the Scenic Hills of Westchester County"
The nearest of all nearby resorts. Exclusive location. Luxuriously furnished. Dignified. All sport activities. Excellent cuisine
OPEN ALL YEAR Phone Armonk Village 955

SHADYBROOK
MAHOPAC, N. Y. Tel. Mahopac 2320
50 miles from N. Y. 140 acres rustic country, secluded, restful, homelike. Unexcelled American cuisine. Sports, Movies. Beautiful walks, $45.
Mrs. G. Popper

RESORTS

—Announcing—
Membership in the West End Casino
Our guests are invited to enjoy all the facilities of this Ocean Front Beach Club, including the Pool, Beach and Evening Entertainment, also our own excellent Tennis, Handball, Cycling. Golf & Riding available. Dancing and Delicious Food. Join us in the gay and diversified activities at our own beautiful Resort Estate.
The Oaks
ELBERON, NEW JERSEY
Telephone: Long Branch 2483

FOR FUN AND SUN
STAY AND PLAY AT
MAUD'S SUMMER RAY
NORTH BRANCH SULL. CO., N. Y.
Telephone: Callicoon 95 or 148
PRIVATE LAKE
ALL SPORTS
FORUMS
THEATRE
ARTISTS
SOCIAL DOINGS
DANCE ORCHESTRA
DRAMATICS
MARIONETTES
MUSICALES
FRED BERK & DANCE GROUP
MORT FREEMAN, Popular Radio & Concert Artist
Gala Labor Day Weekend
Open for Jewish Holidays
Erie R. R. to Callicoon
Private cars from your house direct to Maud's
DAILY BUSES DIRECT
Mountain Transit Lines, Greyhound Terminal
50th St. and 8th Ave. • COlumbus 5-3000
Call City Information: Dickens 2-5786

50 MILES TO FOREST HOUSE

VACATIONING at Forest House provides the ultimate in rest and relaxation. Superb location, two lakes, all sports. Congenial hospitality, fine food and splendid accommodations. Lake Mahopac 688.
FOREST HOUSE
LAKE MAHOPAC, N. Y., TEL. MAHOPAC 688

The Fieldstone
On Round Island Lake
A place of unexcelled beauty for rest and relaxation. One hour from New York
ALL SPORTS — OPEN ALL YEAR
MONROE, N. Y. Phone 7965

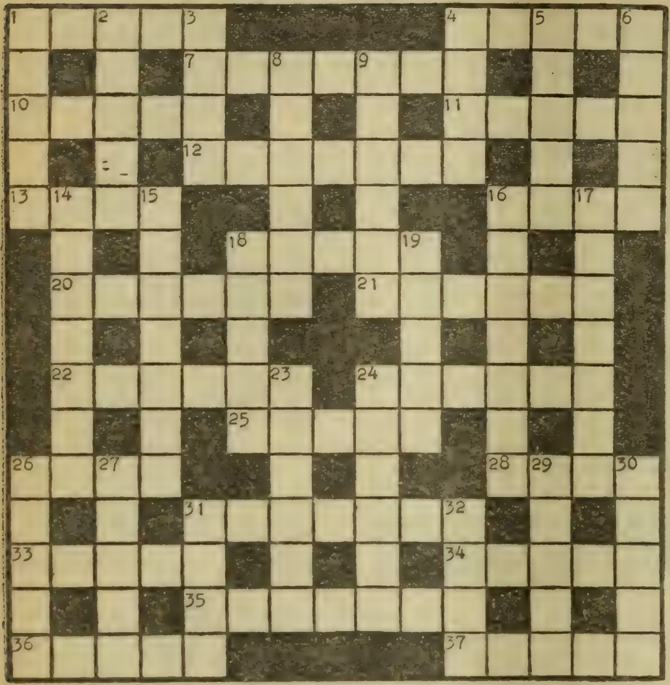
50 MI. FROM NEW YORK
MAMANASCO Lake Lodge
Ridgefield, Conn. Phone 820
A resort of distinction fashioned from a country estate. Water sports, hiking trails, tennis. Library, open fireplaces. Congenial atmosphere. Famous cuisine.

HIGH LAKE GOLF CLUB
IN THE POCONOS
Private mile-long lake—9-hole course. All land and water sports included. Excellent food—comfortable rooms. Res. available to September 4, $47-$72 weekly. Erie R. R. to Hancock N. Y. or car to Honesdale, Pa.
Tel. Lake Como 712, or New York Office, SC. 4-3232
Write High Lake Golf Club, Lake Como, Pa.

Additional Resort Advertising on Inside Back Cover

Crossword Puzzle No. 124

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 Open to receive food for the hungry
4 Explosion of gunpowder
7 Count in
10 Street urchin
11 I help to make Dutch cheese, but am not really wanted
12 A dweller in Cloud-Cuckoo-Land, perhaps
13 Stand by ready to execute
16 The common man of Germany
18 Sounds like a team that is full of ideas
20 Gag that seems to impede the breathing
21 Catch
22 You don't usually mind when he takes your job
24 New York quarter reputedly full of gunmen and bad yeggs
25 A Scottish dog, but not a Scottie
26 Star that has set
28 Horse racing
31 Scottish equivalent of English aldermen
33 Suitable card game for stokers?
34 This flower sounds right for lots of sheep
35 A collector
36 Moved unsteadily
37 How the Irish playwright, Yeats, pronounces his name

DOWN

1 There's an element of doubt about such power
2 Unnerve
3 A farmhand
4 Was first brewed by the ancient Romans
5 Empty
6 English river, and thanks to mother nearly all of it
8 Mark made by folding
9 Reduced to its original form
14 Eight of them have ruled England
15 A word mentioned once in the clues Across
16 Born in Ireland, lived in England, studied music in Germany, became an American citizen
17 We don't mind if he pays us back in our own coin
18 An early Mexican
19 Not broadside on (two words, 3 & 2)
23 Bluebeard's last wife
24 If yours are picked, someone's getting a bright idea on the cheap
26 Half seas over
27 Awry
29 The lights o' London were, until September, 1944
30 "Once upon a time there were three little ----- Who didn't wear stockings and who didn't wear sockses"
31 You won't find it easy to hit this nail on the head
32 Make it snappy!

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 123

ACROSS:—1 JOSEPHUS; 5 CARAFE; 10 KENIL; 11 HOROSCOPE; 12 LAST MAN; 13 ANODYNE; 14 CHANGE; 15 HIDE-OUT; 18 TALLEST; 21 BALLET; 24 USURPER; 26 ROMANCE; 27 INFORMANT; 28 TWAIN; 29 HIDDEN; 30 MANDOLIN.

DOWN:—1 JEKYLL; 2 SENESCHAL; 3 PALEMON; 4 UNHINGE; 6 ABSCOND; 7 AGONY; 8 ELEMENTS; 9 ARMAGH; 16 ONE AND ALL; 17 STOUTISH; 19 EXPURGE; 20 TARTAR; 21 BOROTRA; 22 LIMITED; 23 PENNON; 25 UNFED.

CIGARETTES

CIGARETTES, all popular brands. Extremely fast service. $1.39 a carton postpaid; minimum order, 3 cartons. Send check or money order today. Ace Mail Order, No. 1, Box 150, East Orange, N. J.

FARMS AND ACREAGE

BERKSHIRE FARM AGENCY, Chatham, New York, offers 300 New York-Massachusetts Berkshire Hills farms.

FOR SALE

PEEKSKILL: Commuting home and excellent income. Ten acres, owner's home, two guest cottages. Newly equipped and furnished. Garage, tool house, fine tennis court, swimming pool, flower and vegetable gardens, low taxes. $20,000. Principals only. Box 1546 c/o The Nation.

HANDWRITING ANALYSIS

SCIENTIFIC HANDWRITING analysis. Alfred Kanfer, 62 Leroy St., N. Y. C. Tel. WA 5-0956. Cooperating with doctors, psychologists, schools, firms, industries. Lessons. By appointment, evenings. Marital, educational, vocational, psychological problems. Fee $3.00.

POSITIONS WANTED

GOVERNESS—Swiss lady seeks position with children 4 years up; long experience in education, widely travelled; physical care; trustworthy. French, German, English. Handwork. Highest French, American references. Box 1544 c/o The Nation.

OWI EDITOR, executive, wants responsible public relations, liaison, similar work with Zionist or other liberal group. College, broad contact with political scene and Palestine, 24, married, child. Available immediately. Willing to travel. Box 1545 c/o The Nation.

SCULPTURE

SCULPTURE by Nicholas Mocharniuk, Marquie Gallery, 16 West 57th Street, New York City.

WANTED TO BUY

WE'D BE HAPPY to buy for cash (and/or services as caretakers or gardeners) or to rent with or without option to buy, a small garden farm in a good community with a grade school that is really good—that the children like—or one which the people are vitally interested in improving. Address Box 122, Wyandanch, L. I., N. Y.

The Nation Index

for Volume 160 of The Nation, covering the period from January through June, 1945, is now available. This excellent reference aid may be had for 15 cents.

Send your order for the Index with remittance, to

THE Nation
20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 161 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • SEPTEMBER 1, 1945 NUMBER 9

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 193

EDITORIALS

The New Japanese Line 195
Lend-Lease Blunder 196
Balkan Maneuvers by Freda Kirchwey 197

ARTICLES

Capitalism and Full Employment by I. F. Stone 198
California Looks to 1946 by Carey McWilliams 199
Everybody's Atom by J. D. Bernal 201
Life in a Vacuum by Philip Jordan 204
In the Wind 205

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Monuments of Old Germany by Lincoln Kirstein 206
Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall 207
Dutch History by A. J. Barnouw 208
Briefer Comment 209
Verse Chronicle by F. W. Dupee 210

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor J. KING GORDON
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Editor Political War Section
J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor J. MITCHELL MORSE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates
LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL
JONATHAN DANIELS
CAREY MCWILLIAMS
REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1945, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

THE RETIREMENT OF NELSON ROCKEFELLER AS Assistant Secretary of State for Latin America and his replacement by Spruille Braden is a hemispheric victory for democracy. The Rockefeller interests, Standard Oil and Chase National, have always been pillars of dollar diplomacy and dictatorship in Latin America. It was a sour commentary on the effectiveness of press agentry that a member of the family, backstopped by a leading official of the Chase bank, should have turned up in the Good Neighbor policy period as Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs and then as Assistant Secretary of State for Latin America. Nelson Rockefeller helped engineer the cabal by which Argentina was admitted to the United Nations at San Francisco. It is good to see that his last-minute change of front—in a speech at Boston he ingenuously declared that the Argentine government rather than its people had violated the Chapultepec pledges—did not save his job in the State Department. The militant attitude taken by Braden at Buenos Aires against the Perón dictatorship makes his promotion the sign of a new and more vigorous policy at Washington. In view of the broken pledges cited by Rockefeller himself, we now have ample basis for breaking off diplomatic relations with Perón.

*

THE ARGENTINE PEOPLE WANT DEMOCRACY. BUT their dictator still thinks he can make a deal. He is intensifying his efforts to split Argentina's most powerful political organization, the Radical Party. Last week, it is true, two of its members joined his Cabinet, but the vast majority of Radicals remain united in opposition to Perón and popular determination to oust him is undiminished. This was demonstrated once again on V-J Day, which became the occasion for three days of civil strife in Buenos Aires. Armed soldiers attacked, killed, and wounded civilians celebrating the Allied victory. Pro-democratic crowds fought back with bare hands, sticks, and clubs. The next day Perón was afraid to make a public appearance at the annual Livestock Show, a function always attended by the highest state dignitaries. Had he been there he would not have relished the repeated shouts of "Death to Perón," and "We want no more dictatorships," or the ovation to Spruille Braden, who only the previous day had asserted that the democracies "must and will establish the only legitimate sovereignty—the sovereignty of the people." Later Braden paid a well-deserved tribute to his audience when he said that "there are few peoples on earth so well prepared to exercise healthy democracy" as the Argentines. He is right. The people of Argentina are undergoing democracy's stiffest training course—resistance to a fascist dictator. Many have already suffered torture and imprisonment, many have been exiled or killed. But they are clearly determined to go on fighting until the last battle is won.

*

LAST WEEK IT SEEMED TO EVEN THE LEAST optimistic observers that the Spanish republicans in Mexico were about to reach an agreement on the formation of a new government. Señor Martinez Barrio had offered the Premiership to Señor José Giral, who had promptly invited the participation of the leading political groups and had proposed Dr. Negrín as Vice-President of the Cortes and as Foreign Minister. As we go to press, we learn that this solution was not acceptable to important sections of the working-class movement. The majority section of the Socialist Party, as well as the Communist Party, has rejected Señor Giral's solution. Moreover, the General Union of Workers (U. G. T.) is to be represented solely by Señor Prieto, who speaks only for a minority of the U. G. T., while the invitation to the National Confederation of Labor was so obscure that it might almost be assumed that there was a wish in some quarters to exclude the C. N. T. from policy-making decisions. This apparent exclusion of groups whose contribution to the Loyalist cause in the Spanish war was tremendous in volume and magnificent in quality seems to us neither justifiable nor realistic. The fact is that a republican government which does not have their support and collaboration has little chance of survival. We hope, therefore, that by the time our next issue appears the Cabinet list finally submitted to the Cortes for approval will be much broader than the one now proposed.

*

THE ONE HOPE OF MAINTAINING SOME ELEMENT of order in reconversion is to support OPA against the business pressure groups rapidly engulfing it and to demand a firmer price policy. The War Production Board has come completely under the domination of the big-business point of view on reconversion despite Presidential directives which are opposed to it. The appointment of General Levin Campbell as assistant to War Mobilization Director John W. Snyder adds still another big-business-minded official to the agency. Chester Bowles and the OPA are trying to resist the tide toward a disorderly and inflationary reconversion period in which small business and the consumer will suffer. The greatest danger lies in the fact that, while the Full Employment Bill is making headway in Congress and the country, the pattern of reconversion is in the direction of an economy with a chronic load of unemployment and under-utilization. The steel industry seems to be deliberately holding production to 60 per cent of capacity. The removal of price control from aluminum and magnesium will encourage the restoration of monopolistic practices in the light metals. Aid to little business in priorities and prices and programs for low-cost items in textiles are promised. But without a vigorous Presidential shake-up of reconversion policy and personnel, all such promises will remain on paper.

THE GOOD DEMOCRATIC BELIEF THAT MILITARY leaders must be controlled by civilian authority in time of peace has already begun surging to the fore, only a few days after victory. Judging by some of the actions and reported plans of the military, this is highly salutary; Congress, the press, and the general citizenry are to be encouraged in their efforts to check the authoritarian tendencies of the high brass. We have already pointed out some of the flaws in the army's demobilization scheme, and suggested that its reasons for maintaining four million men under arms a year from now had not yet been made clear. Now comes the question of redeploying European combat veterans to the Pacific for occupation duty, which has brought cries of outrage from the men of the 86th and 95th Divisions, and from several smaller units en route across the country. It is probably true that the army has screened these units carefully, and that men with more than seventy-five points or thirty-seven years are not being sent toward Japan. It remains true that there is injustice in sending combat veterans to a new theater when non-combat troops remain at large in the United States. Of course, it is far easier for the army to send units which are reasonably intact than it is to form new units by a process of individual selection among the non-combat troops stationed here, which is the only way in which the situation could be corrected. In wartime, the expenditurre of time and energy and trouble in organizing such new units, training them, and transporting them, would be indefensible. With occupation as the only task ahead, the army should certainly stretch itself to see that no more combat veterans than are absolutely necessary are sent overseas again after the war has been won.

*

EVEN LOUDER HOWLS OF RAGE ARE COMING from the navy, whose personnel have just had inflicted on them a point-discharge system which gives no break whatever to combat men—except those decorated for bravery, who get immediate discharges. Equal credit is given for months in service whether the sailor spent those months pounding a typewriter in Norfolk or fighting a PT boat through the South Pacific. "Scuttlebutt" has it that this is because the navy's record-tabulating machines are unable to distinguish between duty ashore and duty afloat: an explanation which may not be entirely fanciful. A man with three children gets no more points than a man with only one dependent; a man without dependents, over thirty, and in service since Pearl Harbor, still won't be discharged for months. It looks very much as if admirals, like generals, were anxious to keep big establishments under their command.

*

NO MORE TERRIBLE STORY HAS COME OUT OF Europe than the survey published by the New York Times on Sunday, August 26, of conditions among the pitiful remnant of Central European Jewry. Recent revelations of what happened in the concentration and extermination camps provided a glimpse of persecution so cruel as to be pathological. These disclosures are transcended by the accounts of the treatment accorded the survivors. More painful than the mistreatment of the Jews by their enemies is the indifference, fumbling, ignorance, and, often, the prejudice displayed by

---

Correction: Contrary to a statement on page 71 of our July 28 issue, the California state legislature has memorialized the President and the Senate to approve a bill authorizing the naturalization of Filipinos.

their liberators. Official Allied policy is humane, enlightened, and sympathetic, at least on paper, but too little understanding is being shown in the lower echelons where directives must be carried out. Even on the policy level, it was not until August 23 that a United States directive was issued authorizing special welfare benefits in the Reich for those who suffered at the hands of the Nazis for racial, religious, or political reasons. "Enthusiastic but needy Nazis," said one Times report, "have often fared better than their ex-victims." German Jews will now be treated as displaced persons and will be moved wherever they want to go "provided they can obtain entry into the country." But where can they go? Only the opening of the doors of Palestine by Britain can provide a home for the No. 1 victims of Nazi fury.

The New Japanese Line

DURING the past week General MacArthur has set the stage for the final act in Japan's humiliation. By the time these lines are read, MacArthur himself, with a vast assemblage of Allied military might, will be established in the heart of Japan. Occupation forces are scheduled to land in the other Japanese islands after the signing of the final articles of capitulation. As the hour of occupation approaches, Japanese propaganda has taken on a curiously changed note. For the first time we find the Japanese press and radio frankly admitting defeat and advising the Japanese people to forget past animosities and concentrate on reconstruction. Pictures and detailed accounts of the devastation caused by the atomic bomb are being published to convince possible die-hards of the folly of further resistance. "For Japan's own good," the Nippon Times declares, "there must be a speedy realization that the old order is finished." Admitting the disastrous consequences of one-party rule, other papers urge the people to take a more active part in politics. In an obvious effort to impress the Allies with their newly-fabricated democracy, steps have been taken to set up six parties to replace the totalitarian Political Association of Greater Japan.

This almost servile note in Japan's reaction to defeat is in many respects more disquieting than the defiance of the first few days after surrender. The change came too suddenly and too uniformly to be regarded as even partially sincere. Japan remains a totalitarian state. Its leaders are essentially the same men who plotted aggression against China in 1937 and the attack on Pearl Harbor on December 7, 1941. Like the German militarists in 1918, they have decided that the best tactic for the moment is to play for Allied sympathy in the hope that they may remain in office and ultimately be able to rebuild their shattered naval and military power. Perhaps the clearest evidence of the hypocrisy of Japan's new democratic pretenses may be found in the six parties that are supposed to provide free political expression for the Japanese people. The Social Mass party, which made such an impressive showing in the 1937 elections on an anti-militarist program, is not among them. Nor are any of the other proletarian parties which were active in the 20's and 30's. The six new parties are to be created, apparently, by dividing the Political Association into six roughly equal parts. If there has been any popular outcry against the militarists or the Zaibatsu, any resurgence of labor-union activity, or any other evidence of a genuine change of heart, it has not been reported by the Japanese radio.

Further evidence of Tokyo's duplicity is provided by its continued efforts to sow seeds of dissension among the Allies. With characteristic insolence the Japanese government twice appealed to General MacArthur to permit its forces in Manchuria to retain their arms to protect the local population against outrages committed by the Red Army. These appeals have quite properly been ignored.

Similar requests, however, that the Japanese in China be allowed to keep their arms to prevent the country from being overrun by "bandits" appear to have had some success. Chiang Kai-shek, with American backing, has ordered the Japanese to surrender only to accredited representatives of the Chungking government. And some sort of arrangement appears to have been entered into between Chungking and Chinese puppet troops for joint action against the resistance forces organized by Yenan. Whether this will lead to a Chinese civil war or a sharper cleavage between the two Chinas, remains to be seen.

Hope that Soviet influence will serve as a stabilizing factor and help avert war has been raised by publication of the recently concluded Stalin-Soong agreement. As had been forecast, Russia agreed to the restoration of Chinese sovereignty in Manchuria and Inner Mongolia, and took over only part of Japan's treaty rights in the Kwantung Leased Territory. Russia is to regain a half interest in the Chinese Eastern and South Manchuria railways, but, in contrast to the pre-war arrangement, these railways will be garrisoned by Chinese, not Russian, troops. Both countries agree that Korea shall be given ultimate independence; in the interim it will be occupied by the Big Four.

From China's standpoint, the Moscow agreement is a major diplomatic triumph. The only important concession made to Russia was recognition of the independence of Outer Mongolia—an established fact of twenty years' standing. But against this China gains not only full sovereignty in Manchuria but a guaranty against Russian interference in Chinese internal affairs. Many observers have interpreted this clause as signifying that Moscow has abandoned the Chinese Communists. This is indeed possible. If so, it will be a cruel blow to the millions of peasants who had escaped from China's feudal land system under Yenan's guidance. But there is also a strong possibility that as an unpublished part of the arrangement Chungking agreed to enter into a settlement with Yenan. Chiang Kai-shek's three urgent invitations to Mao Tse-tung and the latter's final agreement to go to Chungking suggest that outside pressure has been exerted. The indorsement of the pact by the Chinese Communists indicates that Yenan has not been wholly cast off. It is difficult to predict the outcome of the negotiations between Chiang Kai-shek and Mao Tse-tung. The most favorable outcome, from China's standpoint, would be the creation of a coalition government under Chiang Kai-shek's leadership. Such an arrangement was nearly reached a year ago. Another possibility is a regional understanding under which the Communists would receive a high degree of autonomy in North China under nominal Chungking authority. In any event, the threat of civil war has been substantially diminished, and the danger of international complications has been virtually eliminated by the new Sino-Soviet pact. The Japanese attempts to divide the Allies in peace appear to have failed as completely as similar Nazi efforts did in Europe.

Lend-Lease Blunder

PRESIDENT TRUMAN'S action in bringing lend-lease operations to an abrupt halt even before Japan's formal surrender had been completed has met with fairly general approval in this country. Now that the fighting has stopped most people have assumed, without giving the matter much thought, that any further aid our Allies may require can be arranged by credits on commercial terms. In our haste to liquidate the war and return to "normalcy" we have not bothered to use our imaginations in considering what the decision means to other countries. Leo Crowley says that the Administration had no option in its action because Congress decreed that lend-lease was to end with "the end of the war." He has interpreted this to mean the end of actual fighting, but for many purposes—conscription, and the use of numerous war powers, for instance—the end of the war does not come until peace is actually declared by Congress.

Questioned in the House of Commons on this subject, Prime Minister Attlee said that, while a long continuation of lend-lease had not been anticipated, the British government had hoped that "cessation of this great mutual effort would not have been effected without consultation and prior discussion." (Our italics.) Mr. Churchill, who followed him, expressed disbelief "that so great a nation . . . would proceed in such a rough and harsh manner as to hamper a faithful ally who held the fort while their own American armaments were being prepared." These statements put in strong but Parliamentary language what many ordinary Britons are saying in much blunter words.

Side by side with dispatches from New York telling how rapidly peace-time plenty is being restored in this country, British newspapers will be printing announcements of new deprivations. Let us keep this in mind and not be too ready to fling accusations of ingratitude when criticisms of the American action are reported.

To the British the end of lend-lease, without a period of warning during which new arrangements to solve their supply problems could be contrived, means anything but normalcy: it means, on the contrary, that controls must be retained and restrictions increased, that belts already tight must be pulled tighter. Even before the news was received butter and cheese rations had been cut and the stretching of six months of clothing coupons over eight months announced. Now it may be necessary to introduce bread rations for the first time since the war started. It is not a matter of shortage of total supplies throughout the world but of shortage of dollars with which to pay for imported food. Britain has been receiving abut $1 billion worth of lend-lease food annually and, in consequence, has been able to devote that much more of its resources to war manufacture instead of to producing goods for export. Now, in order to pay for essential imports it will have to draw on its exchange reserves, which are small in relation to its foreign liabilities, until it can reconvert its industry—far more fully mobilized for war than that in this country—and start the slow process of rebuilding export markets. Last year British exports were valued at about $1 billion—little more than one-third of their pre-war figure; imports, excluding munitions, totalled over $5¼ billion. With the end of the war some decline in imports is possible, since huge quantities of raw materials were received for armament manufacture, but even so an immense gap will remain between Britain's minimum needs and its present capacity to buy. Washington officials suggest that this gap can be filled by American loans. But loans take time to negotiate and, in any case, the lending powers of the United States government are quite modest in relation to the international demand for credits. For Britain is not the only nation, nor the most needy, which will now seek credits to keep its people alive and revive its industry.

The lend-lease decision, coming as it did on the heels of the new British government's socialist program, has led to suggestions that Washington is seeking to put pressure on our ally with a view to keeping it in the straight capitalist path. We do not believe that the Administration has any such motive. On the other hand, it is quite probable that action was taken to force a showdown with Britain on post-war international commercial and financial policies, a showdown which, from the point of view of some of our leading Washington officials, would have been just as necessary if Churchill had been returned to office.

For months now the United States government has been seeking definite commitments from Britain which will insure an eventual return to competitive, multilateral world trade. We want to abolish barter deals, bulk purchases and sales by governments, exchange controls, import quotas, and other devices which impede American free enterprise. Britain is not indissolubly wedded to such methods but it feels unable to forswear their use until it can see its way to achieving balanced trade without them. For its fundamental need is to find means of paying for the imports without which it cannot survive.

One of the biggest obstacles to a solution of this problem is the enormous debt Britain has accumulated during the war. It has drawn heavily for supplies on India, Egypt, Portugal, Argentina, and a score of other countries, giving I. O. U.'s payable only in sterling. American traders want to sell goods to these countries but Britain cannot allow them to turn their sterling assets into dollars for, if it did, the exchange value of sterling would sink through the floor. A way out would be the funding of at least part of these debts through an American loan, and there have been repeated rumors that Britain has requested help from Washington for this purpose. Leo Crowley, Foreign Economic Administrator, however, has denied that any such application has been made. Actually there is reason to believe Washington would be delighted if Britain asked for a loan for then it would be in a position to make conditions. According to John H. Crider of the New York Times, one purpose of Assistant Secretary of State Clayton's present visit to London was to sound out British officials on this matter without making an offer which would give Britain an opportunity to suggest terms. Whitehall, however, has proved unwilling to commit itself. British experts see little point in transforming sterling debts which could eventually be paid off in the form of goods into a dollar debt. For the result might be to worsen Britain's plight unless the American market was thrown open to its products and assurances were received that the American economy would not be allowed to go into another tailspin.

With the end of lend-lease the British government will be forced to come to a definite decision: shall it seek further American aid on American terms, or, turning its back on free-trade ideals, seek to build up an independent trading system around the sterling bloc and so free itself from dependence on the dollar? Mr. Truman and his advisers are, apparently, counting on a favorable answer. We think they are gambling dangerously. While the Administration's action may have been taken with a view to persuading Britain and other countries to adopt commercial policies favorable to American trade, the immediate result at least may very well be more restrictions on trade and tighter exchange controls in Britain and the sterling area. We cannot complain if Britain cuts its coat according to its cloth and refuses, say, to use up its limited supply of dollars to pay for American films. We cannot insist that it must borrow money to pay for non-essential imports at a time when it is forced to ration necessities. It is at least equally probable that America's action will give victory to the British bilateralists and, in the end, leave America commercially isolated.

Balkan Maneuvers

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

A LITTLE honesty among the Allied powers would help clear the air over Europe, but clear air is not, I suppose, what our leaders are anxious to provide. Better fog and low visibility as a cover for motives that don't appear entirely compatible with One World ideals—or even United Nations agreements.

Yet nobody is really fooled. Nobody doubts that when Russia talks about "non-intervention" in Eastern Europe it intends merely to warn Britain and the United States not to throw their weight around in its special security sphere. Certainly it does not mean that it would tolerate a hostile government in Bulgaria or Rumania, no matter how such a government was chosen. And when Messrs. Bevin and Byrnes make solemn pronouncements in favor of "free elections" nobody supposes that they really hope for the early establishment in the Balkans of democratic methods which have not yet been applied in Hongkong or South Carolina. What they are trying to do is obvious, however veiled in semantic clouds. They are trying to build up the political elements which may prove independent of, if not hostile to, Russian influence. Neither side is able to hide its self-interested purposes; but I suppose it is inevitable that both should try. For honesty in this case would expose too baldly the thin patches in the fabric of inter-Allied relations.

And so we shall probably go on stumbling from one crisis into the next, with patched-up agreements creating brief interludes of uneasy armistice. The qualities that could overcome the difficulty altogether seem lacking: a capacity for honest cooperation and a willingness to sacrifice near-at-hand national claims to those more ample purposes of social reconstruction and international understanding which offer the only real basis of even national security. It is startling that three weeks after the fact of atomic power burst upon the world, the greatest Allied nations should still be pitting Balkan factions against each other and haggling over security zones. We need badly a breath of greatness, an impulse of generosity among our rulers.

Progressives everywhere felt particularly let down by Bevin's foreign-policy speech. On Spain, on Greece, on Eastern Europe, he echoed his Tory predecessors to the last stodgy inflection. No one expected the Labor government to abandon the cherished principle of continuity in Britain's foreign relations. What its sympathizers here and elsewhere confidently believed was that the new government would see the unchanging interests of Britain safeguarded rather than threatened by the rise of left-democratic forces in Europe and by firmer bonds with Russia. Mr. Bevin's stand-pat speech has shaken that belief.

Nor has Bulgaria's sudden capitulation altered the situation by so much as a hair. The provisional government yielded, not because it had been persuaded of its sins. Indeed Mr. Bevin's disapproval, read side by side with his defense of the Churchill policy next door in Greece, can only have created a mood of cynicism in Bulgaria. The government yielded because it was bullied by Britain and the United States: unless the election laws were changed, the newly elected regime would be excommunicated and economic help would be withheld. This threat of political-economic sanctions worked; the election has been indefinitely postponed. But I cannot believe the result will mean better relations between the west and the east or even any increase in Balkan democracy.

For behind the interplay of power politics, some real facts lie half hidden. The most important of these is the fact of revolution. All Europe—perhaps all the world—is undergoing a process of revolution. Here in America, social change has been cushioned and slowed down by our immense wealth, our well-fixed habits of democratic procedure, and above all by our exemption from the devastation war has brought to every European country. For these happy circumstances we should be thankful; they certainly give us no excuse for displays of self-righteousness.

The peoples of Europe are dealing with the fact of revolution in various ways and with varying degrees of success. In the western nations, the tradition of democracy may prove strong enough to survive hunger, physical destruction, and the impact of social change, particularly if they receive help and encouragement from the United States. Eastern Europe has no democratic tradition. Under forced draft, an obsolete system of society is being broken down and a new one constructed. In each country the resistance to Nazi domination generated a tough, fairly united fighting force largely under Communist direction and committed to immediate, urgent, primitive reforms—the ending of feudalism through the distribution of land to the peasants and the wiping out of prewar ruling groups, whether landlords, collaborationists, clerical interests, fascist left-overs, or combinations of all of them.

The process is not one which observes the niceties of democratic behavior. Reports indicate that the abuses in Bulgaria have been extreme. Repression of political opposition is not a pleasant business, and one-party rule, even when the party is a "front" made up of a variety of parties, is not by any definition democratic.

It is possible that the rigors of revolution might be moderated by the friendly intervention of all three major powers acting together under the Potsdam agreement. But to be useful such intervention would have to be both disinterested and united. It would have to respect the underlying realities of social and political change. It would have to be based on a general policy applicable elsewhere—in Greece and Italy as well as in Bulgaria and Rumania. The intervention of Britain and the United States met none of these tests and, indeed, it could not meet them as long as the powers are sparring for position in eastern Europe. Under existing circumstances, however successful it may appear on the surface, our ultimatum to Bulgaria can only have intensified differences and created new suspicions. Mr. Byrnes and Mr. Bevin have stopped the Bulgarian elections; they are not going to establish Jeffersonian democracy in Bulgaria, no matter how drastically the election laws may be changed or how many observers they station at the polls.

Capitalism and Full Employment

BY I. F. STONE

THE New York Times recently complained—one could almost hear the tremor in the editorial voice—that the Full Employment Bill "rests essentially on the assumption that private enterprise, left to its own devices, cannot provide sufficient employment." I don't know what is meant by "sufficient" employment. I suspect that employment sufficient enough to satisfy conservative editors might not be sufficient enough to satisfy the rest of us. But if the New York Times means full employment, its reproach is not unjustified. Despite the pious genuflections to free enterprise on almost every page of the bill, its basic assumption is, indeed, that free enterprise, left to its own devices, is unlikely to achieve, much less to maintain, full employment. If the backers of the bill felt otherwise, they would never have bothered to introduce it. If free enterprise alone can provide full employment, there is no need for action by government.

What the editors of the New York Times seem to overlook, however, is that this basic assumption is shared by the opponents of the bill. Senator Taft, the leader of the opposition, has said in Congress and over the air that the full-employment idea itself is communistic and that it originated in Section 118—the "right-to-work" section—of the Soviet Constitution. I was myself on a radio program with the Senator last winter in which he read from that Soviet document, as though this provided a conclusive and crushing argument, "The right to work is insured by the socialist organization of the national economy. . . ." Unlike the New York Times, Taft indulged in no question-begging phrases about "sufficient employment." His position was that free enterprise and full employment are incompatible. He implied that full employment is possible only under socialism. This point of view has been expressed in many other conservative quarters, notably on the financial and editorial pages of the New York Herald Tribune.

There has thus been a curious reversal of roles in the debate on the Full Employment Bill. Many conservatives like Senator Taft, in opposing the bill, are saying that full employment can be achieved only under socialism. Many liberals and leftists, in backing the bill, are saying that maybe full employment can be achieved under capitalism. We on the left agree with Senator Taft and the Soviet Constitution that the socialist organization of the national economy is the one certain way to guarantee full employment. But we are less defeatist than Senator Taft. We are not yet ready to state dogmatically that it is impossible to have both full employment and private capital. In a very real, though paradoxical sense, we have more faith than Taft in the possibilities of private enterprise in America.

The basic assumption shared by both sides is true. It is true in this sense: "Free enterprise" as it existed in this country before the war was incompatible with full employment. "Free enterprise," roughly speaking, was a combination of monopolistically controlled basic-material industries and competitive consumer-goods industries. In the former, prices and output were determined not by the market but, as under socialism, by administrative decision. The criterion of decision in this private socialism, as Roosevelt once called it, was the maintenance of a profitable scarcity. The monopolistic basic-materials industries hampered and limited enterprise in the competitive consumer-goods field. There too, though less obviously, the natural tendency was to keep supply a little behind demand. A margin of poverty and joblessness is necessary to the profitable functioning of an unplanned, irresponsible, and anarchistic economic system like capitalism. Full employment is incompatible with such a system of production. The individual employer under existing circumstances can best hold down labor costs if there is a margin of unemployment, best maintain profits if there is a margin of unsatisfied demand.

I stress "existing circumstances." The real question at issue between the opponents and the supporters of full-employment legislation is whether it is possible under different circumstances to maintain both full employment and private capitalism. They say "No." We say "Yes." We have just come through a war period, and in that period we had full employment, and a considerable area of free enterprise, within the framework of private and corporate ownership. And full employment of facilities so lowered unit costs as to make operation enormously profitable despite war-time taxes and war-time wages. Three things made full employment possible during the war: (1) the government provided a market for all industry could produce, (2) it set up agencies to plan, supervise, and direct the productive process, and (3) a sense of common danger and patriotic purpose made extraordinary controls sufficiently enforceable to be effective. If we can carry these three essentials over into peacetime, we can have full employment under private capitalism in peace as well as war. I am not sure that the possessing classes have sufficient foresight to meet the future halfway with such a program. But it could be done and it's worth trying. For ultimately the only alternative is a very grave and costly one.

In the enactment and successful utilization of the Full Employment Bill much will depend on the intelligence of the smaller and the independent business man. He will be wise to do less worrying about sacred-cow words like "free enterprise" and more thinking about the actual situation in which he finds himself. In a fully employed economy he can survive as a business man. In a return to "free enterprise," as it was practiced before the war, he becomes again one of the little fish on which the big fish of the business world feed. Part of the profitability of the system lay in expansion but part lay in economic cannibalism, and it was the little fellow who ended up in the pot. To the biggest financial operators, governmental planning for full employment means a loss in freedom to control and speculate. But for the average business man planned full employment is as vital as for the worker and the farmer; it is the only context in which he, too, can achieve security.

California Looks to 1946

BY CAREY McWILLIAMS

Los Angeles, August 23

ON AUGUST 6 an era in California politics came to an end: "the Hiram Johnson era." A lone wolf in California politics, Johnson was a master of political strategy and tactics. After he was elected Governor in 1910 he proceeded to "drive the Southern Pacific out of politics"—for about a decade. California voters could never forget their indebtedness to him for this masterly achievement, and for many other progressive accomplishments. They liked his fiery denunciations of General Harrison Gray Otis, owner-publisher of the Los Angeles Times; they admired the courageous way in which he took over the San Francisco graft prosecutions after Special Prosecutor Francis J. Heney had been shot. On these solid foundations Johnson built a strong personal machine. But his liberalism, like that of certain Southern politicians of the same period, was curiously mixed with illiberal ingredients. He was a chauvinist, an isolationist, and a race-baiter. Though he had a strong claim upon the loyalty of California voters, he would have been overwhelmingly defeated in 1946. For the great majority of Californians, of both political parties, were indignant over that final act of an embittered, morose, cynical old man—his "no" vote on the United Nations Charter.

True to form, Governor Earl Warren has used the vacancy created by Johnson's death to pay an old political debt by appointing Major William Knowland to the Senate. Major Knowland is the son of Joseph Knowland, publisher of the Oakland Tribune, a pillar of reaction in California these many years. The elder Knowland was Warren's original sponsor in politics and has consistently advanced the career of his protégé. The appointment, which as a matter of right and tradition should have gone to a Southern Californian, is not popular. California progressives and chronic Johnsonites feel keenly that the Governor ought to have appointed a man who represented the old Johnson tradition.

Major Knowland is a young man, 37 years of age, former Republican National Committeeman, assistant publisher of the Tribune, who has served one term in the Assembly and one term as State Senator from Alameda County. He is not an isolationist, but surely not a progressive on domestic issues. From present indications he is likely to be opposed for the Republican nomination in 1946 by Lieutenant Governor Frederick Houser—a smug reactionary if ever one existed—and by Judge Thomas White of the District Court of Appeals in Los Angeles, a liberal Catholic with an excellent record on racial, labor, and international issues. There is also considerable sentiment, among Willkie Republicans, for Bartley Crum of San Francisco. If the reactionary vote were divided between Knowland and Houser, either White or Crum would stand a good chance of winning the Republican nomination.

Until last week, the fight for the Democratic nomination promised to be a free-for-all in the best California tradition. Mentioned as likely candidates were: Orson Welles, Congressman George Outland, Colonel Evans Carlson (of "Carlson's Raiders"), Colonel James Roosevelt (who is establishing political residence in California), Congressman Ellis Patterson (perennially willing to run for any office higher than the one he currently occupies), Congressman Cecil King, J. Ray Files, a prominent Los Angeles lawyer, former Congressman Will Rogers, Jr., and Attorney General Robert W. Kenny, the most powerful figure in Democratic Party politics in California today. When Kenny quickly eliminated himself, by announcing that he would run for reelection as Attorney General, the liberal forces inclined toward Colonel Carlson and George E. Outland, generally regarded as the state's ablest Representative in Congress. But within the last few days the situation has been considerably changed by the report that Manchester Boddy, publisher of the Daily News and the Evening News in Los Angeles, would be a candidate.

In 1926 the Illustrated Daily News, one of the tabloids founded by Cornelius Vanderbilt, Jr., was tottering to a premature grave in Los Angeles. At this juncture Boddy took over control of the paper, largely with the aid, so it has long been rumored, of the Southern California Edison Company, or, if not of the company itself, then of some of its officers and influential stockholders. To most observers Boddy seemed an unlikely choice for the difficult task of rehabilitating the News. A graduate of the University of Montana, a veteran with a distinguished record in the first World War, and a crack book-salesman with an inclination toward metaphysical speculation, he hardly seemed the right man for the job. He lacked practical newspaper experience, he was not widely known in Los Angeles at the time, and he was himself without means. But, by consummate bluffing and financial finesse, he managed to keep the News alive from 1926 to 1932.

In the depth of the depression the News struck a new low: its circulation dropped to 75,000 and its principal advertisers began to desert it. Then, as the result of a casual suggestion, Boddy began to feature, as front-page news, a series of articles on technocracy. Throughout December 1932 large crowds fought for the early editions, with single copies frequently selling for a dollar and two dollars. Boddy had really hit his stride as a publisher, and since then the News has been a profitable and successful enterprise.

Extremely charming and engaging, Boddy is essentially a salesman of ideas. Following his skilful handling of the technocracy ballyhoo, he began to plug for handicraft industries; switched to decentralization of industry; and then gave David Cushman Coyle's "The Irrepressible Conflict: Business vs. Finance" a typical Boddy treatment. Still later he promoted the idea that capitalism should be confined to the production of luxury goods, only to abandon this dispensation, after a few months, for a short flirtation with social credit. From time to time, however, he has returned to his first love, technocracy. As a columnist in his own newspapers Boddy is unpredictable, erratic, and inclined to be tangential in his views. During the EPIC campaign in 1934 he delayed taking a position until the week of the election; and then, with all Southern California eagerly anticipating his indorsement of Sinclair, he devoted his column to a series of essays on Plutarch's "Lives"!

In many respects Boddy resembles Senator Sheridan Downey. Both gentlemen regard themselves as extraordinarily subtle logicians and mathematical wizards; both are spinners of particularly fancy socio-economic fairy tales. The possibility that California may be represented in the Senate, during the critical post-war period, by two such incorrigible romanticists (albeit men of good will) is disconcerting. Should he decide to run, however, Boddy will be "the man to beat." He stands well with the American Legion and the A. F. of L.; he has considerable support in business circles; he is widely known throughout the state; and he has the inside track with officials of the Democratic Party.

Since most of the Los Angeles County Congressmen mentioned for the Senate are indebted to Boddy for support in previous elections, they will probably withdraw should he enter the race. This does not, however, apply to George E. Outland, whose district embraces the central coastal portion of the state. In California politics there is some advantage in coming from this neutral zone, thereby avoiding the perennial north-south rivalry. Many of Outland's most enthusiastic admirers, however, want him to run for Governor, an office for which he is especially well qualified by temperament, training, and experience. He has taught sociology and government at Yale and at Santa Barbara State College, and is the author of "Boy Transiency in America," a standard work on the subject. Running for Congress in 1942, he had the courage to oppose confiscation of the land and machinery of Japanese farmers who were moved inland after Pearl Harbor.

Although the suggestion may seem far-fetched, Orson Welles is one of the dark-horse candidates to watch in this fight. During the 1944 election he demonstrated remarkable political drawing power and was one of the most effective campaigners for President Roosevelt's reelection. The vision of Orson Welles replying to Senator Bilbo is, indeed, fascinating to contemplate. Still another dark-horse candidate, either for Governor or Senator, is Colonel Evans Carlson. The "talk about Carlson" dates from a memorable speech which he delivered at the Writers' Congress sponsored by the Hollywood Writers' Mobilization and the University of California on October 1, 1943. On this occasion Colonel Carlson made a profound impression by his obvious sincerity, simplicity of manner, and unmistakable conviction. He is, of course, known to servicemen throughout the world as the organizer of the famous Second Marine Raider Battalion which performed so brilliantly at Makin Island and Guadalcanal. All America knows about the spirit of "Gung Ho"—"work in harmony, cooperate, practice tolerance"—which may well be a political slogan in California in 1946.

Colonel Carlson commanded native troops in Nicaragua in 1930-33, and later marched with the Chinese Eighth Route Army. He is the author of two interesting books: "Twin Stars of China" and "The Chinese Army." An ardent student of international affairs, he is also profoundly interested in the great social, economic, and political issues of our time. Listening to him talk, seeing him on the platform, chatting with him in private conversation, one can readily understand the enthusiasm he inspired in the men he commanded; one can also understand the enthusiasm of the Hollywood liberals who see in him a new Lincoln. Colonel Carlson has not said that he will run for office, but it is known that he intends to withdraw from active service, as soon as he fully recovers from injuries received in the Pacific, and devote the rest of his life to public affairs. Since the servicemen's vote will be very important in 1946, particularly in California, he would be a strong candidate for Governor or for the Senate.

In 1946 Governor Warren will be a candidate for reelection. He will not be able to repeat his 1942 campaign, when he stood as an anti-Olson candidate without a positive program of his own. Either Outland or Carlson could be relied upon to stress major issues in such a manner that the cagey Warren would be forced to take a position. Warren has no important achievements to present to the voters in 1946. He is extremely vulnerable on racial issues and is under fire for his conspicuous failure to push through an adequate post-war program and for his quiet opposition to the great Central Valley hydro-electric project.

The ideal candidate to oppose Warren would, of course, be Robert W. Kenny. But Kenny knows Sacramento. Given the present obsolete and undemocratic system of legislative representation in California, any person elected Governor is likely to be stymied if he has a progressive program.

Fortunately, the Republican Party in California is badly demoralized at the moment. For the last fifteen years two-thirds of the members of the legislature have been elected at the primaries by receiving both party nominations. During the last session party discipline in the Republican ranks broke down completely, with the Republican Speaker of the House telling off Governor Warren on several occasions. In an effort to restore order, Herbert Brownell, G. O. P. national chairman, came to pray with the local functionaries for unity. His visit was not a success. Governor Warren, who has been at outs with the Dewey element since the 1944 election, refused to go along with the movement to tighten the organization. Thus in 1946 the Republicans will not be in a position to make a strong partisan campaign, while, organizationally, the Democratic Party in California is stronger today than in 1942.

Never a dull state politically, California promises to excel past performances in 1946. Out-of-state observers should be reminded of the fact that primary elections will be held in June, 1946, the legislature having advanced the date of the primary by two months.

Everybody's Atom

BY J. D. BERNAL

[Dr. Bernal, one of Britain's leading younger scientists, is professor of physics at Birkbeck College, University of London, and a Fellow of the Royal Society. He is the author of "The Social Function of Science."]

> This revelation of the secrets of Nature, long mercifully withheld from man, should arouse the most solemn reflections in the mind and conscience of every human being capable of comprehension. We must indeed pray that these awful agencies will be made to conduce to peace among the nations and that instead of wreaking measureless havoc upon the entire globe, they may become a perennial fountain of world prosperity.

MR. CHURCHILL'S words, written in the foreknowledge of the effects of the atomic bomb, are echoed in many millions of minds today. People have been quick to see how the actuality of the atomic bomb has implicitly changed the whole existence of man in this universe. The immediate effects, however horrible, have been decisive in ending the war; but the possibilities of further destructive use are in every man's mind and far less certain are the hopes that it may also bring equally untold benefit. These hopes are weak despite official reassurance because, though the people may have little experience of the behavior of atoms, they have considerable experience of the behavior of men, corporately and individually. They remember that in the past science has been fully developed only in human destruction and this gives a poor augury for the beneficent use of these more powerful forces.

President Truman in his broadcast said:

> We must constitute ourselves trustees of this new force, to prevent its misuse and to turn it into the channels of service to mankind. It is an awful responsibility that has come to us.

The exercise of this trusteeship is, however, greater than can be borne by any government or group of governments. It is one that must be shared with the whole of the human race. Good will is not enough. It needs to be backed by an intelligent appreciation of the possibilities that the mastery of atomic energy gives us, and of the ways in which these possibilities can be realized without disrupting our coal- and oil-based civilization.

The perfecting of the atomic bomb is only the first impressive practical utilization of knowledge that appeared almost as startlingly as the bomb itself in the scientific world of fifty years ago. The discoveries of X-rays by Röntgen in 1895, followed by that of radio-activity by Becquerel, were totally unexpected; they broke up the complacent nineteenth-century, determinist, physical picture and started a major revolution in scientific thought. There followed the Rutherford theory of the atom with its heavy nucleus and attendant electron, which showed us a picture of matter very different from our old concrete imaginings; while the quantum theory of Planck and Bohr revealed modes of behavior of that matter even farther removed from common-sense experience. These ideas led to an almost unbroken sequence of discoveries—neutron, positron, meson—culminating just before the war with the splitting of the isotope of uranium which is the basis for the atomic bomb. The bomb itself is, therefore, the first large-scale, practical result of fifty years of intense, fundamental scientific activity.

What the effect of the use of atomic energy is likely to be on society, we can now only dimly see. Those who know most about it are prohibited by military secrecy from making any statement. I can write about it only because it is work in which I have at no time been involved. What is important now, however, is not an accurate presentation of the immediate, technical possibilities of the utilization of processes in atomic nuclei but rather an appreciation of the social effects which such utilization is bound to produce. The first obvious and incontestable fact is that we have here a concentration of energy of the order of a million times greater than any we have had before. That does not mean, of course, that we have as yet actually increased the available energy in this planet by any perceptible amount. The rarity of the original elements, the practical difficulties of extraction of the active isotopes, and the unavoidable inefficiency of the disintegration process, may make the effective cost per energy unit for many years far greater than that of the more prosaic sources, coal and oil. We may feel reasonably sure, however, that the application of scientific analysis and practical ingenuity will overcome these difficulties in the course of a few years —if the effort which produced the atomic bomb is maintained at the same intensity.

Long before this time, however, there are obvious fields of utilization for costly but concentrated sources of energy. Such sources would obviously be at a premium in all remote parts of the world where the cost of transporting coal or oil is great and it is there that the use of atomic power will first be economic. It does not follow, however, that the best application of atomic energy is its tranformation into mechanical power. Before this is achieved, we may be utilizing atomic energy for the production of extremely high temperatures and pressures: for a new metallurgy and ceramics, and in large-scale engineering as a super blasting agent. Already, in the availability of an enormous variety of radio-active elements in hitherto unthinkable quantities, we have means for the rapid increase of our chemical, biological, and medical knowledge.

Sooner or later, however, it will be possible to use atomic power economically to provide directly or indirectly for immediate human wants. In the crudest way, such energy could be used to pump water and make fertilizer, extending and intensifying agricultural exploitation. At the same time, by increasing the facility of transport, it can make agricultural products more rapidly available. This means, in effect, that the basic limitation of food supply, already being felt acutely in the world, can be removed.

The discovery of a new source of wealth does not imply its rapid, large-scale use. Columbus's landfall did not mean any immediate increase in the resources of medieval Europe, but it did open a new world, and, in time, that new world with its ever widening frontiers brought an overwhelming increase in human population and standards of living. The development of the atomic bomb is a signal that another new frontier has opened, a frontier more illimitable than the physical frontier of mountain and prairie because it is not tied down to the geographical limitations of this globe but only to the capacities of human intelligence and human ability to cooperate.

Just as, when the new world was opened, the more adventurous could not be content with the constraints and resignations of the old, so, from now on, men will have a reasonable impatience at being tied down by the physical limitations of older methods of production and will demand the most rapid and the most effective development and exploitation of the new powers that science has put into our hands. It is here that lies the way out of the very real horror and apprehension that the atomic bomb has created. Attempts to control this force by secrecy and limitation are foredoomed to failure. The real way to insure freedom from fear and suspicion is not negative restraints but rapid expansion. Many of the troubles of our time, particularly in advanced countries like the United States, have been attributed to the closing of the last frontier. With the unlimited possibilities of atomic energy, mutual suspicion and struggles for lebens-

"BABY PLAY WITH NICE BALL?"

(Copyright in All Countries)

num can give way to a new, universal constructive effort full of excitement, uncertainty, hope, and promise.

The analogy of the opening of the New World, however, must not be pushed too far. What America gave us was something that people were already acquainted with—lands, forests, mines—only more of them than they had ever dreamed of; our new resources are not in the physical world but come from the systematic and cumulative tradition of science, and their benefits can be realized only by ordered and controlled progress, not by a further extension of individual and uncoordinated enterprise.

Perhaps as impressive as the atomic bomb itself is the feat of scientific organization and industrial production that made it possible in three years to go from what was a laboratory experiment involving hardly more than home-made apparatus and sub-microscopic quantities of substance, to a practical release of energy on a scale thousand of times greater than ever before achieved. Social discoveries are intrinsically more important than physical ones. A new way of doing things has an indefinite future not tied to any particular field of knowledge. The overriding need to avoid a fate similar to that we have inflicted on our enemy has shown what many scientists have long believed: that the potentials of modern science were not being realized for the simple reason that insufficient effort was being put into science. From now on this fact is as inescapable as the splitting of the atom itself.

People had grown so accustomed to the multiplicity of ways in which science was affecting modern life that the majority, including many scientists, were content with the relatively small-scale and haphazard manner in which scientific research was conducted and applied. That method, or lack of method, is now dead. The object lesson of the two-billion-dollar expenditure on the atomic bomb, with its integration of scientific, industrial, and military organizations, shows what can be achieved if such projects are tackled in a big way. There are hundreds of projects in science, already known to be realizable theoretically, much less spectacular but of importance comparable to that of the atomic bomb. We have had one example of them already in this war; the development of penicillin, which has saved many times more lives than the atomic bomb has destroyed, or, we hope, will ever destroy. Here again the normal development of fifty years was condensed into two by turning on an adequate effort. The problem of protein structure, with its relation to agriculture, food, and disease; the problem of the control of genetics, with the production of new and useful species; and the great physiological, psychological problem of the relation of body and mind—all these should be tackled by international team-work.

As long as people were content with the pre-uranic scientific progress, that is, as long as people were content with what they knew, the few imaginative scientists who saw the possibilities of the serious and adequate utilization of science could get no hearing. Now that everybody has seen what the pace can be, they are not going to be content any longer with leaving the realization of scientific benefits to their grandchildren or great-grandchildren when they could enjoy them in their own lives. The new era of the atom will also be the era in which the pursuit and application of science will become a major instead of an exceptional human occupation. Put concretely, before the war, between one-tenth and one-third of 1 per cent of the national income of modern industrial states was devoted to scientific research. The war has raised this figure to more than 1 per cent, but a rational appreciation of the newly revealed possibilities of science cannot be content with such a limit. The figure must rise year by year until it reaches stability at some value that we cannot now assess, but may within our own lifetime reach as much as 20 per cent. This implies the recasting of the educational system so as to produce many times the number of scientific workers and at the same time give every citizen enough scientific knowledge to appreciate the problems of the new age.

A mere increase of scientific activity, however, is not enough; it must be coordinated and directed to really worthy tasks. The objectives of science—"what needs to be done"—are set by the conditions of society. Sometimes perverse conditions, such as war, require superior methods of destruction, but normally the aim of science should be to enable individual men to realize their inherent possibilities, whether expressed in art, in science, or in simple human relations. The basic requirements of food, shelter, and work must first be met for the present population of the world and for its future increase. How such general directives can be translated into scientific research is a task for the scientists themselves. It needs to be organized—and organized on a world-wide basis. Science cannot be done in holes and corners. Only a combination of the scientists of all the countries of the world, freely interchanging their ideas and persons, can provide sufficient mutual stimulation to insure a full growth of science. The development of the atom bomb itself required the massed leadership in physics of Britain and America, with contributions from Denmark and from anti-Nazi Germans. German and Japanese science, after its perversion by fascism, was not up to the task. Success was achieved by working to a precise and narrow end, but for the general advancement and benefit of mankind the ends are multiple and indefinite.

It often takes much greater ingenuity to find out what problems have to be solved than actually to solve them once they have been stated. Even now we can see only a very small fraction of the possible applications of atomic energy. These applications must not be attacked in a haphazard way. Just as in war we had our priorities, so we must have them in peace. The jobs that atomic energy can do immediately are probably gigantic enterprises in remote places. Its use, therefore, must be concentrated where such action is likely to give the greatest human return, irrespective of national or individual interests. For example, even now the explosive force of the atom can be used to dig canals, to break open mountain chains, to melt ice barriers, and generally to tidy up the awkward parts of the world.

The control of atomic energy, however, which is already promised by President Truman, should be from the start a fully international control, under the guidance in the first place of the United Nations. The maintaining of secrecy on the principles and processes involved and the limitation of their application to the use of particular nations will be doubly disastrous, partly in slowing down the rate of useful progress, but, far more seriously, in withholding the utilization of atomic energy on account of mutual suspicion. It was possible to develop the atom bomb in secrecy but under a cloak so wide that it covered hundreds of the most brilliant physicists, chemists, and engineers of America and Europe. Far more scientists would have to be brought in for the wider peace-time uses. New and valuable ideas from outside cannot appear effectively under conditions of secrecy. Science needs the widest range of free discussion to develop fruitfully. Sir Henry Dale, president of the Royal Society, has made an impassioned plea for open dealing:

> I believe that the abandonment of any national claim to secrecy about scientific discoveries must be a prerequisite for any kind of international control, such as will obviously be indispensable if we are to use atomic energy to its full value and avoid the final disaster which its misuse might bring.

It is clear that publication and control are indissolubly linked. If we have control without publication, we shall have permanent suspicion and resultant stifling of scientific initiative through secrecy. Such a policy will actually tie up the active sources of energy, which will be kept for war purposes instead of used as fast as they are made. Leading scientists in the world have already recognized this. Sir James Chadwick has said:

> The fundamental principles involved in the atom bomb are so widely known that it is only a matter of time before every country, even without learning the British and United States secrets, develops a similar bomb. I do not think there is any safety in every country having it, but some effort should be made to control its use.

The responsibility is heavy. It must be widely borne. The democratic countries have finished their first task of liberating all countries from domination by reactionary forces. The people of these countries and of the rest of the world must see to it that they do not again pass under a domination of fear created by the very weapons that gave them mastery. They will need all their intelligence and political wisdom from now on to conquer themselves.

Life in a Vacuum

BY PHILIP JORDAN

Germany, British Zone, August 13

TO LIVE in Germany today is to live in "Cloud-Cuckoo Land." It is remote, by a paradox, infinitely stable, and is separated from the normal activities of men and the currents of history by immense gulfs, wide, deep, and spiritually impassable. In the last week mankind has crossed a frontier at whose barriers he has been knocking since the Renaissance first awoke him from a sleep that had lasted several centuries: he has discovered how to harness the powers of atomic fission for his own purposes. On a plane infinitely lower, the Japanese Government has all but surrendered, and for the first time in—how many years is it?—thirty or more, the guns are about to be silenced all over the globe.

You would hardly guess at those facts if you were here in Germany. They have made no more impact on German life than the frail clouds which are moving slowly across the summer sky today. On those who garrison this section of the country the impact is hardly stronger. It is strangely ironic that one of the reasons for the indifference of the latter is due to our present inability to harness illimitable power for other than destructive purposes: we are still as much at the mercy of the weather as we were before the airplane was invented. Here we have had no newspapers to read since the day before the Soviet Union declared war on Japan; and because we have learned to rely on the airplane and have now been betrayed by it, we are as much cut off from our only satisfying sources of information—the newspapers from home—as were our forefathers, in similar appalling weather, in the days before the railroad was invented.

Radio? Yes, somewhere there is a radio, but until today a prolonged series of electric storms has interfered with reception; and when we do manage to turn it on we hear little more than the ineffable voice of Luxembourg, telling the Germans that they are guilty, in much the same voice that a superior, genteel nursemaid uses when reproving some recalcitrant child for stealing jam from the larder.

Not that the Germans are inclined to stick their fingers into the forbidden jam at the moment, but their disinclination to listen to nurse is as convinced and certain as that of the child forced to receive a rebuke which he believes to be neither just nor relevant. It is natural to like jam; and if you are not old enough to have a moral sense, you don't listen to pious homilies on the sin of theft.

But the Germans have an additional reason for disregarding this stern, but, alas, amateur, voice: they are concerned now with satisfying a desire older even than that for glory, older than that for power or self-indulgence, a little older than that to reproduce your species: they are concerned with the problem of their collective stomach. Nothing else matters. They dress up, they go to concerts, they flirt, they read the poverty-stricken little news-sheets we allow them, but they talk of food, endlessly, distressingly. Atomic bombs, the end of "honorary Aryanism," peace on earth to men of good will and all that, these are phantoms for the delight of children, phrases with which the practical mind has no concern at the moment. You can have all the atomic bombs you like, they seem to say, provided that little Hansel and little Gretel can be guaranteed a cup of milk every morning and a slice of good bread several times a day.

Well, of course, little Hansel and Gretel can be guaranteed nothing of the sort. Montgomery, a fine fighting soldier but one who must still prove himself as an administrator, makes their flesh creep with hints of famine this winter, now so close; and he exhorts them to help themselves. They hear that their harvest is good, but they know better. They have lived and farmed here for more years than we have been here days; and for the last five years they have been flogging their unfertilized land to produce more and ever more for the now shattered Wehrmacht. The land is old and tired.

Slowly, with an admirable efficiency, the Allied forces are transporting what remains of the shattered Wehrmacht home so that they may bring in this visually lovely harvest; but the rains which now flatten and rot its weak ears also have their story to tell; and every adult German can see on the horizon, like a thundercloud coming up against the wind, the horrid form of hunger.

That is what matters here. The flounderings of Military Government, the incompetence of UNRRA's desperately willing staff—war demands alone seem to have drained civilization's limited fund of administrative ability—the petulance of those displaced persons who remain here (and who can blame them?), the race against time to produce enough men to produce enough fuel—we've long given up hoping to produce enough food—all these are small rashes on the emaciated and inflamed body of the German state. Had those higher levels which give forth policy adequately realized what every sensible man and woman realized (namely, that Germany must be fed and administered when it was defeated) our task today would no doubt have been easier. It would have been mapped and planned. But it wasn't mapped and planned, because the Churchills of this world know no better than to suppose that you have achieved victory when you sign an armistice. One can only thank God on bended knees that he was defeated at the British election or all the old mistakes of 1918, whose first vague shadows lie across this land, might have taken substance and menaced us with a new, resurgent, bitter, militaristic Germany.

We can face it now: those who planned or thought to plan for beaten Germany fell between two stools as high as cliffs. Torn between their desire to destroy German militarism and their wish to preserve some sort of Germany that might still stand between them and communism, they planned a vacuum; so that Germany today, so far as the zones of the Western Allies are concerned, is nothing but a land of people who are afraid of being hungry. They have nothing to live for beyond food.

Pious "handouts" expressing vague wishes that intellectual life may be restored are distributed to Allied correspondents by the only efficient organization in the country—a so-called public-relations outfit which exists not to disseminate information about this country but to prevent newspaper men from finding out what is going on. Never, in nearly six years of journalism with the armies, have I felt so cut off from the stream of events, so thwarted and so incapable of telling you what is happening. This is the new censorship, invisible, professing helpfulness but standing between the newspapers of the world and the truth like a vast unscalable wall of China. Here and there, of course, you can climb over it, but the effort is hardly worth making, and you get tired of finding admirably disinterested, half-trained men and women trying to do a job with no directive to guide them and not enough experience to use their common sense and take a rapping over the knuckles if they offend the powers.

Much of the trouble, of course, is caused by the violent trade-unionism of the old, the regular, army. Men who proved themselves incapable of understanding the strains and necessities of modern war, and were consequently relegated to their proper places during the years of hostility, are now putting on their red tabs and their brass hats and climbing back to the comfort of a good mess and a job infinitely better paid, for all the stinginess of the British Treasury, than any they might get in civil life. First-class brains are not attracted to the governance of defeated Germany, for there is no room for them at the top—with a few shining exceptions—and no responsibility for them lower down. So Germany will be governed for the most part by men of generally lower caliber than those they have to govern—unless, of course, there should be a change in policy, which, so far as the British zone is concerned, is now possible.

Clemenceau used to say that war is far too serious a matter to be left to soldiers: if war is, how much more so is peace!

In the Wind

EUGENE R. FLITCRAFT of Chicago is having troubles with his "Gentile Business Directory," a 152-page "handy shopping guide for Gentiles who prefer to do business with Gentiles" ($12). The Chicago Better Business Bureau reports that many of the listings are unauthorized and inaccurate, and a number of firms and individuals are considering legal action on the ground that listing in such a publication injures their reputations.

LOCAL 24, United Office and Professional Workers of America, C. I. O., claims a majority of the employees in Henry Ford's Chicago office, and has filed a petition for a National Labor Relations Board election.

TIMING; In its issue of August 13 Time said, "Last week Russia was not ready—if she ever would be—to go to war with Japan" (page 27, column 2). Russia went to war with Japan, as readers of The Nation are aware, on August 8.

THE CURRENT (1945) edition of Webster's Collegiate Dictionary defines "Fascisti" as "an Italian organization, originated by patriots (1919) to oppose all radical elements in the country."

WILLIAM DAMON, an artist of Ocean City, New Jersey, was arrested on Sunday, July 29, while painting a portrait. Mayor Clyde Struble pointed out that a city ordinance forbids "unnecessary business" on Sunday.

ROBERT CASADESUS was the soloist in the final program of the Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood, Massachusetts, August 12. A note on the printed program warned the customers: "Baldwin Piano. (Mr. Casadesus uses the Steinway Piano.)"

DETROIT, MICHIGAN, and Madison, Wisconsin, are planning to adopt the Philadelphia system of taxing the incomes of "daytime citizens," who earn their money in the cities but live in the suburbs.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. One dollar will be paid for each item accepted.]

Monuments of Old Germany

BY LINCOLN KIRSTEIN

Somewhere in Germany

ONE OF THE HAPPIER aspects of the late war is the almost complete survival of the glories of French monumental building, and of the paintings, sculpture, and furnishings which adorn them. This extraordinary circumstance is due to a combination of causes, primarily the realistic and considered policy of French museum directors. Objects from museums were stored in dispersed castles, and a list of the repositories where they were placed (not, as the romantic reporters write, "hidden") was given to a neutral legation for transmission to belligerent bomber-commands. The German Occupation Monuments Service, originated in the First World War under Dr. Paul Clemens, the distinguished art historian, then at the University of Bonn, was revived for the present conflict by a group of Francophile scholars, many of whom had been trained by Clemens at Bonn.

It should be understood that the Monument Service personnel had no relation to, and were continually at odds with, the Einsatzstab Rosenberg, a well-organized body for systematic pillage, which stole on a vast scale from Allied institutions and from Allied nationals, generally Jewish. It is too early to write the history of the machinations by which France was spared its public (though not its private) collections. That story when it is finally documented will be an absorbing chapter in the ancient, Jesuitical record of the manipulation of works of art.

In Germany it has been quite different. The controlling powers of the Nazi state would not entertain the notion of defeat, and hence their protective arrangements were not worked out in advance, but rather forced upon them by the increase of the Anglo-American aerial offensive. The treasures of the Prussian state museums, a complex of collections unrivalled in the world, actually remained in Berlin until March. This appalling delay shows how completely the High Command was taken in by its own propaganda. When the director of the state museums, well over a year ago, attempted to formulate a request for the evacuation of the collections, he was informed that his attitude was dangerously defeatist. The two Flaktürme, Am Zoo and one at Friedrichsheim, were considered as depots, impregnable from the air. But when long-range Russian artillery finally moved up, the Minister of Education dispatched a first shipment, only about one-fourth of the holdings, to a potassium salt mine in central Germany, together with seventy-nine cases of his own library. This was done on the advice of Marshal Kesselring. Some three days after the pictures arrived, along with the entire Reich gold reserve, General Patton's infantry took the mine. The city fathers of Hamburg, on the other hand, refused in their Hanseatic pride to allow their treasure to leave the depot in the Flakturm at the airport.

Pictures and sculpture do not profit by travel. They rip and break. The French had time to pack properly. The German objects had been packed once for a short move, and should have been repacked. There was no time. Papyri were put in open lead cases which were crushed. The nineteenth-century French and German pictures had not even been packed. They were first sent to a mine that was wet. They were later shifted to a drier one, but half a mile down a potash mine is not a nice place for pictures. The oil or tempera surface, the patina on bronze, carries on its own chemical life and needs light and air. Otherwise deterioration sets in.

In the case of other museums, the news is better. The Walraf Richartz pictures from Cologne, the Stadel collections from Frankfurt, the principal provincial and city collections were removed from their galleries, which with some two or three exceptions have been destroyed. Where and when these collections can be displayed is a problem no one can solve for a long time.

The principal Gothic cathedrals of France and Germany stand in the midst of what is, the farther east one moves, almost absolute desolation— monuments to stubborn faith and the genius of medieval builders. Those of Aachen, Cologne, Mainz, Frankfurt, Metz, Strasbourg, and Trier, may have had their roofs burned off and the vaulting pierced, may even have sustained direct hits on side chapel or cloister, but the main skeletal vaulting has held. In Germany, excellent brick and cement kunstschutz for interior sculpture, which was also used on some free-standing exterior groups, has saved what could be saved.

But a very great number of churches, and a great deal of Gothic civic and domestic architecture—the central portions and marketplaces of Trier, Cologne, Mainz, Frankfurt, Wurzburg, Nuremberg, the beautiful breathing memories of the greatest epoch of pure Germanic culture, of Kaiser Maximilian and Cranach and Dürer—these are gone, spurlos versenkt.

Many were exercised over the fate of the Roman remains in Trier, a beautiful and severely damaged town. They came through well enough but they were already ancient ruins a thousand years ago. What did not come through were the glorious baroque palaces of the archbishops and the counts of Kessel. In the Rhine cities, the entire lengths of river banks were tactical targets, and so some of the grandest Renaissance and rococo monuments are lost. In Mainz, for example, a cluster of early medieval and baroque churches was adjacent to the citadel, and to important anti-aircraft emplacements. Now the exuberant, angel-bedecked, triumphant décor of the chorales of Bach and Buxtehude is efficiently strafed, and richly ruined. The Residenz in Wurzburg is gravely hurt but Treppenhaus, the chapel, and the Kaisersaal survive.

The horrid desolation of the German cities should, I suppose, fill us with pride. But the builders of the Kurfürstliches Palast, of the Zwinger, of Schinkel's great houses, and of the marketplaces of the south German cities were not the executioners of Buchenwald or Dachau. No epoch in history has produced such precious ruins. To be sure, these structures are rather filigraine, delicate in comparison to those of antiquity, but what they lack in scale is made up by the extensiveness of the area they cover. Fragments of elegance —and the yawning contempt for the creative impulse.

There is little use in trying to figure out now what can eventually be done. Should the cities be built again around the focus of surviving cathedrals? Can the church summon enough strength for restoration? And where are the transport, the gasoline, the manpower, the materials which are necessary to clear away the solid ruins, even before any rebuilding can be considered? Will the Tiepolo ceiling in the Residenz, lacking a roof, survive the summer rains?

In the meantime, the little our armies can do is done. I can speak only of the Third, but it is the same in the others. Our Monuments, Fine Arts, and Archives officer is Captain Robert Posey, a New York architect. He can at least request first-aid repairs for endangered roofs and walls, place certain sites off limits to prevent deterioration, and remove pictures and books to safer places if they are in danger.

A while ago Captain Posey turned up the library of the German Foreign Office in a dance-hall in a tiny inn. It was founded by the Great Elector in 1680, and it contained among other things the files of the Congressional Record complete through 1943! There were also brass-band parts for every nation in the world, including Guatemala. The director, who had come with the books, was the fox-type, von Papenesque permanent state servant. He let us know he expected us to find the three other carloads of books which had been dispatched a month before. Clearly it was our fault that they had not arrived. It was very important, for the Foreign Office holdings were unique, and three million books at least had been burned in Germany since the aerial offensive started. Captain Posey and I had the same thought: the Nazis couldn't have burned three million books. That's a lot of anti-fascist literature. The Nazis didn't burn them. We did.

NOTES BY THE WAY

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

THE CONVENTIONAL ANTHOLOGY consists of variations on a single theme and is by its very nature impersonal. One would not think of reading it as if it were a "real" book. Yet I did just that with "The Reader's Companion" by Louis Kronenberger (Viking, $2). It is a selection of prose and poetry which Mr. Kronenberger enjoys and expects to read again and again. The book contains a wide variety of good writing, including light verse and aphorisms, which yields its own intrinsic satisfactions; but the volume has another sort of interest too. There is a pleasurable suspense in exploring a man's taste. Moreover, taste is so personal a matter that a true exposition of it is a form of characterization. Mr. Kronenberger, one is convinced, has been very conscientious in "giving himself away," and has made no concessions to considerations other than his personal preferences. I happen to like his taste, perhaps because it so often coincides with my own—and the fact, for instance, that he too likes Blake's poem "Ah, Sun-flower, weary of time" is to me somehow more convincing evidence of good character than the most fulsome "reference" he could produce. But the pleasures of disagreeing are also open to the reader. The point is that "The Reader's Companion" is not only a good collection; it also has the charm and interest of a personal communication—which makes it far more lively than the usual anthology.

THE ALCOHOLIC INTERPRETATION of the behavior of Congressmen and diplomats—a Washington psychiatrist says they drink too much—has its charms. It may even have validity in certain cases. But it would be unfair to the highball, the sidecar, the Alexander, to charge them with all the sins of Congressmen. Theodore Bilbo doesn't drink. Or of the State Department—I can't imagine Mr. Hull, for instance, entertaining the "inebriating impulse." Teetotalers are capable of an intoxication quite as dangerous as that derived from honest Scotch. Hitler did not drink—and the Pétain trial reminds us that during one period at least the trouble with the State Department was that it was swallowing too much Vichy.

THE VIKING PRESS has issued an "errata pamphlet" containing "Corrections of Misprints in Finnegans Wake by James Joyce, As Prepared by the Author after Publication of the First Edition." It is available, at a charge of ten cents, to libraries and to individuals who have copies of the novel. It is surely the most extraordinary collection of errata ever printed. Item: Page 10 line 34 from top . . . for "pelfalittlegnarlybird" read "pelfalittle gnarlybird." Joyce anticipated the scientists. All of a generation ago he split the atom of language and released the hidden powers of the word.

THE ATOMIC BOMB, by the way, has made at least one expression obsolete. "Blown to atoms" will have to be retired.

A SUCCESSFUL AUTHOR, who read my note about Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer and the reader's fee of $7.50 which it offered to a literary critic, contributes an account of his own experience. He was asked by one of the big companies to do a piece of publicity for a moving picture.

> I was sent the script [he writes] and a lot of hand-painted illustrations for the theaters. I set to work and did a thousand-word piece about it. I sent it in but held on to the material. After a while I wrote to know what the payment would be. I was told in a frightened telegram that they had no appropriation to pay for this. I put the matter in the hands of my agent, who got busy. Backed into a corner they managed to scrape the bottom of the till and found $100.
>
> Not long ago my agent queried me about a script. I happened to have the material in mind for such a script. I had a long encouraging letter from the head man in New York, and I set to work on a scenario. I spent eleven days on it. The two head men in New York liked it so much they air-mailed it at once to Hollywood. There it was thrown into the ash-can by Mister Big, and I got nothing.

SPEAKING OF HOLLYWOOD, a writer who recently took a short turn at working there notes in a letter: "Life here is not so strange once you cut clear of the moving picture industry." She also notes that "California is quite full of climate," which reminds me of the delightful remark of a friend who on going to that fabulous state wrote that he had been cast into outer sunshine.

Dutch History

EVOLUTION OF THE DUTCH NATION. By Bernard H. M. Vlekke. Roy Publishers. $3.50.

A CENTURY ago Dutch Catholics did not write history. They were treated as second-class citizens by the ruling Protestant majority. Dutch schoolbooks taught that the rise of the Dutch Republic was due to the Calvinist revolt against the Catholic sovereign who, being also King of Spain, ruled the Netherlands as an absentee landlord from his palace in Madrid. The Catholics, therefore, had failed the cause of the Dutch fight for freedom, and their nineteenth-century descendants had to be grateful for the tolerance that granted them citizenship in a Calvinist nation for whose emergence from serfdom they could not claim any credit.

They refused to be grateful. They denied that the country's liberation from Spanish rule was an exclusively Calvinist achievement. They found an able spokesman in the physician Willem Nuyens, whose hobby was historical research. In his leisure hours he wrote in vindication of his fellow religionists and sought to prove that the Catholics in the time of William the Silent had had an equal share with the Protestants in the Dutch fight for freedom. Nuyens was one of the leaders of the Catholic revival which won for the members of the Church of Rome in Holland not only full equality with the non-Catholic majority but also prominence in scholarship, letters, art, and politics.

H. G. WELLS—
Prophet of the Atomic Bomb

Read his latest book:

"CRUX ANSATA — An indictment of the Roman Catholic Church"

An historical summary of the Catholic Church's political intrigues leading to its tie-up with the Nazi-Fascist-Shinto Axis.

Cloth Binding $1.75 Paper-covered $1.25

Also get a copy of

"BEHIND THE DICTATORS" by L. H. Lehmann

A fully documented analysis of Vatican-Fascist collaboration.

Cloth Binding $1.75 Paper-covered $1.00

COMBINATION OFFERS	Both Cloth Bound Books	$3.00
	Both Paper Bound Books	$2.00

New Pamphlet

"VATICAN POLICY
IN THE SECOND WORLD WAR"

48 pages of Documented Facts 25c

☞ Free to those who return this ad with their order for the above books

Order From:

AGORA PUBLISHING CO., Dept. 951
229 WEST 48TH STREET NEW YORK 19, N. Y.

Dr. Vlekke is one among many Catholic scholars of distinction who now bring credit to the nation whose loyal sons they are. It goes without saying that Dr. Vlekke's portrayal of the evolution of the Dutch nation differs widely from the traditional Calvinist picture. He does not deny that the revolt under the leadership of the Prince of Orange was a fight for freedom, but he does not subscribe to the theory that the forces unchained by that revolt worked the chemistry by which the disparate elements of the Dutch populace were solidified into a nation. That chemical process, he believes, was already at work in the late Middle Ages. The county of Holland with the diocese of Utrecht, the county of Flanders with the Duchy of Brabant formed two political units whose common source of prosperity was their participation in sea-borne commerce. The Dukes of Burgundy found in these provinces the mainstay of their expansionist policy. That policy would not have succeeded so well in binding the Low Countries together if the Dutch subjects they acquired had not been willing to be united. The Dukes met with opposition, to be sure, but the majority of the State Assemblies in their patrimonial provinces was on their side. These provinces formed the nucleus of the nation that later emerged and received its charter in the treaty of Ghent of November 8, 1576. It was a shortlived unit. Political integration was thwarted by religious dissension. The leading classes in the southern provinces, being conservative and Catholic, feared Calvinist radicalism more than Spanish domination, and seceded from the union with the North. Thus came about that regrettable cleavage between the northern and southern Netherlands which in the early sixteenth century seemed predestined for national unity. For a brief period after Napoleon's fall the two were reunited, but Netherland and Belgium, as they are now called, persist by force of tradition and adverse circumstance in their reciprocal aloofness.

Since Dr. Vlekke traces the unifying tendencies to a period prior to the revolt it is only natural that in his view the commanding figure of the Prince of Orange looms less large than he does in historical tradition. This is not stated by way of criticism. On the contrary, the author's unorthodox concept of the forces which formed the Dutch nation makes his book all the more interesting. He has complete mastery over the recalcitrant material and his style is so readable that his learning does not annoyingly obtrude. I know of no other Hollander in the United States who could guide Americans as expertly through the maze of Dutch history.

A. J. BARNOUW

B. H. Haggin is on vacation. His column will be resumed in the issue of September 8.

BRIEFER COMMENT

The Rule of Law

EMERY REVES'S new book "The Anatomy of Peace" (Harper, $2) reminds me of the guest at a New Yorker cocktail party who protested, "Sure, I can think of repartee, too, but I can't shout loud enough." Mr. Reves is forceful, interesting, and dead right on many things. But he roars like the Bull of Bashan and he never will have done with his points. At the close of the book he is still excitedly throwing in remarks the substance of which he has used again and again.

But this is certainly not just another of the peace books. Its central thesis is that the trouble in the world is due to the preservation of antiquated, and fatal, ideas of national sovereignty in a world of industrialism. There is absolutely no remedy but the abandonment of nationalism; of itself that remedy will suffice.

The exposition proceeds in a familiar way. Capitalism has failed as a polity as it has failed as a productive and distributive system. Socialism has failed. Even when it denounced nationalism, socialism did nothing effective to resist it in moments of crisis. And now that the Soviet Union has become nationalist, socialism is even more a delusion. Religion has failed. It does not and cannot be expected ever to appeal to enough people with enough force to restore true political catholicity.

Within any country, Mr. Reves argues, order, peace, and liberty have been the creations of law and of nothing else. The same will turn out to be true for the world as a whole. Today's internationalism is fallacious, for it rests upon unsurrendered national sovereignty; self-determination has the same defect. Collective security is just as much an illusion and for the same reason. Mr. Reves's argument is presented with ruthless force and absolute sincerity, but his unconcealable weakness is that he refuses to confront the next question. What sort of action is required to make nations surrender their absolute sovereignty? For Mr. Reves, forceful insistence on his doctrine is the essential, for he believes that it can stand and be effective without doctrinal context. The Socialist who accepts his main point will still believe that radical reconstruction of society is a necessary condition or concomitant of the intellectual and emotional revolution the author demands.

RALPH BATES

Things Not Caesar's

THERE WILL ALWAYS be an England. I trust there will always be Butlers, Beefeaters, and Belted Earls, even under a Labor government. And I devoutly hope there will always be The Times. The charm of Charles Morgan's essays, "Reflections in a Mirror" (Macmillan, $2.50), is their timely timelessness. London was blitzed and robot-bombed: but "Menander" kept writing of Why Birds Sing, of Ivan Turgenev, of Nausicaa and the Pelicans.

This is not aloofness, heroic or callous. Charles Morgan does not ignore the giant sorrows of the world. But, in his quest for values, he realizes that life does not exist only for the moment's sake. Under many forms there is a single inquiry throughout the book: the conflict between The Mighty Strong Beast, the collective, and the Uncommon Man. Perhaps he has not made a sufficient effort to understand "the Common Man"; the dreary average he depicts is not a foe quite worthy of his rapier. In his final essay, On Unrelated Knowledge, he expresses the conviction that man is most truly himself when he lives by law. But there is no law of the uncommon: the law is common ground, the rules that apply to our common humanity. No government, no church, no culture, can live under anarchy. The domain of the law, i.e., that which is common to men, is vast and expanding. This apparent contradiction is not resolved by the author. However, I am more than willing to admit that there are things which are not Caesar's—things which dwell beyond government, church, and culture, above the law.

Two quotations, in a different line of thought: "The evidences of strength in our civilization . . . in the proofs which reach us in increasing strength that in France, in Scandinavia, in all the occupied territories, desire for the reintegration of a free Europe is burning and effective." "The ideas of the Roman Empire, of the Papacy, and more distantly of Athens, have all served to establish, as a reality in the human mind, the idea of European coherence. If it were not a concept with power over thought, the Germans would not have troubled to represent their aggression as an attempt to establish a new European order." Only our intellectual sloth and our faint-heartedness prevent us from acknowledging this obvious fact.

ALBERT GUERARD

The Two Chinas

MOST BOOKS ON CHINA suffer from too great an absorption with one or another of the two Chinas. Observers who have visited in Chungking territory tend either to ignore Communist China or to parrot Kuomintang propaganda about alleged Communist atrocities. The few observers who have visited the so-called border areas are naturally concerned primarily with recounting the achievements and problems of Communist China. Mr. Rosinger, Far Eastern expert of the Foreign Policy Association, has performed a unique service in "China's Crisis" (Alfred A. Knopf, $3) by giving us a balanced picture of the two Chinas at the most critical stage in the emergence of the Chinese people into the modern world. He stresses the constructive achievements of the Chiang Kai-shek regime, but he does not gloss over the corruption, sloth, and open collaboration with the enemy that have persisted in Chungking throughout the war.

It is doubtful whether anyone can read this book without being gravely concerned regarding the wisdom of recent American policy in apparently throwing its weight on the side of the groups which would keep China under the yoke of the past. Yet on the whole it is an optimistic book. Mr. Rosinger is convinced that despite its many weaknesses and the shortcomings of its leaders, China will emerge from the war the dominant power of the East. But its strength and the welfare of its people will depend largely on its ability to achieve unity without a bloody internal conflict. The prevention of such a conflict is a challenge to the best statesmanship not only of China but of America, Britain, and the Soviet Union.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

VERSE CHRONICLE

Four Canadians

OF THE Canadian poets in this group, Ralph Gustafson appears to be least conscious of his nationality as implying any special predicament or being the source of any distinctive twist of sensibility. Apart from a few local references, the lyrics that make up "Flight Into Darkness" (Pantheon, $2) are quite in the vein of recent Anglo-American verse. In them anxiety over the state of the world alternates with themes of private love; and the writing, loaded with surprising adjectives, is eager to announce itself as modern. How little appropriate this modern manner is to the thinking core of the poems can be seen by inspecting closely almost any one of them. In Dedication, for example, the poet rejects the usual practice of honoring the war dead with conventional memorials and proposes to show what a soldier's death really implies. But the demonstration turns out to consist largely in declaimers, exclamatory remarks, and lists of objects notoriously more pleasing to poets than to actual boys:

> You who live, see! These,
> These were his hills where laughter was
> And counted years of longing, grain
> And wintry apples scorched in sun,
> Of corded hemlock deep in snow.

In both a political and a psychological sense, F. R. Jones is more aware than Gustafson of being a Canadian. Naturally this alone would not make him superior, nor is he so in fact. His being a Canadian, although it is for him a great source of ideas, is unfortunately not a cause of much originality in the texture of his poetry. In "Overture" (Bruce Humphries, $2.50) one group of poems explores his reactions to the Canadian landscape. Here the precious "North Woods" of the tourist emerge as a bleak, uncreated region of rock and forest intersected by the too elemental, too relentlessly flowing St. Lawrence.

> a quiet calling > of no mind
> out of long æons
> when dust was blind > and ice hid sound
>
> only a moving > with no note > granite lips
> a stone throat

Obviously the landscape embodies for Jones some uncongenial sentiment of geological timelessness. Why is he satisfied to state it in imagist verse so conventional that the total effect is only a slight shudder? Another group of his poems is made up of satires on local politics and literary life written from the point of view of a Marxist and anti-provincial. Many of these are amusing:

> and he   the last dot in the sky > did but accentuate an i
>
> now you may see him   virginal > content to live in montreal.

In a note on the jacket, E. K. Brown, the critic of Canadian poetry, says of Jones that "he has contrived to find for his social ideas forms at once simple and beautifully designed." On the contrary he has found them ready-made in Cummings, early Eliot, and others; and this derivativeness is all the more inhibiting in that it is so clever. One poem even undertakes to promote the revolution in the sleepy rhythms of The Garden of Proserpine:

> Till power is brought to pooling
> And outcasts share in ruling
> There will not be an ending
> Nor any peace for spending.

One mentions the derivativeness of Jones's verse forms only because it is so clear a hindrance to the development of a Canadian poetry. He is in the position of those American poets of pre-Whitman days who labored futilely to write about American experience in the manner of Byron or Tennyson.

Patrick Anderson and Irving Layton are probably the most interesting poets of this group. In "A Tent For April" (First Statement, Montreal, $1) Anderson produces a wandering, gracefully-awkward verse as if to amuse himself on a rainy day; and we do not need to look at the jacket biography to guess that he was at Oxford in the '30's.

> These to whom everything happens but history
> Continually wash with cold water of their eyes
> The world, etc.

Yet within these too relaxed impromptus is a great deal of striking fantasy and comment, and considerable feeling for local sights and moods. Like F. R. Jones, Anderson perceives in the North a "vehement loneliness" together with a slightly wearying air of perpetual promise everlastingly unfulfilled; but Anderson throws a wider net and brings up more suggestive images:

> I cannot tell the boredom from the dream > sleep from these trees
> the vacant air from the wind's pale Utopias . . .

Anderson's cultivated ease is entirely absent from Irving Layton's 'Here and Now" (First Statement, Montreal, $1). Layton writes out of a stark plebeian experience among the waterfronts, redlight districts, and Jewish neighborhoods of Montreal, where it seems always to be a very dark night. These experiences he translates into descriptive satires akin to those of Karl Shapiro but not at all dependent on them.

> O reptilian streets whose scaly limbs
> Are crooked stairways and the grocery store,
> Isolate, is your dreaming half shut eye:
> Each virgin at the barricaded door
> Feels your tongue-kiss like a butterfly.

As in this passage, the anger is always leaping right out of Layton's poems and at your throat, often busting up the poems in the process. Yet for all their snarling, bottom-dog attitudes they often succeed in convincing us of their reality.

F. W. DUPEE

NOTICE OF CHANGE OF ADDRESS

Nation* subscribers should give at least three weeks' notice of a change of address, indicating the old as well as the new address.

MOTION PICTURES

RKO NOW

Manhattan
ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st ST.
86th ST.
58th ST. near Lex.
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENT
RIVERSIDE
23rd ST.

Bronx
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL

Westchester
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

"Comedy Drama of Young Love . . . Honest and Straightforward"—N. Y. Sun

ROBERT YOUNG
LARAINE DAY

'Those Endearing Young Charms'

Screen Version of EDWARD CHADOROV'S Stage Play

—Plus—

'WEST of the PECOS' BOB MITCHUM BARBARA HALE

Brooklyn
BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYOU Coney Island

Queens
ALDEN Jamaica
Keith's FLUSHING
Keith's RICH. HILL
STRAND Far Rockaway

"A supreme production . . . both beautiful and good." —PM

BETTE DAVIS

"THE CORN IS GREEN"

with

John Dall • Joan Lorring • Nigel Bruce • Rhys Williams

From the stage play by EMLYN WILLIAMS

—PLUS—

"HITCHHIKE TO HAPPINESS" with AL PEARCE

STAGE PLAYS

FREDRIC MARCH in

A BELL FOR ADANO With MARGO

By Paul Osborn from
JOHN HERSEY'S PULITZER PRIZE WINNING NOVEL

CORT Theater, 48th Street, East of Broadway. BRyant 9-0046. Eves., 8:40, $1.20-$4.20 tax. Incl. Matinees Wed. & Sat.

MICHAEL TODD Presents

UP IN CENTRAL PARK

Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS
Lyrics by DOROTHY FIELDS
Music by SIGMUND ROMBERG

BROADWAY THEATRE, Broadway & 53rd Street. Matinees Wed. & Sat.
REALLY AIR-CONDITIONED

The New Statesman and Nation

England's Leading Weekly Review

may now be obtained through

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

Yearly subscription $6.50 including postage

SPECIMEN copy on request

MOTION PICTURES

"It is worth any dozen run-of-the-studio Academy Award winners."—TIME

David L. Loew presents

Zachary SCOTT Betty FIELD

The Southerner

From George Sessions Perry's
"HOLD AUTUMN IN YOUR HAND"

with J. CARROL NAISH

Beulah Bondi - Percy Kilbride

Directed by Jean Renoir

BRANDT'S AIR-COOLED

Now Playing GLOBE B'way at 46th St.

20th Century-Fox presents

The Most Glorious Motion Picture That Ever Sang Its Way Into Your Heart!

Rodgers and Hammerstein's

STATE FAIR

In Technicolor

Starring

Dana ANDREWS Jeanne CRAIN Dick HAYMES Vivian BLAINE

Now Playing ROXY 7th Ave. at 50th St.

BETTY HUTTON
ARTURO DE CORDOVA
In Paramount's

"INCENDIARY BLONDE"

In Technicolor
with Charles Ruggles
Barry Fitzgerald • Maurice Rocco

In Person!
"The Hour of Charm"
All-Girl Orch.
Under the Direction of Phil Spitalny
With
Evelyn • Jeannie
Francine • Viola
Mack Triplets
All American Glee Club • Imogene Coca

NOW PLAYING PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

RESORTS

YOURS! A little more than EVERYTHING!

Pamper vacation whims with over 25 ways to have fun, including Tennis, Swimming, Boating, Handball, Riding, Recorded Musicales, Dancing, Arts & Crafts, and All Other Sports. Indoor Recreations. Entertainment Gaities. Good Eating. Merry Company. Cheery Quarters, Regular-and DeLuxe. Write or 'Phone.

SUGGESTION: Conditions being what they are, we urge you to MAKE RESERVATIONS NOW!

WOODBOURNE, N. Y Tel. WOODBOURNE 1150

CHESTERS ZUNBARG

A DELIGHTFUL HIDEAWAY IN THE MOUNTAINS

45 Miles from New York City

Zindorest ★ Park Monroe N. Y.

Telephone 4421

A Resort for Adults Only

Exclusive location. 150 acres of unusual beauty. All sports. Lake and Pool on premises. Delicious food, relaxing atmosphere, dancing, modern accommodations.

Greyhound, Adirondack Trailway and Short Line Buses stop at our Entrance. ★

Year 'Round in the ADIRONDACKS

ESTATE providing exquisite natural charm for gracious living.

CRYSTAL LAKE—a 60-acre natural spring-fed lake, entirely within the property of 800 acres, surrounded by rich woodland with magnificent mountain views.

Accommodations in Lodge and Cottages (steam heated), Boathouse, Tennis, Riding, Fishing, Golf nearby. Excellent Cuisine.

5½ hrs. from Grand Central Station

Rates: Lodge $75, Cottage $50 Wk.

CRYSTAL LAKE LODGE
Chestertown, N. Y.

N.Y.C.—MU 5-0493
I. H. KESSLER
Chestertown 2401

BREEZEMONT PARK
ARMONK, N.Y.

35 MILES FROM NEW YORK CITY

"A Country Estate in the Scenic Hills of Westchester County"

The nearest of all nearby resorts. Exclusive location. Luxuriously furnished. Dignified. All sport activities. Excellent cuisine

OPEN ALL YEAR Phone Armonk Village 955

WESTERN VIEW FARM

26th Season

Rate: $9 a day — $49 a week

TED OHMER

New Milford Connecticut

Telephone: NEW MILFORD 440

Timberland
POTTERSVILLE, N. Y.

AN ADULT CAMP IN THE ADIRONDACKS
LIMITED TO 100
OPEN UNTIL SEPTEMBER 23
ALL SPORTS • PRIVATE LAKE
DANCING • LECTURES • CONCERTS
N. Y. OFFICE: 33 W. 42nd St. LOngacre 5-3674

The Rare Charm of an Intimate Congenial Group

RESORTS

Yours for Vacation Enjoyment

HILLTOP LODGE

On beautiful Sylvan Lake
HOPEWELL JUNCTION, N. Y.

65 mi. from N. Y. C. • R. R. Station Pawling, N. Y.
Every conceivable Sport and Recreation . . . with intimate, congenial people

Open from May thru October

Under direction of:
PAUL WOLFSON &
SOL ROTHAUSER

New York Office:
277 BROADWAY
COrtlandt 7-3958

—Announcing—

Membership in the West End Casino

Our guests are invited to enjoy all the facilities of this Ocean Front Beach Club, including the Pool, Beach and Evening Entertainment, also our own excellent Tennis, Handball, Cycling. Golf & Riding available. Dancing and Delicious Food. Join us in the gay and diversified activities at our own beautiful Resort Estate.

The Oaks

ELBERON, NEW JERSEY
Telephone: Long Branch 2438

INVITATION TO RELAX

Enjoy the serenity of Plum Point. Gorgeous countryside, roaring fireplace, delicious food — and fun. Only 55 miles from New York

MAKE RESERVATIONS EARLY

plum point

"Year-Round Vacation Resort"

New Windsor, N.Y. Tel: Newburgh 4270

NEW — Opened by Veteran World War II

THE COLONIAL TERRACE Hotel & Restaurant Peekskill, N. Y.

Open All Year

Swimming • Tennis • Ping Pong
Field Activities • Dietary Laws
Rates and Information on Request

CONTRIBUTORS

LINCOLN KIRSTEIN is attached to the Monuments, Fine Arts, and Archives Section of the Third Army.

A. J. BARNOUW is Queen Wilhelmina Professor of the History, Language, and Literature of the Netherlands at Columbia University.

ALBERT GUERARD, professor of comparative and general literature at Stanford University, is the author of "Literature and Society," "Art for Art's Sake," and "Europe Free and United."

F. W. DUPEE teaches English at Bard College.

The Nation Index

for Volume 160 of The Nation, covering the period from January through June, 1945, is now available. This excellent reference aid may be had for 15 cents.

Send your order for the Index with remittance, to

THE Nation

20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

LESSON IN LOGISTICS:

Mrs. Brown learns why she must use less paper!

WHEN MRS. BROWN asked Grocer White why he didn't wrap her loaf of bread in the usual paper bag, he gave her a mighty quick and important answer. He told her how much our armed forces need every kind of paper to wrap the invasion ammunition, weapons, foods and medical supplies in. And Mrs. Brown, of course, was equally quick to see the importance of paper conservation not only at the store but in the home. Now she carries a market basket or shopping bag to save precious paper bags. Mrs. Brown is sure doing her duty. Are You?

All the magazines in America, added together, USE only 5% of the nation's paper supply. Yet, out of this comparatively small amount, they are SAVING 450 million pounds this year and RELEASING it for vital needs.

This advertisement contributed by this magazine and prepared by the War Advertising Council in cooperation with the War Production Board and the Office of War Information.

PAPER PACKS A WAR PUNCH!
AVOID USELESS WRAPPINGS! ★ ACCEPT SIMPLER PACKAGING! ★ MAKE EACH PIECE STRETCH! ★ SHARE THE PRINTED WORD!

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 161 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · SEPTEMBER 8, 1945 NUMBER 10

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 213

EDITORIALS

Showdown in Japan 215
No Longer Uncle Shylock 216
Anglo-American Economics by Aylmer Vallance 217
Giral Takes Over by Freda Kirchwey 218

ARTICLES

Brass Hats Undaunted by I. F. Stone 219
British Labor Sets Its Course by Michael Foot 221
China on the Brink by T. A. Bisson 222
Battle of the St. Lawrence by Benjamin J. Atlas 224
In the Wind 226

POLITICAL WAR

The New Spanish Cabinet by J. Alvarez Del Vayo 227
Yugoslav Democracy, Limited by Hal Lehrman 228

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

The Face in the Mountain by James Grossman 230
The Problem of Influence by Lionel Trilling 234
Briefer Comment 234
Music by B. H. Haggin 237

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 238

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 125 by Jack Barrett 240

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor J. KING GORDON
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Editor Political War Section
J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor J. MITCHELL MORSE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates
LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS
CAREY MCWILLIAMS REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1945, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 818 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

GERMANY'S SURRENDER WAS A PIECEMEAL affair, bloody and disorderly. The leading characters fled for their lives or were seized or lay dead or disfigured in the midst of rubble. There was little ceremony about it. Terror had collapsed in terror, and the end seemed ugly and appropriate. The surrender of Japan was different. It was accomplished with a certain pomp and elegance. It went off smoothly; people played the roles history had clearly designed for them. A sense of dramatic fitness controlled the performance as in a well-directed drama. But perhaps because of this very fact the whole thing was a little gruesome. Correspondents had to keep reminding their readers that behind all this decorum lay the long, ugly slaughter stretching down the years from Japan's first thrust into Manchuria. Nothing decorous about any of it: the systematic job of destruction, rape, and massacre at Nanking; the elaborate sham of negotiation with an unready, gullible America, ending abruptly when the bombers arrived over Pearl Harbor; the death march of Bataan; the inhuman jungle fighting, without even a pretense of mercy or honor on either side. . . . The Japanese generals were polite and solemn; the Japanese officials cooperative, ready to play their new role of superperfect hosts to a conquering army. Everybody, from the top to somewhere near the bottom, is all set to show that the war was just a little error, a temporary misunderstanding, soon to be expiated, soon to be forgiven, and thereafter the Son of Heaven and all his minions can be left in charge and business can go on as usual during repairs. . . . Correspondents report that the Japanese are bitter about American bombings, but when you mention Nanking or Manila they look pained, as if you had made an awkward slip of the tongue. Surely the uninvited guest knows better than that! But Admiral Halsey expressed emotions that must have boiled through the veins of most of his fellow-countrymen during these last few days when he said he would "have liked to kick each Japanese delegate in the face." Not elegant. Not polite. But very exact and satisfying—and somehow reassuring.

*

WE WELCOME THE HINT FROM STETTINIUS IN London that the United States and Great Britain may be prepared to share the secret of the atomic bomb with our allies and to place its development under the control of the new United Nations Organization. We agree with the Russian publication, New Times, that since the fundamental principles are known "it is simply a question of time before any country will be able to produce atomic bombs." Under such conditions war would be suicidal, and the reductio ad ab- surdum of the nationalistic attitude is the New York Daily News editorial suggesting "two atomic bombs for one." Presumably if our enemies destroy us once, we would destroy them twice! We are glad to see that Senator Pepper has raised his voice against the attempt to make the atomic bomb an Anglo-American monopoly. Altogether too little thinking is being done about the implications of the atomic bomb for warfare and for the future of society. Ultimately it will render both present war strategy and capitalism obsolete. In the meantime we would like to suggest a special commission to study the effects of the atomic bombing in Japan and the rushing of medical aid for Japanese civilians terribly burned (despite bland War Department denials) by the radioactive after-effects of atomic detonation.

*

HOPES OF A PEACEFUL AND DEMOCRATIC solution to China's domestic problems were stirred as we went to press. There were indications that behind the scenes the United States and the Soviet Union may have insisted that Chiang make peace with the Chinese Communists and establish a democratic regime at home as the price for the Sino-Soviet pact and the return of Manchuria to Chinese sovereignty. The tone of the Russian press, the statement made by T. V. Soong at Ottawa, Chiang's agreement to postpone the People's Congress and to make it somewhat more representative, give promise that his current talks with Mao Tse-tung may yet be fruitful. American policy in this situation remains far from clear. Although there is one report that Chiang has agreed to permit the Chinese Communists to accept the surrender of Japanese troops in certain areas, our planes are still transporting Kuomintang soldiers into Yenan's territory and American correspondents have been prevented from covering these unusual military activities. By utilizing American planes and American personnel to ferry Kuomintang troops deep into Communist areas, Generals Wedemeyer and Hurley may be asking for trouble. Clashes are bound to arise in regions where conflict would otherwise have been physically impossible. If American soldiers are killed in these clashes, the incident would, as Mr. Bisson points out in his article in this issue, provide fuel for a "red scare" that would play into the hands of the Russia-hating press. Russia has deliberately adopted a hands-off policy in the China crisis, presumably out of a desire to strengthen United Nations unity. But American intervention is potentially just as dangerous to Allied unity as Russian intervention would be.

*

NO ONE AT ALL FAMILIAR WITH THE WAY THE minds of most officials and big business men operate—both prefer ballyhoo to candor in dealing with the public—can fail to be impressed with the job that the Office of War Information did. Elmer Davis collected a staff which included some of the ablest newspapermen in the country, and they succeeded, despite heart-breaking difficulties, in providing press and public with more honest information about what was going on than has been vouchsafed any other country in any other war. On every side, from the big dollar-a-year men of the War Production Board to the dodos of the State Department, Davis and his young men were surrounded by bigwigs to whom double-talk came natural. Almost every press release and every major report had to be cleared through several agencies dominated by just such mentalities, and it is a miracle that the resultant product was as informative as it was. That the OWI should be abolished at this time, when we more than ever need an agency to interpret our ways to the world, is a tragic consequence of the obscurantist partisanship which made OWI the butt of Congress and the rightist press. The international information functions of the OWI and of the Office of Inter-American Affairs are to be transferred to an "Interim International Information Service" in the State Department. If the President is wise, he will leave that vestigial agency in the State Department for the interim only. The stodgy ways, musty atmosphere, and un-American outlook that continue to pervade that department make it totally unsuited to the task of interpreting America for foreign countries. At the very least, if this agency is to stay in the State Department, the President ought to appoint a man of Archibald MacLeish's ability, stature, and imagination to handle international information and give him ample power to keep free of bureaucratic barnacles.

*

SPRUILLE BRADEN'S MASTERLY ADDRESS ON THE anatomy of fascism which he delivered at a luncheon of the Argentine-American Cultural Institute in Buenos Aires was also his first speech as Assistant Secretary of State. We can't help feeling that as such it must have fluttered the tail coats in the State Department. "Let no one imagine," concluded Mr. Braden, "that my being transferred to Washington means the abandonment of the task I have undertaken. The voice of freedom makes itself heard in this land and I do not believe anyone will succeed in drowning it. I shall hear it from Washington with the same clarity with which I heard it in Buenos Aires." Certainly what we need is diplomatic officials who can hear the voice of freedom even through the State Department's thick walls of protocol, precedent, and plain reaction. We hope that Mr. Braden's hearing remains unimpaired and also that his appointment represents a change of policy toward the voice of freedom whether it rises from Argentina or, say, Franco's Spain.

*

PERON WILL FALL WITHIN THE MONTH IF political developments in Argentina continue at their present pace. The middle-of-the road Radicals, last to oppose him, hope to be first to replace him and they may succeed. We do not think the State Department would object. But since the best-laid plans of ministers are sometimes ruined by determined men, the Argentines may confound conservative elements both in our country and in their own. Several hours after Braden's biting denunciation of the Perón regime the Radicals finally agreed to join the United Democratic Front which includes all opposition parties—on condition that they retain full independence and autonomy and that the Conservatives and anti-Personalists are excluded. The next step is up to the United Front, which, unless the Radicals withdraw their objections, will have to decide which group to exclude. Meanwhile Socialists, Communists, and Radicals held large independent rallies last week, the first since the lifting of the state of siege. And last week also, a second group of exiled democratic leaders came back to Argentina to help liberate their homeland. Perón was afraid to order his police to attack them as he did the week before when the first group of leftist opposition leaders returned. The militant strike of teachers and students and the fact that British Labor government may be counted on to withdraw support from Perón are other factors hastening the dénouement. Meanwhile Perón is not idle. According to one rumor he plans a coup in which Farrell will be replaced by a renegade Radical or by a military figure such as General Avalos who will permit Perón to keep on pulling the strings. As opposing forces prepare for the showdown one fact is evident. A conservative, fairly democratic government dominated by the large landholders and livestock producers and dedicated to the establishment of a stable government of minimal democracy would not displease certain elements in our State Department. And if the people of Argentina are not careful that is what they may get.

*

GOVERNOR DEWEY IS THE REAL OFFENDER IN the Campbell case. He was the glamorous district attorney who missed his goal of a record of 100 percent in convictions by only 2 per cent. And it was his office that in 1938 brought about the conviction of Bernard Campbell for a crime he never committed. Detective Woods, who arrested Campbell when ordered to do so, always doubted his guilt and was instrumental in bringing the true culprit to justice. Some restitution has been made to Campbell for the forty months he spent in Sing Sing by Governor Dewey's executive pardon. At public hearings held last week by the New York County Criminal Courts Bar Association, Robert Daru, the association's counsel, showed that key witnesses were coached before the trial and that the State Parole Board had not, as it asserted, interviewed all persons of any consequence in the case. He charged that, despite the pardon, Campbell had not received full justice either from Governor Dewey or from the state parole authority. For attached to the pardon was a board report saying that it was "impossible today to establish with certainty" Campbell's innocence. This despite the fact that another man had confessed to the forgery of which Campbell was falsely convicted. Mr. Campbell's name has been cleared to our satisfaction—but Mr. Dewey's has not.

*

CHICAGO IS THE FIRST CITY IN THE UNITED States to outlaw racial discrimination in matters of employment. Last week the City Council adopted a Fair Employment Practice ordinance that makes it a misdemeanor for an employer to refuse to employ or for a union to refuse to admit any person because of race, creed, color, or national origin. Violations will be prosecuted in the Municipal Court by the City Prosecutor. Ira Latimer, executive director of the Chicago Civil Liberties Union, which drafted and introduced the ordinance, has stressed its special importance at this time in view of the vast public-projects program about to be initiated in Chicago. The ordinance, a model of brevity and clarity, states that "whereas . . . the democratic way of life within the nation can be defended successfully only with the help and support of all groups within its borders, the City of Chicago, to cooperate with the United States Government by eliminating discrimination in public and private employment, enacts this ordinance. . . ." Not only do acts of discrimination in hiring, promotions, wage increases, tenure, and conditions of employment come under the classification of misdemeanors. But in Chicago it is now also unlawful to seek information concerning the race, color, religion, origin, or ancestry of any employee as a condition of employment and to place help-wanted advertisements based on such discrimination. Chicago has broken fresh ground in the fight for minority rights.

Showdown in Japan

THE next few days may provide a clue as to whether we shall have peace or merely a protracted truce in the Pacific. Now that the surrender has been signed and Allied troops are well established in the heart of the Japanese empire, the nature of our basic policy toward the defeated enemy will rapidly become evident. So far—until the signing of the formal documents—our policies have been amazingly soft, especially when compared with our treatment of Germany after its capitulation. We chose to work through the Emperor in the hope of effecting a bloodless entry into the Japanese home islands. This policy is defensible on the ground that it has saved American lives, even though it inevitably gave an impression of conciliating the authorities. But now that the occupation has been accomplished, General MacArthur must act decisively to eradicate the sources of Japanese militarism or he will find that the opportunity has eluded him altogether.

It is evident that the Japanese government is striving to make our occupation as painless as possible in the hope that MacArthur may be tempted to leave the existing governmental and economic machinery intact rather than risk anarchy in an endeavor to set up direct Allied control over every aspect of Japanese life. So far the Japanese have been embarrassingly passive and polite. Correspondents have complained that the occupation has often taken on the atmosphere of a tea party. And the government has complacently gone about its task of substituting "democracy" for totalitarian rule. The militarist Premier Higashi-Kuni has announced that a general election will soon be called, and that restrictions on the freedom of the press and assembly will soon be lifted. Textbooks to be used in the schools will be carefully purged, not by the Allied occupation authorities, but by the Japanese government itself.

Thus the Japanese hope to achieve by guile what they could not possibly have achieved by prolonged and fanatical resistance, and the danger is that they will succeed. George E. Jones, a correspondent of the New York Times, reported from Okinawa that the Allied military administration intends, unless events force a change, to channel its orders through Emperor Hirohito, his Cabinet, and the prefectural and local governments. As there has been no official statement of policy, this dispatch may merely represent one correspondent's gloomy reaction to developments prior to occupation. But if this is to be our policy, it means that the groups in Japan that are responsible for the war—the superpatriots, the Zaibatsu, and the landlords who have dominated Japanese policy for many years—will retain their dominant position. A few war criminals might have to commit hara-kiri—for the crime of losing the war, not for starting it—but the feudal political and social structure which is the root cause of Japanese militarism would not only remain intact but continue to be dominated by the individuals who led the world to disaster. What started out to be a policy of accepting the Emperor as an instrument for facilitating surrender would thus end in our accepting all the evils which the Japanese throne embodies.

Nothing that General MacArthur has done to date deserves such harsh judgment. He has gone about the task of arranging the occupation and formal surrender in a businesslike manner. He has yet to show his hand toward the Emperor, the present Cabinet, or the other war criminals. He is known to bear little love for the Japanese, and it is doubtful that he is greatly impressed by their excessive politeness and subservience. But MacArthur's virtues are of a military rather than a political order. His actions in the first fortnight of occupation will reveal whether he is likely to be outmaneuvered in peace by an enemy that was his inferior in battle.

MacArthur's first step after establishing his position thoroughly enough to enforce his will should be to dismiss the present Cabinet and arrest Higashi-Kuni and several other of its members as war criminals. It is a militarist government and, as long as it remains in power, our anti-militarist protestations will lack moral force. After eliminating the hold of the military and their associates on the government, the Allied Supreme Commander should turn his attention to the task of demilitarizing Japanese industry. This will involve the establishment of new forms of ownership and control. For in Japan, even more than in Germany, the industrialist class was actively responsible for the war. Only by making it impossible for them to recover their control over industry can we hope to destroy the foundations of Japanese militarism. Punishment of the active warmakers will probably not be such a difficult task. Through defeat they have already forfeited their standing as individuals in Japanese society. Suppression of the hundreds of patriotic societies, which played such an active part in whipping up the war fever, presents much greater difficulties. These societies will doubtless go underground and will probably be able to escape detection unless the occupation authorities are successful in developing a genuinely anti-militarist regime in Tokyo capable of dealing with them.

The discovery and enlisting of democratic groups within Japan that can be counted on to oppose the revival of militarism is perhaps the greatest challenge that faces the Allied Supreme Commander. Obviously, he will not find them within the present government or in any high civil or business posts. A few anti-war leaders may be found in prison or in exile, but Japan did not even keep its opposition leaders in concentration camps where they would be easily available for our use. Most of the men who opposed the war openly in 1937 are now believed to be dead. Yet if we are to credit the dispatches of the correspondents who visited Tokyo and nearby Japanese cities, the common people of Japan are pathetically glad that the war is over. If a vote could be taken today, the anti-war sentiment would undoubtedly be far greater than it was in the 1937 elections when the anti-militarist groups outvoted the war parties. But in a land accustomed to dictatorial rule, the undercurrent of popular unrest may not become apparent until the present militarist regime is driven from power. Waiting for this latent democratic force to develop into a constructive movement capable of regenerating Japan may prolong the occupation for many months or years beyond the short period now being considered. But it is the only alternative to handing Japan back to the groups that even now are probably studying the Pearl Harbor documents to find out how they can improve on their treachery next time.

No Longer Uncle Shylock

EVERY American who understands what this war has cost our Allies will be grateful to President Truman for his frankness in disavowing any intention to collect the $42,000,000,000 we have supplied our Allies on lend-lease, and for his reminder that the cost of the war is to be measured "in blood and toil . . . in the immeasurable wreckage of human lives . . . and cities" as well as in dollars. These are far cries from the "they hired the money, didn't they?" of Coolidge and refreshingly distinct also from the involved double-talk with which the Truman statement was followed by Byrnes. Our allies matched those dollars with sacrifices more precious than money, and we have already had our value received. Our cities were not bombed; our children were not maimed; our country was not ravaged. We bought time with lend-lease, and the race between the Western powers and the Reich to develop the atomic bomb is only the most dramatic example of how crucial a factor time was. Had our allies weakened or crumpled and given the Germans more time, New York and Washington might well have suffered the fate of Hiroshima and Nagasaki. Let us not forget that in discussions of lend-lease.

We alone of the fighting United Nations have emerged from the war enriched by the conflict, and there could be no uglier spectacle than an attempt by the richest of the partners to insist on heavy payments from the poor. But economic good sense as well as equity dictates the cancellation of the lend-lease payments. We are desperately in need of an expanding world market for the wares of our war-expanded industry, and the world market can only be restricted by any attempt to pile $42,000,000,000 in debt on top of the other difficulties of Britain, Russia, France, the Netherlands, and China, the principal recipients of lend-lease. Markets are more important to us than money; markets mean employment, while collection of lend-lease debts, even if possible, would merely add to our squirrel's horde of gold in Tennessee. Some of this we learned after the last war, and it is our good fortune and the world's that President Roosevelt, in framing the lend-lease program, planned in advance just the action foreshadowed by President Truman's statement.

Mr. Roosevelt was very clever in circumventing prejudice and economic ignorance. Aid to the Allies was launched not as a loan or as a gift but as "lend-lease," a completely new phrase pulled out of the hat by that master of political prestidigitation. The text of the enabling act as prepared at the White House and passed by Congress provided that the "terms and conditions" for granting aid were to be "those which the President deems satisfactory," and the compensation "may be payment or repayment in kind or property, or any other direct or indirect benefit which the President deems satisfactory." Congress was reconciled from the beginning to the idea that there would never be repayment in dollars, and Truman, thanks to his predecessor, has ample power to make a magnanimous settlement. Under the circumstances his bold and open declaration looking toward cancellation is preferable to the small-minded trickiness with which Byrnes tried to save some of our "bargaining power." Our bargaining power lies in our enormous economic assets. This power will be enhanced by a generous attitude that will command world respect. It can only be diminished and ill feeling provoked by haggling.

Let us also remember that as bad as an attempt to collect on lend-lease in dollars and cents would be an attempt to use our superior economic power as a bludgeon to force on others economic policies largely of advantage to ourselves. We must permit other countries the benefits of transitional tariff and currency arrangements, such as those of the sterling bloc, if we are to achieve freer trade conditions under circumstances beneficial to weaker countries as well as the United States. And it would also be well to remember, in the midst of our self-righteous talk about free trade (utterly forgetful of our high tariffs and continued export bounties) that the key to world prosperity lies not in breaking up British imperial preferences or lowering other people's tariffs but in the achievement of full employment at home. If we, the Midas of the world, learn to use our wealth, if our men and machines are fully occupied, the resultant prosperity will spill in an unheeding flood over such minor obstacles as tariff walls and currency difficulties.

Anglo-American Economics

BY AYLMER VALLANCE

[Mr. Vallance is The Nation's London correspondent.]

London, August 30 (By cable)

HUMAN nature being perverse, benefactors commonly share with creditors a measure of unpopularity. Candor compels me to report that the United States, to which Britain owes its present position as a victorious albeit impoverished nation, is spoken of here today in somewhat the same accents as Frenchmen spoke of les Anglais in 1919. No one enjoys being a poor relation, and the tendency to view America's preponderant strength and wealth with the green eye of jealousy is accentuated by press dispatches from less responsible British correspondents in the United States featuring the post-war abundance to be found in your department stores and ignoring altogether your unsolved problem of under-employment. Candor also forces the admission that the voice of Rotary-lunching Brother Jonathan proclaiming the American Century grates slightly on the ears of Britishers anxious to forget nineteenth-century British economic imperialism.

This said, it is important to emphasize that there is absolutely no resentment in this country—least of all on the left—at the President's decision to terminate lend-lease. The right, of course, is secretly jubilant. Taking the cue from Wall Street's bel ami, Lyttelton, Conservatives are exaggerating with disingenuous gloom "the gravity of the blow." Their hope is that either the government will be forced to give priority to an individualist export drive at the cost of deferring socialist measures, or that if United States credits "with strings on them" are declined and consumers here are required to tighten their belts and forgo Virginia cigarettes, the public will grumble and blame the Cabinet.

But among Labor M.P.'s, and this goes for the mass of the government's supporters in the country, I can assert with assurance that the dominant sentiment is one of relief that we must face realities squarely, here and now, and that the day of reckoning cannot be postponed—as Churchill, with his Micawber-like propensities, would certainly have postponed it—at the cost of entanglement through further financial indebtedness.

By this I don't mean that Lord Keynes has instructions to reject any and every offer Leo T. Crowley may make of temporary accommodation to cover part, at least, of lend-lease goods in pipeline. Were that the government's decision, they would scarcely have sent Keynes across the Atlantic to announce it. Indeed, the foreshadowed abrupt end of mutual aid, unless slightly cushioned, involves consequences disadvantageous both to Britain and to the United States.

We can get through this economic Dunkirk. Though Britain's over-all balance of external payments, with a deficit running to an annual rate of about four billion dollars, presents a pretty grim picture, and the manner in which we have drawn on the resources of the sterling area (already creditors for nearly fifteen billion dollars in blocked London balances) recalls uncomfortably the methods of Dr. Schacht, we can at least economize our own expenditures of dollars. Last year, against exports to the United States worth eighty million dollars, we imported American goods, excluding munitions, costing over two billions. But two-fifths of this total was represented by petrol, obtainable henceforth from Iran, Iraq, and Trinidad, while as for the other big items, meat and dairy produce, timber, machinery, tobacco, we can switch our imports largely to other sources or go without.

Some dollars, of course, we must spend. We are determined to play a full part in the relief and reconstruction of Europe, and this, given our present scarcity of goods, involves purchases on the Continent's behalf in the United States. Certain American goods, notably raw cotton, are indispensable, and others are urgently needed for our industrial reconversion. Partially, we can draw on our present holdings in dollars, estimated here at nearly two billions. Proportionately, we should impair our ability to put dollars for the purchase of United States goods at the disposal of our sterling area creditors—a point which Crowley is unlikely to overlook. But in a pinch we can draw on those holdings. Certainly the left here would expect the government to do so in preference to incurring financial obligations in Washington without the assurance of an American commercial policy which would enable us to repay them.

That, in fact, is the crux of the present issue of Anglo-American economic relations. The British are uninformed as to whether the men controlling United States policy yet realize not only that America, as a creditor nation, must have a future permanent import surplus but that all Europe, including Britain, has adopted a socialist economy in which foreign trade becomes a matter not of the old-fashioned financial checks and balances of laisser faire but of planned interchange of physical goods. The British government, like that of the U. S. S. R., will undoubtedly sign the Bretton Woods agreement, but, like the Russians, will sign with the explicit reservation that our imports and exports must be state-controlled. We have no desire to impoverish ourselves by adopting "Sinn Fein for Socialism" nor any idea of ring-fencing the sterling area against the inroads of American commerce. But we must face the fact that our resources are temporarily as straitened as in 1940, and must be carefully husbanded in order to command enough raw materials for full employment and enough essential foods for our workers. The summary end of lend-lease brings us sharply up against the realization that our foreign-balance payments are the prime factor necessitating socialist planning. It will be planning for expansion, not restriction, but planning, state-directed, it must be.

Giral Takes Over

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

IT WOULD be useless to pretend that the solution reached by the Spaniards in Mexico is a satisfactory one. The new government, dominated as it is by rightist republican elements, has been received without enthusiasm. José Giral, the Prime Minister, is a colorless person, a man of little force or capacity for leadership, and his Cabinet is almost as pallid. Its outstanding member, Angel Ossorio y Gallardo, is also the most conservative. One can hardly imagine that such a government will be able to rally the republican rank and file, in Spain and in exile, for a united stand against Franco. Nor does it represent a majority of the organized political groups in Mexico. Of the nineteen parties and organizations consulted by President Martinez Barrio, ten urged a government headed by Dr. Juan Negrín. Whether the Giral Cabinet will win the necessary two-thirds vote in the coming Cortes meeting remains to be seen. Even if it does, the result will be a legal rather than an actual political indorsement. For the Cortes itself, elected before the Franco rebellion, has since been dispersed among the various countries of refuge and has lost more than a hundred members through death, mostly at the hands of Franco's assassins. Those who can be assembled in Mexico, even if they make up a quorum, can hardly be said to represent the people of Spain or even the Spaniards in exile.

To express the actual political tendencies among the republican forces, the new government would have to include the group of parties and organizations which composed the Negrín government, including particularly the two chief labor federations. This it has failed to do. The reasons why Negrín and his associates have refused to enter the Giral Cabinet are explained on another page in a dispatch from Mexico by J. Alvarez del Vayo, former Foreign Minister. Undoubtedly there are aspects of the situation which Mr. del Vayo cannot yet discuss in detail. But he makes it plain that the abstention of those groups was based on considerations of policy rather than on factional hostility. They accept the new government as the legal government of the Spanish Republic but refuse to assume responsibility for policies they do not approve. In making this decision they have shown both restraint and political wisdom.

If the groups which dominate the Giral regime had adopted the same attitude toward the Cabinet headed by Negrín, instead of repudiating it and setting up "juntas" in opposition, the republican government would long ago have commanded recognition and support abroad. The Negrín government was of course based on far firmer constitutional ground than is the new regime, since it was legally established in Spain and had received a unanimous vote of confidence at the last Cortes meeting on Spanish soil; its weakness arose solely from the attacks of dissident elements. Now that the new government has been built, in large part around these same elements, the Negrínists have adopted the magnanimous and extremely difficult role of "loyal opposition." There is little tradition in Spanish politics to support this role even in normal times; to carry it through in exile, after years of acute political division, will demand high qualities of statesmanship.

But the attempt is worth making, and it is the logical sequel to Dr. Negrín's whole course in Mexico. For, paradoxically, Negrín himself created the situation which brought Giral to power: he went to Mexico determined to turn the problem of the government over to the parties and at the same time to create the constitutional instruments through which a change in the government could legally be effected. The procedure followed was agreed upon after long and patient negotiation with the party leaders. The result is a tribute to the moral stature of Negrín. He is no longer Prime Minister, but it is a safe guess that his influence has grown rather than diminished.

Inevitably under the circumstances, the new Cabinet takes office in an atmosphere of skepticism. It must prove its strength before the Cortes meets in October, and one of the chief tests of its capacity to function as a government in exile will be its success in winning the recognition of other governments. Mexico established relations promptly with the Giral regime, and it is significant that this first diplomatic point was scored after President Avila Camacho had consulted privately with Dr. Negrín. Of one thing we may be certain: If Giral fails it will not be through any political act of his predecessor; his government will be given every possible chance to carry out the task for which it was chosen. Negrín is neither a saint nor a martyr; but he loves Spain and desires the restoration of the Republic more than he loves or desires power.

Brass Hats Undaunted

BY I. F. STONE

THE report of the Naval Court of Inquiry on Pearl Harbor begins by explaining that the Pacific Fleet was organized in three main task forces. The operating schedule was so arranged that there was always one task force at sea, and usually two. "At no time during 1941," the Court of Inquiry assures us, "were all the vessels of the Fleet in Pearl Harbor." In accordance with this operating schedule, only Task Force One and part of Task Force Two were in Pearl Harbor at the time of the Japanese attack. Reading thus far, one feels that naval operations were wisely planned to avoid a situation in which the entire Pacific Fleet might have been destroyed in one enemy attack on the Hawaiian base. But then we read that "the preponderance of the battleship strength of the Fleet" was in Task Force One, and that all three of the battleships of Task Force Two were also in the harbor, and finally that "all battleships of the Pacific Fleet, except one undergoing overhaul at the Puget Sound Navy Yard, were in Pearl Harbor on 7 December." The Naval Court of Inquiry concludes, however, that this was "purely a coincidence." The disingenuous approach and the fatuous conclusion are alike characteristic of the report turned in by the three high admirals, Kalbfus, Murfin, and Andrews.

Despite this solemn rigmarole about the three task forces, the fact is that the Japanese attack had the effect, as the Army Board of Inquiry reports, "of immobilizing and substantially destroying the Pacific Fleet, which was a major threat to Japan's left flank in its southward move." To dismiss as "coincidence" the crucial blunder that concentrated all our battleships and most of the Pacific Fleet in Pearl Harbor that ghastly morning is to demonstrate the continued presence in the armed services of the brass-hat mentality responsible for that disaster. Admirals and generals are supposed to avoid "coincidences" of this kind when they know war is an imminent possibility, as they knew in the fall of 1941.

On a par with this Naval Court of Inquiry conclusion is its finding that "condition of readiness No. 3," in effect at the time of the attack, was "that best suited to the circumstances." This deserves to rank with the medical gag about the operation being highly successful though the patient died. It draws from Admiral King the tart comment that "condition of readiness No. 3" is that "normally maintained in port." In other words the high admirals of the Court of Inquiry still think the condition of readiness observed by a ship in Brooklyn in peacetime was "best suited" to the circumstances in Pearl Harbor on December 7, 1941. This finding will read better in Japanese.

As can be seen from these samples, the naval report on Pearl Harbor is hardly a masterpiece of forthright self-criticism. The report of the Army Board of Inquiry is by comparison a vigorous and outspoken document. The mealy-mouthed naval report is accompanied by separate statements from Admiral King, as commander-in-chief of the United States Fleet and Chief of Naval Operations, and from Secretary Forrestal. Both King and Forrestal indicate their displeasure with the Court of Inquiry and speak out with manly frankness on the navy's responsibility for Pearl Harbor. On the other hand, the army board's report is accompanied by a separate statement by Secretary Stimson which seeks to soften the criticism in that document and to rebut findings which place on the General Staff in Washington and on General Marshall, its chief, a substantial share of the blame for our unpreparedness at Pearl Harbor. The net effect of the reports and their accompanying statements is to leave the impression that the services as a whole are still far from prepared fully to admit the errors which made Pearl Harbor possible. That attitude does not promise well for the future.

Both the army and navy reports do a great deal of buck-passing. The prize specimen is the naval court's finding that "constitutional requirements that war be declared by Congress" made it difficult to prevent the attack on Pearl Harbor. This was neatly deflated in Secretary Forrestal's dour retort, "The constitutional inhibition . . . did not preclude long-distance reconnaissance." The army board's report blames the state of public opinion and isolationism, but itself contains isolationist overtones; noteworthy is the statement, in discussing contradictory tendencies at home, "we were arming our forces for war and at the same time giving away much of such armament." Both reports have given fuel to the isolationist press by blaming Secretary Hull for not continuing to stall and appease the Japanese in the fall of 1941. That public opinion bears a heavy share in the responsibility for Pearl Harbor is indisputable, but irrelevant. For the question before the army and navy boards was whether the armed services did all they could to prevent the disaster with the means at their disposal and within the existing circumstances. The answer to that question is sharply negative. It is only the criticism of Hull, and by implication Roosevelt, which merits serious consideration.

Hull is blamed for presenting his ten-point proposal to the Japanese on November 26, 1941, over the objections of General Marshall as Chief of Staff and Admiral Stark as Chief of Naval Operations. Marshall and Stark, supported by Stimson and Knox, said we were unprepared for war and seemed to feel that Hull's proposals were so drastic as to make war unavoidable. It is implied that Roosevelt ignored or overruled this warning. But it is hard to see how Hull could have stalled the Japanese any longer without in large part accepting their proposals of November 20, and those proposals would have made us a partner in Japanese aggression. The Japs wanted us to supply them with all the oil they needed, to unfreeze Japanese accounts in this country, to end all aid to China, to "cooperate" with Japan in acquiring "those goods and commodities which the two countries need in the Netherlands East Indies." To accept such terms would have been to risk the complete collapse of China and the dominance of the Dutch East Indies by Japan. There was no assurance that paying this kind of blackmail would have prevented further Japanese advances and an eventual attack upon us anyway. It is to the credit of Hull and Roosevelt that they refused to participate in a Far Eastern Munich and insisted, in the ten-point proposal, on the evacuation of China as a condition for resuming friendly relations with Japan.

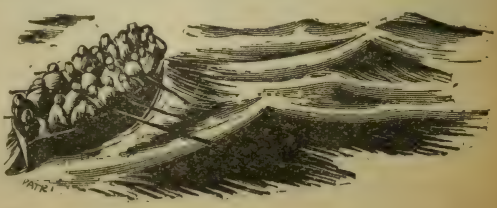
The army and navy wanted more time, but we had already been stalling and appeasing the Japanese for ten years. The price asked for more time was so large that it would have benefited Japan more than the United States. The refusal to pay that price undoubtedly precipitated the long-prepared Japanese attack, and we were poorly prepared for war. But the real point involved in the Pearl Harbor inquiry was whether that disaster need necessarily have happened. And one test of the army-navy plea for more time is what use the armed services made of the time they did have. The services regarded the ten-point proposal as a virtual ultimatum to Japan, and since they so regarded the proposal they were under obligation to take steps immediately for war. But their record, as disclosed in the army and navy inquiries and in the earlier Roberts report, is one of unpardonable negligence and appalling stupidity. We would have had to fight a defensive war for months in any case, but we need not have lost our Pacific Fleet at Pearl Harbor and our air force at Manila in two quick, crushing surprise attacks. For the facts disclosed indicate that it was not a lack of knowledge but sheer stodgy unimaginative bureaucratic complacency at Washington, Pearl Harbor, and Manila which made the Japanese blitz possible.

In the first place, the joint army-navy defense plan for Hawaii signed on April 9, 1941, was, as the army board said, "prophetic in its accuracy." It was based on the assumption that the Japs would attack without warning, and the men who drew up that plan accurately forecast every basic detail of what happened at Pearl Harbor: the time of day, the type of task force used by the Japanese, the form the attack would take, even the fact that it might be preceded (as it actually was) by a single submarine foray in the harbor just before the big blow. The only trouble is that this army-navy defense agreement was neither implemented nor taken seriously by the military-naval command in Washington and in Hawaii. In the second place, President Roosevelt told the heads of the army and navy at a White House conference on November 25, the day before the ten-point proposal, to expect a surprise attack "perhaps as soon as next Monday," which was December 1. In the third place, from the time of that White House conference until December 7, "the record shows" (says the army report) "that from informers and other sources the War Department had complete and detailed information of Japanese intentions." Finally, at 9 o'clock on the morning of December 7, the War and Navy Departments were tipped off (four hours before the attack) that the Japanese would present an ultimatum or declaration of war at 1 p. m. Washington time. And a Commander Kramer in the navy was quick to point out that 1 p. m. Washington time would be dawn at Pearl Harbor, the very time at which our war plans predicted a surprise attack there.

General Marshall as Chief of Staff and Admiral Stark as Chief of Naval Operations failed to see to it that proper defense measures were taken at Pearl Harbor between November 25 and December 7. And they failed to react quickly enough to the advance knowledge that they had on the morning of Pearl Harbor. Stark didn't think the information was worth passing on and Marshall sent it to General Short by commercial cable when faster means of communication were available. The last warning left Washington 22 minutes before the attack and did not arrive until several hours after the attacking force had departed. Marshall could have telephoned Short, but his excuse was that he was expecting an attack in the Philippines rather than in Hawaii and telephoned MacArthur instead. This throws additional light on MacArthur's extraordinary incompetence as a commander at that juncture. For despite the pleas of subordinates to disperse his planes, MacArthur left them on the ground at Clark Field outside Manila, where almost his entire air force was destroyed by the Japanese ten hours after their attack on Pearl Harbor. MacArthur was more culpable than Kimmel and Short, and it is scandalous that there should never have been an investigation of his bungling in the Philippines.

Our military-naval command acted with indecent sedateness. Lacking daring itself, it did not expect daring from the Japanese. Even now, when we know how meticulously and minutely (and, let us confess, brilliantly) the Japanese planned their attacks, we still find the Army Board of Inquiry talking nonsense about "the Oriental mind" and attributing the Pearl Harbor blitz to "the violent and uncivilized reasoning of the Japanese." Our military-naval command did not keep abreast of new developments in warfare, notably the use of torpedoes from planes in shallow water. This was how the Japs did most of their damage at Pearl Harbor, and naval intelligence warned of this possibility months in advance. Our military-naval command underestimated the intelligence of the Japanese and they made the equally crucial mistake of underestimating the loyalty of our Japanese-American population. For it was the latter error which led General Short to institute the alert against sabotage instead of the alert against attack from without. Under this type of alert planes were parked wing to wing and unable to get off the ground in less than four hours. The attack on Pearl Harbor took only three, and most of the planes were destroyed.

Perhaps the crowning example of military stupidity is in the revelation that while our army's mobile anti-aircraft artillery was in state of instant readiness, it had no ammunition. The ammunition was in a crater a mile away. General Short and Ordnance had rejected pleas for artillery shells several days earlier on the ground that "they didn't want to issue any of the clean ammunition, let it get out and get dirty, and have to take it back in later on and renovate it." The slogan of the Pearl Harbor high command seems to have been, "Praise the Lord, but don't muss the ammunition."



British Labor Sets its Course

BY MICHAEL FOOT

[Mr. Foot is a new Labor member of Parliament, having defeated Leslie Hore-Belisha in the recent election. He was formerly acting editor of the London Evening Standard, and covered the San Francisco conference for the London Daily Herald.]

London, August 29 (By cable)

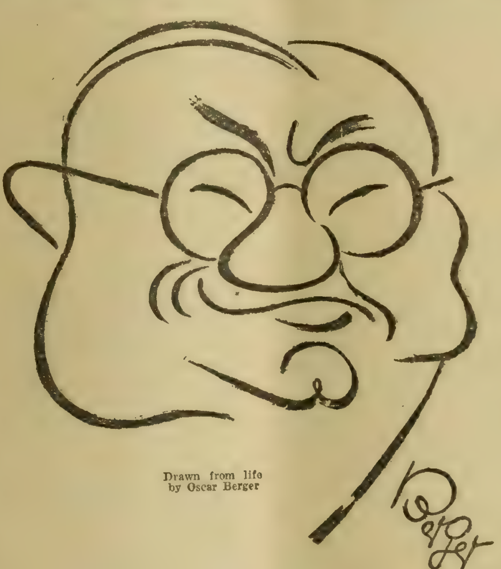
THE new British government has been in power a little more than a month. No government in British history, with the exception of Mr. Churchill's Administration, which came into office when Hitler's panzers were smashing through the Ardennes, has ever confronted more serious economic and social problems during its first weeks of authority.

Coal stocks are much more meager than a year ago and the nation only survived last winter with the utmost economy. Stern warnings have had to be given that the allowances of food and clothes cannot be increased and may have to be diminished; and this unhappy news was broken to a people who were just beginning to hope that some relief might be granted after the bitter endurance of the past six years. Eagerness to be demobilized is being vigorously expressed by the servicemen; their demands cannot yet be satisfied by a government which is resolved not to cast away the fruits of victory through a failure to execute military commitments or through a disorderly and unjust demobilization plan.

All these pressures were urgent enough before the news was announced that lend-lease was to be terminated. Mr. Attlee's revelation had little of the drama of Mr. Churchill's call for "blood, toil, tears, and sweat" in 1940, but it must figure in the records as a hardly less historic proclamation. Britain in the next few years must adopt the psychology of the Soviet five-year plans. Present rewards must be postponed with the purpose of making secure future enjoyment. The success of the new government in appealing for a gigantic productive effort will depend on its capacity to convince the people of its good faith in carrying out measures for insuring a fairer distribution of the new wealth still to be created. It is a formidable summons, but the survival of democratic government not only in Britain is the stake.

How is the government succeeding in the invocation of this spirit? The King's speech which outlined the government's plans for legislative action was a good beginning. The minority Labor government of 1929 worked on the assumption that bold measures should be postponed until economic conditions were more fortunate. That horizon was never reached. The new government adopts a quite different strategy. The King's speech forecast the maximum amount of action in the field of public enterprise that could have been hoped for by the most radical elements within the party. The new Parliament will have to work harder than any of its predecessors. Moreover, to assist in its task, plans are being made for a speed-up in the procedure of Parliament. When first mooted, this proposal aroused the ire of Mr. Churchill and his followers, who claimed to see in it a proof of his election charges that Labor was intent on tampering with the rights of Parliament and the liberties of the people. This accusation has now been scotched. The Tories for the moment are roaring like sucking doves. And except for a probably unavoidable discontent with the pace of demobilization, the government retains the great fund of good will on domestic policy amassed at the election.

On foreign affairs there are louder murmurs of criticism. Mr. Ernest Bevin, who is probably the most powerful figure in the government, killed all hopes of a sudden reversal in British foreign policy. He won more applause from the Tories than from his own supporters. Continuity of policy was the phrase on everyone's lips. However, the decline in expectation which this speech has caused may prove as unjustified as the earlier excessive jubilation. Toward liberal or left elements in Spain, Italy, and France Mr. Bevin's words were not as warm as they might have been, but a careful examination of them shows that neither General Franco nor the Italian monarchists can derive any encouragement, while in the case of France it appears that a real attempt is to be made to overcome the unhappy misunderstandings of the past few years. In Eastern Europe no one who knew Mr. Bevin could have expected a pro-Communist approach; he is seeking to modify the totalitarian methods employed by the new governments in these countries but, unlike some of his



Drawn from life by Oscar Berger

Bevin

Tory predecessors, he is not animated by any anti-Soviet bias. The most serious criticism of Mr. Bevin's attitude concerns Greece. Here he appears to have accepted the same kind of evidence so uncritically welcomed by the coalition government. Proof of continued white terror or preparation for faked elections in Greece would present Mr. Bevin with his first real test as Foreign Secretary; for, as at the time of the fighting, it is clear that the leaders of the Labor Party are not at one with all their followers.

No account of the new government's position would be complete without reference to a fresh and hitherto indefinable factor in the situation. The whole constitution of the Parliamentary Labor Party is revolutionized. Some fifty new members of the party have made their maiden speeches, and the quality they have shown more than confirms Labor's boast at the election that it was the real national party. Of the two hundred new members, most do not yet know one another; they have not had time to master the highly complex business of effective action in Parliament; they have the greatest good will toward the government, but their age is much younger and their accent more virile than many of those whose experience has naturally made them members of the Administration. Their general political outlook is not yet consolidated, but in general they are opposed to the idea of continuity in foreign policy and indeed are healthily impatient about all aspects of policy.

The Tories have too eagerly revealed their desire for a split in labor's ranks. They will not be gratified, but the mood of the new members is certain to have an increasing influence on the government. Meanwhile Britain's recovery from its economic Dunkirk will depend not only on the actions of the government but on the power of these new members to sustain the imagination of the people as they captured it during the election campaign.

China on the Brink

BY T. A. BISSON

[Mr. Bisson is the author of "Japan in China," "America's Far Eastern Policy," and the forthcoming "Japan's Wartime Economy." He wrote What Program for Japan? in The Nation of July 14.]

THE obvious comment has yet to be made on the Sino-Russian agreements: that the basic Chinese political issue is still with us, and still cries out for settlement. It is a comforting but entirely fallacious thought that since the Chinese Communists have been "let down" by Moscow everyone can sleep easier of nights. Such an interpretation ignores the fact that these "China Reds" have gotten along very well without any Soviet aid for a long time now—since 1927, to be exact, and then the aid was given to a Kuomintang-led popular front. Something in the soil of the good earth has provided them with ample nourishment; they have thrived as a home-grown product. There is a sturdiness to this growth that has shown a capacity to withstand wind and weather. It will have to be reckoned with, in other words. Nor will it be weakened by a Soviet-Chinese understanding which strengthens China's general international position.

Advance reports indicate that Mao Tse-tung is taking nothing new with him to Chungking. He is raising the old, simple demand that the Kuomintang adopt a program of genuinely democratic reform—the only workable solution. We may hope that this time his demand will be accepted. Meanwhile, it will be well for Americans not to fall happily asleep, but to take a long, open-eyed look at the abyss which has yawned in China. Now, especially, it becomes advisable to explore fully some of the darker recesses of Chinese politics into which the light has penetrated but dimly.

If any further demonstration of the desperate need for a settlement of China's internal issues was required, the results of the sudden end of the Pacific war supplied it. Literally over night, Japan's surrender offer of August 10 released the explosive potentialities of the Chinese political situation. The crisis at once pitchforked not only China, but all powers with Far Eastern interests, into an exceedingly awkward predicament. For the immediate future the United States is in the most exposed position. It is essential, above all, that American military personnel do not become involved in Chinese civil strife—an events which would compromise our standing in China and the rest of Asia for decades to come.

In the present unprecedented and swiftly moving situation, a series of extraordinary obstacles stand in the way of adequate judgment on developments in China. The facts reaching the American public are thrice distorted: by Chiang Kai-shek's near monopoly of China's agencies of international publicity, by the strict censorship still maintained on news dispatches from Chungking, and by the unconscious or deliberate bias that characterizes much of our own radio and news commentary. In these circumstances it is particularly necessary to guard against a too ready acceptance of Kuomintang maneuvers in politics and publicity, on the one hand, and a failure to give due weight, on the other, to factors which may provide crucial motivations for the Chinese Communist leaders' reactions and policies.

There was little reason to be surprised by Chiang Kai-shek's initial series of orders: to the Chinese Communists to ground arms, to the Kuomintang troops to continue fighting until the surrender was effected, to the Japanese to give up arms and territory only to Kuomintang commanders. But there was just as little reason to expect that the Communist leaders would tamely submit to a program calculated to bar them from the fruits of a victory to which their arms had contributed so materially. The expressions of shocked surprise over the "flouting" of Chiang's orders by a force that, fighting the Japanese successfully throughout the war with no foreign aid, had yet been blockaded by some 500,000 Kuomintang troops, were uncalled for, to say the least.

A better knowledge of recent Chinese history might also have led the commentators to qualify their strictures on Mao Tse-tung for his unwillingness to rush off to Chungking for a conference at Chiang Kai-shek's first invitation. In 1929 General Li Chi-shen accepted a similiar invitation to confer on political matters in Nanking under a guaranty of political immunity. When he reached the capital, Chiang Kai-shek blandly settled political issues by arresting him. He was kept under detention for more than a year. In 1931 Hu Han-min, a member of the Kuomintang's leading triumvirate of that period, also proved troublesome, and Chiang incarcerated him "for his own good." A Chinese political leader takes his courage in his hands when he answers the summons to a conference. An opponent of Mao Tse-tung's stature, bitterly hated by the Kuomintang reactionaries, is doubly jeopardized. Fortunately, this conference takes place in the light of world publicity and under the sponsorship of Ambassador Hurley. The American government becomes the guarantor of Mao's safety.

On another point—the use of Chinese puppet, or traitor, troops to reestablish Chiang Kai-shek's control of occupied territory—American commenators have displayed an amazing leniency of judgment. In part this may be attributed to lack of adequate information. During the last three years of the war, foreign correspondents at Chungking were inhibited, less by the censorship than by their own sense of responsibility in the matter of psychological warfare, from exposing to the American public the extensive defections of Kuomintang officers and troops to the Japanese. Today such inhibitions have lost their force, and the full story has become essential to an understanding of some of the basic political factors operating in post-war China.

Military defections by Kuomintang units (there have been none by Chinese Communists) were relatively negligible during the first year of the war. Not only were defections few, but cases of treason were rigorously dealt with. For dereliction of duty the Shantung Governor, General Han Fu-chu, was executed. Following the desertion to the Japanese of the Kuomintang's vice-chief, Wang Ching-wei, in the autumn of 1938, instances of military defection gradually increased. Up to 1940-41, however, Wang Ching-wei's puppet government at Nanking had managed to recruit only a meager armed force, totaling little over 100,000 men. The tide of military defections began to flow strongly in 1942 and reached its flood in 1943-44. Results could be measured in the swelling numbers of Japan's puppet Chinese armies. By 1945, on a conservative estimate, these forces totaled 800,000,* of which at least 500,000 were former Kuomintang troops. Included among the commanding officers of the puppet armies was a long list of former Kuomintang generals, such as Pang Ping-hsün, Sun Tien-ying, Chao Yuan-hsiang, Sun Liang-cheng, Chin Yi-wu, Wu Hua-wen, Wang Ching-tsai, Chang Pu-yun, Wang Ching-han, and a host of other officers below the rank of general.

Defections on this scale could not be entirely concealed either from the Chinese populace or from the Chungking foreign correspondents. On occasion embarrassing questions were asked at press conferences. In one notable case, the official Chunking spokesman sought to quiet the correspondents by saying, in effect, that there was no need to be concerned, for the puppet Chinese commanders would turn out to be loyal patriots. This was a rare instance in which news of the puppeteering activity of former Kuomintang military units was cabled abroad, but it may be doubted whether many American readers of the dispatch caught its full implications.

Its meaning was spelled out more definitely on August 10, 1945, the day of Japan's surrender offer, in a special military order of Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek's broadcast by the Chungking radio "to all Chinese troops and puppet troops in Japanese-occupied areas." Word of this order was evidently not released to the newsmen in Chungking, since no correspondent reported it. In this country, however, it was picked up by the Federal Communications Commission and published on August 11 in the New York Times. Its salient points directed "all Chinese puppet troops" to remain in "the present assigned areas," to "preserve peace and order and protect civilians," and to "do their best to redeem themselves."

The celerity with which this order was issued betokens the degree of forethought which had gone into its preparation. It raises a number of interesting questions with regard to the future of the puppet armies, and especially of their commanders. Are the traitor generals, for example, to be permitted "to redeem themselves" and so continue as officers in China's national army? If so, China will be in the enviable position of not having to conduct the sort of trials that have rocked France, Norway, and other European countries. The collaborationists will simply be welcomed back into the Kuomintang fold.

The most significant political angle of this problem, however, still remains to be considered. By a coincidence, virtually all the Kuomintang generals who deserted to the Japanese were operating in north and central China. When their units were reorganized and reequipped by the Japanese what could be more natural than that they should continue to operate in the same areas? As a result, the "assigned areas" noted in Chiang Kai-shek's military order were almost exclusively located in regions contested by the Eighth Route or New Fourth armies, or in the larger cities surrounded by the expanding territories liberated from Japanese control by the bitterly fought campaigns of the Communist forces. By 1945 at least 90 per cent of the 800,000 Chinese puppet troops were so disposed. In some cases the officers of these puppet armies had to deceive their troops to effect the switch to Japanese command. After realizing their situation, numbers of these troops deserted to the Chinese Communists in the course of military operations ordered by their commanding officers.

Little imagination is required to appreciate the reaction of the Chinese Communist leaders to the phenomena here noted. The puppet armies could have appeared in no other light than that of a Kuomintang auxiliary of the Japanese. In order to leave no doubt on this score, Chiang Kai-shek is now proceeding to effect the occupation of Communist-besieged cities, notably in north China but also elsewhere in the country, by reconverting the puppet Chinese divisions in these cities into Kuomintang forces of occupation! In Peiping, for example, the puppet forces have placed themselves under the command of Hu Tsung-nan, blockader of the Yenan area and premier anti-Communist field general of the Kuomintang forces. The Japanese commanders are evidently facilitating this turnover, while at the same time refusing to surrender to the Communist armies standing virtually at the city gates. No better tactic for encouraging the outbreak of a major civil war in China could be devised.

In view of the feeble—almost non-existent—Kuomintang military effort north of the Yellow River, it is incredible that Chiang Kai-shek should seem determined to bar the Chinese Communists from receiving the Japanese surrender in this region. Over most of north China, the Eighth Route Army has borne the brunt of the fighting—against Japanese and puppet troops—for the past four years. No regular Kuomintang armies of any size or importance have been fighting the Japanese in this territory. Hu Tsung-nan's large Kuomintang army sat tight and concentrated on its blockade task, while in Shansi and Suiyuan provinces, respectively, the small and ineffective forces of Yen Hsi-shan and Fu Tso-yi have virtually rested on their arms for years. On August 10, however, all three forces sprang to life and are now seeking to occupy strategic centers in Honan, Shansi, and Suiyuan.

But these three Kuomintang armies are all far in the interior. In the key north China provinces of Hopei (Peiping, Tientsin) and Shantung (Tsinan, Tsingtao), regular Kuomintang armies simply do not exist. And the great cities in these provinces are closely encircled by extensive areas liberated by the Eighth Route Army's years of fighting. From these base areas the Communist armies have moved into the outskirts of Peiping, Tientsin, Tsinan, and Tsingtao. Inside the cities are the Japanese and the puppets.

In the final analysis, Chiang Kai-shek must use something better than the puppets to make good his occupation of cities from which regular Kuomintang troops are separated by hundreds of miles. He has one further recourse. He may persuade General Wedemeyer to place American planes at his disposal for the transport of Kuomintang regulars to the north China cities. There is no certainty that the Eighth Route Army will permit such a move to pass unchallenged, as was demonstrated by its occupation of the Nanyuan airfield outside Peiping. If fighting develops, it is quite likely that American personnel will find themselves in the line of fire. An incident would provide fuel for a "Red scare" in some American newspapers, but the responsibility would rest squarely on General Wedemeyer. American planes and pilots were sent to China for use in the war against Japan, not to become a pawn in China's internal politics.

Battle of the St. Lawrence

BY BENJAMIN J. ATLAS

[Mr. Atlas is Washington correspondent of the Syracuse, New York, Herald-Journal. He was formerly chief of the special information section of the Army Specialized Training Division, War Department.]

CONGRESS will soon resume its perennial debate on whether the St. Lawrence waterway should be harnessed for cheap electric power and opened to deep-draft navigation. Far to the north of where the familiar arguments will be heard the St. Lawrence spills its way to the Atlantic in the manner of some Gulliver proving his strength while the Lilliputians still conjecture his worth. Along the 2,687-mile Great Lakes-St. Lawrence artery from the heart of North America to the open sea, shallow-draft ships carry our commerce. Through the narrow length of river between Canada and New York State race all the waters of the Great Lakes, with the power of more than 2,000,000 horses thirteen billion kilowatts of electric energy.

The proposal to harness this energy and to open the entire waterway to deep-draft oceangoing vessels has been before Congress for almost half a century. Meanwhile, engineers of the United States and Canada have completed exhaustive surveys showing that for $421,000,000 the last remaining obstructions to deep-draft navigation could be removed and a power plant built to give the people of the Northeast a hydroelectric development far bigger than the TVA. In annual output of electricity, which would be shared equally by the United States and Canada, the project would be the biggest in the world.

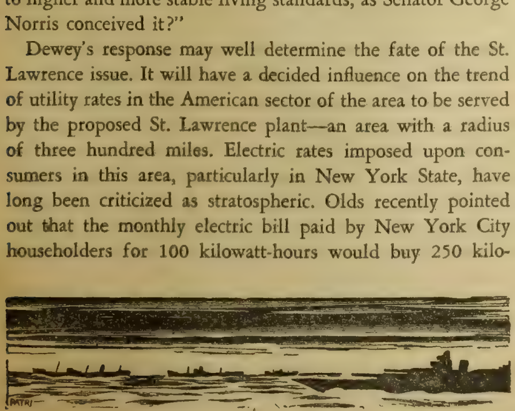
In refusing to authorize the development Congress has exhibited as much scorn for the counsel of governmental and industrial leaders as for the laws of nature and technology. Down through the years the project has been advocated by such diverse men as Herbert Hoover, Franklin D. Roosevelt, Alfred E. Smith, Calvin Coolidge, Owen D. Young, and Henry I. Harriman. Experts have advised Congress that the completed project would open the hinterland of North America to practically 90 per cent of the world's ocean shipping and supply an urgent need for low-cost electricity in an area inhabited by one-fifth of the continent's population. In the most thorough survey of its kind the United States Department of Commerce showed that shipping costs and electric rates would be reduced, railroad and water commerce increased, and industry, agriculture, and employment stimulated.

The Aluminum Company of America with professional adroitness has encouraged opposition to public development of the St. Lawrence, whose resources it covets for itself. After World War I it nearly succeeded in preempting them. Uniting with General Electric and du Pont under the name of the Frontier Corporation, Alcoa sought exclusive rights to the St. Lawrence and some neighboring waters for a 5,000,000-horse-power project on which the corporation was willing to spend $1,300,000,000. Fortunately the late Governor Smith of New York thwarted the attempted grab. Smith insisted that the resources belonged to and should be used for the benefit of all the people. Apparently "all the people" still lack a majority in Congress on the St. Lawrence issue.

Two St. Lawrence bills were dropped into the House hopper before the recess. Forensics will start in the Senate after a bill is offered by Senator George D. Aiken (Republican, Vermont), whose loyalty to the St. Lawrence waterway is reminiscent of the late Senator George Norris's crusade for the TVA. Aiken will repeat a proposal he made in vain to the Seventy-eighth Congress for approval of a 1941 agreement between the United States and Canada to complete the project. The 1941 agreement incorporated many features of a treaty signed by the United States and Canada during Hoover's Administration but later denied Senate ratification. The TVA is a federal agency, but the United States' share of the St. Lawrence power would be controlled by New York State, presumably through its Power Authority, first chartered by the state when Roosevelt was governor. From returns on the power sales New York offers to pay to the federal government over a fifty-year period an amount estimated in 1941 at $93,375,000.

The most ominous threat to the public-power scheme is now found in the willingness of many anti-St. Lawrence Congressmen to support a new Aiken proposal on condition that transmission of the power be restricted to the utilities companies. The gravity of that threat is increased by the silence of the present New York State administration on a St. Lawrence power-marketing policy. Roosevelt and Lehman as governors of New York never left any doubt that the State Power Authority would be authorized to build its own transmission lines whenever necessary to encourage increased distribution of St. Lawrence power at the lowest possible rates. Governor Thomas E. Dewey, however, has not yet given a clear-cut definition of his power-marketing policy, although he is backing the St. Lawrence development. Vice Chairman Leland Olds of the Federal Power Commission challenged Dewey not long ago to clarify his position. "Governor Dewey has reiterated his support for the project," said Olds, "but does he mean a 'Muscle Shoals' in the days when its power was sold to the Alabama Power Company for two mills while residential customers paid the company eight cents and farms could not afford power? Or does he mean a 'Muscle Shoals' serving as a stimulus to real American enterprise, as a means to higher and more stable living standards, as Senator George Norris conceived it?"

Dewey's response may well determine the fate of the St. Lawrence issue. It will have a decided influence on the trend of utility rates in the American sector of the area to be served by the proposed St. Lawrence plant—an area with a radius of three hundred miles. Electric rates imposed upon consumers in this area, particularly in New York State, have long been criticized as stratospheric. Olds recently pointed out that the monthly electric bill paid by New York City householders for 100 kilowatt-hours would buy 250 kilowatt-hours in Cincinnati, Madison, Topeka, Spokane, and Washington, D. C., in every case from a tax-paying private company. Experience in power marketing, whether at the municipal, state, or federal level, has proved that the most effective way to cut rates is to apply a government yardstick. Senator Lister Hill of Alabama, whose constituents are among the millions blessed by the TVA, has likened the government transmission line to "a public highway that brings the benefits of multiple-purpose projects to farmers, to householders, and to business men alike. If the government is required to sell merely to one large utility in the vicinity that can afford to build a line to the government's power dam," Hill has warned the Senate, "that utility will be able to dictate the terms upon which the power may be sold by the government."



Obviously passage of a St. Lawrence bill under conditions preventing any but private transmission would be a hollow victory for the people. Amid the growing pressures to cripple the project, a reaffirmation of the marketing policy enunciated by Roosevelt and Lehman is an urgent responsibility of the present New York State administration. As a matter of legislative procedure, details of a marketing program could await a federal-state contract subsequent to Congressional approval of the United States-Canada agreement. Nevertheless, an unequivocal expression of policy is needed now to head off the latest move to hamstring the public project. That the danger of a disastrous compromise is real is not doubted by anyone close to the Washington scene. In the debate that preceded the Senate's defeat of the Aiken proposal last winter by a two-to-one vote, Aiken exposed the offers of some private-utility operators to withdraw opposition "if they could be sure the St. Lawrence power would not be used for expansion of public power lines."

It is certain that Dewey, if he wished it, could get President Truman's backing for a policy of public transmission. Truman voted for Aiken's St. Lawrence proposal last December while he was a member of the Senate. He has demonstrated his allegiance to public power several times since, as for instance by renaming David E. Lilienthal as TVA chairman.

Dewey would be well advised politically to make the state's power-marketing policy clear at once. The challenge for a showdown is certain to grow as the time approaches for his reelection drive in 1946, preparatory to another possible try for the Presidency. Dewey's general declaration for the St. Lawrence last January drew the wrath of Republicans, but they will give him their votes out of party loyalty. Meanwhile, on the strength of that utterance, the Republican Governor has gained credit among Roosevelt liberals. He can ill afford to weaken his popularity with that group by ignoring the power-marketing issue.

Dewey's general friendliness to the St. Lawrence development up to now has become particularly embarrassing to United States Senator James M. Mead. Mead's explanation that he would support the power project divorced from the seaway cannot erase his recorded vote against the St. Lawrence proposal last December. He will have to live down that act in 1946 when he attempts either to stay in the United States Senate or to wrest the Governorship from Dewey.

Many of Mead's liberal supporters are still hopeful that he will come out convincingly for the St. Lawrence project as a whole. They would like to see the Buffalo Democrat end his preoccupation with the local interests of his home city, where grain-storage operators are worried about the seaway's possible threat to their profits. Mead's stand on the St. Lawrence issue has been turned to effective advantage by the anti-public power bloc.

While Congress has regaled itself with diverting dialectics on the St. Lawrence, Alcoa's sister company in Canada (Aluminium, Ltd.) has created its own private power empire at a strategic corner of the St. Lawrence system, with American taxpayers sharing the financial risks. Supported by a $200,000,000 loan from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, including an advance of $68,500,000, the Aluminium, Ltd., plant at Shipshaw on the Saguenay River north of Quebec has developed a capacity to generate 1,200,000 horse-power for its own benefit. The mistrust with which the United States Department of Justice regards Alcoa and Aluminium, Ltd., is apparently understood in Canada, and the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation has been waging a vigorous campaign to reclaim the resources for the people. The Quebec parliament last spring authorized purchase of private power plants on the St. Lawrence with a view to public control, and the Quebec government has already taken over the Montreal Light, Heat, and Power Company. Some persons have suggested the advisability of integrating the Shipshaw development with the rest of the St. Lawrence-Niagara system in an international super-TVA for the Northeast. The suggestion is of importance as pointing up the potentialities of the world's cheapest source of hydroelectric power.

What is needed to rescue the St. Lawrence resources for the public is immediate grass-roots action. The true case for the St. Lawrence has not yet reached the rank-and-file business men, farmers, and householders who would reap the project's benefits. The anti-St. Lawrence propaganda to which these people have been systematically exposed year after year has killed their interest in the question. Yet only the insistence of the folks back home will get action from Congress. Even Senator Robert F. Wagner, long a public-power advocate, waited until this year before consenting to be among the sponsors of Aiken's St. Lawrence legislation. Only a resurgence of public interest can put an end to the sham of such distractions as whether the St. Lawrence project ought to be voted on again as a treaty needing ratification by two-thirds of the Senate. It would take strong popular pressure to compel the New York State administration to declare itself for something more than just a title to a power site.

Once business men have been introduced to the truth about public power, they have been quick to appreciate its value as an industrial catalyst and a rate-cutting influence. The most vigorous champions of the TVA today are the storekeepers, factory owners, and farmers in the area who had mistrusted public power before the TVA became a reality. Their vigorous disapproval of Senator Kenneth McKellar's attempt to hamstring the Lilienthal administration offers a model for action in the Northeast. The battle for the St. Lawrence must be won without much more delay lest most of the benefits be denied to the people forever.

In the Wind

DEBATE: The Chicago Sun of August 26 carried the following advertisement: "Town Club weekly public forum. . . . Today at 3 p.m. 'What Should We Do with a Defeated Japan?' Speakers: 'Yes!' Irving Pflaum, foreign editor, Chicago Times. 'No!' George Kao, Chinese News Service."

PROBLEM: An Associated Press dispatch from Madrid on August 23 reported, "A committee of directors of leading Spanish newspapers and magazines will be named next month to find a formula easing the present complete internal censorship without exposing the Franco regime to attacks by the opposition."

TROPE: "The European enemies are vanquished," says an advertisement in the August 12 issue of the Sunday Guardian, Port of Spain, Trinidad, "and Gibraltar is intact, impregnable, and redoubtable as ever. This rock has stood the test of time. In Trinidad we have built this Gibraltar of the Cleaning and Dyeing Industry. It took us over sixty years to build this unshakable rock. It has also stood the test of time and tribulation and today it stands as firm as ever under its present generals R. J. J. Clamens and Roy Clamens. All loyal subjects can depend on the excellence of our service at Gibraltar."

LABOR: The Metropolitan Music School, New York, has signed a contract with the Music Teachers Chapter of the Teachers Union, Local 555, C. I. O. This is the first music school in the country to have a union contract.

OBSESSION: John O'Donnell of the New York Daily News is still fighting Franklin D. Roosevelt. In his column of August 30, on the Pearl Harbor report, he called the late President "No. 1 public enemy of the United States in that horrible and shocking disaster."

PHILOSOPHY: "Is it a bad habit to reflect much upon the meaning of life?" asked Dr. Albert Edward Wiggam in his column, Explore Your Mind, in newspapers of August 24. "Worse than bad," he answered, "it's dangerous, unless you enjoy a nervous breakdown."

AD HOMINEM: Dr. John P. Peters, professor of medicine at Yale, spoke for the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill in a debate on health insurance over Station WOR August 28. Dr. Morris Fishbein, editor of the Journal of the American Medical Association, answered his arguments by asserting that Dr. Peters was not a practicing physician. But even less is Dr. Fishbein. He has worked for the American Medical Association ever since he completed his interneship. And Dr. Peters is on the staffs of the New Haven Hospital and the New Haven Dispensary.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. We will pay $1 for each item accepted.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

The New Spanish Cabinet

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Mexico City, August 29

THE Spanish republican crisis in Mexico was resolved several days ago, and the confusion that the first news about it must have created among American readers can now be somewhat cleared up. Naturally every Spanish republican, whether or not he occupies an official post, feels an intense obligation not to say anything that might prejudice the common cause. There are, however, two or three aspects of the situation which, perplexing as they may appear when viewed from a distance, are perfectly clear to those who played a role in the recent crisis.

The first is the question, now being widely debated by Dr. Negrín's followers, of why he risked a procedure that could end, as it did, by removing him from the leadership of the government. It is indeed true that when Dr. Negrín arrived in Mexico the great mass of the emigration, there and elsewhere, supported him. Why, his friends are asking one another, did he run the risk of calling in the parliamentary groups when, in the opinion of the ordinary citizen, many of the deputies, elected in 1936 before the Franco rebellion, do not represent the militant feelings of the Spanish people today? The answer was clearly stated in my article, Negrín's Plan for Spain, published in The Nation of July 21. Without the intervention of the Cortes there was no constitutional procedure for filling the vacant Presidency of the Republic, and without a President, Negrín could not, in accordance with the Constitution, broaden or reorganize his Cabinet. But, above all, Negrín was preoccupied with the consideration that recognition might be withheld by certain countries unless an enlarged and fully representative constitutional government were created. Only those who do not know Dr. Negrín can possibly imagine that he failed to take into account those dangerous maneuvers whose sole objective was to destroy him and his policy of resistance. At the first Cabinet meeting after his arrival here each of his ministers resident in Mexico called Negrín's attention to the danger of his being victimized by some such maneuver.

Dr. Negrín's answer was that he had no choice and that he must trust that a sense of responsibility and duty toward the Spanish people would ultimately prevail. Some of Dr. Negrín's friends suggested, not for his sake, but for the sake of the cause, that there should be a prior pact by which Negrín would facilitate the legal procedures necessary for a reorganization of the government, with the clear understanding that he should be retained as Prime Minister. Negrín is not the man for deals of this sort.

The second point that is being passionately discussed in Mexico is why Negrín did not accept a post in the Giral Cabinet. Here a brief chronology of the crisis is in order. President Martinez Barrio assumed his post on Friday, August 17, and finished his consultations with the heads of the various parties on Wednesday, August 22. During these five days intrigues were increasing; on Tuesday night, however, the general impression in Mexico was that President Barrio would call upon Negrín. On Wednesday morning we were informed that the President had asked Giral to form a government.

Giral requested an interview with Negrín and in this first conversation offered him the post of Minister of Foreign Affairs. Negrín left the decision to the executive committee of the Socialist Party to which he belongs. The executive committee communicated with Giral and told him that circumstances made it advisable that Negrín should continue as Prime Minister and that they would not authorize him to hold a Cabinet post. However, if the Cabinet were a broad republican coalition the executive committee would be ready to provide another minister as a gesture of support and cooperation. In the next forty-eight hours various propositions were made to Negrín: that he should be Vice-President and Minister of Foreign Affairs; that he should be Vice-President with an additional portfolio and that I should continue as Foreign Minister; that he should be Vice-President and Foreign Minister and that two of his friends, outstanding physicians, but without special political significance, should be included in the Cabinet. Negrín invariably replied that it was not a question of posts but of policy.

In order to face the arduous and complicated task of restoring the Republic, the Prime Minister must be in a position to direct policy in all its aspects. International and national policies could not be separated. Nor could the support of various nations be enlisted without guaranties of a national policy that would permit reestablishment of the Republic without unnecessary violence. Therefore the first requisite was to have true representation of all political forces within the government, and to leave the doors open to any group that chose to exclude itself. And secondly, the government needed a homogeneous policy and bold, strong direction.

On Saturday José Antonio de Aguirre, President of the autonomous Basque government, arrived and held a conference with Giral and myself. This was our last effort to achieve a broad coalition and to prevent the formation of a government in which the representation of the various republican forces was more apparent than real. Twelve hours later Giral abruptly declared the negotiations at an end, insisted on being Prime Minister, and presented the original list of Cabinet members that he had held in readiness since Friday.

The third point that must be clarified is the insinuation that only "Negrín and the Communists" remained outside the government. This was an unfortunate note for the new Prime Minister to strike in explaining the reason for the crisis; his statement evoked a sharp reply from the groups that had refused to join the Cabinet. These groups include the Socialist Party whose executive committee was elected in Spain (as distinct from the other branch of the party organized in exile by Indalecio Prieto); the U. G. T., the strongest trade-union organization in Spain; an important segment of the Left Republicans, the party founded by the late President Azaña; the Federal Party; the Basque Nationalist Action; the Asturian Workers Alliance, and others. They asserted their joint responsibility for the decision to remain outside the government and rebuked Giral for adopting the tactics used by the enemies of the Republic throughout the Spanish war. They explained that the reason for their decision was their united belief that "only a strong policy of resistance" such as was maintained by the last republican government could secure the establishment of a democratic regime in Spain. They pointed out that the Prime Minister is chiefly responsible for defining and representing the policy of the Cabinet. "Dr. Negrín's political significance would have been neutralized had his name appeared side by side with those of the persons now in the Cabinet—very honorable men but some of them representing a policy utterly different from and even contrary to what we believe indispensable at this moment." Whereas the government itself would have been weakened by the presence within it of such strongly conflicting points of view, the reply ended with the declaration that the abstaining group, "as republicans and democrats," will applaud the success of the new Cabinet, if success is obtained.

At 7:30 on Sunday evening Giral's Cabinet was announced. At 8:30 Negrín was already working on a plan of action with representatives of the parties and groups mentioned above. He easily exchanged the title of chief of the government for that of chief of the resistance. Nor was it any more difficult for me to surrender the post of Foreign Minister for freedom to devote myself fully to my work as an editor of The Nation. At such moments one realizes how little importance there is in a ministerial title if it is not accompanied by intense and useful action. Only time will tell if, from the point of view of the republican cause, the shift from one administration to another will prove equally rewarding and without penalties. We say: "As republicans, whether the government pleases us or not, we are pleased that a government has resulted from the present crisis; we must not attack it or make its life more difficult." That is what Negrín will say at the first public function since the crisis, which will be held on September 3 at the Fronton. He will urge full support of the government on the part of all republican elements. Nor is his attitude merely theoretical: to republican army officers and civil servants in Mexico who remain loyal to him he has said, "You belong to Spain and you must put yourselves at the disposal of the government." At the same time he will appeal to the friends of Spain everywhere not to be discouraged or pessimistic but to maintain intact their enthusiasm and fighting spirit on behalf of the Spanish people.

Yugoslav Democracy, Limited

BY HAL LEHRMAN

Belgrade, August 31 (By cable)

DISGRUNTLED bourgeois sip their spritzer in the Ruski Tsar, the cafe of the Belgrade élite on Prince Michael's Street, and trade sneers regarding the newly mighty who now inhabit Dedinje Hill. The partisans have taken over the villas of the aristocracy, and it is a source of bitter mirth to today's "underprivileged" that one high official who lived in jails or cellars hiding from the police most of his adult life now resides in two mansions with twenty domestics. But the partisan chiefs are working hard and long hours in the midst of their opulence, and there are weightier reasons for complaint about contemporary Yugoslavia.

I did not believe the stories which assailed me on my arrival here about the persecution of Yugoslavs who do not regard Britons and Americans as enemies of the nation—until the proof exploded under my nose. The August 1 celebration of United States Army Air Force Day proclaimed by Truman was organized by a group of Belgrade youth. The auditorium was draped with Yugoslav and American flags, the Air Force film "Memphis Belle" was shown, and two young men delivered pro-American speeches passed by the Yugoslav censor. At 2 a. m. the next day both were arrested by the OZNA and held incommunicado.

For forty-eight hours I tried vainly to see the police authorities, or the prisoners, or at least learn the charges. On the third day I was officially informed that the youths had been arrested because, according to "numerous previous reports," they had been associated with the Chetniks. I inquired why nothing had been done about the alleged reports until the morning after the pro-American demonstrations. No reply—except that the prisoners were suddenly released.

Top-ranking partisans say privately that the masses have disliked the Allies ever since the days of the occupation, when, after combat against combined German-Chetnik raiders, or after seeing their villages burned down by Chetniks, they gathered around the radio and heard London extol the heroic resistance of the Chetniks against the invaders. Nor has the record of the Allied occupation of Trieste and other Yugoslav irredenta endeared us to them. For whatever reasons official organs like the police and press are systematically anti-Allied.

Annoyances go fairly high. The British wasted weeks trying to get authorization to fly courier planes between their consulates and were finally forced to appeal directly to Tito. The Anglo-Yank embassies have several times formally protested against discrimination. The Soviet embassy hasn't found démarches necessary.

Belgrade rumbles with rumors of terror in the provinces. I am told there are three methods for disposing of suspects: mobilization and shipment to remote areas whence no letters return; arrest by the OZNA and disappearance; kidnapping or murder by unidentified "bandits" with whom the police somehow never catch up. I cannot confirm or deny these reports—because I have been unable to go and see. Correspondents need passes for travel more than a few miles outside of Belgrade, and only Soviet correspondents are able to get them.

I shall pass over the atmosphere of fear here in the capital, the unwarranted searches of homes and the seizure of property, the deep and abiding hatred against the regime on the part of many plain citizens who did not go to the hills during the occupation but did not collaborate with Mihailovich, Nedich, or the Germans either. Let's examine the program for the future, a few of the eleven monumental laws which the Parliament has passed in the last seven days.

My last dispatch called the legislation constructive and I still think so. The menace lies in the ambiguity of the escape clauses at the service of doctrinaire administrators. Take the law on the right to vote. Article Four disfranchises leading members of war-time fascist organizations, but "also any individuals who associated themselves with such work." "People's committees" are empowered to draw up voting lists. Thirteen deputies, including the Croat moderate and former minister Subasich, have already filed protests with Parliament concerning the manner in which these committees are operating in Zagreb. In Belgrade last week a ward committee moved to strike a man from the register because he sold an overcoat on the black market in order to get food. Conversely a woman who had stolen a kilo of sugar was reinstated on the register because her daughter, aged fifteen, had tattled against schoolmates for scribbling anti-Tito slogans on walls. None of these decisions is final, pending confirmation of a higher committee, but the tendency is obvious.

Article One of the law on the press guarantees its liberty, but eighteen other articles proceed to restrict it. Article Six excludes anyone ever connected with fascist and pro-fascist writings. Article Eleven authorizes suspension for "spreading false and alarming rumors endangering the state." Also noteworthy are the government controls over paper distribution and almost all printing plants. There are more than a hundred pro-government journals in Yugoslavia and not a single one for the opposition.

One could go on taking apart all the other laws. The guaranty of right of association prohibits political parties which are fascist or spread discord, but does not give any definitions. The law on the election of deputies allows parties outside the all-powerful People's Front to enter national tickets but does not provide the freedom of travel necessary for building a national organization. And the law on crimes against the state, by incriminating anyone threatening the "people's authority," gives the government carte blanche for the persecution of all critics.

This indictment verging on diatribe is not intended to impugn the greatness of the partisan struggle or the merits of the leaders, some of whom are of giant stature. As Kosanovitch said in the Parliament, explaining why his Independent Democratic Party is in the People's Front, "If there had been no Front and if the procrastination advocated by reaction had prevailed, we would be faced with unsolved Serb-Croat, Serb-Bulgar, and Macedonian problems and would be entering into civil war." The partisans revived and solidified the concept of a federative Yugoslavia. The ways, and factories, and increasing of production, relief for Balkan brotherhood. They have a vigorous program of internal reconstruction: land reform, building of roads, railways, and factories, and increasing of production, relief for devastated areas, and aid to the sick, the hungry, and the old. They are young and burning with enthusiasm for "people's democracy of the masses." And that's why they have no moderation and no charity for honestly critical opinion. The "people" are a closed corporation and membership therein is arbitrarily barred to too many.

I do not credit the accusations of many dubious patriots now crowding the correspondents' doors here (and speaking excellent French or German) that the Communists are greedy to retain and expand their personal power. True, they have the power. Other parties have many posts and the semblance of power, but the Communists possess it in reality because they hold the key positions. Subasich may be the Foreign Minister, but a Communist is the chief of his political department, and a Communist is director of personnel. Of the "Big Five" in a Cabinet of twenty-six, Tito, Kardelj, and Pijade are avowed Communists; Hebrang and Rakovich—the latter is chief of the OZNA—do not wear labels but aren't fooling anybody. During the occupation 25,000 Communists died, including eleven of the Central Committeemen, and also 50,000 from the Federation of Communist Youth. The party has too big a stake to leave much room for tolerance.

The opposition—minuscule in the Parliament but potentially weighty in the country—dreads the worst. A Democratic Party spokesman, Savko Dukanac, put it neatly: "The chief trouble with . . . your laws is that there is no confidence between us. You do not believe in our well-intentioned criticism, and we do not believe your people's authority will administer the laws impartially."

One measure of hope lies in the regime's sensitivity to foreign opinion. Even the small publicity given abroad to Dr. Milan Grol's resignation from the Vice-Premiership brought fervid denials of "totalitarianism" and hasty recognition of the opposition's right to speak its mind in the Parliament. Where previously the government, through Pijade, had threatened that "the people would go to war" against a future constituent assembly if it tampered with the prescriptions set down in advance for the constitution, the government now, through Kardelj, assures the country that the assembly may write any constitution it pleases. The bugaboo of the partisans is Allied intervention. They look across the frontiers toward Greece and Bulgaria and Rumania and shut their eyes defiantly to the spectacle of supervisory election commissions. They'll concede much to be spared further mention of this distressing subject.

THE FACE IN THE MOUNTAIN

BY JAMES GROSSMAN

THERE are certain resemblances that once seen cannot be driven from the mind. If, when you are looking at some rock formation on a mountain, it takes on the appearance of a human face, there is nothing to do but resign yourself to tracing its details. The unsought image once having come will not go away, and the more you reason with it the more persistent it will be. The only relief is to give yourself to it thoroughly and tell others about it, which is what summer visitors among the mountains always do.

There is at least a fascination, if of a low order, in finding faces in mountains; and the reverse, discovering natural scenery in faces—as crags in brows, pools in eyes—remains after centuries a standard practice of literature. The utter dissimilarity of the things compared excuses the attempt; it is at the worst likely to fall flat for having been done so often before. But where a superficial similarity exists, the attempt at further comparison is always dangerous. If one finds two faces alike or two authors, they had better be like with a vengeance; for because they already have in common the same number of features or the writing of books in the same language, there will be a peculiar irritation in the slightest failure of the claimed resemblance.

My own particular obsession of a haunting likeness came over me recently while I was reading again some of the stories of Henry James about writers and artists; I was reminded at almost every turn—although I was sure at the same time that it was some mere common humanity that was taking me in—of the plays of George Kaufman. Through all the bitterness of "The Death of the Lion" there came to me constant and unwelcome recollections—unwelcome, I mean, for the moment and for their seeming inappropriateness—of all of the gaiety of "The Butter and Egg Man" and "Once in a Lifetime."

One cannot argue with memory; it comes as it will or it will not come at all. My own argument was completely unsuccessful: next to Henry James I could think of no American who had written as much as George Kaufman—to include for convenience in his own name those of his various collaborators—about the arts and the life of the artist. There were the actor in "The Royal Family" and "Stage Door," the play producer in "The Butter and Egg Man," the movie director—the movies themselves in fact—in "Once in a Lifetime," the song writer in "June Moon," and the playwright in "Merrily We Roll Along." Nor would it do to say that these were practicers of the inferior arts, which as subjects are not quite the same as "art" itself. James had answered this very objection in his preface to "The Tragic Muse": "The late R. L. Stevenson was to write me . . . on the occasion of 'The Tragic Muse' that he was at a loss to conceive how one could find an interest in anything so vulgar or pretend to gather fruit in so scrubby an orchard; but the view of a creature of the stage, the view of the 'histrionic temperament,' as suggestive much less, verily, in respect to the poor stage per se than in respect to 'art' at large, affected me in spite of that as justly tenable."

Nothing could be scrubbier or more vulgar than Tin Pan Alley or shoestring producers or, for all its gaudiness, Hollywood, as Kaufman shows them; unless it be "all the stupidity and vulgarity and hypocrisy" of the conditions of the practice of literature in James's London of the 1890's. In this London world as shown in, say, "The Death of the Lion" are the female author with a man's name ("convenient, you know, for a lady who goes in for the larger latitude, . . . men are more naturally indelicate"); the male author with a woman's name ("because the ladies are such popular favorites"); the recording instruments of literary fame—one's portrait painted by the latest fashionable painter and one's "home life" described in the syndicated gossip column, "Smatter and Chatter," along with the latest divorcée; and, above all, the great social menagerie into which the captured Lion is brought by the proprietress and her noble friends, who do everything for him, including losing his manuscript and abandoning him to die alone, but who never, in all their admiration, read ten pages he ever wrote.

So many of the details of this story have their obvious counterpart in Kaufman's plays that one is tempted to press hard on those which do not at first glance seem to fit into his work. Even the death, and the manuscript so carelessly handed about unread from one admirer to another until it is lost by the servants, yield something very like under the gentlest pressure. For these symbols of an indifference to literature amounting to contempt and hatred we have in "Once in a Lifetime" the playwright Lawrence Vail, bafflingly and mystifyingly lost and the object of wide public search while he sits every day in the very center of the great studio, under the eyes of the efficient secretary, waiting to speak to someone about what his work is to be. The figurative references to cages and keepers and to the trapped and caught state of the Lion have become literal, if only off-stage, facts in the case of Lawrence Vail. Playwrights' rooms in Hollywood are locked ("Once they get out of their rooms nobody knows what becomes of them") and no one willingly goes there, "those padded walls and the bars over the windows" are so scaring. Vail does not die; instead, he has a breakdown and is cured in a sanitarium conducted solely for playwrights who have gone to Hollywood, by a playwright who was once there.

In Kaufman as much as in James the really good artist is acted upon by his environment but does not successfully act on it. If he has an effect on his environment it is an unintended one. Lawrence Vail's outburst to George Lewis against the fantastic waste of Hollywood is repeated to the great Glogauer by George in sufficiently garbled form to start his career of prodigality, magnificent mistakes, and boundless success. By much the same irony—but on a much more modest scale of conduct, for nothing can compete with Hollywood for lavishness of wasted effort—Hugh Vereker brings about the opposite of what he intends; his explanation to the narrator of "The Figure in the Carpet" that there is a central meaning in all his work sets the narrator off on an endless wild-goose chase to discover the secret by every means except the one of actually reading the work with attention and imagination.

The difference in stature between Lawrence Vail on the one hand and the Lion, Hugh Vereker, or Ralph Limbert on the other is necessary because of the difference in the point of view from which the two authors regard their central common fact, the public taste, which both with equal cynicism place at the same low level. James's major interest is in the greatness that fails with the public; Kaufman's is in the simple-mindedness that is essential for the greatest popular success. To show by how much one can miss on the high side and to measure the flatness of the scene around him by its imagined opposite, James has created in his novelists a whole school of literary giants, sensitive, perceptive, ironic, doomed. They tower if anything too much, and we search uselessly for their likeness in James himself, as if only fact and not the imagination could be the source of true greatness. The intelligent Lawrence Vail is made to tower over the world around him just enough to show how little talent is too much for it to take to itself and use. He cannot from his relatively easy heights—any more than could Ralph Limbert from his greater one in "The Next Time"—stoop low enough to come to the great popular level. In James's words, "It takes more than trying—it comes by grace."

The true grace, it seems to me, is in never having had to stoop, in having been there all along out of sheer innocence of any higher places. The successful ones all have it: the lyric writer who can rhyme "June" and "moon" in perfect good faith, without the slightest suspicion that it has ever been done before; the young butter and egg man from Chillicothe who cannot say "brothel" without blushing, but who produces so good a brothel scene in his play that the police will raid it; James's Greville Fane, the clergyman's spotless widow who writes of the fierce immoral passions of duchesses while she watches over her children in their cribs and pats their heads; and above all, George Lewis. All these have the lovable innocence of paradise, which is worth good hard cash in a world that has eaten the fruit of the tree.

George is the most perfect of them all. We are told of Greville Fane that she "couldn't write a page of English," but we are forever being surprised to find that George can read one. He is completely free of any complications of mind or even of rhetoric—he does not know that words can mean the opposite of what they say or in fact that they can be used figuratively—and has no entanglements of any kind with the world of ideas. He goes unswervingly through the production of the movie, like some intellectual Sir Galahad who, because he is unaware of their very existence, cannot be seduced by those twin enchantresses, art and reality.

The gift of being untouched by life cannot be found, but it can be lost in the course of living. We are certain that the ingenuous young man from Chillicothe will never be successful after his first production, because he thinks he knows now how it is done; and we are happy when he goes back to the hotel business. The musically illiterate composer in "June Moon" is slipping because he has become too self-conscious of the value of his ignorance, too aware that "it ruins a composer to play the piano too good"; only an infusion of naiveté—and his new lyric writer, the hero, has enough for two—saves him. Greville Fane can no longer write successfully about the glamour of a vicious aristocracy when she sees that she has created in her children two vicious aristocrats.

George's enduring incorruptibility represents, I suspect, an ideal rather than any merely likely state of facts. In our own experience there is often so great a disparity between the artist and his work that we can account for it, as James has pointed out in the fable of "The Private Life," only by the notion that the artist at his work is a different person from the one we meet. It is one of the most consoling functions of art to deny this common fact and to picture the ideal artist, in perfect and lasting correspondence to his work. Of course when the artist is portrayed as being exactly like his work, then we can see his work in him without having it exhibited to us at length. This is one of the reasons for the peculiar convincingness of James's dying novelists and of Kaufman's George. (It is a minor but probably unavoidable blemish in "June Moon" that we hear the song of that name; we can imagine, in fact we have heard, worse.)

The public as an abstraction has always been a faceless, nameless thing that consumes and destroys. Its individual members share the function but have none of the terrifying aspect of the monster; they have rather the naive simple-mindedness of the popular artist himself. As he creates, so they destroy, with the innocence and good faith of children. "The conscience of these people," the narrator observes of Lady Augusta and her friends, who have lost the Lion's manuscript, "is like a summer sea." Lady Augusta asks whether, if the manuscript shouldn't reappear for the occasion of its reading to the Princess, "the author wouldn't have something else to read that would do just as well."

Standing as she does for the public, she is in this question at one with the perfect popular artist, George Lewis. It is fitting that the mere notion of discrimination—there is surely some significance in the fact that the word has practically only a pejorative meaning now—should be alien to her, for it is to him. His very method of work is that of pure chance: by reaching into his wastebasket instead of his files for a scenario he makes the wrong movie.

Lady Augusta has a slightly more sophisticated sister in the telephone operator of "The Butter and Egg Man," who is at least aware of the great question of discrimination. When the tryout has gone miserably in Syracuse, the wise Broadway producers call on her, as on the public in human form, for "some good straight dope, a fresh viewpoint" on what's wrong with their play. She says, "Well, I'll tell you. . . .

Syracuse is a funny town. . . . You see, the people here are funny, sort of. If they like a show they'll go to it, but if they don't like it—they won't." I wonder, but it would take us beyond our present subject, if the most elaborate apparatus of statistical science for questioning the public on what it wants of the lively arts can do more than multiply her answer.

I have spoken only of successful works of James and Kaufman. They also have some resemblances in two unsatisfactory pieces, "The Lesson of the Master" and "Merrily We Roll Along." Both deal with the successful abuse of talents by the writer who is ashamed of his popular success because he "knows" he should have done better. Each has lacked the strength to resist the good things of the world, particularly a wife. Richard Niles's first wife nags him into worse; the Master's burns his best. The Master's fate is the less bitter of the two; his first wife is quite chic, and on her death he marries the charming girl whom his young admirer has given up on his advice. Niles's fate is sheer horror: his wives turn into hags at his touch.

Both works treat solemnly and with a heavy irony what appears to be the richest material in comedy. James and Kaufman in their separate ways have often snatched their brightest comic triumphs from situations that seen as we usually see them in life are ugly and drab: the publisher in "June Moon" who in order to sell his mistress buys the song; in "The Next Time" the hopeless struggle of Ralph Limbert to stifle his intelligence and good taste so that he may write something that will sell and keep his family from starving; in "The Tree of Knowledge" the lives that have been warped to form a protective circle around the fatuous sculptor and hide from him the total silliness of his work. It is odd that they should see the difficult so clearly and miss the obvious so completely.

The material of "Merrily We Roll Along" and "The Lesson of the Master" calls particularly for comic treatment. The tragic dilemma of Niles and the Master is our own and unbearably close. The awareness that we were meant for better things is so much the smug secret knowledge of each of us that for fear of self-betrayal we cannot publicly give ourselves to it with sympathy, unless at the same time we are allowed to laugh. Clean laughter denied, we make our own Philistine jokes. We snicker at the torture that comes from wearing a hair shirt made of the most expensive silk. We deny the high price of public favor and insist that the two characters come by it as cheaply as the divinely sponging Saltram in "The Coxon Fund" "accepts favors, loans, sacrifices—all with nothing more deterrent than an agony of shame." If his two friends advise Niles, and the Master the young man, from love, it is the love of the vulture for its prey; for our part we ask only to be saved from our friends who would save us from ourselves.

Because it is the point of both stories that the two writers are not the same as their work, its quality cannot be presented dramatically, through their character, but can only be baldly stated. In art bald statement makes us contrary. We decide that the Master's novels are much worse and Niles's Broadway comedies much better than they are said to be. This is ungrateful carping—even if it does help to keep our two authors a little longer in the same boat, or rather on the same hillside—for we would not have been able to detect the reason for this technical failure had we not seen their technical successes in the presentation of the artist in relation to his work. And for that matter, we would not have suspected that they could have forced the blessing of comedy out of these two stries had we not watched them on other occasions wrestle with death itself and all the vices, until so blessed.

Despite the example of James's own easiness—when he chose to be easy—in the presence of death, he is taking on every day so much of its stiff eminence that it is unfair and a disservice to any merely living writer to undertake a comparison of him with the dead master. I have not intended any such comparison, or any sort of judgment between Kaufman and him, for that would involve a consideration not only of their likenesses but also of their differences, which are so numerous and extensive as to make Coleridge's warning to the point: "A fondness for judging one work by comparison with others, perhaps altogether of a different class, argues a vulgar taste." ("I don't put them back to back that way," says Corvick, the intelligent critic in "The Figure in the Carpet.") The likenesses between the two men seem to me only the more valuable for being so outnumbered by the differences. We tend to forget the unity of art in the interest of the separate arts, and the relationship of artists in the interest of their separate methods and intentions. Whenever, for all their rich variety, they remind us of each other, they serve to remind us also of ourselves and of the common humanity, their various but single subject, which we share with them. If we can see the likeness of a face in a mountain, can't we see it also in another face?

The Dead Wingman

Seen on the sea, no sign; no sign, no sign
In the black firs and terraces of hills
Ragged in mist. The cone narrows, snow
Glares from the bleak walls of a crater. No.
Again the houses jerk like paper, turn,
And the surf streams by: a port of toys
Is starred with its fires and faces; but no sign.

In the level light, over the fiery shores,
The plane circles stubbornly: the eyes distending
With hatred and misery and longing, stare
Over the blackening ocean for a corpse.
The fires are guttering; the dials fall,
A long dry shudder climbs along his spine,
His fingers tremble; but his hard unchanging stare
Moves unacceptingly: I have a friend.

The fires are gray; no star, no sign
Winks from the breathing darkness of the carrier
Where the pilot circles for his wingman; where,
Gliding above the cities' shells, a stubborn eye
Among the coaled and ashen nations, achingly
Tracing the circles of that worn unchanging No—
The lives' long war, lost war—the pilot sleeps.

RANDALL JARRELL

"This dramatic situation, really a life-and-death meeting between two philosophers, is the framework of one of the most moving, convincing, poignant between-the-lines and in-back-of-the-line novels to come out of the war. The author is a master of imagination.

"The puzzle of war, the puzzle of the human or inhuman millions, receives a powerful answer in this book."

Kenneth Fearing, N. Y. TIMES

Beneath The Stone

GEORGE TABORI

At all bookstores, $2.50 HOUGHTON MIFFLIN COMPANY · PUBLISHERS

The Problem of Influence

FREUDIANISM AND THE LITERARY MIND. By Frederick J. Hoffman. Louisiana State University Press. $4.

FOR some time, one of the self-imposed tasks of academic research has been the investigation of the creative writer's debt to the systematic thinker. And all too often this investigation has proceeded on assumptions which are much too simple. It is usually believed that the creative writer uses in his work the idea which the systematic thinker thinks up, quite as if an idea were a baton that is passed from hand to hand in a relay race, remaining the same in each hand. But Frederick Hoffman, even though he writes as an academic research scholar, understands that the question of influence cannot be reduced to such simplicity. Dr. Hoffman's prose is perhaps not always so lucid as the intelligence which conceived and organized his book—I found myself questioning the formulation of certain statements which I nevertheless thought right in their intention—but his study of the relation of Freud's ideas to literary practice is a work that the student of modern literature will need to know. And every historian of literature and ideas will do well to ponder its theoretical chapter on The Problem of Influence.

Dr. Hoffman knows that an idea is not the unitary, irrefrangible thing that most historians take it to be. He knows that it is modified in its transmission by the kind of cultural environment into which it falls, by the response to the kind of technical or figurative language in which it is expressed, by the power of understanding of those who receive it, and by their own purposes and intention.

Certainly nothing could better illustrate the precarious existence of an idea and the precarious position of the historian of ideas than Freud's psychology. For no system has had to endure more misunderstanding—willed or unconsciously willed—or more intellectual braggadocio from people of normally good and modest intelligence, often while they are themselves making use of Freud's doctrines. It did not lie within the purview of Dr. Hoffman's work to observe that while the investigation of Shakespearean metaphor proceeds along lines that are closely analogous with the Freudian method, so precise a Shakespearean scholar as J. Dover Wilson contemptuously cites a certain Sigismund Freud; nor to point to the spectacle of the admirable biographer of Rimbaud and Baudelaire, Enid Starkie, who ritualistically knocks down a Freudian man of straw while she accumulates evidence for the Freudian case. But Dr. Hoffman does deal at length with the kind of understanding of psychoanalysis that was current in Greenwich Village in the days when Floyd Dell was the Freudian authority and friend "psyched" friend—what depths of the past lie in that lost, banal slang word! Those were the days when Ludwig Lewisohn warped Freud to the interests of Zionism and Waldo Frank understood psychoanalysis only when he chose to, misrepresenting it when that suited his doctrinal purpose of the moment, being in this rather like Arthur Koestler, who is a perfect intellectual coquette in the matter.

Of the writers Dr. Hoffman deals with—he wisely limits their number—perhaps only Thomas Mann really understood Freud with the ordinary intelligence we might reasonably expect of a writer, and also used him creatively in a large way and to the good advantage of his art. In this country, Conrad Aiken is notable for the seriousness of his interest; Aiken's understanding of psychoanalysis—not always unexceptionable—did his novels little good but it wonderfully informed certain of his stories and poems.

The case of D. H. Lawrence is interesting not only for Lawrence's inability to understand Freud, but for the light it throws on the methods of critics who lightly use the idea of "influence." Almost from the beginning of his career, Lawrence thought in an essentially Freudian way. Yet he reached his insights without having read Freud and when at last he came to deal with Freudian theory he was shockingly obtuse. Much the same can be said of Sherwood Anderson, who became distressingly coy whenever he spoke of Freud. Yet it is one of the clichés of criticism that both Lawrence and Anderson are the notable examples of Freud's influence on literature. LIONEL TRILLING

BRIEFER COMMENT

On Looking at Pictures

MOST BOOKS that propose to tell you how to look at pictures turn—usually very early—into expositions of how pictures get to look the way they do. Lionello Venturi's "Painting and Painters: How to Look at a Picture: from Giotto to Chagall" (Scribner's, $3.50) is no exception.

Professor Venturi's conclusion states: "The first impression of a picture is quite vague, and it is only after an analysis of all its components that we may really understand the meaning of each of them and of the picture as a whole." This statement seems to me highly misleading if not completely wrong. The process of looking at a picture is infinitely more complex in scheme than that; it cannot be analyzed into discrete, sequential moments but only, if at all, into logical moments (though logic as such has very little to do with the experience of art). Doesn't one find so many times that the "full meaning" of a picture—i. e., its aesthetic fact—is, at any given visit to it, most fully revealed at the first fresh glance? and that this "meaning" fades progressively as continued examination destroys the unity of impression? With many paintings and pieces of sculpture it is as if you had to catch them by surprise in order to grasp them as wholes—their maximum being packed into the instantaneous shock of sight. Whereas if you plant yourself too firmly before looking at a picture and then gaze at it too long you are likely to end by having it merely gaze blankly back at you.

Professor Venturi is one of the few competent living art critics, and his book gives an expert and philosophical, if sketchy, account of the development of Western painting until the present. Yet books telling you how to look at pictures should generally be read only after you have already learned how by patient experience.

The keystone of Professor Venturi's aesthetics is the somewhat Crocean axiom that "the only standard for . . . appreciation is the personality of the artist"—which is correct but open to serious misinterpretation. The chief difficulty of this book is that it constantly announces the truth in misleading or incomplete terms. There is an inability to round out expression that makes for a certain haziness and incoherence which do not, perhaps, characterize the professor's thought itself.

CLEMENT GREENBERG

The Free State Vindicated

D. W. BROGAN has written a searching analysis in "The Free State" (Knopf, $2) of the historical and ideological roots of the tragedy of Germany. And in his brilliant little book he compares the bases of representative governments with the authoritarian tenets of the Reich from Frederick William I to V-E Day. Brogan's political values are Jeffersonian—good equipment for a social philosopher.

He finds that the democratic faith with all its implications for a better life is indigenous to the free state while to the Germans it has always been a foreign importation, stunted by their spiritual climate. He shows further—he is always practical—that the free state is now and has always been more efficient. It can, for instance, wage a total war more successfully than the purely military state, for whereas the military state may be able to mobilize the resources of a nation for war it does not create new resources. "It is squeezing the orange, but there is only one orange." The free state, on the other hand, possesses reserves of material and moral power which provide the improvisation, the technical ingenuity, and originality that swing military tides. This war has shown that the balance is weighted by the non-military inventions of civilian technicians. As Brogan says, "the jeep is the child of the flivver, the corvette of the freighter." This section of his book should give pause to Germans and others who still envision the ultimate triumph of the war machine.

Brogan's book is a useful war-time polemic but to the political and social architects of a new Germany it could prove discouraging. For if the free state based on the democratic faith is for the Germans an unnatural concept the prospect for the future is bleak—Brogan argues in effect that a democracy by infusion is illusory. Yet that, it would seem, is our only choice. And an imposed free state would be, for all its imperfections, far preferable to the military state we have all but destroyed.

HARVEY J. BRESLER

Democracy in Triplicate

IN "REPRESENTATIVE BUREAUCRACY, an Interpretation of the British Civil Service" (Antioch Press, $3.50), J. Donald Kingsley makes a stimulating contribution to the growing discussion of administrative bureaucracy in relation to contemporary social change. About one-third of the book is a meaningful study of the evolution of the British civil service. In it Mr. Kingsley argues that the interests and ideology of the bourgeoisie, coming to dominant political power after 1832, reshaped the civil service from an organ primarily of the aristocracy into an organ of the "middle classes," and that limitations of the civil service are the limitations of those classes. The discussion makes the service come alive.

Out of the historical analysis comes Mr. Kingsley's main thesis: with the shift in effective power from the legislative to the executive branch of government the importance of administrative bureaucracy grows; hence the crucial need for our democratic future "is to develop and maintain representative bureaucracy." This representative character, according to Mr. Kingsley, "must be sought in a common world view and upon a derivative stability in institutional relations . . . in the strength of the officials' commitment to the purposes that the state is undertaking to serve. . . . Bureaucracies, to be democratic, must be representative of the groups they serve . . . must mirror the dominant forces in society." This contains, obviously, an important element of truth, and it is convincingly developed. But it seems to me a conditional and limited truth. Every bureaucracy, except in periods of deep-going class-political change, is representative, in Mr. Kingley's sense, even in a despotic state. It is true, as Mr. Kingsley argues in his incisive analysis of the administrative process, that conflicts between ministers and permanent officials "are not likely to be serious" if both accept the state's purposes. But whether that is democratic or not depends upon whether or not the state is democratic. The bureaucracies of communism and fascism are representative since they promote "the purposes the state is undertaking to serve," "mirror the dominant forces in society," and accept "a common world view." But how democratic are they? A totalitarian regime creates the dominant forces, decides and imposes the state's purposes and world view.

Democracy in the coming world will depend primarily upon the general institutional framework within which representative bureaucracy works—a limited-power state, grass-roots pluralistic economic democracy, checks and balances (which Mr. Kingsley, mistakenly, I think, limits to top-governmental separation of powers) in the form of a variety

HENRY MILLER, author of the controversial TROPIC OF CANCER, perhaps the finest novel of our time, explains its so-called "smut" in OBSCENITY AND THE LAW OF REFLECTION, just published in a limited edition at $1 by the Alicat Book Shop, 287 S. Broadway, Yonkers 5, N. Y. Collectors please note.

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street
New York 7, N. Y.

Dear Sirs:

I want to subscribe to The Nation, or the following Nation magazine combinations as listed below:

....
....
....

☐ Remittance enclosed ☐ Bill me

NAME..
STREET..
CITY...................... ZONE...... STATE..........

9-8-45

Money-Saving
Magazine Combinations

●

THE Nation
with Harpers Magazine $6.50
You save $2.50
with Consumers Union $7.00
You save $1 50
with HARPERS & Consumers Union $9.00
You save $3.50
with Free World $7.50
You save $1 50
with Saturday Review $8.50
You save $1.50

All club combinations listed are for one year, and may be mailed to different individuals and addresses. Canadian and foreign postage extra.

THE NATION BY ITSELF

1 Year $5 2 Years $8
3 Years $11
Servicemen's Rate: $3 a Year

Canadian and Foreign Postage, $1 a Year Extra

MOTION PICTURES

"It is worth any dozen run-of-the-studio Academy Award winners."—TIME

David L. Loew presents

Zachary SCOTT Betty FIELD

The Southerner

From George Sessions Perry's "HOLD AUTUMN IN YOUR HAND"

with J. CARROL NAISH

Beulah Bondi - Percy Kilbride

Directed by Jean Renoir

BRANDT'S AIR-COOLED

Now Playing GLOBE B'way at 46th St.

Paramount Presents

ED GARDNER'S "DUFFY'S TAVERN"

FEATURING

32 HOLLYWOOD STARS

IN PERSON

THE ANDREWS SISTERS

Featuring

Tim Herbert

Vic Shoen
And His Recording Orchestra

Foy Willing's
Riders of the Purple Sage

Pig-Meat Alamo
Markham

COOL PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

"Bright and Tuneful" . . .—Barnes, Herald-Tribune

Rodgers and Hammerstein's

STATE FAIR

A 20th Century-Fox Picture In Technicolor

Starring

Dana ANDREWS Jeanne CRAIN Dick HAYMES Vivian BLAINE

On the stage, IN PERSON
CONNEE BOSWELL • CONDOS BROS. • GENE SHELDON

Now Playing ROXY 7th Ave. at 50th St.

of autonomous social institutions, freedom. There are glimpses of this in Mr. Kingsley's analysis, but they are overwhelmed by his concentration on the administrative process. He dogmatically and disdainfully denies there is a danger of bureaucratic despotism. Ignoring the literature and ideas on this subject, he fails to see that a bureaucracy may develop interests and powers of its own, and he fails to see that where effective economic power is not wielded by classes outside the state but by the state itself the conditions for bureaucratic despotism arise.

Its limitations, as well as its merits, make this a book that should be read. It opens windows on a range of problems that must be understood and solved if the coming world is to be truly democratic.

LEWIS COREY

Apology to F. R. Scott

In reviewing F. R. Scott's book of poems, "Overture," in last week's issue, I called him F. R. Jones. The error is as unexplainable as it is inexcusable. My apologies to Mr. Scott.

F. W. DUPEE

MOTION PICTURE

NOW RKO

BROOKLYN & QUEENS
BUSHWICK
DYKER
Keith's FLUSHING
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
Keith's RICHMOND HILL
STRAND Far Rockaway
TILYOU

"Comedy Drama of Young Love . . . Honest and straightforward"—N. Y. Sun

ROBERT YOUNG • LARAINE DAY

'THOSE ENDEARING YOUNG CHARMS'

Ann HARDING and introducing Bill WILLIAMS Screen Version of EDWARD CHODOROV'S Stage Play

—— and 2nd feature ——

ZANE GREY'S 'WEST OF THE PECOS'

Robert MITCHUM • Barbara HALE

STAGE PLAY

MICHAEL TODD Presents

UP IN CENTRAL PARK

Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS Lyrics by DOROTHY FIELDS Music by SIGMUND ROMBERG
BROADWAY THEATRE, Broadway & 53rd Street. Matinees Wed. & Sat.
REALLY AIR-CONDITIONED

The Nation Index

for volume 160 of The Nation covering the period from January through June, 1945, is now available. This excellent reference aid may be had for 15 cents.

Send your order for the Index with remittance, to

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street New York 7, N. Y.

Music

B. H. HAGGIN

A READER has written me from Germany an interesting comment on the paragraph from Einstein's "Mozart" that I quoted last May. The paragraph was about Mozart's relation to the intellectual currents of his time, and contained the statement that Mozart probably would have had no use for Rousseau, "whose call 'Back to Nature' would have meant very little to him. Mozart was on the side of Voltaire, in spite of the ill-tempered words he pronounced upon the sage of Ferney as an obituary." This leads my correspondent to observe: "I had just finished reading a collection of Mozart letters . . . [which] are astounding, aren't they? And after reading them Einstein's passage was just nonsense. The compulsion some people are under to try to fit literary or musical figures into our idea of their time seems so wasteful. These writers want their idols to be on what we now think was the right side of their century. (I recently saw an article in which the author seemed a little hurt that Balzac had 'completely misunderstood' the Paris Commune. Just because this writer does approve of the Paris Commune there is no reason to believe that Balzac didn't know what he was talking about when he said that he didn't approve.) Thus, since Einstein is on the side of Voltaire (good for Voltaire) it is necessary that Mozart be, too. And so the vicious letter he wrote on Voltaire's death becomes 'ill-tempered'—which is absurd. He was not on Voltaire's side; he hated Voltaire; his letter on Voltaire's death is really nasty. And why can't the man be given credit for some unpleasant qualities, or for some errors of judgment (if indeed they are errors of judgment)?"

Also, my recent analysis of the review of Einstein's book in the summer issue of Kenyon Review has brought this illuminating comment from another reader: "I should say that Mozart's music is rich in sentiment, but not sentimental as Beethoven occasionally is in the slow movements of his weaker works. Indeed I should say that Mozart's very expressiveness, his capacity to arouse the substantive feelings and passions of joy, sorrow, longing, gaiety, precludes the possibility of his being sentimental. Sentimentality is precisely the pose of feeling, the simulation or suggestion of it rather than the thing itself. Sometimes, in Beethoven, one feels that he is trying to create a mood which has no actual occasion or objective correlative (to use T. S. Eliot's phrase) in the music itself. The mood is suggested or 'called to mind' but not embodied. In Mozart one can't help being gay or exultant or whatever the music is at the time. In Brahms's serenades one feels that one 'ought' to be gay; in the finale of Mozart's E flat Symphony one is gay, deliriously so. That is why the Brahms is so terribly dull in the end, even though the tunes are often quite charming in themselves."

From the very beginning there have been readers of this column who have found it impossible to regard my dislike of much of Brahms's music as a product of rational judgment of experience; and the accusations of insufficient knowledge of the music and of prejudice against it have continued in the face of my statements to the contrary. I have pointed out that since I have expressed my love for certain works of Brahms my dislike of others cannot represent a prejudice against him; I have also pointed out that I acquired an exhaustive knowledge of his music during the dozen or more years when it was for me, every note of it, the greatest of all—until I began to be aware of something in some of the works that made me dislike them. What I began to be aware of was the pose of feeling that my correspondent speaks of which is to be heard in the ranting of the first movement of the First Symphony, the treacly sentimentality of the second movement, the archness of the third—all of which can be heard also in other of Brahms's pretentious large-scale works. And not only pose of feeling, but pose of the entire process of artistic creation—of feeling making itself articulate through the substance, procedures, forms of an artistic medium. The very first work that I disliked was the Sonata Opus 99 for cello and piano: here for the first time I became aware of a mere filling out of formal pattern by arbitrary manipulation of synthetic substance—of a form of expression without real expression. And in time I came to dislike the other works of Brahms in which pumped-up attitudes are communicated through synthetically contrived large structures—as against music which communicates something genuinely felt that has dictated the substance and its manipulation into a form.

Now that I think of it, that pose of feeling and of artistic expression of feeling is one of the things I have heard and disliked in the music of Shostakovitch, of Villa-Lobos, of Roy Harris, of William Schuman, and of others like them.

After all this had been written Einstein's book came up once more. This column's favorite correspondent, returned from war, listened with me to Mozart's String Quintet K. 515; and when we were talking about the things that were so astounding in the minuet

NOW AVAILABLE FOR CIVILIAN USE
ARMY TALK, Orientation Fact Sheet Number 70:
PREJUDICE!—ROADBLOCK TO PROGRESS
The complete text of this important Army education pamphlet.
The answer to Bilbo and Rankin.
Reprinted by Permission of the War Department by International Labor Defense
112 East 19th Street New York 3, N. Y.
100 for $4 — 500 for $16 — 1,000 for $80

BOOKS FOUND FREE!
WHAT BOOKS DO YOU WANT?
We quote lowest market prices. No charge for locating Hard-to-Find and Out-of-Print Books. All books. OLD or NEW, mailed POST-FREE.
SEARCHLIGHT BOOK NATION
22 East 17th Street, New York City

Alcoholics ARE Sick People
ROBERT V. SELIGER, M.D.
Assistant Visiting Psychiatrist
JOHNS HOPKINS HOSPITAL
(An educational pocket-size monograph sent in a plain envelope.)
Book Dealers' Agent
REMINGTON PUTNAM CO.
Baltimore 1, Md.
ALCOHOLISM PUBLICATIONS
2030 Park Avenue, Baltimore 17, Md.
Please send: ALCOHOLICS ARE SICK PEOPLE.
☐ copies $2.00 cloth bound
Name..
Address..
....

movement—the somber strangeness of the Minuet, the first part of the Trio, the violent intensities of its middle part —I showed him what Einstein had found important about it: "The following Minuet is more of a tempo di minuetto, with a Trio in the subdominant, which itself grows into complete song-form." Later we listened to the last few minutes of "The Marriage of Figaro," leading up to and ending with the Contessa, perdono passage; and when I lifted the pickup off the record after the solemn octaves that gently ease us from the superearthly exaltation of that passage down to this earth again, he sat silent for a long time; then, beginning to laugh, he said: "Let's see what Einstein has to say about it." So we looked, and found that Einstein had nothing to say about it. And looking further we found that he did have things like this to say: "It has been observed with truth that in Susanna there is a bit of Colombina left, in Figaro of Arlecchino; that Don Bartolo and Marcellina are pure buffo figures. But the Countess? The Count? Cherubino? The tiny roles of Barbarina and her father, the gardener Antonio? Basilio the schemer? It took courage to see the opera buffa possibilities in this work and to realize them—courage that Mozart and da Ponte can have gathered only from pieces like those of Bertati and Casti." At which point we shut the book with a bang—for good.

CONTRIBUTORS

JAMES GROSSMAN is a lawyer who lives in New York City. He has contributed to the Partisan Review.

RANDALL JARRELL, now in the air corps, was formerly an instructor in English at the University of Texas. He is the author of two books of poems, "Blood for a Stranger" and "Little Friend, Little Friend."

LIONEL TRILLING, associate professor of English at Columbia University, is the author of "Matthew Arnold" and "E. M. Forster."

CLEMENT GREENBERG is The Nation's art critic.

HARVEY J. BRESLER is a business executive and lawyer, who served overseas as an Economics Officer with Civil Affairs (AMG). He has written for the New Republic, the Commonweal, Tomorrow, the Political Science Quarterly, the New York Herald Tribune Books, and other publications.

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

Nazis Still in Command

Dear Sirs: Yesterday we were relieved of the job of running a P. O. W. enclosure with 7,000 P. O. W.'s of which we had been in charge for two weeks. The camp had been running for a week or so when a German lieutenant expressed the wish to be brought to the Russian authorities. Well, P. O. W.'s had come to us with the oddest and craziest requests; this one, too, could have been dismissed with a laugh. But something in that man demanded confidence and respect. He opened our eyes to a lot of things in the camp that didn't agree with the principles for which so many Allied soldiers had given their lives. As in most P. O. W. camps the German officers still retained their grip upon the rank and file, a lot of "cliques" had been set up, and an honest anti-Nazi didn't have a chance. In addition to the guards there were only seven of us, all German-speaking, N. C. O.'s to carry on the administration of a camp of 7,000; and we would have saved ourselves a lot of work if we had decided to leave things as they were. However, there was that German lieutenant P. O. W. with the single-track mind, whose one purpose was to wipe out fascism in whatever form it appeared. And there was also our conviction that we mustn't let these things happen if we could change them.

So we seven non-coms, our officer, and that man had a talk one evening. This is what we decided and we carried it out the following morning. At 7 o'clock we gave orders to the officers to stand by with their baggage. At the same time the men were told to stand by for an important announcement. Well, the officers who, as we had found out, were instigating subversive activities, were led away. Those who had tried hard to have the men do close-order drill and those who had stolen rations from their own men were locked up in the cage. Now we had 7,000 men without officers, without leaders, and you know what a German is without a leader. These 7,000 men were now broken up into seven separate groups, and every one of us had 1,000 men staring at him waiting and wondering what was going to happen next. Well, here is a rough idea of what each of us said to his group:

> This morning we have freed you from your officers. For six years these men have mistreated you. For six years or longer they have stolen from you and from every decent German and now, when they shared your fate of captivity, they thought they could continue that life. . . . That has changed as of today. I have taken over the battalion of 1,000 men. Together we will choose ten Company Commanders who have your confidence and mine. Neither I nor these ten men have been to the War Academy in Potsdam, nor to any S. S. Oberfuehrerschule. But I am sure we'll be able to run the battalion as efficiently as if we wore those silver epaulettes.

Never had I seen so much satisfaction as in those men after I gave them the news. Every company was asked whom they would suggest. In addition I asked who felt capable of leading a group of 100 men and I found out all the men who had ever been in trouble with the German Army for "crimes" like "Zersetzung der Wehrkraft," listening to foreign radio stations, etc. I picked my ten men from these groups and today I can say that none of them has let us down.

But here's the payoff. While I was writing these lines I was told to report to a meeting. The orders from Army HQ were in. Everything we did in these last two weeks will have to be undone. We will have to put German officers back in charge of the companies. We will have to appoint German Battalion Commanders in our own places. We are supposed to supervise them only. But this is impossible. Here every one of us is up against eleven politically indoctrinated Nazi bastards who should be shot rather than put in charge of German people. Now the old game of intrigue and fake and forgery will be continued. German officers laugh about "these silly Americans." And the men who were company commanders and who cooperated with us, what can they expect from these officers? In a few days these company commanders had uncovered 182 former members of the Waffen S.S., 12 former members of the Allgemeine S.S., some members since 1932 and 1933.

SERVICEMAN

Somewhere in Germany,

[This letter reached us through the Newsletter for a Democratic Austria which also sent us the following information: The June 8 issue of the Kaertner Neueste Nachrichten, a newspaper published under the auspices of the British Occupation Authorities, reports that the Military Government is directing men in agricultural work in Carinthia. These men, Austrian P. O. W.'s, will be commanded by their own officers, who are mostly German, and "who are responsible to the Allied Command for the conduct of their men." This means that Austrian P. O. W.'s, on Austrian soil, are often being officered by Germans and owe them obedience.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

The Errors of Weimar

Dear Sirs: I wish to take exception to your editorial note on Dr. Gerhard Anschuetz in The Nation of August 11. Unintentionally, I trust, you have done a grave injustice to an honest and fearless man.

Let me first correct two major errors that you (and the source of your information) committed in your short note. Dr. Anschuetz never was—nor ever claimed to be—the author of the Weimar Constitution. Its real father was the late Dr. Hugo Preuss, a democratic scholar-politician, who was the first Minister of the Interior of the German Republic. Dr. Anschuetz's claim to fame rests with the facts that he was the leading expert on constitutional law of pre-Hitler Germany and that he wrote the outstanding commentary on the Weimar Constitution.

Your second error concerns the paragraph of the Constitution which Anschuetz is said to have criticized. It characterizes the reliability of the newspaper interview on which you base your remarks, that it speaks of paragraph 54, although anybody who ever read a book on modern German history knows that it was paragraph 48 which conferred the fateful emergency powers on the President of the German Republic. It is unthinkable that Dr. Anschuetz would have misquoted the most frequently discussed article of the Constitution.

In general, I hold no brief for scholars and politicians who remained in Hitler Germany. But there are exceptions, and Gerhard Anschuetz is one of them. I always considered him the clearest constitutional thinker I ever encountered in Germany and one of the rather few university professors who did not hesitate to stand up for their democratic convictions. As you say, he spent ten years of Hitler's reign in a Nazi prison. I do not think that he deserved a slur from you. Your note would have made more sense, if it had ended with the words: ". . . That there were a few other things wrong with Weimar Germany besides paragraph 48, and that one of them was too few—far, far too few—Dr. Anschuetzes." FELIX E. HIRSCH

Annandale-on-Hudson, N. Y.,
August 14

[When The Nation said that one of the things wrong with Weimar Germany was "too many—far, far too many—Dr. Anschuetzes" we did not intend a slur on his character. Nor do we doubt that he stood up for his democratic convictions. What the comment tried to say, perhaps too obliquely, was simply that too many honest democrats in pre-Hitler Germany thought you could sweep back the Nazi tide with a broom made of constitutional provisions and other legal formulas. If more of them had realized from the start that what they faced was not legitimate political opposition but a fascist revolution, to be met by the united forces of all the left and democratic elements in Germany, Hitler would not have come to power and Dr. Anschuetz would not have spent ten years in a Nazi prison. As for our other errors, they are inexcusable. We relied on a dispatch in the New York Times instead of turning to several available reference books in The Nation's library. We should have learned by this time that even the Times is not infallible. —EDITORS THE NATION.]

Would Conscription Pay?

Dear Sirs: Conscription or Enlistment? by Militaris seems to me the most reasonable discussion of the subject that I have seen. My opinion may be largely personal; but the article emphasizes most temperately what I would emphasize. If we are to have another war within five years after this one ends, we may well continue conscription. If we are not to have another war for fifteen or twenty years, conscription would be largely futile. Unless there is a rather immediate prospect of war, it is almost impossible to keep up the necessary interest in military training, for large numbers of conscripts.

GUSTAVUS S. PAINE

Southbury, Conn., July 15

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

LANGUAGE IS POWER

. . . Forge ahead, win special assignments, promotion, better job in global peace time opportunities through ability to speak a foreign language.

MASTER A NEW LANGUAGE quickly, easily, correctly by LINGUAPHONE

The world-famous Linguaphone Conversational Method brings voices of native teachers INTO YOUR OWN HOME. You learn the new language by LISTENING. It's amazingly simple; thousands have succeeded. ◆ ◆ 29 LANGUAGES

Send for Free book, Call for Free demonstration

LINGUAPHONE INSTITUTE
81 RCA Bldg., New York 20 • Circle 7-0830

LEARN RUSSIAN

FOR IMMEDIATE APPLICATION

Practical 33-Week Course under the recognized authority, DR. E. MARKOFF

Classes held Thursdays, beginning October 11. Scientifically planned and tested method in grammar and useful conversation for beginners and advanced students. Also special normal course for teachers of Russian.

AMERICAN RUSSIAN CULTURAL ASS'N
200 W. 57 St., N. Y. 19, N. Y. CI 5-5377

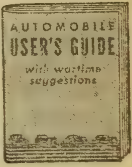
The
New Statesman and Nation

England's Leading Weekly Review may now be obtained through

THE NATION
20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y.

Yearly subscription $6.50 including postage
SPECIMEN copy on request

FREE to All AUTO owners



196 PRACTICAL SUGGESTIONS

that will help you to get

- better gas mileage
- longer tire life
- better performance
- lower upkeep costs

Get a FREE COPY from any General Motors dealer, or use coupon below.

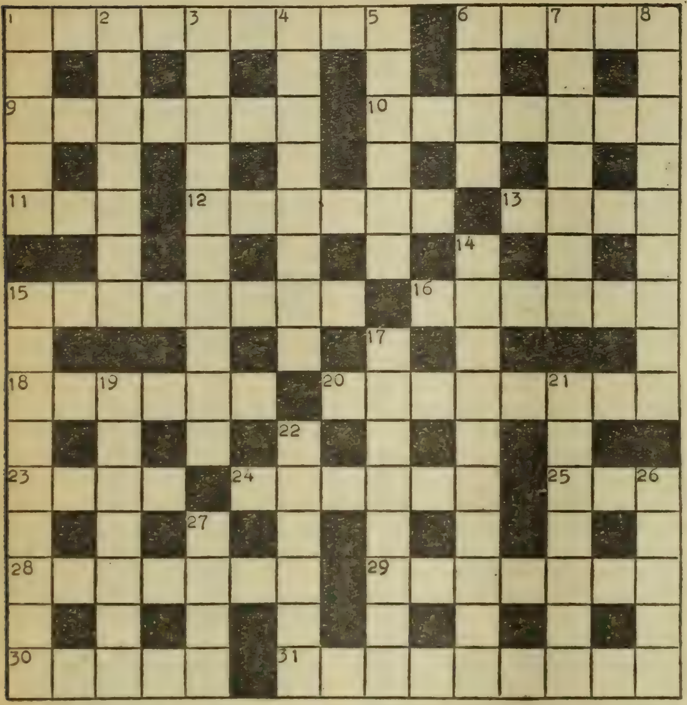
Customer Research Dept., Room 1817
GENERAL MOTORS, DETROIT 2, MICH.

Please send FREE COPY of new edition 64-page "Automobile User's Guide"—containing 196 practical suggestions on care and operation.

Mr.
Mrs. ....
Miss
please print
Address ....
please print
City..
Zone State
Make of car
now owned ....
9 year model

Crossword Puzzle No. 125

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 Choose to be grateful for someone in Vanity Fair
6 Sir Walter Scott's black one had several aliases
9 Is a lass (anag.)
10 Part of a car worn 'round the neck?
11 This Japanese fish is nearly all tail
12 Chant in harmony
13 Edible part of an alligator
15 Poem whose second half is spoken
16 Hole in favor with golfers who hit a long ball (hyphen, 3-3)
18 Punctual (two words, 2 and 4)
20 A topping thing for one's retirement
23 Not an odd-sounding Russian
24 Spanish wine shop
25 A big fellow
28 Tyrannical schoolmaster in David Copperfield
29 A little fellow
30 Sonya appears in a medieval peasant's jacket
31 A game bird

DOWN

1 "Fixed like a ----- on his peculiar spot, To draw nutrition, propagate, and rot"
2 He of the lean and hungry look, in Julius Caesar
3 What the Scotsman had inscribed on his tombstone (four words, 4, 2, 2, 2)
4 A police dog, perhaps
5 "O.K. I'm on!" (anag.)
6 Take off
7 Hal and Lila join in an old salutation (hyphen, 3-4)
8 Bright and companionable, if a little unsteady about the room
14 One who ascends by this is likely to have sway (two words, 4 and 6)
15 Parts from capital
17 Guide to the North
19 Gorboduc, by Thomas Sackville, was the first regular one written in English (It was a bit dull)
21 Tagged
22 Not an outstanding success as a shepherdess (hyphen, 2-4)
26 "O sleep, O gentle sleep, Nature's soft ----- !"
27 He and his brother miller, Bone, were more than Flesh and Blood could stand

◆

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 124

ACROSS:—1 MOUTH; 4 BLAST; 7 INCLUDE; 10 GAMIN; 11 EIDAM, 12 DREAMER; 13 TEND; 16 HERR; 18 ASIDE; 20 WHEEZE; 21 ENTRAP; 22 RELIEF; 24 BOWERY; 25 CAIRN: 26 TSAR; 28 TURF; 31 BAILIES; 33 POKER; 34 PHLOX; 35 AMASSER; 36 YAWED; 37 YATES.

DOWN:—1 MIGHT; 2 UNMAN; 3 HIND; 4 BEER; 5 ADDLE; 6 TAMAR; 8 CREASE; 9 UNMADE; 14 EDWARDS; 15 DWELLER; 16 HERBERT; 17 REPAYER; 18 AZTEC; 19 END ON; 23 FATIMA; 24 BRAINS; 26 TIPSY; 27 ASKEW; 29 UNLIT; 30 FOXES; 31 BRAD; 32 SPRY.

RESORTS

—Announcing—
Membership in the West End Casino
Our guests are invited to enjoy all the facilities of this Ocean Front Beach Club, including the Pool, Beach and Evening Entertainment, also our own excellent Tennis, Handball, Cycling. Golf & Riding available. Dancing and Delicious Food. Join us in the gay and diversified activities at our own beautiful Resort Estate.
The Oaks
ELBERON, NEW JERSEY
Telephone: Long Branch 2433

Yours for Vacation Enjoyment
HILLTOP LODGE
On beautiful Sylvan Lake
HOPEWELL JUNCTION, N. Y.
65 mi. from N. Y. C. • R. R. Station Pawling, N. Y.
Every conceivable Sport and Recreation . . . with intimate, congenial people
Open from May thru October
Under direction of: PAUL WOLFSON & SOL ROTHAUSER
New York Office: 277 BROADWAY COrtlandt 7-3958

INVITATION TO RELAX
Enjoy the serenity of Plum Point. Gorgeous countryside, roaring fireplace, delicious food — and fun. Only 55 miles from New York
MAKE RESERVATIONS EARLY
Plum Point
"Year-Round Vacation Resort"
New Windsor, N.Y. Tel: Newburgh 4270

RELAX, REJOICE with SUMMER at . . .
Lakecrest
On Hunn's Lake • Stanfordville, N. Y.
90 miles from N. Y. Ideal location in the heart of DUTCHESS COUNTY. Excellent accommodations. Cordial hospitality. Recordings. Library. All seasonal sports. Via N.Y.C.R.R. to Amenia, N.Y. Open all year.
WRITE OR PHONE YOUR RESERVATIONS
EVA BERG. Director Stanfordville 4108

SHADYBROOK
MAHOPAC, N. Y. Tel. Mahopac 2320
50 miles from N. Y. 140 acres rustic country, secluded, restful, homelike. Unexcelled American cuisine. Sports, Movies. Beautiful walks. Mrs. G. Popper
Reduced September rates. Open for Holy Days.

Birdland
CENTRAL VALLEY, N. Y.
200-ACRE ESTATE 1,000-FT. ELEVATION
Congenial adult resort. All sports. Clay Tennis Courts. Golf, fine food. Only 45 miles from N. Y.
10% DISCOUNT FOR SERVICEMEN
JEWISH HOLIDAY SPECIAL, $15.00—2 DAYS
Highland Mills 7895; N.Y.C.: LO 5-3715, WA 5-4671

The Fieldstone
On Round Island Lake
A place of unexcelled beauty for rest and relaxation. One hour from New York
ALL SPORTS — OPEN ALL YEAR
MONROE, N. Y. Phone 7965

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 161 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • SEPTEMBER 15, 1945 NUMBER 11

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 241

EDITORIALS

Baruch on the Veterans 243
Cross-Currents in Japan 244
The State Department Reorganization 245

ARTICLES

The Truman Program by I. F. Stone 246
Palestine—a World Responsibility by Senator Robert F. Wagner 247
Japan's Police Terror by Andrew Roth 250
The Hollywood Incident by Carey McWilliams 251
White Justice in Dallas by George Clifton Edwards 253
Who Bosses the Philippines? by Captain X 255
In the Wind 257

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Harvard Ponders Education by Irwin Edman 258
The Great Choice by Albert Guérard 260
Briefer Comment 262
Music by B. H. Haggin 264
Films by James Agee 264
LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 266
CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 126 by Jack Barrett 268

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor J. KING GORDON
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Editor Political War Section
J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor J. MITCHELL MORSE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates
LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS
CAREY MCWILLIAMS REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1945, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 8, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

PRESIDENT TRUMAN HAS WISELY TAKEN THE initiative in demanding a Congressional investigation of the Pearl Harbor disaster. Through Senator Barkley the Administration has forestalled the Republicans and offered its own resolution for such an inquiry. This had passed the Senate before we went to press and will probably have passed the House before this issue appears. It is a pity the terms of the resolution did not cover that other "Pearl Harbor" at Manila, where MacArthur lost virtually his entire air force to the Japanese, on the ground and without a fight, ten hours after the surprise attack on Hawaii. There are many gaps in the army-navy reports on Pearl Harbor—notably the omission, from the published version of the army report, of fifty-two pages on the activities of an army lieutenant and a German contractor in charge of airfield construction on Oahu. The full story of the diplomatic maneuvers which preceded the outbreak of war with Japan has yet to be told, and we hope the joint Congressional inquiry will find out whether it was opposition to further appeasement or an ultimatum from Chungking which led the State Department to insist in November, 1941, on the withdrawal of the Japanese troops from China as a condition of peace. Senator Taft said that he wanted to be sure the resolution provided authority to go back as far as the days when we were selling scrap iron to Japan. It does, and we hope the Ohio isolationist and corporation lawyer will feel the same way when investigators expose the part that oil and iron interests played in the appeasement of Japan.

*

THE DEPARTURE OF GENERAL MACARTHUR AND the end of army control in the Philippines open the way for much-needed changes in the islands. Under the army no long-range plans for rehabilitation and economic reform could even be started, and the Commonwealth has kept itself afloat chiefly on the artificial business activity generated by the presence of a large military establishment. Now it must tackle the job of preparing for independence, and under present conditions independence looks more like a threat than a long-desired goal. For the islands are shattered, materially and humanly. The chronic ills of a feudal colonial system have been multiplied by the corrupting effect of enemy occupation and the destruction of war. As for the political situation, it is even more deplorable. Under the shelter of MacArthur's military control a government of collaborationists has firmly intrenched itself, as the article by Captain X on page 255 of this issue clearly reveals. Civilian administration cannot alter the picture overnight, but President Truman's appointment of a High Commissioner is a move in the right direction. Mr. McNutt held this post once before, from 1937 to 1939, and he recently headed the Commission on Health and Rehabilitation of the Philippines. He is a good administrator, if not a person of great social or political imagination, and he should be able to set in motion the civilian agencies that have been stalled since the liberation of the islands. We hope he will also reverse the MacArthur policy of supporting political reaction and discouraging the weak and poorly organized advocates of Philippine democracy.

*

EDWARD R. MURROW, WRITING FROM LONDON to the New York Post, expressed his horror that certain New York night-club entertainers were making jokes and rhymes about the atomic bomb and suggested that since it was likely more people would die of starvation in Europe than were killed by the two bombs, here was a topic that would tax the ingenuity of entertainers in search of a jest. Murrow's grim suggestion may not be too far-fetched. Recently the New York Times ran a joyous editorial in praise of the return of the abundant life—reduced ration points, 20 per cent increases in meat supplies, a bumper turkey crop "with the promise that carries for heavily laden Thanksgiving tables." Apparently, said the Times, "the situation remains tight only for fats, oils, and sugar." (The restoration of whipping cream was announced a day later.) The same issue of the Times carried first-hand reports of Europe's food outlook. Herbert Lehman, returning on the Queen Elizabeth, said Europe was in for a grim winter. Roy C. Hendrickson, deputy director of UNRRA, said that while shipments of relief supplies were being increased, there were acute shortages that could only partially be met. In the matter of fats and oils UNRRA has been able to do nothing to improve a European diet of eight to twelve pounds a year compared with an American level which never fell below forty-five pounds even in the "tight" period to which the Times referred. It seems to us that our authorities are misjudging the American people if they assume we are eager to return to bountiful living while Europe and the rest of the world starve. Let's keep rationing strict if thereby Europe can get more meats and fats. Let's be quick about advancing credits if it means food supplies to France, Belgium, Great Britain, and other countries not serviced by UNRRA. Let's give UNRRA promptly the appropriation Mr. Lehman is asking for.

*

PREMIER FERUCCI PARRI HAS REFUSED TO HOLD elections in Italy until a peace treaty has been signed. He may resign rather than yield to the Allies on this point. Parri's resignation might well mean the dissolution of the Committee of National Liberation. Meanwhile the Italians are looking forward to holding a Constitutional Assembly. Actually, no free choice can be made between republic and monarchy while foreign troops occupy the country and a pro-monarchist Allied Commission circumscribes the authority of the government. Premier Parri said to Donald Downes, ONA representative, in a recent interview: "You cannot manufacture democracy without democracy or perform the most significant right of freedom without true freedom; nor is it possible to do either without national autonomy." Under AMG each Italian ministry has its counterpart in the Allied Commission. Recently the commission required the hated Carabinieri to increase its numbers and modernize its equipment. These henchmen of monarchy would supervise the polls if an election were held now. In the north, mayors and provincial administrators have been required to take an oath of allegiance to the King—an oath not required of the Prime Minister himself. Without the bolstering of their position by Allied authority the monarchists would stand little chance: even the Christian Democrats, the largest party in Italy, have publicly acknowledged "the outspoken republican preference in the party ranks." Unless the elections are forced before the signing of the treaty and the departure of AMG, the right would like to see them delayed until "recovery and tranquillity" return. The left, on the other hand, wants the elections immediately after the signing of the treaty.

*

THE FORMULATION OF A PEACE TREATY FOR Italy will present a severe challenge to the statesmanship of the Foreign Ministers of the Big Five now meeting in London, involving as it does an escapable clash of interests. Russia will undoubtedly back Tito's claim to Trieste, while Britain is reported to favor a free port available to all the landlocked Balkan states. A particularly ticklish problem arises in connection with the former Italian colonies. The anti-Soviet clique in the State Department is said to favor returning the colonies to Italy rather than creating a four-power trusteeship in which Russia would be represented. Although the United States has not hesitated to demand a voice in the internal affairs of Bulgaria and Rumania under the terms of the Yalta agreement, this group is strongly opposed to permitting Russia to gain a foothold on the Mediterranean, even in an international arrangement. From Russia's point of view, the whole question may well be viewed as a test of Anglo-American sincerity toward the United Nations Charter. That document clearly provided for trusteeship for former enemy territory, and any effort to hedge on that obligation in the first post-war territorial settlement would threaten United Nations unity.

*

THE SCANDALOUS BEHAVIOR OF THE FASCIST Bavarian government under the noses of the Allied military authorities is new proof that we are far from having won the fight against fascism in Europe. The Nation will start publication shortly of a series of articles on this vital subject by Saul K. Padover, a distinguished American writer who has just returned from Germany. Mr. Padover is an expert on government administration, and it would be difficult to find anyone better equipped to tell the American people the truth about American-occupied Germany. But even without his evidence it is plain enough that the fascists in the Bavarian administration, from Minister President Friedrich Schaeffer through Minister of Economics Lange and the acting head of the Ministry of the Interior, August Fischer, are running things to suit themselves. A headline on a recent story by Victor H. Bernstein in PM announced that the situation was one which "even the AMG can't stomach." Can Bernstein, who has done such excellent work, really believe that there would be a fascist government in Bavaria if the American government objected? But unless the American government does object, its policy is not "the destruction of the fascist tyranny," as President Roosevelt proclaimed at one of the most crucial moments of the war.

✶

THE GOVERNOR OF TEXAS HOLDS A MAN'S LIFE in his hands. Unless he intervenes, L. C. Akins will be put to death on October 6 because his skin is black. A factual study of the case is set forth in an article by George Clifton Edwards, a Dallas attorney, on page 253 of this issue of The Nation. The procedure of the Texas courts in bringing about a conviction for murder and imposing the death sentence is, unfortunately, not exceptional. What is almost impossible to understand is the action—with the honorable dissent of Justices Stone, Black, and Murphy—of the United States Supreme Court in attesting that no grounds existed for throwing out the conviction on the basis of special discrimination. It would almost appear that the court's predilection for permitting the states freedom to experiment in social legislation has been broadened to include freedom to experiment in refined forms of depriving United States citizens of their lives. We appeal to Governor Coke Stevenson to use his prerogative to free the state of Texas from the imminent guilt of legal murder. And we urge our readers, after they have carefully studied Mr. Edwards's analysis, to act in their capacity as American citizens committed to a belief in equal justice and wire the Governor. A man's life may yet be saved and the traditions of American justice vindicated.

✶

PROSPECTS FOR A JOBLESS INSURANCE BILL THAT will see war workers through the reconversion period without severe hardship appear to be slight despite President Truman's urgent plea for such legislation. Since it is obvious that the federal government has a responsibility to the hard-working men and women whose jobs were suddenly terminated by the cancelation of war orders, the opponents of the bill have been careful not to oppose the principle of the proposal. Instead, they have raised the hoary slogan of states' rights to sabotage the Administration's plan for increasing unemployment benefits by federal grants-in-aid. One state official, testifying before the Senate Finance Committee, said that forty states have restrictions preventing them from increasing their unemployment benefits even if they receive federal aid. Behind this technicality—which could easily be removed by the state legislatures—lies the concerted opposition of the state bureaucracies to any move which challenges their political domination. Since the plan would be of great benefit to the persons they are supposed to serve, as well as to the nation as a whole, their attitude provides the strongest argument yet advanced for the abolition of state control over unemployment insurance and the creation of a unified federal system. If it is impossible under the present law to provide equitable benefits for our war workers regardless of the state in which they happened to work, no time should be lost in changing the law. Surely the country does not want to repeat the experiences of the early 1930's, when the states held out against the use of federal funds until millions faced starvation and the states themselves were on the brink of complete economic collapse.

✶

THE DEATH OF VICE-ADMIRAL JOHN SIDNEY McCain within a few hours of his return home is tragic testimony to the terrible effects of modern war on the men who fight it. McCain did not die from a sniper's bullet or a battleship's salvo, but war killed him as surely and as mercilessly as it killed any man who fell in the front lines. Reporters at Pearl Harbor who interviewed him on his way home from Japan remarked the strain and fatigue in his face, and those who knew what ceaseless effort of concentration he brought to his job of commanding the fast carrier force cannot have been too surprised that the sudden release from enormous responsibility and overtaxing work was followed by the stopping of a very stout heart. McCain was one of those extraordinary men who can master a new trade late in life—he received his wings at fifty-two—and go on to become a leader in the field. His sinewy, calculating mind and his enthusiastic embracing of the new potentialities of the naval air arm made him an ideal commander of the spearhead of our Pacific power. An unusual and imaginative command arrangement allowed that power to be applied almost continuously, Halsey and McCain alternating with Spruance and Mitscher as heads of the great Pacific fleet and its fast carrier force. Halsey and McCain carried the fight from Leyte to Tokyo Bay, through the harrowing days of Kamikaze to the triumphant days of searing attacks on the Japanese home islands by our carrier-based aircraft. McCain's planes in the last three months of war sank more than a million tons of enemy shipping and destroyed nearly three thousand enemy aircraft. The strain of that performance cost McCain his life; its brilliance has won him a high place in the annals of American military leaders.

Baruch on the Veterans

THE country has now been given a most comprehensive, detailed, and thoughtful report on the problems of veterans' readjustment to civilian pursuits by Bernard M. Baruch. In the endless stream of articles, books, lectures, and radio programs devoted to the subject, the Baruch report shines like a bright deed in a naughty world. It should become a sort of bible for government officials, Congressmen, and all authorities charged with responsibility for carrying out this most important of America's immediate reconversion tasks. It should serve as a guide to all citizens interested in straight thinking about a subject which has hitherto been befogged in a high incidence of nonsense.

Mr. Baruch strikes to the heart of the matter when he says:

> The solution of the veterans' problems does not—cannot—proceed alone. During the period when our soldiers and sailors will be shedding their uniforms, six to eight million workers in strictly war industries will be shifting jobs or homes. The ultimate goal of any veterans' program must be to restore the returning soldier and sailor to the community—socially, economically, and humanely. This cannot > be accomplished except as part of the larger program embracing the whole of human demobilization.

>
> One terrible danger of failure may be to set the veteran off from the rest of the nation, cherishing the grievance of having been wronged, at odds with fellow-Americans, his feelings an explosive fuel ready to be ignited by some future demagogue.

These two paragraphs should be pasted in the hats of all who deal with veterans. They set forth the essential objective of veterans' demobilization and the devastating cost of failure.

Implicit in the whole Baruch report is the author's understanding of the central objective of an intelligent program for veterans: "to restore the returning soldier and sailor to the community." He discards the nonsense of attempting to "reward" men who have done deeds for which there can be no adequate reward except in terms of a healthy nation and a peaceful world. He rejects the sentimental theory that we must "do something for veterans" in favor of the sound theory of helping ourselves to achieve our national objectives by making sure the veterans will take their places in the community as productive citizens, not as professional ex-servicemen who are set apart from non-veterans by walls of false distinction—walls which may be built either by disproportionate preference for veterans or by inadequate or faulty assistance.

Central to the success of Mr. Baruch's plan is the appointment of a "single, unforgetful mind" to the post of work director in charge of the entire "human side of demobilization." This post, first suggested in the original Baruch-Hancock report on demobilization eighteen months ago, was formally created in an executive order of a year ago establishing a Retraining and Reemployment Administration. General Frank T. Hines, who was appointed to the post, was prevented by his duties as Veterans' Administrator from doing much in this broader field. General Omar Bradley, to whom the new Baruch report is addressed, has replaced General Hines in the Veterans' Administration, and Hines has now been appointed Minister to Panama. No successor is in sight for head of the Retraining and Reemployment Administration; presumably President Truman is looking for a man of the required caliber for the job. It is a vital appointment, for General Bradley, as Mr. Baruch said, cannot do his own work to best effect without this unifying force outside the Veterans' Administration.

The Baruch report contains six more major recommendations: a clean-cut division between medical and non-medical affairs in the Veterans' Administration, with the creation of a new veterans' medical service under an outstanding director; the establishment of an independent committee to survey every aspect of veterans' medical care and recommend changes to modernize that outdated system; substantial increases in salaries of medical personnel with promotion on the basis of professional ability as opposed to the current initiative-killing system of seniority, closer links with civilian medical centers, and encouragement of research; another committee to recommend simplification of non-medical routines in administration; amendment of the G. I. Bill of Rights to make loan provisions effective over ten years instead of two; and an incentive tax of 25 per cent less than the normal rate to veterans starting new businesses.

All these recommendations seem to us sensible and to the point. They are not entirely original with Mr. Baruch: reporters such as Albert Deutsch and Albert Q. Maisel, whose exposés contributed to General Hines's replacement, have suggested similar reforms in the medical field, and the American Veterans' Committee has proposed action paralleling Mr. Baruch's in all these fields for the past six months. But it is encouraging to have the voice of such a widely respected elder statesman add its authority to the views of a group of veterans of this war, and it is devoutly to be hoped that the President, General Bradley, Congress, and common citizens everywhere will listen to these voices.

Cross-Currents in Japan

DESPITE continued revelations of inhuman Japanese cruelty toward American prisoners of war, the first week after formal surrender passed without any notable stiffening of General MacArthur's policies toward the defeated enemy. Perhaps it is too soon to expect a drastic change. The occupation has been proceeding very slowly. Ten days after the first landings we still had only 32,000 men in Japan. The entry into Tokyo came nearly a week after the formal capitulation. The Japanese have played their cards skilfully to persuade MacArthur to leave their governmental and economic structure intact. No incident has marred the progress of the occupation. The Japanese government appears to have faithfully, if at times tardily, carried out all MacArthur's orders. In an obvious effort to prepare the people for the hardships of the occupation, Premier Higashi-kuni has finally told them that it was Allied power rather than the magnanimity of the Emperor that brought about the sudden end of the war. In his speech before the Diet he frankly admitted that the Japanese had been defeated even before the dropping of the atomic bomb and Russia's entry into the war, and that these events had made their situation impossible.

MacArthur appears to have attacked his new job with more zeal than understanding. He has shown a clear intention to crack down on the Japanese so as to impress upon them the fact of their defeat. He has imposed a curfew on Japanese civilians in the occupation areas, forbidden the sale of alcoholic beverages, announced severe penalties for the acquisition or use of American food or supplies, and ordered Japanese civilians to show a respectful attitude toward Americans. Tokyo Rose, the notorious radio propagandist, has been arrested. But in sharp contrast to these indications of a tougher policy, the Allied High Command has announced that it will use several thousand members of the Kampei-tai, the Japanese counterpart of the Gestapo, to assist the regular police in maintaining order. Presumably they have been chosen because they have police experience and can lift a heavy burden from the limited American occupation forces. Yet as Andrew Roth points out elsewhere in this issue, the chief function of the Kempei-tai has always been the suppression of liberal and democratic groups within Japan. Only if the secret police are wholly suppressed and their documents destroyed can we expect the progressive groups within Japan to gather courage enough to emerge as an effective political force. Under present circumstances it is not surprising that there has been little evidence of the existence of a political movement opposed to the militarists. Kagawa, the noted Christian pacifist, has, however, turned up in Yokohama with the information that some labor unions have reappeared after fourteen years of suppression.

While MacArthur's actions indicate no change in American occupation policies, some hope may be found in the State Department shake-up announced last week in Washington. Eugene Dooman, who has long served as Mr. Grew's right-hand man in determining policies toward Japan, has resigned. His place as chairman of "Swink"—a joint State, War, and Navy Department committee responsible for occupation policy—has been taken by John Carter Vincent, head of the China Division. The importance of this change can hardly be overstated. Dooman and Grew have long urged a lenient policy toward the Emperor and the Japanese industrial and financial leaders so as to preserve "order" within Japan. They were chiefly responsible for the decision to retain the Emperor. Many others in the department, including Under Secretary Acheson and Mr. Vincent, were strongly opposed to the Grew-Dooman policies. Even after Grew's resignation many observers predicted that he would show up in Japan as chief adviser to MacArthur. That danger has apparently been averted. Both Grew and Dooman are definitely out, and an old China hand, George Atcheson, Jr., has been appointed acting adviser to MacArthur. Little is known of Atcheson's views on Japan, but at least he has none of the social ties with the Zaibatsu that Grew and Dooman possessed. So far as we have been able to learn, no one with a thorough understanding of the Japanese social and economic structure has been appointed to a high policy-making position either in the State Department or on MacArthur's staff. Even men who have served in China cannot be expected to possess the detailed knowledge that is necessary to guide our policies in Japan unless they have made a special study of the subject. Real knowledge is needed if Japanese militarism is to be eradicated and the first, hesitant shoots of democracy are to be wisely nourished.

The State Department Reorganization

PRESIDENT TRUMAN, with three new appointments, seems to have completed the reorganization of the State Department hierarchy. By far the best of the three is that of Benjamin V. Cohen as Counselor of the department, a post which has been vacant since the death of the respected R. Walton Moore in 1941. Cohen was one of the original "brain trusters"; he and Tom Corcoran made an able team in the early years of the New Deal. We know of no man in public life who has served his country with greater devotion or more selflessness than Cohen. He is a man of scholarly attainment and philosophic insight; his intellectual horizons, and his sympathies, are quite unlike those to which we have been accustomed in this traditionally bloodless and bureaucratic agency. To have a progressive of Cohen's caliber in the No. 3 position—he will rank next to Under Secretary Acheson—will be a real change in a department which has had so many meaningless "reorganizations."

We cannot record the same satisfaction with the other two new appointments announced by the President on the recommendation of Secretary Byrnes. Neither man is known or tested. William Benton succeeds Archibald MacLeish as Assistant Secretary in Charge of Cultural and Public Relations. Little is known of Benton's views on foreign policy except that, unlike MacLeish, he was rather isolationist-minded before Pearl Harbor. Benton was formerly a partner in Benton and Bowles, the advertising firm, and has since been vice-president of the University of Chicago. At the university he distinguished himself chiefly by trying to inject big-business methods into education, to the detriment of education. Less is known of the other Assistant Secretary, Donald S. Russell of Spartanburg, South Carolina. He was a law partner of Byrnes and is expected to handle the department's relations with Congress.

How would one size up the new State Department? At the top, under Byrnes, are four able men—Under Secretary Acheson, Counselor Cohen, Assistant Secretary William L. Clayton, and the new Assistant Secretary for Latin America, Spruile Braden. The Nation was critical of Clayton on his appointment but must in all fairness note the fact that he has been making an excellent record in the department. Braden's vigor at Buenos Aires promises well for his work in Washington. Acheson and Cohen are old friends and close associates; they seem to agree on basic questions of policy, and one suspects that Clayton and Braden will also be in general agreement with them. These four are the nucleus for a department really equipped to handle foreign policy with understanding and efficiency.

Elsewhere one sees unknown quantities and one leftover from the striped-pants era. The leftover is Cordell Hull's old croquet partner, "Jimmy" Dunn, who is Assistant Secretary in Charge of European, Far Eastern, Near Eastern, and African Affairs (no less). The unknown quantities, in addition to Russell and Benton, are Frank McCarthy and Walter Brown. McCarthy succeeded Julius Holmes as Assistant Secretary in Charge of Personnel; any successor to the reactionary Holmes would probably be a change for the better. Brown, a Spartanburg, South Carolina, radio-station operator, is confidential adviser to Byrnes on public relations. Like Russell, he is quite new to foreign affairs.

Thus even at the top the "reorganization to end reorganizations" is only partially satisfactory. And in an old-established agency like the State Department shake-ups must extend deep down into the permanent bureaucracy if they are to have any substantial and wholesome effect. The news that Eugene Dooman has resigned as our principal adviser on Far Eastern affairs indicates that some changes at least are planned on the lower levels. Such changes are essential if the department is adequately to fulfil the new obligations it has assumed in fields formerly handled by the Office of War Information, the Foreign Economic Administration, and the Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs.

The Truman Program

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, September 9

I HAVE been out of Washington for most of the summer, and there is much I have to learn. But I would like to venture a few observations in the wake of the President's message to Congress.

1. To understand the message and what is happening here one must keep in mind that Administration utterance, thought, and action reflect three diverse approaches to post-war problems. On what may best be termed the theological level the Administration bows the knee to "free enterprise"; the message invokes "free enterprise" fervently, as do the backers of the full-employment bill. A psychologist might say that the fervor of the worshipers increases in direct ratio to the volume of their secret doubts, for on the practical level the White House and its progressive allies are asking for a legislative program based on the belief that without extensive government intervention at many points in the economy full employment is unattainable. One would not need a full-employment bill if "free enterprise" were as magical as it is represented to be in the current liturgy. But there is more to the picture than these contrasting "theological" and practical attitudes. On the emotional level still another attitude is visible. The mood of the White House and of Democratic Party leadership generally seems to be as optimistic as that of the Republicans. The President remains, as he has always been, a New Dealer. It is the momentum of the New Deal, the logical consequences of its basic assumptions, the experience of the past, and the pressure of organized labor rather than any feeling of impending emergency which underlies the President's program. Basically, the President, like most Americans at this moment, feels that "everything is going to be all right." There is a mystic faith in "pent-up" demand. There is an all too human failure of the imagination. We have been enjoying a fully employed economy for almost five years and find it hard to imagine any really drastic change. It is this mood which accounts for two facts, one about the Administration, the other about the President's program. The President has a New Deal program, but his Administration, in its actual operating personnel, is less New Dealish even than Roosevelt's was after 1940: no one with a sense of urgency would bring so many mediocre politicians and conventional minds into posts of crucial importance. It is this which gives so many people here the feeling that the New Deal is over, though the President's program calls for its extension. The optimistic mood of the moment also explains why Truman recommends an immediate large-scale public-works program. The works on which immediate action is asked—public buildings and highways—are minor. The major projects—regional TVA's and housing—are presented in long-range terms. Should coming unemployment be as severe as some of the ablest economists on lower Administration levels believe, we shall be caught unprepared, and the jobless will have to rake leaves again.

2. The President in his message has gone all out for a progressive program. He is for higher unemployment compensation and an increase in minimum wages under the Fair Labor Standards Act. He is for the full-employment bill and for a permanent Fair Employment Practices Committee. He is for slum clearance and for a federal research agency, as long advocated by his friend Senator Kilgore. He asks for repeal of the Johnson Act, for interim lending power to fill the gap left by the sudden cessation of Lend-Lease, and for an additional contribution of $1,350,000,000 for UNRRA. He wants a system of crop insurance, and he recommends only limited tax reductions. The little man from Missouri has courage.

But it will take more than courage to put this program over. Even the leader of a party newly come to power, with a full range of patronage at his disposal, could hardly hope to overcome all the special interests and prejudices sure to be antagonized by this program. Without an economic crisis and the public awakening it brings, little of this program can be enacted. If a large volume of unemployment develops quickly, Truman has a chance to put it over. If the crisis comes later, he must gamble politically on the advantage of having had a concrete program. He can blame the opposition for having defeated measures that might have prevented the crisis. The advantage of his politically bold message is that it clarifies the issues for 1946 and 1948, and behind this strategy is the sound observation that the Democratic Party nationally has never got anywhere except as a left-of-center party.

The Republicans will fight. The honeymoon is over. The reaction of the GOP Congressional leaders was curiously 1920-ish. They put their research experts to work estimating how much the Truman program would cost. They are thinking in terms of fiscal economy and "normalcy," and their statements bristle with the old horrid words that failed so signally against Roosevelt—"boot-strap legislation," "deficit financing," "regimentation." They are staking their hopes on a quick and fairly successful reconversion, with enough employment and business activity to keep the middle classes fairly content and thus to make possible a successful campaign on—as Chairman Halleck of the Republican Congressional Campaign Committee expressed it—"the old-fashioned issue of conservatism."

But this is not the whole of their strategy as it seems to be developing in Congress. The fight against higher unemployment compensation indicates that they will let conservative Southern Democrats take the leadership and the blame on the more unpopular issues. And Taft's amendments to the full-employment bill show that they will not risk frontal attacks on the basic measure but will seek instead to confuse the issue and accomplish their purpose by indirection. Last winter Taft sounded like a cross between Martin Dies ("with a Communist plot") and a sectarian Soviet ideologist (full employment can be made possible only by the socialist construction of society) when he discussed the full-employment bill. Now he claims to be all for its purposes but wants some "clarifying" amendments. The most important of these would take the right to work and clarify it as existence. Unfortunately for Taft, the demand for full employment is too fundamental to be sidetracked by the kind of legalistic trickery one might use successfully in wringing a mortgage or bond indenture.

3. The fundamental issue shaping up here is between those who want a fully employed economy and those who think they can get along profitably even if there is a large volume of unemployment. That a full-employment economy is the more profitable is demonstrated in the new War Production Board report on the effect of the war on the industrial economy. Despite high wages and high taxes, low costs per unit of output under conditions of all-out production boosted profits, after taxes, by 120 per cent over 1940 and to a point far over 1929. The basic question raised by the WPB report is whether our expanded metal-working and chemical industries will shrink back to fit our pre-war economy or whether our economy will be expanded to fit these enlarged productive possibilities. The question is already being answered: capacity and output are being reduced in many of these industries. In part this is due to habitual patterns. "The modern industrial economy," the WPB report says in a sentence which deserves immortality, "has always been characterized by the low degree of utilization of its existing plant." The individual enterpriser operating on his own is safest when working within a comfortable margin of scarcity, including scarcity of jobs; thus prices are held up and wages down.

On paper, partial employment seems to have its advantages. The September 1 issue of Business Week estimates that if the excess-profits tax is repealed, business during the coming year can earn higher net profits than the war-time peak, even with 9,000,000 unemployed. "Why, then," the average business man may ask himself, "sail out on the uncharted seas of economic planning?" But what if the economy declines to stay neatly poised at a level profitable to the owners of industry, though miserable for many millions of jobless? What if a deflationary spiral sets in? Wouldn't the average business man be better off in an economy planned for full employment, however painful that might be to the sacred cow of "free enterprise"? It is on the answer to these questions that momentous changes will depend in the not so distant future of the U. S. A.

Palestine—a World Responsibility

BY ROBERT F. WAGNER

(United States Senator from New York)

PALESTINE should no longer be discussed dispassionately. The period of inquiry, investigation, and calm debate is long behind us. Detachment has ceased to be a virtue. Today Palestine cries aloud for indignation. In Palestine international promises have been broken, loyalty and fidelity have been unrequited, hostility has been appeased, and human life has been subordinated to the mysterious demands of imperial policy. The miracle is that, despite all this, Jewish Palestine has throughout the war been a bastion of security to the United Nations and is today the most successful pioneering effort of modern history.

The war is over. The military considerations which have restrained official expression of America's views on the Palestine issue are no longer germane. Plain speech and forthright action are prime essentials in the peace-making era we have now entered. The problem of the Jewish National Home will not indefinitely hang on the vine. It is overripe for action now.

In 1917 the Jews of the world were assured of the opportunity to establish a national home in Palestine. This assurance was formally announced by the British in the Balfour Declaration. This declaration was not a secret commitment. It was an open covenant, openly arrived at. It was not the product of a sentimental whim on the part of Lord Balfour but the result of long negotiations with Britain's allies, the United States and the Arab leadership. It was a solemn undertaking by the British government designed to help win the war and to contribute to the solution of the age-old problem of Jewish homelessness and insecurity. The Congress of the United States in 1922 expressed its approval of the Balfour Declaration. In 1923, by the grant of the League of Nations and Britain's acceptance, Great Britain became the mandatory for Palestine. By the terms of the mandate Great Britain assumed responsibility "for placing the country under such political, administrative, and economic conditions as will secure the establishment of the Jewish National Home," as provided in the Balfour Declaration.

It seemed as if at last, after long centuries of suffering, persecution, and wandering, the Jews were to attain one objective on which they were predominantly united, the establishment of a national home, legally secured and publicly recognized. Since that time no political party and no responsible statesman, either in Great Britain or in the United States, has ever publicly questioned the wisdom of the high decision taken in 1917. Every American President since Wilson has reaffirmed American approval and support of the grand undertaking. In 1944 both the Democratic and the Republican National Convention adopted platform planks advocating the fullest opportunity for the establishment of a free and democratic Jewish commonwealth in Palestine. Before the recent British elections the Labor Party was unequivocal in its advocacy of the Jewish National Home.

And, indeed, no one can question either the wisdom or the success of the enterprise. The opportunity which was extended to them was embraced by the Jews with unanticipated ardor. They have poured their blood and sweat, their toil and treasure into the neglected, physically and spiritually desecrated land. In twenty-five years the Jewish population of Palestine grew from 80,000 to over 500,000. They introduced modern agriculture and industry. They have literally caused the desert to bloom. Out of their efforts has come a higher standard of living for both Jew and Arab, a standard above that of any of the surrounding countries. Tremendous progress has been achieved in health and sanitation—between 1929 and 1940 the Arab death rate in Palestine declined 33 1/3 per cent. A great university has been founded. Education is widespread. The ancient tongue of the Hebrew Prophets is today the vernacular of the shopkeepers of Tel Aviv.

Most heartwarming has been the transformation effected in the bearing and morale of the once poverty-stricken, hopeless, and despondent pioneers who rebuilt themselves even as they replenished the land with their sweat. No one who shares my faith in the inherent capacity of the human soul to flourish under conditions of peace and freedom can fail to experience a high sense of elation.

Thus it has come to pass that, despite all manner of obstacle created by man and nature, the foundations of a Jewish commonwealth have been established. One would suppose that such success, exceeding the most ardent expectations, would enlist an ever-growing measure of support from the mandatory power. Such has not been the course of history. This is not the place to explore the overt and covert motives which diverted Britain's policy from its publicly assumed obligations. Indeed, they are irrelevant. The facts themselves are of record. The whittling-down process began almost at the birth of the enterprise. The mortal blow was struck in 1939. In that year, when European Jewry was undergoing martyrdom at the hands of Hitler, when refugees fortunate enough to escape the torture chambers and crematoriums were naturally turning toward Palestine as a sanctuary and a haven, the Chamberlain government issued the infamous White Paper. This pronouncement limited Jewish immigration into Palestine to an aggregate of 75,000 over the succeeding five-year period—thereafter it forbade Jewish immigration altogether except with Arab consent; it severely restricted the purchase of land by Jews; and it consigned the Jewish community of Palestine to a permanent minority status in its own national home. By thus yielding to Nazi propaganda Great Britain hoped to win Arab support. It succeeded only in losing the Arabs' respect.

The new policy was adopted unilaterally without consultation with the League of Nations—the source of Britain's rights in Palestine—or with the United States, and it was put into effect over the express disapproval of the Mandates Commission. As recently as March 9, 1944, President Roosevelt declared that the American government had never given its approval to the White Paper of 1939.

The new regulations were a barefaced breach of Britain's obligation "to facilitate Jewish immigration . . . to encourage close settlement on the land . . . to secure the establishment of a Jewish National Home." Their passage has fittingly been called by one of Britain's foremost statesmen an act of "moral bankruptcy." These words may sound harsh, especially when applied to a great and brave ally with whom we have just fought shoulder to shoulder in a war to save civilization. But the words are true, and they are pale and mild in comparison to the stout language used by Winston Churchill in 1939 when he scornfully dissociated himself from the White Paper.

Only one circumstance explains, though it does not excuse, the issuance of the White Paper. It was written as part of that sad chapter in the history of England when its government counseled its people to stray after false idols in the groves of appeasement. Nothing, however, explains the continuance of that policy. By common sacrifice we have repudiated Munich. Appeasement is everywhere discredited. Only the Chamberlain White Paper survives, the sorry souvenir of former folly.

Time and again in this last frightful decade Jewish spokesmen have pleaded for something more than professions of sympathy. More than a year ago Senator Johnson of Colorado pointed out that Hitler was murdering more Jews each day than Britain was admitting into Palestine in a year. But today, when there are no military considerations to obscure the cruelty of this illegal policy, the gates of Palestine are still barred to Jews. The officials who today keep the doors of Palestine locked are British officials; the regulations which obstruct Jewish land purchases are British regulations; the power which is preventing the development of the Jewish National Home is British power.

It was Mr. Churchill who said before he attained the Prime Ministry, "Either there will be a Britain which knows how to keep its word on the Balfour Declaration and is not afraid to do so, or, believe me, we shall find ourselves relieved of many overseas responsibilities other than those comprised within the Palestine mandate."

So far I have said very little about the Arabs. A wag is reported to have declared that if the Arabs hadn't been in Palestine, the British Colonial Office would have invented them. Internal division is reputed to be a useful tool in the hands of colonial administrators. If by Arabs we mean the inarticulate masses, we can judge their opinion by their conduct. In the twenty years from 1920 to 1940 the Arab population of Palestine has increased from 650,000 to over a million. Within Palestine there has been an internal migration from Arab districts into Jewish districts. The Arabs came because in the Jewish communities they received higher wages, enjoyed better health and sanitation, and received a fair opportunity to educate their children. Their alleged hostility to the Jews did not keep them away. A different attitude is prevalent among the feudal masters, who look with understandable suspicion upon the lifting of the Arab's standard of living and the awakening of his self-esteem.

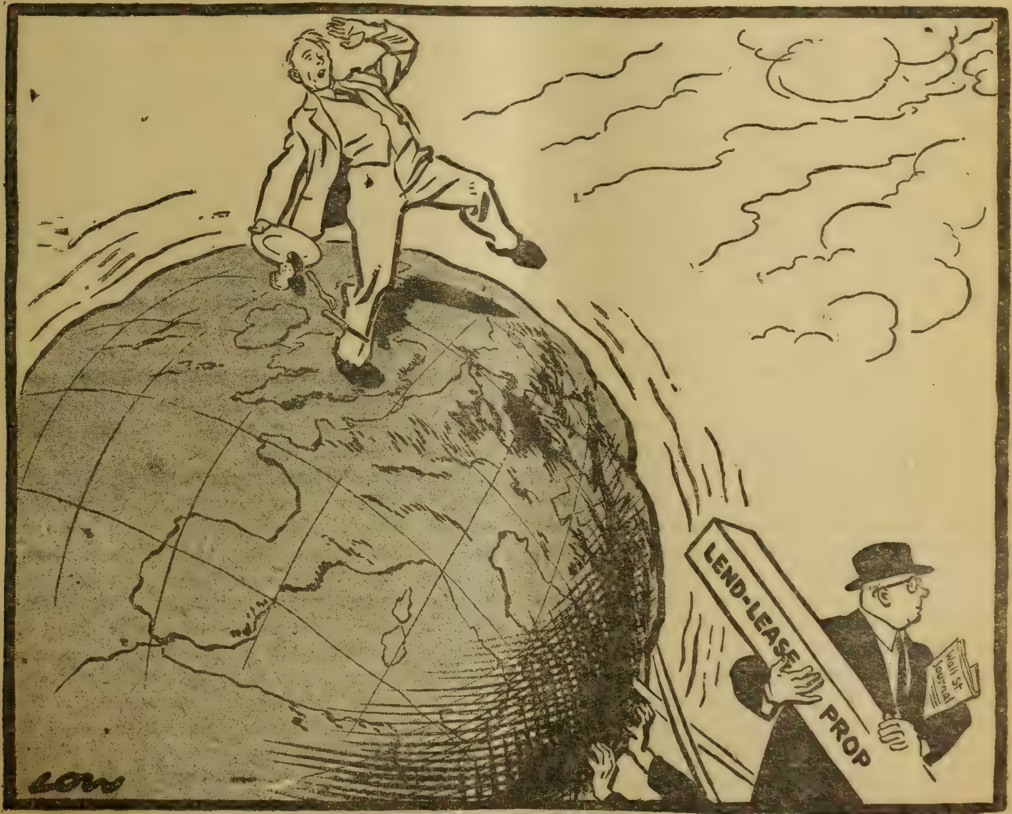
It is true that there has been a birth of nationalism among the Arabs which is entitled to find a peaceful expression. As a result of World War I the Arabs obtained a magnificent opportunity for such expression. An Arab empire was created of more than a million square miles, comprising the states of Iraq, Syria, Transjordan, and Saudi Arabia. These states are underpopulated, undeveloped, and afford more than ample room for growth for centuries to come. It should not be forgotten that at the Peace Conference following World War I the Arab delegation through its leader, Emir Feisal, approved the Zionist proposals. A Jewish Palestine with an area of 10,000 square miles, as Feisal well said, in no way interferes with the growth of a healthy Arab nationalism. On the contrary, by the renascence of the Near East which Palestine promotes it accelerates the attainment of Arab aspirations.

Some of these facts have become obscured in Arab political thinking as a result of the discovery that England was disposed to falter on the Palestine obligation. Undoubtedly it will take greater effort for Britain to retrieve its position than if it had adhered firmly to the true course from the beginning. Regardless of difficulty, however, is it not time by deed to demonstrate to the whole world, including the Arab leaders, that statecraft has returned to its faith in the sanctity of the plighted word and that the tragic era of international gangsterism is at an end?

I am sure that our British allies are not in doubt concerning the attitude of the American people in this matter. Undoubtedly they know that only the strongest and highest suggestions of military necessity restrained the Congress from expressing its views in the midst of war. Now that hostilities are over, America's conviction is all the stronger that the Balfour Declaration should be executed fully, expeditiously, and faithfully. That means, in the words of Lloyd George, "that when the time arrived for according representative institutions to Palestine, if the Jews had meanwhile responded to the opportunity afforded them by the idea of a national home and had become a definite majority of the inhabitants, then Palestine would thus become a Jewish commonwealth."

It is heartbreaking to consider how many human lives might have been saved had Palestine remained wide open. At least the tragedy which is behind us ought to spur us to more responsible action with respect to the small remnant of European Jewry which has escaped. The lot of these Jews is deplorable beyond description. They have been despoiled of their possessions and uprooted from their homes and associations. They have been physically starved and spiritually crushed. All about them is the poison of bigotry, with which Hitler drenched the minds of their neighbors. The summary fact is that Palestine is indispensable not only to the rehabilitation of these human beings but to the health of Europe. Without Palestine the problem almost defies solution.

Palestine is a world problem in a more elevated sense than that it is the crossroads connecting the world's great empires. Palestine is the crucible in which will be tested the ability of the powerful to deal faithfully with the weak. The Christian world has Palestine on its conscience. If it would regain its moral self-respect, it must promptly do justice to Palestine.



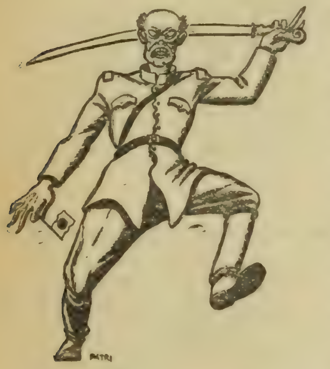
OI! TAKE IT EASY!

Japan's Police Terror

BY ANDREW ROTH

(Author of the recently published "Dilemma in Japan" and of other books on the Far East; intelligence officer in the Navy during the war. Owen Lattimore says of Roth, "He represents the younger school of American experts who are not blinded, as are so many older experts, by myths which even the Japanese do not believe.")

AS AMERICAN forces move into Japan for occupation duties the question of the hour is: Are we taking over or are we being taken in? Some of the more obvious plans of the Japanese oligarchy for a future comeback have already been spotted. The launching of officially sponsored "sound" political organizations with a variety of labels, including "liberal" and "socialist," was an amateurish and heavy-handed move. Similarly, it is plain that the Emperor institution, perhaps the most effective instrument of internal suppression and external aggression ever devised, is being exploited by Japan's real rulers to shield them from blame for defeat and to enable them to keep control of the populace in the turbulent months ahead. But little attention has been paid to their preparations for reorganizing and buttressing Japan's Gestapo-like police, which will have a key role in the oligarchy's efforts to subvert the Potsdam terms and prevent the emergence of any authentic democratic and anti-fascist elements.



Informed political scientists have frequently referred to Japan as the "absolute police state." Even before its modernization the government had a wide network of secret political police. In the course of the modernization this police force was expanded by the addition of many former samurai and streamlined for greater efficiency. It then set to work to suppress peasant uprisings and to cripple the liberal movement of the 1880's, which threatened to broaden the Meiji reformation from an industrial and governmental facelifting into an authentic democratic revolution.

In the 1920's this police played an even more nefarious role. After World War I the influence of the democratic idealism of Wilson and of the economic radicalism of Lenin, added to economic dislocation and distress, aroused a considerable section of the population to demand democratic reforms. A broad movement developed which favored universal suffrage, democratic government, and freedom of speech, press, and assembly. A wave of illegal strikes proclaimed the demands of industrial workers for higher wages, legal trade unionism, the right to strike, and social security. Share-cropping farmers organized peasants' unions and agitated for reduction of the feudal rents, the usurious interest rates, and the monopoly-swollen price of fertilizer. Women of all classes demanded an end to their serf-like status.

These movements were strong enough to force concessions from the oligarchy. But each concession was virtually nullified by increased police repression. Industrial workers were permitted to strike, but if they availed themselves of this right they were beaten up by jingoist thugs encouraged by the police, or jailed and beaten by the police themselves. Universal male suffrage was reluctantly granted in 1925, but almost simultaneously the so-called "Law Against Dangerous Thoughts" was passed granting the police complete freedom of action to arrest anyone who desired or even discussed changes in the autocratic state structure.

Wave upon wave of police raids decimated the leadership and terrorized the following of the groups desiring democratic reforms. Yukio Ozaki, the veteran democratic spokesman, has for some years had several policemen stationed in front of his house scrutinizing and harassing all his visitors. Even before her arrest in 1937 Baroness Ishimoto, the courageous feminist and social reformer, was under constant police surveillance. Once when she spoke to the copper miners at Ashio three police inspectors stood behind the fragile noblewoman to make sure she said nothing "dangerous." Yuki Ikeda, one of the Baroness's coworkers, was handled less gently. The police jailed her repeatedly and on one occasion broke all her fingers in an effort to stop her from agitating for decent conditions for working women. Wataru Kaji, leader of the Japanese Anti-War League, based at Chungking, was so frequently jailed and beaten that it became advisable for him to leave Japan and continue his anti-fascist activities from China.

Since all forward-looking political movements in the past have been crippled by police action, it is particularly distressing that the recent moves of the Japanese ruling groups to increase police terror have gone unchallenged. There was no public comment on Prince Higashi-kuni's appointment of Iwao Yamazaki to the strategic post of Home Minister, where he controls some 200,000 government employees, including the police, and is charged with the supervision of elections. Yamazaki is an authoritarian bureaucrat with extensive experience in police work. He has served as director of the Police Bureau and of Tokyo's Metropolitan Police Board and was ruthless enough to qualify as Vice-Minister of Home Affairs under General Tojo. His appointment was hailed by Japan's totalitarian press, which also called upon the government to enlarge the already swollen police force so as to enable it to suppress any "internal friction" or "clash of divergent opinions" and maintain "unification and solidarity." In broadcasts to the United States glib Japanese propagandists explain that an increased police force is required to hold down fire-eating nationalists. It is much more likely that the fire-eaters are being recruited into the police force to suppress democrats and leftists, as was done in Germany at the end of the last war. Military fascist officers, no longer able to commit atrocities against Allied prisoners and conquered peoples, can now devote their grisly talents to torturing the inmates of Japan's crowded political prisons.

It is to be feared that during the past few weeks the police have been slaughtering these political prisoners as a means of depriving the anti-fascist movement of experienced leadership. There is a notable precedent for this. Under cover of the great earthquake of 1923 nine leftist labor leaders were stabbed to death in jail and their bodies secretly burned by the police. Two weeks after the earthquake Saka Osugi, the intellectual leader of the Anarchists, together with his mistress and nephew, was strangled in a Tokyo jail by a captain of police. And just recently Russian troops entering the Japanese half of Sakhalin Island discovered the bodies of political prisoners who had been slashed to death with knives.

Unless strong Allied measures put an end to such police activities, forward-looking forces in Japan may be crippled at precisely the most propitious moment for their growth. All the evidence at hand indicates unrest and dissatisfaction in wide sectors of the population. If the dam of police suppression were broken, the currents of unrest might very well be combined into a broad movement to democratize Japan's political and economic structure and dig out the roots of aggression.

It is within our power to give Japan's democrats the opportunity they have earned by their years of battling the ruthless brutality of the police. The liquidation of the existing police organization should stand as high on our agenda in Japan as the elimination of the Gestapo did in Germany. The Potsdam terms call for the removal of "all obstacles to the revival and strengthening of democratic tendencies among the Japanese people." Anything less than complete reform of the police system will make a mockery of our victory.

The Hollywood Incident

BY CAREY McWILLIAMS

ON DECEMBER 2, 1944, the Hood River, Oregon, Post of the American Legion removed the names of sixteen Japanese Americans from the honor roll of the community. With scarcely a single exception, the newspapers of the nation condemned the action as essentially un-American. A minor chorus of protest developed within the Legion: Wolverine Post No. 360 in Detroit, Captain Belvedere Brooks Post No. 450 in New York, Cheney Post No. 72 in Seattle, Justice Department Post No. 41 in Washington, D. C., David Latkin Post in New York, and Don E. Brown Post No. 592 in Los Angeles passed resolutions condemning the action as being contrary to Legion policy and practice. The incident placed the Legion officials in an extremely embarrassing position. They feared that it might turn many veterans of World War II against the Legion. Largely with this consideration in mind, the National Commander of the Legion issued a statement repudiating the action of the Hood River Post and suggesting that the stricken names be restored to the honor roll.

Among the Legion posts most deeply concerned was Hollywood World War II Post No. 591, with a membership of approximately four hundred. As the first World War II post, it had been carefully watched and especially encouraged by the Legion hierarchy in California. In December, 1944, in the second bulletin issued by the Americanism Committee of Post 591, its chairman, William Kent, had published a vigorous statement against intolerance toward Japanese Americans and in defense of the principle of racial equality. Following the issuance of this bulletin, Post 591, at a regular meeting held on January 9, 1945, unanimously adopted a strong resolution condemning the action of the Hood River Post, and admitted into membership an honorably discharged veteran of World War II, Harley M. Oka, a young Nisei with a spotless record and an excellent reputation. Both actions were hailed by many newspapers as proof that the Legion, as an organization, did not condone racial discrimination.

William Kent felt rather proud of the good work his committee had done in furtherance of a policy which apparently had the approval of the National Commander. But on January 16 he received the following communication from the Commander of the 24th District (of which Post 591 is a part):

> Dear Comrade Kent:
>
> You are hereby removed as a member of the Americanism Committee of this district; for the good of the Legion.
>
> A careful investigation of your activities, speeches, and writings reveals your criticism of the mandates, policies, and programs and that your tactics too closely resemble the "plan" of those rabble-rousers and un-American groups which are so hostile to the ideals of the American Legion.
>
> We cannot permit such activities to be cloaked with the respectability of membership on the Americanism Committee of this district.
>
> P. A. Horton, Commander
> 24th District, American Legion

Needless to say, Kent was amazed. He later asked for, and received, an overwhelming vote of confidence from Post 591. To indicate its further disapproval of Horton's action, Post 591 withdrew all its members who were serving, as Kent had been serving, on committees of the 24th District.

On January 23 Post 591 held a regularly scheduled meeting. Commander William Schneider was in the chair, and the meeting was about ready to transact its regular business when District Commander Horton, without prior notification or announcement, entered the hall with six men who were not members of Post 591. After having marched up to the platform, Horton motioned William Schneider, commander of Post 591, away from the microphone and curtly announced: "Comrades, as District Commander, it becomes my unpleasant duty to take over this meeting." He was immediately challenged by the adjutant and other members of the post, who raised a point of order. Attention was called to the fact that Horton was not acting in accordance with the constitution of the California Department of the Legion or with its national constitution. He was also pointedly reminded of the fact that he had not been invited to attend the meeting, much less to address the assembled members of Post 591. Commander Horton's reply to the point of order was: "You are members of the 24th District whether you like it or not."

Over continuing objections Horton then began to lecture the members of the post. "This program of the Japanese," he said, "is one with which you are not familiar. You could not be familiar with it." After some more in the same vein, he introduced John R. Lechner, B.D., LL.D. Dr. Lechner was not a member of Post 591, nor had he been invited to speak. Born in Innsbruck, Austria, he is a naturalized citizen. He received the degree of doctor, however, not from the University of Innsbruck, but as an honorary degree from the "Metropolitan University" of Los Angeles, with which, as a resident of Los Angeles for over twenty years, I am not familiar. The United States Office of Education seems not to be familiar with it either, for it is not listed in its Educational Directory. Dr. Lechner operates through an organization known as the Americanism Educational League, which is his alter ego. Long known as a violent Nisei-baiter on the West Coast, he is the author of a pamphlet entitled "Playing with Dynamite," full of old wives' tales about the resident Japanese. Although Lechner had been expressly repudiated as a spokesman for the Legion by the California Department (see the California Legionnaire, January 14, 1944), Horton apparently felt that he was just the person to lecture the members of Post 591 on "Americanism."

Disclaiming any prejudice against persons of Japanese descent, Dr. Lechner proceeded to tell the members of Post 591 that "the Japanese colony in the United States was guilty of things that no other racial group in America would have been guilty of." "If I hold a glass of cream in my hand," he said, "what would happen if I put water in it? It was yellow cream, rich cream, and if I put water in and kept pouring water into that cream there would be nothing left but a glassful of dirty, inky water that looked like dishwater. Comrades, you can talk American citizenship and Americanism, but if you put all the rot and dirt of the world in it you will have little left that is clean and pure and like the citizenship that our fathers had." (Official transcript, page 26.)

After Dr. Lechner's mess of metaphors Commander Horton stepped to the microphone again and charged the post with having been intolerant in admitting Oka to membership! Basing his remarks on an Americanism Manual of the Legion, he made this strange statement:

> We know full well in the Legion, and we insist in the Legion, that totalitarian nations have a right to maintain the form of government they want. It is none of our affair. We are not interested. But we are determined that they are not going to force their form of government on us, and any battles we have against communism, fascism, Nazism, or any other form of ism are for the protection of our American way of life, not from any particular animosity to any particular group, but the Communist Party has infiltrated into every organization, and the method and manner of your handling this whole situation smells to high heaven of the tactics pursued by the usual Communist group. (Transcript, page 31, italics mine.)

Horton then marched out with his escort. After he had left, William Kent got the floor. "I have not done any speaking or writing outside my own post," he said. "I am a business man, not a politician, not one who wants to impose his opinions on anybody else. I have given you factual reports, and I repeat again that I stand behind every word I said. . . . I want to know this, is backing up the United States Constitution and precepts un-American? Am I a rabble-rouser or not?" The answer was a vote of confidence from the post.

After this meeting the Los Angeles Herald of January 25 carried a story with the headline: "Blame Legion 'Radicals.' District Chief Explains Row on Hollywood Jap." In this story Horton was quoted as having said that Post 591 had "kidnapped" Oka from Santa Ana to induct him into membership as a publicity stunt. (Oka had not lived in Santa Ana for six years.) The Los Angeles Examiner of the same date carried a similar story. Following the appearance of these stories Post 591, on January 29, wired E. W. Bolt, Department Commander for California, requesting an immediate investigation of the conduct of Commander Horton and an apology from Horton to the post and its officials.

In the meantime, so I am informed, the national officers of the Legion had become thoroughly concerned over "the Hollywood Post incident." Here was a District Commander who had insulted the officers and members of a post made up of veterans of World War II over a matter in which the post had, in effect, merely followed the lead of the National Commander. Seeing in this incident an issue that might possibly alienate thousands of World War II veterans from the Legion, the National Commander, so I am reliably informed, urgently requested the State Commander to heal the breach between Post 591 and Commander Horton. Unfortunately, the State Commander felt that the issue was "too hot" for him to handle and appointed a five-man committee to investigate the charges filed by Post 591.

Eventually the committee came to Hollywood and held hearings on the charges. At these hearings Commander Horton, through his counsel, denied that the admission of Oka to membership in Post 591 was even an issue in the dispute! On the contrary, it seems that what he really objected to were "certain irregularities" in the post's bookkeeping procedures and the fact that Oka's membership had not been "processed" as required by the by-laws. It was established at the hearings, however, that Oka had been admitted to membership along with thirty other applicants and by precisely the same process; that he had not been "kidnapped"; that his application had been secured in the normal routine of recruiting new members; that he was a bona fide resident of the community; and that his application had been regularly checked, investigated, and cleared.

Before these hearings took place, however, something rather extraordinary occurred. One day late in January two deputy sheriffs from the "subversive detail" of the sheriff's office called at the place of business where Commander Schneider was employed and stated, in the presence of his employers and coworkers, that they were there for the purpose of "interrogating him in regard to the taking into the post of an American citizen of Japanese descent." They also volunteered the information that the investigation was being conducted at the request of the Department Commander. An hour later the same investigators appeared at the home of Kent, made similar statements, and demanded the address of Oka—which Kent refused to give them. Upon investigation, Ben Beery, attorney for Kent and Schneider, discovered that on January 30 Commander Horton had gone to George Contreras, head of the "subversive detail," complained that a "radical or Communist influence" had infiltrated Post 591, and requested that a criminal investigation be launched. At the hearing Horton explained this extraordinary request by saying that he and Contreras were members of the same Legion committee on "radical research" and that he had asked the latter to make the investigation as a member of this committee rather than as the head of the "subversive detail" of the sheriff's office!

The committee finally submitted a report to the state Commander. In general, the report was a complete whitewash of the incident. As originally submitted to the Department Commander, however, it sharply criticized the District Commander for his lack of tact and for some of the remarks he had made. But when the report was approved by the state executive board even these reprimands were deleted. Upon the issuance of the final report, William Kent, William James, Commander Schneider, Sergeant Leo Shibley, and Harley M. Oka resigned from Post 591. The report was published in full in the California Legionnaire under the caption, Hollywood Incident Now Over.

But is the Hollywood Incident really closed? Does the National Commander propose to submit this record to the veterans of World War II as a test of the American Legion's attitude on racial issues? Does the Legion intend to let this kangaroo trial stand as an example of the democratic character of its procedures?

The final board of appeal has not yet passed judgment on the Hollywood Incident. That board will be made up of 11,000,000 veterans of World War II, whose attitude was indicated in another West Coast "incident." Recently Spokane Post 51 of the Veterans of Foreign Wars rejected the membership applications of two wounded Japanese Americans. Upon hearing of this action, Sergeant Edward P. Salsich and 457 other overseas veterans at the army's Baxter Hospital in Spokane formed a "veterans' anti-prejudice committee." To Sergeant Salsich, Colonel V. R. Miller, commanding officer of the Nisei 442nd Infantry Regiment in Italy, wired: "To say that we are shocked by the reasons given by the post in rejecting one of our own men for membership is to put it mildly." He added that in 240 days of fighting in the front lines his Nisei regiment sustained 4,349 battle casualties, 2,300 of which were suffered during a three-week battle in the Vosges Mountains of northeastern France. "As the commander of these Japanese American troops," he said, "I can say that no finer soldiers, no finer Americans are in the United States Army. These men are entitled to the same treatment accorded other Americans, for we can win the war only to lose the peace because unthinking Americans violate the principles for which we live and die."

White Justice in Dallas

BY GEORGE CLIFTON EDWARDS

(A Dallas attorney who has had no connection with the Akins trials)

Dallas, Texas, September 4

ON SEPTEMBER 15, 1941, a young Negro, L. C. Akins, left his work as porter in a garage in North Dallas to go to his home across the river, where he had a crippled wife—she had lost both feet in an accident—and one child. He took an Oak Lawn car downtown and about eight o'clock reached his transfer point, intending to take a west-bound car on Commerce Street for Oak Cliff. He got his transfer and with a number of other persons walked toward the entrance of the car he wished to take. He reached the car and mounted the step. In so doing the young Negro either actually brushed ahead of and jostled a young white woman who was also entering the car, or her husband, who was at her elbow, thought he did. At any rate the young white man grabbed the Negro from behind and jerked him from the car to the street. Words, blows, and a fight followed instantly.

The white man, Morris, was a policeman who had been on the force only a short time. He was about six feet tall and weighed 169 pounds. He was not in uniform and displayed no badge, but he carried a pistol. At the beginning of the fight he drew his pistol, struck Akins on the head with it, and then shot him through the body. The two men were close together, fighting desperately, the Negro trying to guard against the pistol and to seize it and the white man trying to strike him with the pistol and to shoot him. In the struggle the white man dropped his pistol. The Negro, Akins, snatched the gun from the ground or out of the air and fired one shot; that shot killed Morris. Akins then walked two blocks to the City Hall and calmly surrendered himself and the gun.

The fight took place in a space about twelve by fourteen feet, between the curb and the car step. Only a few moments elapsed between the alleged jostling and the final shot. The shot that killed the white man came from his own gun, the gun which he had dropped after he had shot the Negro.

Akins was put in jail, denied bail, tried, and given a life sentence. The verdict was reversed, he was tried again, and this time given a death sentence, which has been affirmed. He was to be executed on September 7, 1945, but has obtained a stay of execution to October 6.

If the wounded survivor of the fight had been a white man, it is doubtful whether, anywhere in Texas, he would have even been indicted. It is certain that the white survivor of such a fight would not have been prosecuted for murder with malice. And if he had been indicted and put on trial, it is absolutely certain that he would not have been convicted and given a death sentence. This being true, it is clear that Dallas and the state of Texas are about to put this man to death because he is black. And everybody in Dallas knows it. Twice I have made this statement publicly before the Dallas Bar Association, and many times privately to other lawyers. Not one lawyer has denied the truth of the statement. One assistant district attorney refused to take part in the case because he said the Negro ought never to have been indicted. One appellate judge, off the bench, in conversation, which he will deny, said, "Of course the nigger ought not to be executed, but there was not an error in the record."

In Texas the law justifies killing in defense of one's life. In Texas also there can be no murder without malice. In Texas, finally, with countless instances of fights and killings, no court and jury have ever convicted and given death to a white man who in deadly combat had killed his antagonist, with the antagonist's gun, after that antagonist had already shot him.

It makes no difference that instead of being lynched Akins has been given the customary delays of Texas courts. It makes no difference that he was indicted by a grand jury specially selected with his indictment in mind and specially provided with one eighty-one-year-old, humble, "good" Negro member to prevent a reversal by the higher court. This man is to be executed solely because he is black.

The United States Supreme Court has granted certiorari in this case "because of the importance in the administration of criminal justice of the alleged racial discrimination which was relied on to support the claim of violation of constitutional rights." Justice Reed and the majority upheld the decision of the Texas Criminal Courts, but the Chief Justice and Justices Black and Murphy dissented, Murphy filing a written opinion. The general setting of the case—that the slain man was white, that he was a white policeman (there are no Negro policemen in Dallas), that the alleged jostling was of a white woman by a Negro, the white witnesses, the exclusively white jury, the white judge and court officials, the white prosecution—all this frame of racial inequality was before the court only as incidental to one narrow point. The grand jury that indicted the Negro was attacked as having been selected with discrimination against the Negro race, in violation of the principle expressed by Chief Justice Stone in Hill v. Texas (86 Law Ed. 1559), when he said that the commissioners who selected the grand jury were bound by their duty "not to pursue a course of conduct which would operate to discriminate in the selection of jurors on racial grounds."

Earlier Justice Frankfurter had said in Lane v. Wilson (83 Law Ed. 1281-7) that "the amendment nullifies sophisticated as well as simple-minded modes of discrimination." And Justice Reed in his majority decision against Akins admitted that "a purpose to discriminate may be proved by the systematic exclusion of eligible jurymen of the proscribed race or by unequal application of the law to such an extent as to show intentional discrimination" (Akins v. State 89 Law Ed. 1210). Here "discrimination" against the Negro race means simply "dealing unequally with" the race of which Akins was a member, in the selection of the grand jury. The grand jury had to be selected legally, and without discrimination, if it was to furnish any authority for the trial and conviction.

Under the Texas law the grand jury is selected by three commissioners appointed by the judge; they pick out sixteen men as a panel, of whom twelve are finally chosen as grand jurors and become the indicting body.

The first conviction of Akins, resulting in a life sentence, was reversed by the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals in an opinion based on the United States Supreme Court's decision in Hill v. State (86 Law Ed. 1559), which the Texas court followed with sullen reluctance. In the Hill case no Negro was on the grand jury, and it was shown that none ever had been selected, though there were numerous Negroes in Dallas County qualified to serve. After the reversal, the judge who had presided in the trial court told the commissioners who were to select a new grand jury that in view of the appellate court's decision it would be well to include a Negro. The general public and the commissioners knew from the judge's remarks that Akins was to be indicted again. The commissioners followed the judge's suggestion and chose a barely literate Negro farmer from a remote part of the county.

When motion was made to quash the indictment because of the discrimination alleged, a hearing was held at which the commissioners expressed themselves frankly. W. H. Wells said, "We had no intention of placing more than one Negro on the panel. When we did that we had finished with the Negro." Ernest R. Tennant testified, "I did not have any intention of putting more than one on the list." Roy E. Douglas, the third commissioner, agreed. "We liked this one," he said, "and our intentions were to get just one Negro on the grand jury."

There is, of course, nothing complicated or difficult in the idea of "discrimination." It means simply "dealing unequally with." And if the statements of the commissioners have any meaning whatever, they show very clearly that the commissioners did deal unequally with the Negro race. From their own testimony it seems impossible to deny that they allowed one Negro only on the grand jury. Yet Justice Reed, on page 1212 of the Akins decision, could say that the evidence "leaves us unconvinced that the commissioners deliberately and intentionally limited the number of Negroes on the grand jury list." And the majority voted with him to affirm the death sentence.

To the average citizen in this state, where discrimination against Negroes is commonplace, the judicial killing of Akins comes as no surprise. The average policeman, prosecutor, or juror says simply, "When a nigger kills a white man, death to him." Akins never had a chance in Texas. But it is shocking that the United States Supreme Court should have consented to this death sentence, should have tolerated the evasion of its own previous decisions by the deliberate subterfuge of putting one eighty-year-old Negro on the grand jury as evidence of "no discrimination."

I repeat that I know, and the judge who tried the case knows, and everybody else in Dallas knows that no white man would have been convicted of murder in a case like this, that Akins was condemned to death because of the color of his skin. Every citizen who approves or condones this death sentence shares the guilt of this Negro's death.

Who Bosses the Philippines?

BY CAPTAIN X

(An American army officer who fought in the Philippines)

Manila, P. I., August 9

THE Philippines are seething with political unrest. There are plots and deals and maneuvers, of reactionaries against liberals, collaborationists against resisters, fascists against democrats, rich against poor. There is growing dissatisfaction with the Roman Catholic church because of its extensive property holdings and its pro-Franco leanings both before the war and at present. Every sector of life in the islands simmers in the boiling political pot, and a scum of reaction is rising to the top.

The Nacionalista Party—the government party—is controlled by big economic interests. It is the home of collaborators and reactionaries. It is rapidly losing all its progressive members, but there is no comparable organization for them to join. Andrés Soriano, Manuel Roxas, and Sergio Osmeña are the key men in the party around whom the struggle rages.

Soriano, a Spaniard, is probably the largest single economic power in the Philippines and wields immense political influence. He is owner and operator of the huge San Miguel Brewery and has interests in breweries in the United States. In addition he is a great mining magnate, owning the IXL, the San Mauricio, and the Masbate Consolidated mines. He also owns ice-cream interests and has the Coca-Cola concession.

Before the war he was an avowed fascist. He was the honorary consul in Manila of the Franco government. He was also president of the Casino Español, the Falangist club, a position that made him the recognized leader of the Falangist movement in the Philippines. During the war in Spain he collected large sums of money from local Spanish business firms for use in "the cause." No one supposes that he has had a political change of heart, though he doesn't talk or operate openly as a fascist now.

The story of his acquisition of Philippine citizenship is a scandal. He applied shortly before the war, during the days when the United States government was freezing the assets of all Axis nationals and when it seemed expedient not to be too closely identified with an Axis ally. The law office of Roxas filed the petition for Soriano's appearance in court. His sponsor was General Basilio Valdes, chief of staff of the Philippine army. His counsel were Claro M. Recto, who later became Secretary of Foreign Affairs in the puppet government and a signatory of the Pact of Alliance with Japan, and Benigno S. Aquino, a rabid anti-American orator. Aquino, formerly campaign manager for the Nacionalista Party, became assistant head of the Japanese-sponsored Preparatory Commission for Philippine Independence, speaker of the puppet Assembly, and director of the Kalibapi—the sole political party during the Japanese occupation. He is now in Tokyo with José Laurel, former head of the puppet government.

Soriano was a resident of Manila, but in order to avoid publicity he filed the application in Rizal Province. This was a violation of the law which requires that citizenship petitions be filed in the place of residence. The Philippine Civil Liberties Union formally opposed the application, filing a written protest. Before the case came to court the union offered its help to the Solicitor General in opposing the application for citizenship of a known fascist. The Solicitor General accepted the offer pro forma but declined the assistance of the Civil Liberties Union when the case came up. This Solicitor General was Sixta de la Costa, who remained in office during the Japanese occupation. The Civil Liberties Union attempted to present its case but was refused recognition by the court, and Soriano's application was approved. The union promptly appealed the decision to the Supreme Court, but while the appeal was still pending, and before the required thirty-day period between the court's approval and the administration of the oath elapsed, Soriano took the oath—a second violation of the law. In fact, the law was violated on three counts, for Soriano took the oath in Manila before another judge, and the statute requires that it be taken in the same court and before the same judge who approved the application. This slippery business could not have been carried through successfully without the approval of high political circles.

Soriano is thus not legally a citizen. How, then, could he be an officer in the army and an aide-de-camp to General MacArthur? How could he occupy a position in the Cabinet? He was commissioned a captain in the Philippine army on January 1, 1942, and after he went to the United States was made a major. Furthermore, he was Secretary of Finance under Quezon in the refugee government. After he resigned this post he went to Australia and was commissioned a colonel in the United States army. Shortly before the return to Leyte he turned up on MacArthur's staff. He is said to have more influence than anyone else with MacArthur.

In passing it may be noted that Soriano's brewery was the first business to be reopened after the liberation.

The recent history of Manuel Roxas is equally interesting. First it must be said that he is a collaborator—both because he supports collaborators now and because he behaved as one himself during the occupation. In the first fighting against the Japanese he was a brigadier general and acted as liaison officer between the Philippine army and General MacArthur. Early in the war he went to Mindanao, where he surrendered to the Japanese after the other officers, with his knowledge, had decided to continue the fight. Shortly after this he sent formal letters to the guerrilla commanders urging them to surrender for the purpose of speeding the return of peace and order. Tomas Cabili, later Secretary of National Defense in the Osmeña Cabinet, received such a letter. He and others rejected the idea, but many accepted it and surrendered. Roxas was then taken to the Capas internment camp, from which he was released conditionally after a short time. He returned to Manila and became a member of the Preparatory Commission for Independence and helped draft the constitution of the puppet government. Some time during April, 1944, Roxas became chairman of the Economic Planning Board, and shortly afterward Secretary without Portfolio in Laurel's Cabinet. During this time he campaigned vigorously to induce rice growers to deliver their grain to Biba, the Japanese-dominated rice pool, though he knew the guerrillas were doing everything possible to prevent Japanese seizure of Filipino rice through Biba.

On September 21, 1944, after the American bombings, martial law was declared. On September 22 a joint meeting of the Council of State and the Cabinet was called for the purpose of declaring war on the United States. Roxas did not attend, pleading illness. Upon inquiry by one of the members as to why Roxas was absent, the President made it a matter of record in the minutes that Roxas had already approved the declaration of war. The following is a direct quotation of the statement written to Laurel by Roxas: "Compadre: If our allies [the Japanese] ask for a declaration of a state of war, sign it. If they ask for a declaration of war, sign it also." Afterward Roxas pleaded that he had made this and many other statements under duress. However, it is a matter of record that two men at the joint meeting voted against the declaration. They were Ramón Avancena, of the Council of State, and José Yulo, the Chief Justice, who claimed that under the puppet government's constitution a declaration of war or of a state of war would be valid only with the concurrence of two-thirds of the Congress. And Miguel Unson, who voted for the declaration of war, nevertheless objected that the reasons stated were false. The Americans, he said, were coming to retake what was their own and to offer independence to the Philippines. In view of the fact that none of these men was punished or molested, it is difficult to accept Roxas's plea of duress.

After war was declared, several guerrilla groups offered Roxas escape and safekeeping. He declined, giving as his reason the fact that his wife, who was accustomed to the facilities of the city, could not live in the mountains. Some time later the guerrillas returned and advised Roxas that they were now prepared to offer Mrs. Roxas the comforts to which she was accustomed. He again declined, saying that he knew the proper time to join the guerrillas. The time never came.

After the American landing on Leyte Roxas went to Baguio with the Cabinet for safety instead of joining the guerrillas. The Cabinet was captured, but a distinction was made in the case of Roxas. The other collaborators were sent to Iwahig Prison on Palawan. Roxas was "liberated," with the personal guaranty of General MacArthur. His first statement was, "Most of the acts of the puppet government were done under duress." He referred to Laurel as a "patriot."

Shortly after his "liberation" Roxas returned to the political scene, though he had previously made a public statement that he would not seek or accept any office until after the war. He was promptly elected president of the Senate by a collaborationist majority. One of his first speeches was a declaration that he was generalissimo of the guerrillas! As a publicity stunt, and to give his claim verisimilitude, he submitted a list of men who he said deserved decorations.

Among the first acts of Roxas was a vicious attack on Secretary of the Interior Tomas Confesor, one of the outstanding progressives in the Quezon government, who had lived with the guerrillas for three years. This is the background of the attack. During August or September, 1943, a rift developed between Confesor and Colonel Macario Peralta, Jr. Both were guerrilla leaders in Panay. The quarrel reached such proportions that Confesor had to be rescued by Colonel Edwin Andrews on instructions from General MacArthur in order to prevent his assassination. At this time, it is claimed, General MacArthur did not know what the disagreement was about. In any case, Confesor immediately returned to Manila and opened an attack on Roxas. A plane was then sent to Panay for Peralta. Upon his arrival the first person he conferred with was Roxas. Then many statements came out attacking Confesor. Shortly afterward Peralta was sent to the Command and Staff School at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, whence he sent word to Roxas praising him for his inspiration to the guerrillas. Confesor and Cabili have since been kicked out of the Cabinet, though officially they "resigned in order to serve their country better as members of the Rehabilitation Committee in the states." Now there are no more real anti-collaborators in the Cabinet and very few in the Congress.

The following incident indicates the character of the Congress under the leadership of Roxas. On June 9, 1945, a resolution was passed supporting United States Congress Joint Resolution No. 93 granting the Philippines complete independence before 1946. While the resolution was before the Philippine Congress a motion was made to include President Roosevelt's statement that collaborators should not be permitted to occupy positions of political or economic power and influence. This motion was defeated on the remarkable ground that it "might commit Congress to that policy."

Roxas no longer takes much trouble to hide his real intentions. He is openly fighting for the reinstatement of all members of the puppet government. He claims there were no collaborators among them. He is powerfully supported by the big economic interests, the majority of whom played ball with the Japanese and many of whom made large sums during the occupation. He has the support of all former and present Falangists and other fascists.

Roxas must not be underestimated. He is extremely clever and a smooth talker: he captures the imagination of people who know nothing about the issues involved. In this connection it should be noted that three-quarters of the Manila newspapers are collaborationist and support Roxas. He has recently begun to publish his own newspaper, whose editorials seek to wash away the sins of the collaborators. Roxas is not an ignorant or naive man. He knows what grave problems the Philippines face. He is aware of the terrible plight of the peasants and the city proletariat. Therefore he courts them with excellent speeches. His promises mean nothing, but they sound wonderful.

There has been a split between Roxas and Osmeña. How deep it goes would be hard to say. It may be a political maneuver. But this much is clear: Osmeña's popularity among all classes of people is rapidly declining. He is old, hesitant, and slow in reaching decisions; he has no popular appeal, and the people do not feel that he is really interested in complete independence. He has won the disgust of all progressives because of his many compromises with collaborators and because by his inaction he has become the dupe of the reactionaries. It is not true that Osmeña has taken a vigorous anti-collaborationist stand. He has constantly tolerated the return of collaborators and has yielded to pressure to get rid of progressives in his government. He has supported or permitted a rapid return to the pre-war economic order dominated by private industrialists and big landowners. For all these reasons Osmeña will probably lose the November election. On the other hand, there is still the possibility of a deal between Roxas and Osmeña. Various persons, from various motives, are urging them to "unite." What the deal would involve no one can say. It might mean "uniting" around Roxas. It might mean Roxas as the running mate of Osmeña, who would resign after the election, leaving Roxas to succeed him. These are some of the many current speculations.

In this situation what will the progressives do? They are faced with a difficult choice. The Democratic Alliance, representing most of the liberal opposition groups, is in its infancy. Among its leaders are brilliant men, many of them lawyers, who are enthusiastic and sincere although perhaps more adept in political theory than in the revolutionary action the present situation calls for. Many are former Nationalists who have bolted the party on account of the collaborationist policies of its leaders. Several, notably Vicente Lava, who gave himself whole-heartedly to the efforts of the Hukbalahap, fought for three years as guerrillas. But the Democratic Alliance cannot possibly wage an effective campaign this fall. Its resources are slim and it has no leader who could compete with Roxas and Osmeña with any chance of success. Even without these handicaps the time before the election is too short to allow the progressives to do more than create a certain consolidation of their forces. The alternative to an independent campaign is to support Osmeña as the lesser evil in the probable event that the Nacionalistas divide and the President runs against Roxas. The choice must be made soon. But whatever the Democratic Alliance may decide, its main task is to organize a long-range fight against the collaborators and other reactionaries who now rule the Philippines under the protection of the American military authorities. In this struggle it desperately needs material and moral support from progressives in the United States.

In the Wind

SOCIETY NOTES: Ad age, official publication of the San Francisco Advertising Club, carried the following advertisement by the San Francisco Examiner in its issue of August 29: "We never claimed to be 'the newspaper that reaches the war workers' because our field is on the right side of the railroad tracks year in, year out."

REVOLUTION: That radical consumer publication, the Wall Street Journal, offered this advice in its Commodity Letter of August 28: "Start jumping on the butcher when he leaves a lot of fat on the steak or roast. There will be more animals coming to market, and it won't be a case of taking the steak with the tallow on or doing without another week."

TRICOTEUSES: R. H. Markham, in the Christian Century of August 15, gave this analogy of conditions in Bulgaria today: "If the Communist Earl Browder, Ruth McKenney, William Foster, and Robert Minor, with the cooperation of The Nation's Miss Kirchwey and PM's Isadore Stone, should set up a court to hang, after a day's trial, Hoover, Landon, Vandenberg, Dewey, the Times's Sulzberger, and the Tribune's McCormick, with photographers filming the dangling victims, we would have a picture in American terms of Bulgaria's 'people's justice' in the grand new order."

WAR: Editor and Publisher of September 1 reports that an unidentified news photographer who appeared in shirtsleeves at a formal ceremony in Halifax, N. S., recently, was berated by a high-ranking officer. "Dammit," the officer roared, "your paper ought to provide you with morning coats for occasions like these—it's disgraceful!"

REDS: Charles Ventura, society columnist of the New York World-Telegram, turned labor columnist on September 4. "Echoes of hunger cries now reverberating throughout the fashionable residential colony of Redding Ridge, Connecticut," he said, "are being heard in New York salons. Certain of the feminine members of the colony have gone on a sit-down strike by refusing to whip up a meal for their businessmen husbands. They say they're fed up with having to do their own domestic chores and demand a new deal now that the war is over."

MAGIC: Ralph Blodgett, of the Meneough Advertising Agency of Des Moines, Iowa, wrote an article entitled We Need Those Depressions in the August 25 issue of Opinion and Comment, a quarterly published by the College of Commerce and Business Administration of the University of Illinois. "It is to be hoped that depressions are never abolished," he said, "for they have many desirable features. Those who learn to 'ride the business cycle' can find as many advantages in depressions as in booms. . . . That very name 'depression' is inappropriate. It horribly maligns those great periods so full of splendid opportunities. . . . Let us keep those periods but abolish only the name. . . . Some economic research foundation might well offer prizes for suitable names and select the best one."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. One dollar will be paid for each item accepted.]

HARVARD PONDERS EDUCATION

BY IRWIN EDMAN

THE Report of the Harvard Committee, "General Education in a Free Society" (Harvard, $2), is not, as brief newspaper accounts have led the public to suppose, simply a recommendation that the elective system be dropped in Harvard College. The book—for it is one—is concerned with a far wider question, of which the suggested revision of the Harvard College program is one chapter. The report is occupied with the central issue of "the general education of the great majority of each generation in the high schools"—not that of "the comparatively small minority who attend our four-year colleges." The document raises more basic issues still: What are the common purposes to which education in a free society may be said to be directed? How far does the cultivation of individuality, acknowledged to be one of the aims of education, consort with more obviously social purposes? What common standards, what basic values, can a democracy agree upon? What is freedom? What is the good citizen in a free society? The good man? The good life?

President Conant, in his introduction to the report, asks to be "permitted . . . to issue a solemn warning: any judgment based on an incomplete or fragmentary reading is not only unfair to the authors but almost certain to be false. The book must be taken as a unit." The authors, almost to the point of tedium, repeatedly ask the reader to hark back to Chapter II, Theory of General Education, upon which their whole analysis depends. That chapter, they say, will consider "what can, perhaps overformally, be called a philosophy of American education, and especially that part of it which is general education." The substance of that philosophy is indicated in the chapter subheads: Heritage and Change, General and Special Education, Areas of Knowledge, Traits of Mind, The Good Man and the Citizen.

Like Plato's writings on the subject, to which the committee makes frequent obeisance, this report turns out to be not only a discussion of education in the narrow sense but a theory of human nature and civilization. Plato's views on these matters were derived from his observation of Athens; this committee considers human nature and civilization in America as seen from Cambridge, Massachusetts.

The terms of this survey of the basic questions raised by educational practice in the United States are very general. They are so general and, often, so genteelly balanced that it is impossible to do more at times than to express a somewhat bored acquiescence. There is never any question of the earnestness of the authors and of their desire to give a good account of the subject and of themselves and of Harvard. But they turn up some egregious truisms: "Education can . . . be wholly devoted neither to tradition nor to experiment, neither to the belief that the ideal in itself is enough nor to the view that means are valuable apart from the ideal." "Democracy must represent an adjustment between the values of freedom and social living." Such vanilla-flavored homiletics are not likely to shock the reader into absorbed attention.

There is a considerable amount of such banal good sense, expressed too often—albeit without jargon—in the bleak anonymous style of a committee. But there is a good deal more. Every committee has some strong minds whose views, expressed with clarity and enterprise, become eventually the "unanimous" beliefs of the committee. The Harvard report is not quite so innocent of tendentiousness as at first appears. One repeated assertion of the committee is that American education has lost the unifying principles it had in the nineteenth century, when appeal was predominantly made to "the Christian view of man and history as providing both final meaning and immediate standards for life." "And certainly," the committee adds, "this impulse to mold students to a pattern sanctioned by the past can, in one form or another, never be absent from education." The committee apparently feels deeply the necessity of finding a unity which may be the common heritage and the common possession of all members of a democratic society. There must be "some over-all logic, some strong, not easily broken frame within which both college and school may fulfil their at once diversifying and uniting tasks." It is clear that the committee is not willing, like the Chicago Thomists, to adapt an ancient unity in some degree of assumption and detail irrelevant to our age, our knowledge, or our problems. They recognize that in a diverse society any unity is hard to find. They come up with a very modest suggestion indeed as to the unity possible in twentieth-century America—"the ideal of cooperation on the level of action irrespective of agreement on ultimates. . . ." Translated from this bland abstract doubletalk, how much, one wonders, is left of "unity, of over-all logic, of some not easily broken frame"? During the war we had, it is true, "cooperation on the level of action." What corresponds to it, one wistfully wonders, during the peace? The committee seems wistfully to wonder, too.

The writers of this report give plenty of evidence themselves, in their admirable historical summary, of the degree to which American education has ceased to exhibit unity of purpose almost in direct proportion to the larger number and greater variety of groups reached by the enormously expanded high schools and colleges. They seem agreed that "cooperation on the level of action" is not enough. They appeal to something beyond, to "common beliefs and common commitments," which, they suggest, it is the function of general education—as over against special education—to provide. But about anything beyond faith in the "dignity of

How to be a successful lover

What do you know about sex and love? Do you belong to that generation which has been raised on the theory that love is "concealed sexual desire"—and the theory is wrong! We pride ourselves that we tell our children "the facts of life"; yet do we? The biological facts, yes; but what about this mysterious thing called love, that we read about in novels and see on the movie screen; how often do we experience it in our own lives?

Isn't it the truth that when we tell our children "the facts of life" we are telling them less than half the whole story of what it takes to make a success of marriage—yet how many of us know enough to tell them the rest?

Was Freud Wrong?

It is a strange thing that for forty years—since Freud—psychologists and psychoanalysts have devoted so much attention to the study of sex and so little to love. For Dr. Theodor Reik, in his revolutionary book, PSYCHOLOGY OF SEX RELATIONS, points out that the two things are not the same at all!

Sex is violent and possessive; love is tender and unselfish. Sex has existed since the dawn of time; love—as we understand it—is a comparatively late product of the adjustment between men and women.

Sex Is Not Love!

Yet the Freudians would have us believe that every human impulse and action arises subconsciously from the well-springs of sex, either its satisfaction or its frustration. Art, music, poetry are supposed to be the result of "sublimation." Even friendship between man and man or woman and woman is said to have a sexual basis. Tenderness is supposed to be desire under another guise. It just isn't so, and this book proves it!

SOME OF THE SUBJECTS TREATED IN THIS BOOK

- The nature of the sex drive
- Why lovers quarrel
- The ladies invented love!
- Imagery in sexual excitement
- Identification with partner
- The "Oedipus" bugaboo
- Sexual frigidity and impotence
- What really causes unfaithfulness
- Promiscuity and homosexuality
- The desire to conquer
- The role of fantasy
- Amalgamation of sex, ego and tenderness in the Happy life

PSYCHOLOGY OF SEX RELATIONS

By Dr. Theodor Reik

Author of From Thirty Years With Freud, Masochism in Modern Man, A Psychologist Looks At Love, etc.

Marriage is more than a biological meeting between men and women. And—unless there is something beyond sex present—even complete physical satisfactions are rarely experienced.

Successful marriage demands an understanding of the real bases of physical, mental and emotional attraction in their entirety. PSYCHOLOGY OF SEX RELATIONS shows how this may be achieved—in completely frank, helpful language.

A Guide to Better Loving—and Living

To enable normal, intelligent people to bridge the gap between the fundamental sex-drive and complete satisfaction in marriage is the purpose of this book. Dr. Reik believes that it is important for people to understand the true nature of sex attraction; to realize the differences in the emotional attitudes of men and women; to understand the parts played by hostility, envy; the instinct to dominate and to be dominated; the basis of jealousy, the real causes of indifference, the power of ego-fulfillment. Author of a score of distinguished and pioneering books, close associate of Freud who has had the courage to go far beyond Freud, Dr. Reik has been the recipient over many years of the secret fears and hopes of many men and women. There is no psychologist today better equipped to give the average person the answer to these and many other perplexing questions.

Reading this book is like enjoying a heart-to-heart talk with a wise, witty and understanding person who really does know the answers; a personally conducted tour of the most important subject in the world—by an expert. Freeing you of old shibboleths, it will show you concretely how to "find yourself" in marriage—and in the world.

On sale at all booksellers, $3—or mail coupon for free examination

FARRAR & RINEHART, Publishers, Dept. N
232 Madison Ave., New York 16, N. Y.

For the enclosed $3, send me copy of PSYCHOLOGY OF SEX RELATIONS. I may return the book in 5 days for full refund, if not satisfied.

Name ....

Address ....

City .... Zone .... State ....

☐ If you prefer book sent C.O.D., check here. Same guarantee applies.

Note: Book not sent to minors.

REIK
PSYCHOLOGY OF SEX RELATIONS

man" and in "mutual responsibility" they are not very specific. General education is concerned with nurturing the individual into a good citizen and a good man. It is not made clear what these common beliefs and commitments are, nor is it shown how, even were they less vaguely specified, their teaching would be distinguished from indoctrination. It is a nice point, and the committee with characteristic judiciousness reminds us that we must have minds open but not too open. "If toleration is not to become nihilism, if conviction is not to become dogmatism, if criticism is not to become cynicism, each must have something of the other." Isn't it true?

The appeal throughout is one that well-intentioned academic minds have always made, to the standard of "reason." The authors admit that "human nature involves instincts and sentiments as well as the intellect." But men may, they say, be educated to reasonableness, to the art of life, to wisdom. There is a little passing reference made to the social and psychological basis of ideals, but the Harvard report does not seem to be very aware that psychology and anthropology have thrown a great deal of light on human nature of late. There is no anthropologist or psychiatrist on the committee, nor do these sciences seem to have greatly influenced the ultimate conclusions. There is almost too much mention of Plato, and none of Malinowski or Freud.

Within the limits of abstract, debatable, and often merely debating philosophy, the practical suggestions for education are sensible enough, and whatever one thinks of ultimates, these pages are illuminating. There is a suggestive account of the way in which high schools may, and indeed must, be used if there is to be a basic and general education, as contrasted with merely technical and special training, for the citizens of our democracy. On the college level, at least for Harvard College, there is proposed a basic system of courses in the humanities, in the social sciences, in the natural sciences, designed to serve as parts of a general education. (Such a group of courses has, by the way, long been in operation at Columbia and elsewhere.) There are illuminating suggestions as to the way in which even certain "special" courses may be used for the purposes of general education. There is a sensible but skimpy discussion of the present status and the important possibilities of adult education, and of the new media of radio and movies. There is good sense about the "human" college and the "Olympian" university, and about the individual who is at the heart of the college, the advancement of knowledge which is at the heart of the university, and the connection between the two.

These chapters are worth the attention of anyone, and particularly of educators. But the report challenges consideration as a whole, as a theory of education in America. Even its failures are instructive. To ask what education is for in our, or in any, time is to ask what society is for, what life is for, what gives meaning to experience. It is not surprising that in our day a group of distinguished Harvard professors, when they do come to agreement on such issues, should have achieved only a formal unity. A genuine philosophy of education requires a coherent and compelling philosophy of society and life, and nothing like that has ever come out of even a sixty-thousand-dollar committee. Plato was a Committee of One.

The Great Choice

AMERICA'S PLACE IN THE WORLD. By Nathaniel Peffer. The Viking Press. $2.75.

AMERICA: PARTNER IN WORLD RULE. By William Henry Chamberlin. The Vanguard Press. $3.

FOR a few years at least, two powers will hold undisputed sway in the world: the U. S. S. R. and the U. S. A. For a few months at any rate, our supremacy cannot be challenged; and these months will be decisive. We can stand for liberty through justice; we can put our trust in force alone. The choice is more pressing than most of us realize. We cannot, without disaster, drift "in the middle of the road."

The purpose of these two fine studies is to awaken in the American people a sense of their responsibility. Closely parallel, they are complementary. Nathaniel Peffer's is the more philosophical; never abstract and vague, it is chiefly concerned with general issues and guiding principles. Chamberlin's work is not lacking in thought, but it is mainly a survey of concrete instances. It is dangerous to deal in a book with the problems of the moment: the results of Yalta had just been—darkly—released after the main part of Chamberlin's study was in print. But even in these swift-moving days we should think in terms of decades, not hours. The ideas of Peffer and Chamberlin are valid today because they were valid twenty-five years ago. Neither could foresee the atomic bomb; yet, in his very first paragraph, Chamberlin ascribes to the blockbuster the symbolic significance which we now attach to the deadlier weapon. Human nature remains more important than its instruments. There is more difference between the stone ax and nineteenth-century artillery than between that artillery and atomic warfare. If man remains a primitive with two-billion-dollar gadgets, we shall have war factories buried half a mile underground; that is all.

Chamberlin and Peffer agree on a capital point of history: that our refusing to join the League was not responsible for World War II. I beg to dissent. I know that England and France made a mess of the League, but that was because we had already killed the world's confidence in its success. Geneva with America at the head of the table would have offered a totally different picture. There were minor objectionable features about Versailles, although it was sweetness and light compared with the coming peace. But we, with malice toward none, and free from entanglements, could have invoked the wisest provision in the Covenant, Article XIX for the peaceful revision of treaties. It remained a dead letter: the victors clung to a crumbling peace; the defeated sought to destroy or elude it, but not to amend it. Although our joining the League was blocked by a minority in the Senate, we as a people are responsible for not making the will of the majority prevail. The trouble was that the majority had good intentions but no will power. Counting heads is not enough; the bewildered many, even if they are right, are no match for the fanatical few, even though perverse. I still believe that our rejection of Wilson was "the great refusal." There are far more reasons for our walking out of the United Nations now than there were for staying out of Geneva.

Both Chamberlin and Peffer are extremely definite in their condemnation of the Big Three principle. It is sheer power politics, and I am appalled at the fact that alleged liberals are toying with it. Even the "realists" who support it do not believe it will last (Fox, Dallin), or that it will be able to preserve peace. We are lazily accepting as a normal method the first condition of strategy—secrecy and the massive use of power. Chamberlin may be too gloomy when he says that the peace was lost at Teheran. I prefer the De Gaulle spirit: yes, the cause of peace suffered a severe setback at Teheran, another one at Yalta, and possibly the worst at Potsdam. But it is not lost, any more than the war was lost at Warsaw, Dunkirk, Singapore, or Manila.

We must reverse that tendency, and work for the faith we profess: democracy among men and nations, liberty inseparable from equality, force only in the service of the law. This raises the central point in both books: the necessity of abolishing the crying contradiction between our words and our deeds. I am not afraid of brave words like the Four Freedoms: but we should make a clear distinction between remote ideals and definite aims. These should be forthright commitments, effectively implemented. If we keep proclaiming principles and acting against them, we may call such confusion realism; the world will call it hypocrisy. On that shifty and cynical basis there can be no peace. Even we feel increasing uneasiness about our inner contradictions. We want to give Russia (and England) the full benefit of the doubt; but we are conscious that we are yielding in essentials for the sake of an alliance. This is appeasement, not peace. To quote Chamberlin's closing words: "The fruits of Munich are known. Those of Yalta remain to be gathered." It is plain that Chamberlin has an anti-Russian bias; but I, whose sympathies are on the other side, can see the force of his argument. We shall not remain friends with Russia for very long if we condone high-handed methods contrary to her principles as well as to our own.

We should therefore, as Sir Bernard Pares advises, stand up to Russia, provided it be as a fearless but generous friend. In this respect Peffer's chapter The New Holy Alliance? is all-important, one of the most cogent pieces of political writing I have read in a long time. If it were felt that we were the rallying point of an anti-socialist crusade, Russia would be justified in taking precautions against us. It is time to realize that there is a certain amount of collective activity, or collectivism, in this scientific-industrial world. Our task is to preserve the permanent values of American life, and first of all liberty, under collectivism; certainly not to turn collectivism into a source of profit for the few.

Both Chamberlin and Peffer are appealing to the American people to carry on an American, that is, a democratic policy. It is for the people to make their will manifest, and their will must prevail. Even liberal-minded scholars like T. A. Bailey believe in the necessity of secret diplomacy. This ancient fallacy must be exploded. In their general lines international problems are broader and simpler than purely national ones. The common people are more competent to say whether they want peace or war, anarchy or law, than they are to pick out the site of a power dam. Every secret deal implies a crooked deal among the profiteers, and a raw deal for the rest of mankind. Let us have "open covenants openly arrived at."

THE ★ Russian Story

THE COMING OF AGE OF A GREAT PEOPLE

By NICHOLAS MIKHAILOV

Author of Land of the Soviets

★ "In this telescoping into 184 pages of 1,000 years of Russia's turmoil and growth, Mikhailov has no political axe to grind. His book, simply and directly written, is rather a historic and geographic travelogue, reading with the speed of a novel, letting the facts speak for themselves.

—N. Y. Times Book Review

At your bookstore, $2.75

SHERIDAN HOUSE

257 4th Ave., N. Y. 10

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street
New York 7, N. Y.

Dear Sirs:

I want to subscribe to The Nation, or the following Nation magazine combinations as listed below:

....

....

....

☐ Remittance enclosed ☐ Bill me

NAME..

STREET..

CITY........................ ZONE...... STATE..........

9-15-45

Money-Saving
Magazine Combinations

●

THE Nation

with Harpers Magazine $6.50
You save $2.50

with Consumers Union $7.00
You save $1 50

with HARPERS & Consumers Union $9.00
You save $3.60

with Free World $7.50
You save $1.50

with Saturday Review $8.50
You save $1 50

All club combinations listed are for one year, and may be mailed to different individuals and addresses. Canadian and foreign postage extra.

THE NATION BY ITSELF

1 Year $5 2 Years $8
3 Years $11

Servicemen's Rate:
$3 a Year

Canadian and Foreign Postage, $1 a Year Extra

Both also are conscious that only union, and union now, can prevent the Balkanization of Europe, and an Anglo-Russian conflict, into which we shall inevitably be drawn. Peffer merely alludes to the subject; Chamberlin mentions it over and over again, in his own words and in fine quotations from Churchill and Voigt. But, he adds in a despondent mood, "this last development cannot reasonably be anticipated until the hates aroused by the present war have subsided." I demur. It is the hates that make the union imperative. Saints could live in holy anarchy; snarling sinners need a common discipline. The union's first duty will be to curb violence; ultimately, it will allay hatred and foster good-will. ALBERT GUÉRARD

BRIEFER COMMENT

Beware of the Zaibatsu

A FACTUAL AND DETAILED HANDBOOK of Japanese society, such as "The Japanese Nation," by John F. Embree (Farrar and Rinehart, $3), has long been needed for popular use in this country. It is unfortunate, however, that many of the emphases in this study, at times incidental but more often repeated several times over, are not of a nature to further a discriminating insight into the workings of the Japanese oligarchy. The villain of the piece appears here again as the military leaders (though they are also shown as favoring apparently good "national socialist" measures), while an explicit effort is made to play down the political importance of the Zaibatsu. The danger of such an approach, in a period when the Zaibatsu will be carrying the ball for the military in preparation for a war of revenge, is too great to be permitted to pass unnoted. Much too tender a regard is also shown for the bureaucracy, the "respected" landowners, and the generally totalitarian elements of the old regime. The police system of Japan, for example, is qualitatively different from that in the United States, even though third-degree methods are practiced by "some American city forces." The role of the Emperor, though denounced at one point, is held capable of gradual modification toward a "constitutional monarchy"—an interpretation which is open to serious question. And it smacks of a justification of Japanese aggression to speak of "the situation of a newly industrialized independent nation in the midst of an area dominated by Occidental colonial and economic interests—a situation which was bound, sooner or later, to a lead to a war of survival."

DON'T MISS THIS GREAT RALLY!

Salute to Spanish Republicans

MADISON SQUARE GARDEN
MONDAY EVENING, SEPT. 24, 7:30 P. M.

SPEAKERS
HAROLD LASKI
Chairman British Labor Party
(By radio from London)
ISABEL DE PALENCIA NORMAN CORWIN
JOHANNES STEEL LISA SERGIO
BARTLEY CRUM, Chairman
(Others to be Announced)

EDWIN FRANKO GOLDMAN BAND
Directed by Mr. Goldman
BROADWAY AND HOLLYWOOD TRIBUTE TO SPANISH REPUBLICAN FIGHTERS

Tickets from $3.60 to $.60 for sale at

Leblang's Ticket Agency, 1176 Broadway
Workers Book Shop, 50 East 13th Street
Book Fair, 133 West 44th Street
Music Room, 129 West 44th Street
Veterans of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade, 13 Astor Place

Sponsored by the Spanish Refugee Appeal, 192 Lexington Ave., N. Y. 16, N. Y.

If proper allowance is made for these dubious emphases, the reader will find much of interest and value in many chapters of the book. There are intimate glimpses, filled out with much fascinating detail, into the Japanese family and household, and interesting discussions of culture patterns, education, and newspaper and radio developments. The long chapter on Japanese religion, moreover, contains a recapitulation of the Shinto mythology and a brief summary of the modern practices of state Shinto which are sufficient to disclose their threat to a peaceful world community.

T. A. BISSON

Marc Chagall

LIONELLO VENTURI has provided the short text to an excellent book of reproductions of paintings and drawings by Marc Chagall (Pierre Matisse Editions). Chagall's personality is very well understood here, but his art is taken too unqualifiedly to afford us the illumination we have the right to expect from such a mind as Professor Venturi's. The fault may lie with what I detect to be an unconfessed or unconscious hostility on his part to most of modern art since impressionism. The book perpetuates the banal and widespread misconception of cubism as essentially intellectual and "scientific." And by implication Chagall is counterposed to Picasso—which is just as unfair to Chagall as it is to Picasso.

CLEMENT GREENBERG

Continental View

THE MAIN POINTS of Roland Hall Sharp's "South America Uncensored" (Longmans, Green, $3.50) have been made by other books recently reviewed in The Nation. There are, however, a frankness and a fulness of information about Brazil and Paraguay which give the book a special utility. There is, too, considerable treatment of Latin American imperialism, particularly Argentine imperialism, a matter which has received less attention than it deserves. But the special quality of "South America Uncensored" is that its political and social analyses, which are unencumbered with statistics and over-rigid formulations, are accompanied by a very interesting and vivid description of the continent itself. The resources of South America are related to the existing state of affairs and to the potentials of the countries concerned. Popular illusions about the unbounded natural wealth of the continent are corrected, so that the largeness and importance of the tasks confronting democracy are clearly seen. There is a quiet sincerity about Mr. Sharp's writing and a sobriety of judgment that are very persuasive. RALPH BATES

Great Men of Africa

IN 1870 Africa was the "forgotten" continent; during the next thirty years its wealth became known and important to all the world. Stuart Cloete, popular novelist of South Africa, has told the history of that period through the lives of three men: Cecil Rhodes, financier and imperialist; Paul Kruger, Boer farmer, statesman, and soldier; and Lobengula, King of the Matabele and last great native chieftain.

"Against These Three" (Houghton, Mifflin, $3.50) demonstrates a nice sense of historical continuity in addition to Mr. Cloete's acknowledged narrative and descriptive powers. It is fascinating biography and essentially accurate history. RALPH ADAMS BROWN

MOTION PICTURES

ALHAMBRA
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
COLISEUM
81st STREET
86th STREET
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
58th STREET
Bet. Lex. & 3rd Ave.
HAMILTON
MARBLE HILL
125th STREET
PELHAM
REGENT
RIVERSIDE
ROYAL
23rd STREET
WESTCHESTER
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCHELLE
WHITE PLAINS
YONKERS

NOW RKO

Gripping Psychological Melodrama!
"Cool and Calculated Shocker."—New York Times

HUMPHREY BOGART
ALEXIS SMITH • SYDNEY GREENSTREET
"CONFLICT"
—Plus—
'MAMA LOVES PAPA' with LEON ERROLL

The New Statesman and Nation
England's Leading Weekly Review
may now be obtained through
THE NATION
20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.
Yearly subscription $6.50 including postage
SPECIMEN copy on request

The Nation Index

for volume 160 of The Nation covering the period from January through June, 1945, is now available. This excellent reference aid may be had for 15 cents.

Send your order for the Index with remittance, to

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street New York 7, N. Y.

MOTION PICTURES

"It is worth any dozen run-of-the-studio Academy Award winners."—TIME
David L. Loew presents
The Southerner
From George Sessions Perry's
"HOLD AUTUMN IN YOUR HAND"
Directed by Jean Renoir
BRANDT'S AIR-COOLED
Now Playing GLOBE B'way at 46th St.

Paramount Presents
ED GARDNER'S
"DUFFY'S TAVERN"
FEATURING
32 HOLLYWOOD STARS

IN PERSON
THE ANDREWS SISTERS
Featuring
Tim Herbert
Vic Shoen
And His Recording Orchestra
Foy Willing's
Riders of the Purple Sage
Pig-Meat Alamo
Markham

COOL PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

"Bright and Tuneful" . . .—Barnes, Herald-Tribune
Rodgers and Hammerstein's
STATE FAIR
A 20th Century-Fox Picture In Technicolor
Starring
Dana ANDREWS Jeanne CRAIN Dick HAYMES Vivian BLAINE
On the stage, IN PERSON
CONNEE BOSWELL • CONDOS BROS. • GENE SHELDON
Now Playing ROXY 7th Ave. at 50th St.

"It is a brilliantly composed screen tribute to the courage and perseverence of our fighting men. . . ."
—Crowther, N. Y. Times
General Dwight D. Eisenhower's
THE TRUE GLORY
Distributed by COLUMBIA PICTURES
Now Playing VICTORIA B'way & 46th St.

STAGE PLAY

MICHAEL TODD Presents
UP IN CENTRAL PARK
Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS Lyrics by DOROTHY FIELDS Music by SIGMUND ROMBERG
BROADWAY THEATRE, Broadway & 53rd Street. Matinees Wed. & Sat.
REALLY AIR-CONDITIONED

Music

B. H. HAGGIN

SHAW did no concert-reviewing after his resignation from the World in 1894; but the death of Verdi in 1901 elicited from him the superb article on Verdi's work, and an atrocious performance of "Il Trovatore" in 1917 provoked the equally fine article on that opera, that are included in the volume of his music criticism published by Dodd, Mead in this country. In the general article, having refuted the contention that Verdi had been influenced by Wagner, he proceeded, as he said, to "take Verdi on his own ground. Verdi's genius, like Victor Hugo's, was hyperbolical and grandiose: he expressed all the common passions with an impetuosity and intensity which produced an effect of sublimity." And concerning "Il Trovatore" he observed that it is "unique even among the works of its own composer and its own country. It has tragic power, poignant melancholy, impetuous vigor, and a sweet and intense pathos that never loses its dignity. . . . It is absolutely void of intellectual interest: the appeal is to the instincts and to the senses all through." Which led him to this statement about performance: "Let us admit that no man is bound to take 'Il Trovatore' seriously. We are entirely within our rights in passing it by and turning to Bach and Handel, Mozart and Beethoven, Wagner and Strauss, for our music. But we must take it or leave it: we must not trifle with it. He who thinks that 'Il Trovatore' can be performed without taking it with the most tragic solemnity is, for all the purposes of romantic art, a fool. The production of a revival of 'Il Trovatore' should be supervised by Bergson; for he alone could be trusted to value this perfect work of instinct, and defend its integrity from the restless encroachments of intelligence."

And now imagine this music sung by a singer about whom Shaw wrote in 1894: "Whoever has not seen Miss Eames as Charlotte has not realized the full force of Thackeray's picture of the young lady who, when she saw the remains of her lover

> Borne before her on a shutter,
> Like a well-conducted person,
> Went on cutting bread-and-butter.

I never saw such a well-conducted person as Miss Eames. She casts her propriety like a Sunday frock over the whole stage. . . . Never, since Miss Mary Anderson shed a cold radiance on the rebuked stage, have virtue and comeliness seemed more awful than they do at Covent Garden on 'Werther' nights. How I envy Miss Eames her self-possession, her quiet consciousness of being founded on a rock, her good looks (oh, those calmly regular eyebrows!), and, above all, that splendid middle to her voice, enabling her to fill the huge theater without an effort!"

That combination of music and singer was what I heard recently from an old record on which Eames sang the impassioned Mira d'acerbe lagrime duet in her cool lady-like fashion with de Gogorza; and it was sheer farce which reduced the music to nonsense. Fortunately another record in the pile enabled me to hear the music restored to impressive sense by Gadski and Amato, singing with superb style as well as the beautiful voices they had in their prime. And these two records illustrate an important point, which I would like to state before I go on to speak of some of the other records in the pile—namely, that the talk about the Golden Age of Singing has been undiscriminating: not all the tenors were Carusos, not all the sopranos Hempels. The passage about Eames is one of many in Shaw in which he discusses the now legendary figures who for him were living day-to-day Covent Garden realities; and if he confirms what we have heard about the powers of Calvé he also convinces us that her Carmen was horrible, and reveals that Jean de Reszke shirked his performances except when he had the competition of a Van Dyck to fear, that Edouard de Reszke bawled his head off, that Tamagno did the same, and other things of the sort.

In this connection I might speak of two of the records of the famous soprano Lilli Lehmann that I had heard about for years, and that I was at last able to hear recently through the kindness of Mr. William H. Seltsam, an enthusiast who before the war reissued a large number of early vocal records. In certain respects Lehmann's performances—of Casta Diva from "Norma" and Abscheulicher! from "Fidelio"—lived up to what had been said about them: she had recorded them around 1907, when she was sixty or more, and the beauty and steadiness of the voice in the long opening phrases of Casta Diva, its security in the florid passages, were remarkable; and she sang, moreover, with the style of a great artistic personage. On the other hand it was astonishing to hear what liberties in tempo and phrasing — which today would be considered excessive, and even in bad musical taste—were possible within the limits of good musicianship in 1907. In Casta Diva, for example, after the first two beautifully inflected phrases, Lehmann suddenly rushed up to the climactic high point of the passage, stopped to take breath, and then descended very slowly.

But whatever the liberties that prevailing standards allowed, Hempel had her own unerring feeling for phrase that produced musical as well as vocal perfection. Among the great treasures in the pile of old records that I mentioned before were several of her performances; and it was not only the effortless agility and accuracy but the musical style of the florid passages that made Vien, Diletto from Bellini's "I Puritani" breathtaking. Indeed what moved us all to tears was rather her exquisite inflection of the simple opening statement of Ah, vous dirai-je, maman, and her wonderful extended phrasing of Dite alla giovine from "La Traviata," which she sang with Amato.

These, I repeat, are performances which Victor ought to reissue on a subscription basis; and if you agree with me tell Victor so.

Films

JAMES AGEE

A Great Film

WILLIAM WELLMAN and the others who are responsible for "Story of G. I. Joe" obviously did not regard their job as an ordinary one. They undertook a great subject. It is clear that they undertook it in a determination to handle it honestly and to make a masterpiece. A wonderful amount of their achievement measures up to their intention. If their picture had been made under the best of circumstances, in a time when everyone who had the heart and the talent was free to make the best pictures possible, it would still be among the best. Coming as it does out of a world in which even the best work is nearly always compromised, and into a world which is generally assumed to dread honesty and courage and to despise artistic integrity, it is an act of heroism, and I cannot suggest my regard for it without using such words as veneration and love. Many things in the film itself move me to tears—and in none of them do I feel that I have been deceived, or cynically seduced or manipulated, as one usually has to feel about movies. But not even the finest of the picture's achievements are more moving than the angry, bitter nobility of the intention which is implied behind the whole of it.

The authors of the screen play, Leopold Atlas and Guy Endore and Philip Stevenson, have not only avoided writing a story, in any traditional sense; they have also developed a rather original narrative style, dry, keen, sober, and visually very imaginative. This style seems to be based to some extent on that of Hemingway; but it is freer than some of Hemingway's less good writing of self-pity, over-insistent masculinity, and the musical gift which sometimes blurs even the most beautiful things Hemingway observes into one kind of Irish croon. Many of the scenes end abruptly; some are deliberately deflated or interrupted or made to end flat or tonelessly. All these devices are artful or, if you like, artificial, but on one seeing, anyhow, not one seemed dishonest either aesthetically or morally. It is about as taciturn a picture as I have seen; but not a verbal or speechless stretch in it seems forced or ineffective. Much use is made of a commonplace of good movie making which most American studios reject: that you can show a wave of action, even very complex and cryptic action, more excitingly and instructively rather than less if you don't pause continually to explain it to the audience, and if you don't delete the inexplicable. There is a wonderfully discreet and powerful use, for that matter, of purely "meaningless" bits—such as a shot in which Ernie Pyle (Burgess Meredith) sits by the road while some soldiers straggle past—which have as great meaning as anything could have, being as immediate and as unlimited by thought or prejudice as what the eye might see on the spot, in a casual glance. And visually there are some of the most eloquent and simple things ever put into a movie—the scene, for instance, in which the worn-out captain and the wretched young replacement private, silently and in great tension and shyness, watch and approach each other, and are interrupted by the sudden violent mental breakdown of a third soldier.

Many of the best things in the film are done just as exactly and unemphatically. With a slight shift of time and scene, men whose faces have become familiar simply aren't around any more. The fact is not commented on or in any way pointed; their absence merely creates its gradual vacuum and realization in the pit of the stomach. Things which seem at first tiresome, then to have become too much of a running gag, like the lascivious tongue-clacking of the professional stallion among the soldiers (Wally Cassell) or the Sergeant's continual effort to play the record of his son's voice, are allowed to run their risks without tip-off or apology. In the course of many repetitions they take on full obsessional power and do as much as anything could to communicate the terrific weight of time, fatigue, and half-craziness which the picture is trying so successfully to make you live through. The characters are just as unobtrusively introduced and developed—so quietly, in fact, that it is misleading to speak of "development" in any traditional sense. One of the most terrible things in the movie is the silent uninsistent notice of the change in the face of the youngest of the soldiers, after his first battle, from that of a lonely, brave, frightened boy to something shriveled and poisoned beyond suggesting by words. And the development of the character of the Captain is so imperceptible and so beautifully done that, without ability to wonder why, you accept him as a great man in his one open attempt to talk about himself and the war, and as a virtual divinity in the magnificent scene which focuses on his dead body. This closing scene seems to me a war poem as great and as beautiful as any of Whitman's. One of the glories of the over-all style and tone of the film is its ability to keep itself stopped down so low and so lucid, like a particularly strong and modest kind of prose, and to build a long gently rising arch of increasing purity and intensity, which, without a single concession to "poetic" device, culminates in the absoluteness of that scene.

In a film so excellent there are so many things to honor, and to comment on, that I feel incapable of clearness even on a few, much less of completeness or order. The picture contains, for instance, the first great triumphs of the kind of anti-histrionic casting and acting which I believe is indispensable to most, though by no means all, kinds of greatness possible to movies. It would be impossible in that connection to say enough in praise of the performance of Bob Mitchum as the Captain and Freddie Steele as the Sergeant, or of Wellman for his directing and, I suppose, casting of them. It is also the first great triumph in the effort to combine "fiction" and "documentary" film. That is, it not only makes most of its fiction look and sound like fact—and far more intimate and expressive fact than it is possible to record on the spot; it also, without ever inflating or even disturbing the factual quality, as Eisenstein used to, gives fact the constant power and meaning beyond its own which most "documentors"—and most imaginative artists as well—totally lack feeling for. I don't insist on the word if you feel it is misleading, but most of this film is good poetry, and some of it is great poetry, and all of its achievements, and even most of its failures, are earned in terms purely of moving pictures. The sudden close-up, for instance, of a soldier's loaded back, coldly intricate with the life-and-death implements of his trade, as he marches away from his dead captain, is as complete, moving, satisfying, and enduring as the finest lines of poetry I know.

This is not a faultless movie. Most of its scenes are perfectly and often originally fitted together, but one of the major transitions—between Africa and Italy—is diffuse, generalized, and conventional, and another—the fight for Cassino—remains rather a disappointing and somewhat leaky transition, not the climactic release of energy that was needed and I believe intended. Indeed, though I am aware of my limited right to an opinion, it seems to me that the movie does fail in one important thing: to give adequate direct impressions—indirectly, it gives any number—of the individual's experience of combat. Even when shots from "San Pietro" are used, in the last fight, the reality to the individual does not come through; and when the Captain and the Sergeant outwit German snipers in a ruined church, the episode seems brilliant, highly specialized, and almost literary, rather than something common to the experience of many infantrymen. If people as good as these can't communicate that experience, I am about ready to believe it has been proved inexpressible; but I still wonder what might have been done if during one combat sequence the camera had worked inside some individual as well as outside. Much of the picture is very somber in lighting and slow in movement—it has drawn as intelligently on Mauldin as on Pyle—but some of this darkness seems a little sumptuous and studioesque; and some of the outdoor sets, diligent and good as they are, seem over-prepared, with nothing left to chance, like the groundwork of a first-rate diorama—as if the mud had been churned up inch by inch by union labor, before the actors took over. But these are about the only faults worth mentioning; and if by any chance "Story of G. I. Joe" is not a masterpiece, then however stupid my feeling is, I cannot help resenting those films which are.

I imagine that some people, better educated than the infantrymen in "Story of G. I. Joe," will wish to point out that for all its courage and intelligence "as far as it goes," the film is not, in the sense they understand it, "an indictment of war." Nobody is accused, not even the enemy; no remedy is indicated; and though every foot of the film is as full an indictment of war as I ever expect to see, it is clearly also demonstrating the fact that in war many men go well beyond anything which any sort of peace we have known, or are likely to know, makes possible for them. It seems to me a tragic and eternal work of art, concerned with matters which I know are tragic and which I suspect are as eternal, anyhow, as our use of recent scientific triumphs will permit. Both the film and I may be wrong about this, but I am afraid the burden of proof rests with the optimists.

LEARN RUSSIAN
FOR IMMEDIATE APPLICATION
Practical 33-Week Course under the recognized authority,
DR. E. MARKOFF
Classes held Thursdays, beginning October 11. Scientifically planned and tested method in grammar and useful conversation for beginners and advanced students. Also special normal course for teachers of Russian.
AMERICAN RUSSIAN CULTURAL ASS'N
200 W. 57 St., N. Y. 19, N. Y. CI 5-5377

BOOKS FOUND FREE/
WHAT BOOKS DO YOU WANT?
We quote lowest market prices. No charge for locating Hard-to-Find and Out-of-Print Books. All books OLD or NEW, mailed POST-FREE.
SEARCHLIGHT BOOK NATION
22 East 17th Street, New York City

Courses in MAGAZINE WRITING fiction • non-fiction
The Magazine Institute, a private school owned and operated by successful writers and editors, offers practical, up-to-date training in story and article writing. You work in your own home. Every assignment you send in is returned with detailed criticism.
EXPERT INSTRUCTION. An experienced writer or editor takes you in hand, answering all your questions, helping you find the type of work for which you are naturally suited. Before long you are writing in your own home fiction stories, essays, short sketches, whatever you are best fitted to do.
Send coupon today for free catalog which tells about opportunities in magazine writing.
The Magazine Institute, Inc. Dept. 99-C
Rockefeller Center, New York 20, N. Y.
Please send catalog, without obligation to:
NAME ....
ADDRESS ....
....
(Confidential. No salesman will call.)

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

Veblen vs. Grew

Dear Sirs: As Japan now has the center of the world stage it is worth recalling what a master mind had to say of its leaders and governing class a generation ago. In 1917 Thorstein Veblen referred to Japanese government leaders as "these shrewdest, most callous, and most watchful of all adepts in unashamed statecraft." Compare this with Mr. Grew's statement, on the eve of Pearl Harbor, about the naivete and ingenuousness of the Japanese. Who is the "realist," the scientific scholar or the salon diplomat?

In "The Opportunity of Japan," written in July, 1915, Veblen said: "Japan must strike for domination, if at all, within the effective lifetime of the generation that is now coming to maturity. . . . The imperial government must throw all its imperial force, without reservation, into one headlong rush; since in the nature of the case no second opportunity of the kind is to be looked for." In "Essays in Our Changing Order," Veblen wrote as follows:

> To the Japanese government, or "state," the country, with its human denizens, is an estate to be husbanded and exploited for the state's ends; which comes near saying, for the prestige of the Mikado's government.
>
> In the material respect, the division of interest as between the people at large and the governing class is particularly well marked and well maintained; being indeed a division after the same fashion as that which holds between servant and master in any community that is organized on a servile footing. So that the people at large, the common man, has no appreciable share and no substantial concern in the measures taken by the government agencies, or even in the deliberations of that advisory board of nobility and gentry that has, under the constitution, been installed under the rubric "parliament." In effect, the people at large are the government's chattels, to be bred, fed, trained, and consumed as the shrewd economy of dynastic politics may best require. . . . The government established by the revolution (against the Shogunate) or "restoration" of Meiji (i. e., the supersession of the Shogun by the Emperor) is of the nature of an autonomous co-optative bureaucracy, made up of certain lines and cliques of the nobility (to some extent of a bureaucratic origin) backed by the loyal adhesion of a large body of gentry which differs from the displaced samurai in its work-day avocations rather than in its spirit of aristocratic fealty or its substantially parasitic livelihood. . . . Power vests in a self-appointed, self-authenticating, aristocratic cabinet—under the mask of a piously nourished monarchical fiction—with the advice, but without the consent, of a "parliament" endowed with advisory power.

THOMAS J. BARNUM

New York, August 14

Not at All "Blighted"

Dear Sirs: Under the heading Northwest Recaptured, in your August 18 issue, Jerome Mellquist refers to Superior, Wisconsin, as "that blighted ore port at the head of the Lakes."

"Blighted" is a most inaccurate description of the largest iron-ore shipping port, with the largest iron-ore dock, in the world. These are the facts: approximately one-third of the iron ore shipped annually on the Great Lakes is from Superior, Wisconsin; 25,939,951 tons were shipped in 1944, and that was not a record year. The largest grain elevator and the largest briquet plant in the world are also located at Superior. We hope that your contributor's reckless use of an adjective reflecting on an American city will be properly corrected.

A. J. WENTZEL,
Superior Association of Commerce
Superior, Wis., September 1.

The Spanish Opposition

[The document printed below was wired from Mexico City with the request that it be published in The Nation so that the position of the groups which supported Dr. Negrín in the recent political crisis might be clearly understood by the friends of republican Spain in the United States.]

THE parties and organizations signing this document were astonished at the statement in which Señor Giral, Premier of the Spanish Republic, announced the formation of his government. At a moment of such vital importance to the Spanish Republic we would have remained silent—although silence is sometimes itself a form of collaboration—if Señor Giral's statement had not contained an assertion that demands immediate clarification.

Señor Giral placed the responsibility for his failure to form a true national coalition government, the first task with which he had been charged by the President of the Republic, on certain persons, parties, and groups.

First of all we must reject the insinuation that the only republican elements that remained outside the new government are "Negrín and the Communists." If the statement was made by Giral only because of his anxiety to offer a "satisfactory" explanation simultaneously with the release of his list of new Cabinet members, we can only regret the lack of serenity that motivated this action. If, however, the underlying motive was to identity Dr. Negrín with the Communist Party position, the insinuation is as false and unjust as the analogous assertions circulated through the world by the enemies of the Republic during the Spanish War.

The groups that refused participation in the Cabinet did so with a full sense of responsibility. As Spaniards and Republicans they have been inspired by the imperative necessity of continuing the policy of resistance that has characterized the heroic struggle of the Spanish people for freedom and democracy. This policy is represented in the person of Negrín. As head of the last republican government in Spain, he maintained his policy of resistance both during and after the war. The person who gave and the person who received the commission to form the government [President Martinez Barrio and Señor Giral] acknowledged the need of that policy by their efforts to secure the participation of Dr. Negrín in the new Cabinet.

The signatories of this document declined to collaborate with a government not headed by Dr. Negrín because of this major consideration. According to the Spanish constitution it is the Prime Minister who directs the entire policy of the government. It is not a question of individual ministries but of the head of the government. Therefore it was our firm belief that Dr. Negrín's political significance would have been neutralized had his name appeared with those of the persons now in the Cabinet—very honorable men but some of them representing a policy utterly different from and even contrary to those we consider indispensable at this moment. The conjunction of such different policies would have served no purpose and would have nullified and rendered fruitless any government action. That is why we decided to remain outside the Cabinet. As Spaniards and republicans we shall applaud any success that the new government can achieve for the benefit of the Republic. We shall not share responsibility for its failures.

(Signed) Spanish Socialist Party — Ramón Lamoneda; Communist Party—Vicente Uribe; Unión General de Trabajadores de España—José Rodriguez Vega; Republican Federalist Party—Eugenio Arauz; Unified Socialist Party of Catalonia—José Moix; Federation of Socialist Regional Groups—Angel Galarza; Basque National Action—Tomas Etxabe; Workers' Alliance of Asturias — Jesús Ibañez.

CONTRIBUTORS

IRWIN EDMAN is professor of philosophy at Columbia University. Among his books are "Philosopher's Holiday" and "Four Ways of Philosophy."

ALBERT GUERARD, professor of comparative and general literature at Stanford University, is the author of "Europe Free and United."

T. A. BISSON is the author of "Japan in China," "America's Far Eastern Policy," and the forthcoming "Japan's Wartime Economy."

CLEMENT GREENBERG is The Nation's art critic.

The March of Events at Your Fingertips

FACTS·ON·FILE

World News Digest and Index

Every important fact, speech and event for each year since 1941 condensed and cross-indexed for ready reference. Covers 12 major fields. Enables you to discard your stacks of clippings. Invaluable for writers, teachers, students, speakers and executives. Attractively bound volumes for 1941-2-3-4 at $20 ea. For FREE sample and complete data, write FACTS-ON-FILE, Dept. N, 516 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK CITY

CITY COLLEGE
OF NEW YORK
EVENING SESSION
ADULT EDUCATION PROGRAM OFFERS
32
ONE YEAR SCHOLARSHIPS
sponsored by BROWNIE'S
BLOCKPRINTS, Inc.
Creators of BROWNIE GREETING CARDS
For the course
DESIGNING
AND ILLUSTRATING GREETING CARDS
AND OTHER ART COURSES
For all information, write before October 1st, to CITY COLLEGE OF NEW YORK
ADULT EDUCATION PROGRAM
Convent Avenue and 139th Street
New York 31 - New York

WE CALL TO YOUR ATTENTION
the fourth number of INTERIM
VOLUME ONE

A literary magazine born during war, INTERIM now promises to be, and in many quarters here and abroad, is accepted as, the most representative and genuine literary quarterly of our time.

Complete sets of Volume I are still available. INTERIM is issued at one dollar and fifty cents a year and forty cents a copy. We know you will find it a good investment in an integral part of our nation's culture.

INTERIM
1536 Shenandoah Drive,
Seattle 2, Wash.

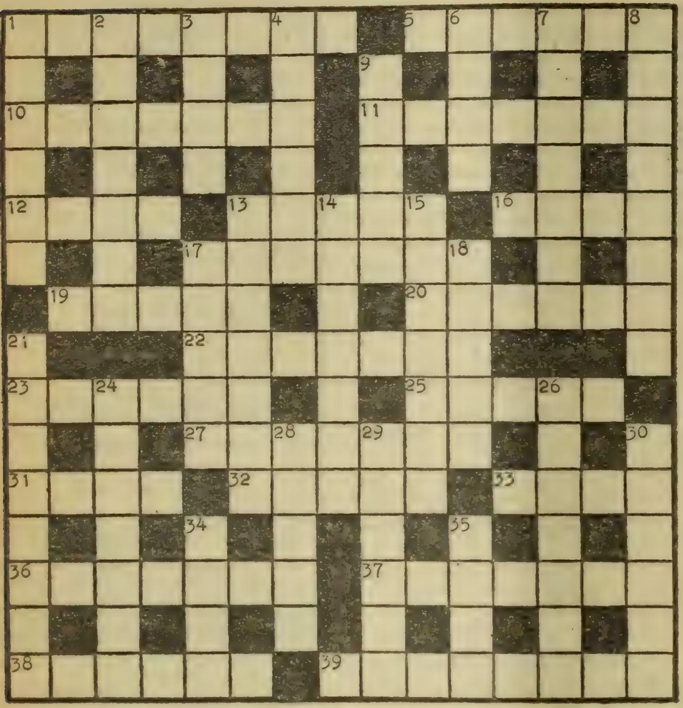
Name...

Address..

City..

Crossword Puzzle No. 126

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 Object of De Soto's quest
5 Wall plaster
10 A redoubtable warrior
11 "As large as life, and twice as - - - - - - -"
12 Key to where the notes are to be found
13 Though feathered they are not birds, but usually belong to birds
16 Associated with a book and a candle in literature
17 Sure!
19 Grotesque caper
20 Floating, like water-lily pads
22 He reduces the number of hide-bound animals
23 She wrote Little Women
25 Taffy's nationality
27 Waldteufel waltz
31 Sculls, or their users
32 Donkeys definitely are 33 Penang-lawyer
36 Thinks up
37 Frame of a table
38 Mr. Hemingway, perhaps
39 They are always moaning about their troubles for our entertainment

DOWN

1 Draw charmingly
2 Underground prison cell
3 Underdone
4 Ball-player who should keep the catcher busy
6 Drams of spirits
7 The "Ambling Alp" of the prize ring
8 Not what seamen's waterproofs are made of 9 Feminine name
13 Not the sort of party we should want to attend as the guest of honor
14 Delightful surprise which would affect the hardest heads
15 Muscled
17 Tombs
18 Nostrils
21 One unsympathetic to Esau?
24 A house on wheels
26 Mr. Attlee's in the U.S.A.—in Washington, to be precise 28 Lift up
29 Found only in flowers and heaven
30 Takes the edge off
34 Not all of them are taverns
35 Leading man

◆

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 125

ACROSS:—1 PICKTHANK; 6 DWARF; 9 ASSAILS; 10 MUFFLER; 11 TAI; 12 INTONE; 13 TAIL; 15 PASTORAL; 16 DOGLEG; 18 ON TIME; 20 COVERLET; 23 IVAN; 24 BODEGA; 25 BEN; 28 CREAKLE; 29 TODDLER; 30 SAYON; 31 PARTRIDGE.

DOWN:—1 PLANT; 2 CASSIUS; 3 THIS IS ON ME; 4 ALSATIAN; 5 KIMONO; 6 DOFF; 7 ALL-HAIL; 8 FIRELIGHT; 14 ROPE LADDER; 15 PROVINCES; 17 POLESTAR; 19 TRAGEDY; 21 LABELED; 22 BO-PEEP; 26 NURSE; 27 SKIN.

RESORTS

The Oaks
ELBERON, N. J.
Enjoy all outdoor sports, excellent tennis, ocean bathing, delicious cuisine, in this American plan country estate. On Highway 4N, only 50 miles from N.Y.C. (Jersey Central or Pennsylvania R.R. direct to Elberon.)
Long Branch 2433

Year 'Round in the ADIRONDACKS
ESTATE providing exquisite natural charm for informal gracious living.
CRYSTAL LAKE—a 60-acre natural spring-fed lake, entirely within the property of 800 acres, surounded by rich woodland with magnificent mountain views.
Accommodations in Lodge and Cottages (steam heated), Boathouse, Tennis, Riding, Fishing. Golf nearby. Excellent Cuisine.
5½ hrs. from Grand Central Station
Rates: Lodge $75, Cottage $50 Wk.
CRYSTAL LAKE LODGE
Chestertown, N. Y.
N.Y.C.—MU 5-0498
I. H. KESSLER
Chestertown 2491

50 MI. FROM NEW YORK
MAMANASCO Lake Lodge
Ridgefield, Conn. Phone 820
A resort of distinction fashioned from a country estate. Water sports, hiking trails, tennis. Library, open fireplaces. Congenial atmosphere. Famous cuisine.

Timberland
POTTERSVILLE, N. Y.
AN ADULT CAMP IN THE ADIRONDACKS
LIMITED TO 100
OPEN UNTIL SEPTEMBER 23
ALL SPORTS • PRIVATE LAKE
DANCING • LECTURES • CONCERTS
N. Y. OFFICE: 33 W. 42nd St. LOngacre 5-3674
The Rare Charm of an Intimate Congenial Group

SHADYBROOK
MAHOPAC, N. Y. Tel. Mahopac 2320
50 miles from N. Y. 140 acres rustic country, secluded, restful, homelike. Unexcelled American cuisine. Sports. Movies. Beautiful walks. Mrs. G. Popper
Reduced September rates. Open for Holy Days.

The Fieldstone
On Round Island Lake
A place of unexcelled beauty for rest and relaxation. One hour from New York
ALL SPORTS — OPEN ALL YEAR
MONROE, N. Y. Phone 7965

OAKWOOD
NEW WINDSOR, N. Y. Newburgh 4477
Delightful...swimming & boating on private lake.
Different...the colonial atmosphere.
Delicious...our unexcelled cuisine.
Diverting...recordings for listening & dancing.
All this only 53 miles from New York City
A Resort for Adults Only

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 161 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • SEPTEMBER 22, 1945 NUMBER 12

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 269

EDITORIALS

Why Help England? 272
Unregenerate Japan 273

ARTICLES

The New Reservationists by I. F. Stone 274
The Tragedy of German Labor by Saul K. Padover 276
The Constitutional Debate in France by Frédéric Pottecher 280
Norsemen's Return by H. Irgens Larsen 282
Danger! Venereal Disease by Albert Deutsch 284
Question Mark Over London by Aylmer Vallance 285
How St. Louis Got the News by Willard Shelton 286
In the Wind 287

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Christianity and Revolution by Hannah Arendt 288
Briefer Comment 289
Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling 292

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 294

CROSSWORD PUZZLE NO. 127, by Jack Barrett 296

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor J. KING GORDON
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Editor Political War Section
J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor J. MITCHELL MORSE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates
LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS
CAREY MCWILLIAMS REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1945, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

EVERYONE KNEW THE LABOR POT WAS BOILING under the lid of war-time controls. Now the lid is off, and steam is pouring out in the form of wage demands and strike threats. Those who pretend to be shocked might remember that labor has never accepted the justice of the Little Steel formula, however modified, and that strikes were inhibited for patriotic reasons rather than reasons of self-interest. What should have been done was to anticipate the troubles that are now about to explode. Labor's own proposals for orderly reconversion in major war industries should have been considered instead of being brushed aside. The Full Employment bill should have been pushed through so that plans to take up the slack of jobless workers would now be ready to apply. Federal legislation for unemployment insurance to tide war workers over the reconversion period should now be on the books instead of in committee. Today the country is unprepared to meet the industrial crisis precipitated by the abrupt ending of the Pacific war. The result is likely to be a new war, this time a domestic industrial one. As we go to press, the coming conflict in the automobile industry is still in the sparring stage. The 30-per-cent wage increase demanded by the United Automobile Workers will almost certainly be rejected by General Motors, which has been selected as the first battleground. The union will thereupon demand a strike vote in accordance with the provisions of the Connally act. Then the issue will be clearly joined, and an attempt will be made to win a decision through pressure, bargaining, and an appeal to public opinion.

*

IN MANY WAYS THE TIMING OF THE FIGHT is unfavorable for the workers. With hundreds of thousands of men being laid off in war industries all over the country, a wage demand faces enormous obstacles. But it is important, none the less, for the union to attempt to establish its position before wage-and-hour standards crumble and union ranks are hopelessly depleted by unemployment. That position has been effectively stated by officials of the U. A. W. and also by Philip Murray, speaking for the steel workers. Both insist on the enormous profit margins achieved by the war industries as contrasted with the savings possible, at war-time price levels, to the workers. The U. A. W. points out, in defense of its demands, that the companies are already cushioned by price increases granted in 1941 and 1942 against the impact of new wage rises. Rejecting management's claim that if the 30-per-cent increases are allowed the price of cars will have to go up accordingly, the union is prepared to show that the increase can be absorbed and still leave the companies a good profit. It recommends, in fact, stricter price controls in order to stimulate car buying and thus keep up production levels. These claims and counterclaims will be thoroughly aired during the weeks of controversy that lie ahead. But if they are to result in a workable program of industrial development, it is essential that the government take the positive measures already under consideration to build a full-employment economy and mitigate the effect of temporary dislocations.

* * *

GENERAL WEDEMEYER'S PLAN FOR EMPLOYING American troops to garrison several important Chinese cities—including Peiping and Tientsin—"to assist in bringing order to the occupied areas" implies direct intervention in China's civil conflict in behalf of Chiang Kai-shek. While Chiang has been able to reassert his authority in the Yangtze valley and the Canton area of South China, he has no troops and little influence north of the Yellow River. Peiping is reported to be still in the hands of Japanese puppet troops. The entire area both north and south of the former Chinese capital has long been under the control of the resistance forces organized by Yenan. General Wedemeyer has already announced plans to ferry Kuomintang troops to Peiping in American planes; his desire to use American troops as an additional occupying force apparently arises from the discovery that Kuomintang troops alone cannot stand off the resistance forces. Presumably well-equipped American troops could hold the city, much as the Japanese have held it, despite the numerical superiority of the guerrillas. The impropriety of using American men drafted to defend their country against Axis aggression for bolstering Chiang Kai-shek's unpopular regime does not seem to have occurred to General Wedemeyer or Ambassador Hurley. Washington, however, is reported to be still "studying" Wedemeyer's request for additional troops. We wonder how much study would be necessary if the parents, wives, and friends of the men selected for this assignment would begin asking their Congressmen questions about this new "Archangel" expedition.

* * *

THE NAVY HAS ANNOUNCED ITS INTENTION of setting up a magnificent target for whatever new engines of destruction may beset us in future years. Through the chairmen of the two Congressional committees on naval affairs, navy planners have set forth their objectives: a peacetime fleet of 1,079 vessels, including 18 battleships, 3 42,000-ton aircraft carriers, 24 Essex-class (27,000-ton) carriers, ten light (11,000-ton) carriers, 79 escort carriers; permanent personnel of more than half a million officers and men; progressive replacement of obsolescent ships and equipment; and—oh, yes—research in and development of new weapons. One may be pardoned for feeling that the program is perhaps a little grandiose; one might inquire gently, "Where, gentlemen, do you propose using this Gargantua? Against whom? In what cause? And had you heard of the atomic bomb? The pilotless explosive missile? The radar-directed explosive? The land-based high-altitude bomber with the 5,000-mile range, already obsolete?" As I. F. Stone pointed out in another connection recently in these columns, the brass hats remain undaunted. The mentality which could produce such a plan was neatly reflected in Admiral McCain's remark just before his tragic death: "Give me the fast carrier force and you can have the atomic bomb." The same mentality produced the Maginot Line and the disaster at Pearl Harbor. It is the mentality which always plans for the next war in terms of the last, the mentality which says aloud, "Good enough for pappy, good enough for me," the mentality which, if unchecked, will produce in a decade or two a disaster of far greater consequence than Pearl Harbor.

* * *

SECRETARY ICKES'S WARNING TO THE PHILIPPINE government that it had better purge itself of collaborationists before it gets on with elections comes just seven weeks after The Nation carried the first story of the post-liberation role of reactionaries and collaborationists in Manila. It seemed quite apparent that this undemocratic development was taking place with the approval, if not the open sponsorship, of the American army authorities; in fact, many active guerrilla leaders who had fought the Japanese throughout the occupation but whose opinions happened to be left were languishing in jail. Mr. Ickes's sharp challenge has already had its effect, and the elections are to be postponed. But Mr. McNutt, as the newly appointed High Commissioner, will have no easy task in assisting in the rebirth of Philippine democracy. The collaborators have worked their way back into positions of high authority, they have the active support of the Islands' economic feudal overlords, and the democratic forces are weak and scattered. A beginning has been made, however, and we are glad to see that our scrappy Secretary of the Interior has shown where Washington stands in this basic fight for independence.

* * *

THE SECRECY THAT SURROUNDED THE POTSDAM Conference may explain how an interesting item of news failed to reach the correspondents. The Nation has just learned that before the resolution on Spain was finally formulated by the Big Three, Stalin asked that the United States and Great Britain completely break off diplomatic relations with Franco: this seemed to be called for by the resolution presented to San Francisco by Ambassador Luis Quintanilla of Mexico, which barred Spain from the United Nations organization. Such a course would have established in fact a united policy on Spain among the major powers, since Russia has consistently refused to have anything to do with the puppet fascist regime that somehow has survived the general débâcle of fascism in Europe. Apart from wanting a united policy based on the San Francisco statement, Stalin is said to be motivated by a concern over the activities of the Nazis who have found refuge in Franco's sanctuary. Recently American correspondents have reported that the German exiles, now fully recovered from V-E Day shock, have been arrogantly boasting in the coffee-houses of their plans for the future. There are reliable stories of the reorganization of German espionage and propaganda services in Spain, of agents in constant touch with South America, particularly Argentina, and of newly built terroristic groups operating over a wide area between Barcelona and Lisbon. The Germans are also pressing for the reopening of their schools, which had been fully Nazified during the Hitler period. Apparently the old teachers are at their posts, ready to take up where they left off. Stalin was obviously fully justified in demanding a complete diplomatic break with Franco. It would be interesting to know who was responsible for substituting words for action.

*

MEANWHILE, THE SPANISH REPUBLICAN GOVERNment in Exile, through the secretary of the Basque delegation in London, has submitted a note to the Council of Ministers formally requesting recognition in place of the Franco government. Obviously, this must be the primary objective of the new Republican Cabinet; it must win substantial diplomatic support or relinquish power to a more effective and representative group. But the action in London was at least partly neutralized by an astonishing statement made at a press conference in New York by Fernando de los Rios, the new Foreign Minister. Dr. de los Rios did not support his government's request for recognition. Instead he urged the Big Five to demand that Franco release political prisoners, allow a free press, and recognize democratic rights in Spain. Does this mean that if Franco acceded to these demands, à la Argentina, the Republican Foreign Minister would be prepared to forgo restoration of the Republic? If not, what does it mean? In view of his government's action in London we can only suppose that Dr. de los Rios spoke carelessly and out of turn.

*

BUT WHILE DIPLOMATS WRANGLE OVER SPAIN'S political fate, the human fate of thousands of Spanish democratic fighters is left to the uncertain mercy of voluntary relief. In France there are still perhaps 150,000 Spanish Republican veterans and their families stranded without any kind of organized support. Many of the men have been fighting in the democratic ranks since 1936—actively, as part of the French, British, and American armies, or in the FFI. Today they are men without a country; not even the UNRRA is permitted to help them. They and their civilian compatriots are without clothing, medicines, food, jobs. More than 20,000 ill Republican soldiers, recently returned to France from German war-prisoner camps, are on the waiting list of a hospital in Toulouse, which can do nothing for them unless it receives money and supplies. On Monday, September 24, the Spanish Refugee Appeal is holding a mass-meeting at Madison Square Garden in New York to raise funds for the Spanish Republicans in France; these funds will be distributed by the Unitarian Service Committee. We urge all readers who can possibly do so to attend the rally and those who cannot to contribute directly to the Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee at 192 Lexington Avenue, New York.

*

ARGENTINA, LIKE SPAIN AND OTHER SATELLITES of the defeated Axis, will not benefit from the lifting of export restrictions recently announced by the FEA. It will, in effect, be ostracized from the post-war trade expansion upon which it had counted to strengthen its shaky economy. Nor is the political situation any steadier. Last week Foreign Minister (for less than a month) Juan Isaac Cooke resigned because of "ill health"—possibly induced by a conversation with Spruille Braden which the latter termed the most constructive one he had during his stay in Buenos Aires. Less heartening was the fact that the Supreme Court, which many Argentines had hoped would serve as an interim government, has declared itself lacking in authority to withdraw recognition from the Perón regime and to govern the country itself. It had been petitioned to do so by the presidents, deans, and faculties of leading universities and by other pro-democratic groups. Accordingly the Argentines will have to find some other way of removing Perón, and it may be less pleasant. The nation-wide lawyers' strike, the resumption of classes in the University of Buenos Aires by secondary-school teachers dismissed last month on account of pro-democratic activities, the strike of transportation workers in Buenos Aires, and the defection of several powerful unions from the government-dominated C. G. T. to the pro-democratic U. O. L. (Local Labor Union) show the rising temper of the people. Last week the government closed U. O. L. headquarters and arrested six members in a desperate effort to stem the flow of unions into that organization, which has declared it will call a twenty-four-hour general strike "when circumstances advise."

*

OUR NATIVE FASCISTS HAVE PLANS FOR veterans and are busy setting out the bait. They count on doing a rushing business if and when mass unemployment builds up among veterans a mass resentment against society. Some of these plans were brought to the attention of the House Committee on Un-American Affairs last week in a letter signed by Edward J. McHale, executive secretary of the American Veterans' Committee. He wanted certain organizations looked into because of their sponsorship and, in some cases, their stated aims. Here are a few:

- The Servicemen's Reconstruction League, sponsor Joe McWilliams;
- The Nationalist Veterans of World War II, sponsor Gerald L. K. Smith;
- The Protestant War Veterans, sponsor Edward J. Smythe;
- The American Order of Patriots, Houston, Texas, labeled for Gentiles only;
- The St. Sebastian Brigade, sponsor Father Charles E. Coughlin;
- The Military Order of the Liberty Bell, anti-Negro, anti-foreign.

Mr. McHale suggests that "unless their true aims are exposed to public scrutiny, many service men may unwittingly fall prey at home to the same principles and forces they fought against abroad."

*

IN A RECENT DECISION THE UNITED STATES Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, by extracting the fangs of the Merchants and Manufacturers Association of Los Angeles, has finally concluded a fifty-year struggle for industrial democracy in Southern California. Founded in 1894, the M & M has for years been one of the most powerful open-shop organizations in the nation. It was the enactment of an anti-picketing ordinance, drafted and sponsored by the M & M, that precipitated a period of industrial violence in Los Angeles which culminated in the dynamiting of the Los Angeles Times on the evening of October 1, 1910. Indeed, the M & M has a long and ugly record. It has engaged in extensive industrial espionage, financed anti-labor employers, imported strike breakers, employed professional gunmen, trained employees to resist the trade-union movement, and inspired the formation of countless company unions. Under the terms of the decree upheld by the Ninth Circuit Court, the M & M and its affiliates, Southern Californians, Inc., The Neutral Thousands (TNT), and the Employers' Advisory Service, are permanently restrained from interfering with the formation of labor unions or contributing support to labor organizations, and the M & M is required to notify all its members, contributors, and supporters that it has terminated these and similar activities. The decision closes one chapter in industrial relations in Los Angeles and opens another. Los Angeles will never again be the "white spot," "the open-shop citadel," of America. The hearings in the M & M case, embodied in a transcript of twenty-one volumes with a thousand exhibits, consumed seven months. The trade-union movement of Los Angeles owes a deep debt of gratitude to David Sokol, formerly attorney for the National Labor Relations Board, for his vigorous prosecution of the government's case against this bastion of reaction.

*

DEATH TO UNION ORGANIZERS HAS BEEN threatened by the mayor of Reform, Alabama. He recently told J. F. Hynds, executive council member of the Southern Tenant Farmers' Union, that "someone would be found dead" unless the union were broken up at once. The local police chief has served notice that he will take the law into his own hands and do the job himself if the union is not disbanded. For some time the union has been sending its members to work on seasonal jobs outside the town. Apparently the mayor and some local employers object. For on August 23, shortly after several members left to work in a New Jersey canning plant, a union officer was summoned by the police chief to appear in the mayor's office. When he did so, threats of violence were made by the mayor and the police chief. A sawmill operator who was present joined in, saying, "If any more Negroes leave here, we are coming after you." The good white folk of the town are understandably attached to their low-paid Negro workers, and naturally they don't want them coming home with fancy ideas about freedom and decent wages. Since federal and state laws protecting unions apparently don't operate in Reform, the Workers' Defense League has urged United States Attorney General Clark, to restore civil liberties there.

*

FOR SOME MONTHS THE MEXICAN COMMITTEE Against Racism, with headquarters in Mexico City, has been conducting an aggressive campaign to expose discrimination against persons of Mexican descent in the state of Texas. Recently the committee charged that insultingly discriminatory practices had been found to exist in 150 Texas towns, notably in New Braunfels, Pecos, Snyder, Spur, and Melvin. The reaction to these charges in Texas has been amusingly ambivalent. After making a blanket denial of them, the New Braunfels Herald explains that "the so-called discrimination practiced in Texas is based not on race but on cleanliness and behavior; segregation is not discrimination." And the manager of the New Braunfels Chamber of Commerce is quoted by the San Antonio Light as saying: "We do not have discrimination for reasons of race or religion. The only discrimination which we practice is for social reasons and for reasons of healthfulness." It would seem that Texas has unwittingly entered a plea of "guilty" to the charges and should now be sentenced. Perhaps the United States should send an army of occupation to the Texas border counties and annul, by proclamation, these odious Nürnberg practices which deny persons of Mexican descent, many of them citizens of the United States, access to stores, restaurants, and places of amusement. The disingenuous defense entered by the state of Texas to the charges constitutes the best proof that segregation is per se discriminatory. While continuing to press its charges, the Committee Against Racism has tactfully announced that it "knows very well that the North American people are not racists and that only the most backward sections of the United States have a mentality like that which predominated in Europe during the Nazi domination."

Why Help England?

IT SEEMS to us that the first point to be kept in mind in the current Anglo-American conference on a substitute for Lend-Lease is that the cost of reconstructing the homes and economies of our allies must be counted as part of the cost of the war. Ethically, as the one member of the United Nations coalition which was enriched by the war, we ought to shoulder a large share of that cost. Politically, we have as big a stake in the reconstruction of Britain as in that of Western Europe and the U. S. S. R. In the long view their return to health is essential if they are to play their respective roles in a coalition strong enough to prevent a German revanche until we have had time to bring a new generation and a new point of view to birth there. A wise and far-seeing estimate of future political possibilities also dictates a generous course, lest the impoverished European allies be brought together by envy and resentment against the one power which, for the second time in a generation, has benefited financially by a world war.

If ethical imperatives and political acumen fail to move us, let us at least recognize economic necessities. Economic isolation is even less feasible for us than political isolation. A restored and expanding world market is essential to our prosperity and political stability. Our very wealth of productive resources, given the unplanned and anarchic character of American capitalism, makes us more dependent than most industrial countries on the shifting tides of the world market. We have most to lose from the deflation and disorganization of that market. With our war-expanded capacity to produce, we must boost our foreign trade to higher levels than ever before if we are to achieve anything like full employment at home. If the world market is free and expanding, full employment can be attained at home with a minimum of interference with so-called "free enterprise." The decline of the world market would progressively widen the extent of governmental interference and direction necessary for full employment.

The abrupt shutting off of Lend-Lease was critical for Britain; it may prove equally critical for us. In the past our trade has risen or fallen with the volume of our international lending. The precipitous drop in American exports from 1929 to 1932 exactly paralleled the sharp drop in American loans. There was a similar parallel movement in the slump of 1937-38, which only a new world war prevented from developing into a new world depression. But those declines dwindle in importance beside the sudden ending of a system by which we made available $44 billion in purchasing power to our allies in the short space of four years. It was Lend-Lease which boosted our export trade last year to three times the 1929 level. Sixty-two per cent of our cotton, to take but one example, was sold abroad under Lend-Lease. The sudden wiping out of so huge a market is a serious matter for American industry and agriculture, and in the absence of an adequate substitute we may find ourselves on an economic toboggan slide.

There is a shrewd observation in the report by the Senate's Post-War Planning Committee, "The Problem of Postwar Employment and the Role of Congress in Solving It." The committee said, "The mass purchasing power necessary to maintain a healthy mass production must come from the American people in purchases of consumer and capital goods. If it does not come from them, mass production cannot be maintained except through subsidized exports and a governmentally supported public-works program" (our italics). The war experience showed that all three are necessary on a huge and unprecedented scale to assure full employment of our vast potential in men and machines. But the fact is that ever since becoming a creditor country in the First World War, we have preferred, by one means or another, to subsidize exports rather than lower our tariff walls and accept goods in payment. The $17 billion we lent our allies in the First World War, the $17 billion of private foreign lending during the '20's, the $17 billion we spent buying gold from abroad in the '30's, were all disguised forms of export subsidy. The biggest was Lend-Lease, which totaled $44 billion. In each case the fact that these subventions not only kept our factories busy but enabled us to expand them constituted our repayment. Reconstruction grants or loans without interest will differ in only one essential from these devices of the past.

The essential difference is not that we are asking Britain and other Allied countries to establish "freer" trade as a condition for subventions of this kind. The difference is that Britain is in no mood to borrow much from us unless it is assured that we will take the steps necessary to rationalize and expand world trade. The first requires a willingness on our part to permit repayment in goods; to buy as much as we sell abroad. The second requires a determination to take the steps necessary to maintain full employment at home. For if the United States, which now provides half the world market, is prosperous, the rest of the world will be prosperous without resort to currency depreciation, export quotas, imperial preferences, or systems of blocked accounts. It is we, with our towering tariff walls and export bounties, who have sinned most against free trade. As former Secretary Morgenthau wrote in the New York Herald Tribune the other day, "The problem is not to browbeat or cajole the British into embracing the system we desire, but simply to make it feasible for them to participate in it." Britain was our best customer before the war. The Empire group forms one-fourth the world market. Their reconstruction and participation in an expanding world economy are as important to us as to them, and the cost is far less than the cost of another world depression.

Unregenerate Japan

GENERAL MAC ARTHUR'S orders abolishing the Imperial General Headquarters, clamping a censorship on the domestic press, closing the Domei news agency, suppressing the Black Dragon Society, and rounding up a number of the principal war criminals are rightly being hailed as necessary acts for cleaning out Japanese militarism. But it is difficult to reconcile these apparently sincere efforts to eradicate militarism with the opening of American publicity channels to the most insidious kind of Japanese propaganda, designed to confuse the American public and weaken our occupation policies. For the past week or so American newspaper readers have been fed a steady diet of statements from Japanese militarists, politicians, and industrialists in which each has sought to dissociate himself completely from responsibility for the war and its calamitous consequences for Japan. It appears from these statements that not a single Japanese leader—Togo, Tojo, Konoye, Suzuki, or any important industrialist—desired war. There suddenly seems to be an utter absence of militarists in Japan.

While the average American undoubtedly reads these protestations of innocence with a considerable amount of skepticism, few newspaper readers have sufficient knowledge of Japan to sift the false from the true. The net result can hardly fail to be what the Japanese intended—confusion about our occupation policies. When Tojo declared, before his attempted suicide, that history would absolve him of responsibility for starting the war, few Americans were taken in. But when Prince Konoye represented himself as a constant seeker for peace and declared that if he had been permitted to talk with the late President Roosevelt he could, with the Emperor's help, have avoided war, his statement had a degree of plausibility. For not many persons remember the clever manner in which the myth of Konoye's "liberalism" was used as a cloak to conceal the military's plans for the attacks on China and the United States. A month after the first of the supposedly moderate Konoye governments took office, the war against China was launched. The second Konoye government entered into a formal military alliance with Germany and Italy, and the third government was in power when plans were laid for the attack on Pearl Harbor.

Even more deceitful are the protestations of the industrialists. In a special dispatch to the New York Times George B. Jones attributes Japan's downfall to the "incessant friction" between Japanese militarists and business men, and quotes a Japanese industrialist as declaring that freedom of speech is essential to liberate business from the cruel clutches of the military. Other industrialists have been given space in our press to plead for American assistance to rebuild the industry destroyed by our bombing. At a five-course steak dinner sponsored by leading members of the Zaibatsu, American correspondents were told that without American aid large-scale unemployment would develop, which might "lead to dangerous thoughts, such as socialism." Obviously, there is a certain amount of truth in the industrialists' complaints against the militarists. Some rivalry among the various Japanese factions making up the ruling group did exist. But what the American public will not learn from these skilfully dressed up dispatches from Tokyo is that the industrialists and political leaders played as active a role as the militarists in planning Japan's bid for world mastery. Nor can they be expected to know that many of the wartime restrictions which the industrialists now blame on the militarists were in reality sponsored by the Zaibatsu to strengthen their hold on the Japanese economy and lay the basis for an imperialist expansion of their power. While the spokesmen of the Zaibatsu and the pre-war political leaders are filling American newspaper columns with their carefully prepared handouts, the truth about the role of these groups in Japan's war preparations never appears in the press because the oligarchy alone has access to American correspondents.

It is difficult to say who is more to blame for permitting the Japanese ruling group to pour this propaganda into the American press—MacArthur, the correspondents, or our newspaper editors. Since the press rarely exercises self-restraint in such matters, the chief responsibility apparently rests with the occupation authorities. They have clamped down on Domei, whose chief crime seems to have been that it scooped the American press on several occasions, but have done nothing to stop the propaganda flow at its source. It will be recalled that the same situation arose in Germany, but that after Göring had taken advantage of American press facilities to present his case before the world the American military authorities clamped down on all interviews with German war leaders.

The misleading picture of Japanese war guilt which is being foisted on the American public is the more dangerous because General MacArthur is apparently personally unaware of the role which the Zaibatsu and the so-called moderates played in the preparations for Japan's bid for world domination. Not a single industrialist, financier, or party leader is listed among the forty war criminals whose arrest has been demanded of the Japanese government. In defending himself against the accusation that his occupation policies so far had been "soft," MacArthur rightly pointed out that some caution is necessary until the military phases of the occupation are further developed. But the anxiety which has arisen over MacArthur's policies concerns the direction rather than the speed of his actions. Undoubtedly some of Japan's war criminals will face Allied justice. But punishment of a few individuals will be meaningless as long as the feudal social and economic structure that bred Japanese militarism is allowed to remain intact.

The New Reservationists

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, September 14

THE strategy of the fight against the Full Employment bill is the strategy of the fight against the League of Nations. There is one relevant difference between Henry Cabot Lodge and Robert A. Taft. Lodge at one time in his life favored some kind of League to enforce peace.

Taft's is the more consistent record. The senior partner in Cincinnati's leading corporation-law firm has always believed, and continues to believe, that full employment is not only incompatible with a capitalist system but undesirable under one. If he could afford to speak frankly, he would agree with the article in the London Times quoted by Beveridge, "Unemployment is not a mere accidental blemish in a private-enterprise economy. On the contrary, it is part of the essential mechanism of the system, and has a definite function to fulfil . . . it maintains the authority of master over man." But neither the American climate of opinion nor the narrow margin by which Taft was reelected to the Senate permits him the luxury of such plain talk. Except in private, he has given up the view that the fight for full employment is the result of a kind of Communist plot. Taft is now for full employment, and at the moment he is for the Full Employment bill. But he is for it with reservations, and these reservations, like Lodge's to the Covenant, are designed not to perfect the bill but to cripple it.

Without greatly intensified effort by progressive forces, Taft may be successful. It was only by a tie vote that the bill managed to squeak past the Taft amendments and out of the Senate Banking and Currency Subcommittee yesterday. The going will be rougher in full committee, where the wrangle to whittle away the bill will be resumed on Tuesday. It has been the fate of this measure to undergo a constant process of "perfection," first by its friends and now by its enemies; it has grown constantly vaguer in the process. The original proposal, as made in August, 1944, by James Patton of the National Farmers' Union, may have been crude, but it was concrete. It was based on the generally accepted view that it will take a volume of output of about $200 billion at current prices to maintain full employment; and that about $40 billion of capital investment a year is required to maintain production and employment at that level. Patton proposed that the federal government guarantee that level of investment, estimating the expected private investment annually and planning to fill the gap—it would be considerable—with government investment. There are differences of opinion about this approach, but it has the virtue of backing up the full-employment pledge with the promise of a specific and measurable course of action. There are difficulties in this proposal, but they are the difficulties inherent in any attempt at full employment under capitalism, and these difficulties are dodged rather than eliminated by dropping the Patton proposal.

The bill reported out of subcommittee yesterday does not differ substantially from S 380, as introduced last January by Senators Murray, Wagner, Thomas, and O'Mahoney. It provides, as did the Patton measure, for an annual survey of projected investment in a kind of "National Budget," covering the expected income and outlay of the whole economy rather than merely of the federal government. The bill ties itself into knots, bowing, scraping, and leaning over backward, to placate the national cult of "free enterprise," but it does finally say "to the extent that continuing full employment cannot otherwise be assured" the government shall "provide such volume of federal investment and expenditure as may be needed." This is the one concrete way in which the bill promises to implement its pledge that "all Americans able to work and desiring work have the right to an opportunity for useful, remunerative, regular, and full-time employment."

It is at this pledge, and at any dollar-on-the-barrel-head promise to keep it, that the Taft amendments are aimed. One of the weasel-worded changes Taft proposes would substitute for the right to work the proposition that "all Americans have the right to have their governments adopt policies which shall provide to those able to work and seeking work useful, remunerative, regular," etc. Since this is neither a contract nor a mortgage nor even a statute enforceable by litigation, but a declaration of policy, shyster draftsmanship of this kind is apt to prove futile. The importance of the bill lies in the expectations it arouses and the pressure these expectations will exert on government in time of stress. Subtle jokers are unlikely to affect these popular expectations, since few of the jobless will consult a lawyer.

More important than Taft's effort to dupe public opinion is his attempt by amendment to channel Congressional action away from any adequate program to create full employment by federal investment. Taft would eliminate the heart of the bill, the provision quoted above which provides for "such volume of federal investment and expenditure" as is necessary to assure full employment. Taft's amendments would allow for some federal spending as a last resort, but this is all hedged about with assurances of a balanced budget rather than full employment. In subcommittee yesterday he put forward a new one, a proposal for "carefully planned public works" to be "accelerated" when unemployment increases and "decelerated" when unemployment declines. This was successfully attacked as an attempt to limit federal expenditures to public works. It was also objected that Taft's proposal embodied no promise of sufficient public works to generate full employment. This amendment will turn up again in full committee, if not on the floor, for it is nicely calculated to take in the unthinking and the unwary.

The Full Employment bill as it stands is inadequate. Full employment will not be achieved by compensatory government investment. Ultimately we shall have to plan industrial output in terms of human need, guarantee industry a market for full production of annual quotas, and distribute left-over commodities by a stamp plan to the poorest paid. But these long-range reflections should neither deter us from full support of the bill nor disparage the great service being rendered by the Senators fighting for it. The battle over the Full Employment bill is of crucial and historic importance; the bill's imperfections can be corrected by experience; nobody really knows how to achieve full employment under private enterprise anyhow. The important thing is the principle established, the expectation aroused, the pressure generated. Senators Wagner, Taylor, Mitchell, Murdock, and Tobey deserve the highest praise for their brave fight in the subcommittee and full support in the battles ahead.

The fight will grow worse. In full committee the line-up is very close. Two Democrats, Radcliffe of Maryland and Fulbright of Arkansas, are supporting Taft. Bankhead of Alabama is torn between loyalty to the Administration and to the Farm Bureau; the latter, which opposes the bill, will probably win. In that case either McFarland of Arizona or Carville of Nevada can cripple the bill by providing a majority of one for the Taft amendments. If the Administration puts on the heat, it should be able to keep McFarland and Carville, if not Bankhead, in line. In that case, the Full Employment bill is safe. But if it is true, as the Wall Street Journal reports, that Democratic leaders "are telling members Truman's 'liberal' proposals are long-range, not immediate," Taft will win and full employment will lose. I might add that the bill will face even tougher opposition in the House, though Patman and 105 other Representatives are jointly sponsoring the measure.

I end with two sidelights on the bill, one sad, the other amusing. The sponsors of the bill found it necessary in its most recent revision to omit from the statement of purposes "the full utilization of our national resources." Behind the talk of "free enterprise" to which they must make concessions is a deeply rooted philosophy of scarcity. The amusing sidelight concerns Taft. Four Republicans supporting the bill—Morse, Tobey, Aiken, and Langer—put in some excellent amendments. One provided that any full-employment program should be accomplished "without resort to measures or programs that would create unemployment or impede the improvement of living standards in other nations." This had to be watered down to a compromise provision against "economic warfare" because Taft (and Radcliffe) objected that it might interfere with such measures to protect American industry as export bounties or merchant-marine subsidies. The stalwart supporters of "free enterprise" seem to feel no twinge of inconsistency between their ideological tub-thumpings and their consistent pursuit of governmental intervention to give favored producers unfair advantages. The spectacle is a familiar one, but none the less nauseating.

The Tragedy of German Labor

BY SAUL K. PADOVER

(Historian, political scientist; author of "Jefferson" and other books; before the war assistant to the Secretary of the Interior; during the war an officer in the army's Psychological Warfare Division)

MY CONCLUSIONS about Germany, which I shall state before the arguments, are seemingly paradoxical. (1) German labor's record under Hitler was, from the point of view of democracy, miserable. (2) Without German labor, especially without the Social Democrats, there can ultimately be no democracy in Germany. (3) Military Government, aware of the first fact, is blind to the second, and in the name of democracy is supporting anti-democratic elements.

I am writing from fairly close contact with MG and extensive experience with Germans of all classes. I entered Germany with the army in the first weeks of our penetration and spent the succeeding period of the war in the Reich investigating conditions and interrogating German civilians. It is particularly important for those who are concerned with the future of democracy, especially in Europe, to have an unsentimental appraisal of liberal elements and tendencies. Without a knowledge of the facts, we shall not be able to formulate an effective program for Germany or, what is more important, correct MG in its waywardness.

First, the story of German labor.

After we took Aachen I had occasion to discuss the German labor movement with former Social Democratic trade-union officials. One of them said: "The workers? They have been the greatest disappointment of all. They are not in the least anti-fascist." I thought that this was the judgment of a frustrated official. But there was nothing particularly subjective about the comment of another Aachener, a conservative lawyer who was one of the city's many Bürgermeisters. "Our German workers," he said, "have never caused the Führer any difficulties. All they asked for was bread and beer, and they shouted Heil Hitler!" Farther north, in the coal region, a class-conscious proletarian miner spat contemptuously at the mention of German labor. He said that the German workers were "spineless and gutless" robots. "Knechtseelen" (souls of slaves), he called them. And in Düsseldorf a prominent Ruhr industrialist said to me blandly: "No, we never had any trouble with labor during the war. They never sabotaged or slowed up their work. They were very loyal."

The deeper we entered into Germany the more we found that these comments were well founded. We discovered to our astonishment that all the pre-war rumors about a German underground were hardly more than that—rumors. We found that talk of resistance on the part of labor during the war was propaganda—possibly manufactured by Goebbels to mislead the Allies. We learned that the German workers were among the most reliable and unwavering supporters of Hitlerism.

I kept on asking why? I knew that the German trade-union movement had served as a model for the world and that it had given the German worker dignity, security, and numerous social benefits. I was aware that the German Social Democratic Party, a labor party, had been strong enough to found the Weimar Republic on the ruins of the Kaiser's empire. And the Communists too, I recalled, had polled nearly 6,000,000 votes in the 1932 elections. What had happened to all these people?

WORKERS THOROUGHLY "COORDINATED"

The picture as it emerged from a prolonged investigation is not conducive to optimism, but on the other hand it helps to chasten our judgment. We must remember what happened. To begin with: the Nazis cleverly realized that the German is an obedient soul addicted to organization. They knew that the German trade unions were over-organized and over-disciplined, much like the Prussian army, and that the way to control this delicate mechanism was to destroy its leadership. When the Nazis seized power in 1933—without the resistance of the Social Democratic leadership be it remembered, although many of the rank and file were ready to fight—they did not molest ordinary workers, ordinary Socialists, or ordinary Communists. Instead, they rounded up the Socialist, Communist, and trade-union leaders and officials and other individuals of prominence and threw them into concentration camps, where many of them, perhaps most, were massacred. After that, Hitler had no difficulty in taking over the whole trade-union mechanism and incorporating it into the Nazi party machine. And German psychology being what it is, the workers who had previously voted red and saluted with the clenched fist, now for the most part voted Ja and saluted with the outstretched arm.

Psychologically, the Nazis well knew how to handle the workers. They flattered and wooed them in all kinds of ways. They preserved the old Socialist holiday, May 1, as Labor Day. They set up a Labor Front for the "benefit of labor." They wrote miles of copy on the "dignity of labor." They organized Kraft durch Freude excursions for poor workers. They gave laborers vacations with pay. They set up labor trustees in the factories and shops to whom the workers could go with their grievances.

Not all these Nazi institutions were phony. Some were of obvious benefit to the workers. I recall a complaint made by a Ruhr manufacturer, a young man who had joined the Nazi Party in 1929 and was an ardent admirer of Hitler. He said to me: "There were some things I did not like about the Führer's policies. His treatment of labor I liked least of all. In my own factory, where I employed 450 men, I had less to say when it came to personnel problems than the labor agent who was put in by the Nazi Party. Often he listened to the workers instead of to me. And me an old party member!"

It should also be remembered that the Nazis were not foolish enough to give the workers merely circuses. They also gave them bread. Under the Republic millions of persons had been unemployed. The Nazis abolished unemployment. True, they did it by building wonderful Autobahnen—we certainly appreciated them in the spring of 1945—for which there were few automobiles and by manufacturing armaments for which there was no immediate consumer market, but this did not trouble the average worker, who was satisfied with a steady job and good pay. As a matter of fact, pay in Germany was so good that even today most people have plenty of money. During the war prices were kept within reasonable limits and the workers were able to save considerable sums, particularly since there were also many shortages.

By the time the war came, German labor was already thoroughly coordinated and if there was discontent it was inaudible. Up to 1939 Hitler's Reich enjoyed considerable prosperity; afterward the first two years of the war brought immense loot into the country. German labor, together with German Junkers and farmers and business men, shared in the spoils.

For German labor there was never any awakening. A time came when the middle classes and more particularly the top officers realized that the game was up, that the Führer could not deliver what he had promised, and that therefore it was necessary to save what was left of Germany by liquidating the Great Man. Labor was not an active participant in the plot, despite some recent claims by certain apologists in this country. Drugged by years of propaganda, and perhaps also contented with work and wages, the workers displayed a coolie-like indifference to political problems and to the future.

Apathy is apparently a communicable disease, and the few pre-Hitler labor leaders who survived the Nazi slaughter were stricken with the same sickness of irresponsibility and political confusion that ravaged the rest of the country. I know of one eminent labor personality, a leading figure in the left wing of the Catholic Center Party, who was approached by the anti-Hitler conspirators in 1942 and asked to give the plot his support. The conspirators, headed by Leipzig's Mayor Gördeler, were mainly army officers and would need some show of labor support if they succeeded. The labor leader told me that for two years—until the attempt on Hitler's life in July, 1944—he participated in the secret meetings of the conspirators, but only as an observer. At the last secret meeting, which took place at Godesberg, he said to the conspirators: "My friends and I will cheerfully welcome the elimination of Hitler, but we will not cooperate with militarists. If you, Herr 'Müller,' succeeded in killing Hitler, I would jump up and cry 'Hoch Müller,' and immediately afterward, 'Down with Müller.' I would appreciate your deed as a tremendous service to Germany, but I would deplore your taking power in the name of generals. I would go up and down Germany urging the people to put up monuments in your honor but to keep power out of your hands."

I ran into a similar situation in one of the biggest cities in the Ruhr. We needed a Bürgermeister, and the only qualified non-Nazi we could find was Herr Holzmann, formerly the business manager of a number of Socialist trade-union newspapers. When I interviewed Herr Holzmann he expressed happiness that Germany had "at last been freed from the yoke of Hitlerism." He was most grateful to the Americans, he said. When he was asked to show his gratitude by accepting the job of mayor of his home city, Herr Holzmann's face registered a series of emotions—surprise, embarrassment, fear. He was not worthy of so great an honor, he stammered. It sounded unconvincing, and he hastily added that he could not accept such a great honor without first consulting his Social Democratic colleagues. But it was not possible to consult his colleagues, he explained, because the bombings had scattered them and he did not have their addresses. Suppose he gave us the names and we located his colleagues? No, no, that would not help either because he had no means of transportation. Well, we would give him transportation. Herr Holzmann shook his head desperately. Really, really, he wished the American Military Government would not force him into such a difficult post. I said: "The Americans don't force anybody to do anything. All I can say is that if you, a Social Democrat and a representative of labor, do not have in you a sense of duty to your guilty country or a sense of obligation to the liberated workers, then one may conclude that Germany is indeed beyond redemption and should be abandoned to its fate." His reply was characteristic: "If you, sir, think it is my obligation to accept, then of course I must accept."

COMMUNISTS AND SOCIAL DEMOCRATS

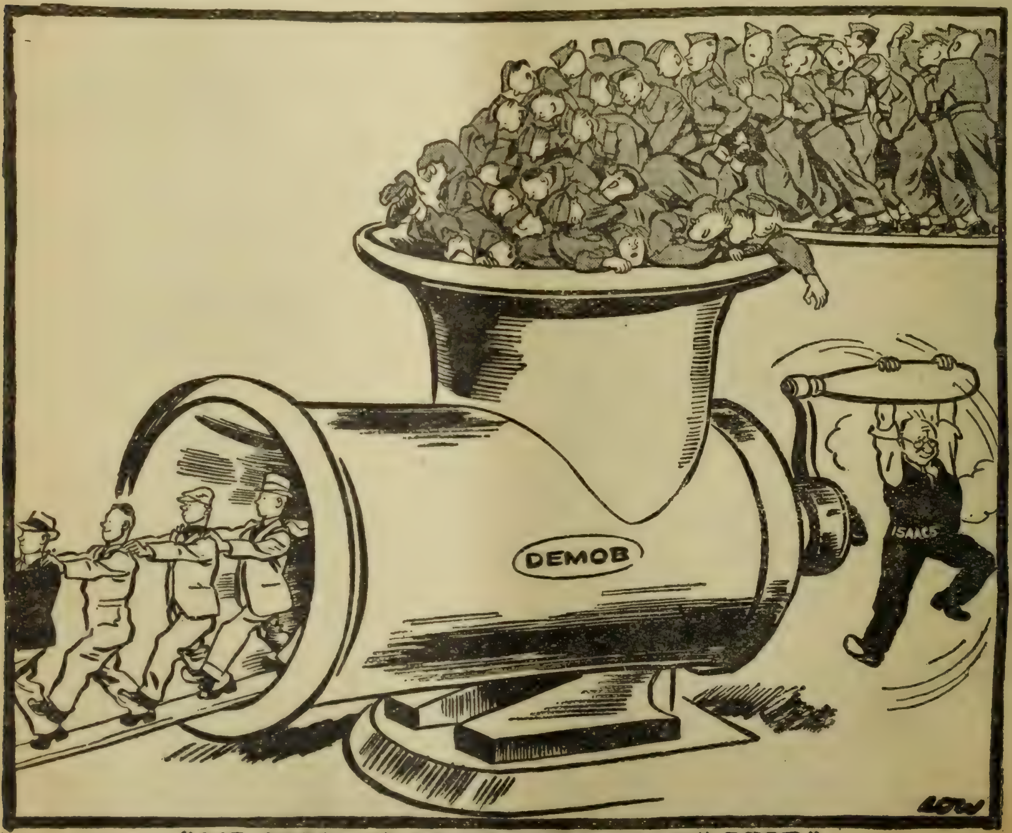
And what about the Communists? Everywhere we went in Germany middle-class people warned us against the "dangers of communism." Upon investigation this turned out to be a mixture of prevarication and political hypocrisy. The truth is: we found few real Communists in Germany. By 1936 or 1937 the Nazis had exterminated the party leaders whom they had succeeded in capturing. As for the Communist members and voters, it is an unpalatable fact that many of them became Nazis. The old joke that a Nazi was like a beefsteak—brown outside and red inside—had grains of solid truth in it. In the coal-mining areas in the Rhineland we found that approximately one-third of the members of the K. P. D. (Kommunistische Partei Deutschlands) abandoned the hammer and sickle for the swastika. The other two-thirds, mostly older men, remained true to their faith, but without leadership and without a program they sank into apathy and the bitterness of frustration.

Germany is the only country in Europe where the Communists have no moral ground to stand on and no record of resistance to the fascist tyranny. Everywhere else, notably in France and Belgium and Italy and Yugoslavia, the Communists were heroic fighters against fascism and frequently the backbone of the resistance movement; but in Germany, particularly during the war, Communists accepted Nazism like the rest of the population.

A few days after we liberated the Buchenwald camp I ran into the prize German bolshevik. He was a thin little fellow who had spent all the years of the Hitler regime in various concentration camps and somehow survived. In Buchenwald he was a leader in the Communist-dominated committee that had a good deal to do with the internal administration of the camp under the S. S. As I was listening to him in front of the crematorium—where the heaps of human bones and ashes left one bereft of speech—he noticed a Polish prisoner carrying an armful of clothing and shoes—obviously looted stuff. The little Communist turned on the Pole and upbraided him sharply for "robbing German homes." I told the Communist what I thought of his nation for having enslaved and murdered millions of innocent human beings, and I asked him whether a pitiful slave-prisoner did not have the right to get something to wear, even if he took it from a German home. The Communist muttered, "Ja, ja, aber man muss ordentlich sein" (Yes, yes, but one must be orderly), and he repeated stubbornly, "Man muss immer ordentlich sein." Such people do not make revolutions.

Whether a revived Communist Party would make headway in Germany—outside of the Russian-occupied area—is problematical, unless MG policies drive German labor into the not unwilling arms of Moscow. The more intelligent older workers recall, not without a touch of bitterness, that the Communist Party of Germany was one of the prime instruments in the destruction of the Weimar Republic and in the annihilation of German democracy. Up to the end of 1932 the German Communists' slogan was that the enemy (of the working class) was socialism, not Nazism; their program was: destroy the Republic first, Hitler later. The German Communists achieved 50 per cent of their program.

The Social Democrats still have a large actual and potential following among the German workers. They lack, however, a program that makes sense and, above all, self-confidence. The Social Democratic leaders who survived under Hitler are older men, weak and vacillating and troubled by a bad conscience. Unlike the Communists, few of the Socialists ever became active Nazis; on the other hand, like the Communists, they did nothing against the Nazis either. Their record up to the outbreak of the war was pitifully inadequate; their record during the war, which in their hearts they condemned, is beneath contempt. They knew that the war was unjust and of Germany's making, but they never raised their voices in protest. They knew, as did most other Germans, that the German government was gassing and burning to death millions of guiltless people, but they never made a gesture of resistance. To protest or to resist meant death or the concentration camp, and especially in the last years of the war there was not enough moral courage left among the 70,000,000 Germans to produce martyrs or protesters or resistants. One thinks of the thousands of French resistants murdered by the Gestapo; one thinks of the thousands of Polish and Greek and Norwegian and Yugoslav underground fighters massacred by the S. S.; one thinks of the handful of desperate Jews, wretchedly armed, who held up the Wehrmacht for many days in the battle of the Warsaw ghetto—and one wonders why only the voice of servility came out of Germany and no cry for justice.



" WE ARE (PUFF!) DOING OUR (PUFF! PUFF!) BEST "

Last winter I spent an afternoon with a master mechanic who had been a lifelong member of the Social Democratic Party. He told how he had brought up his only son in anti-fascist principles, how he had taught his boy that "fascism means the death of humanity," and how the son grew up to hate Hitler and all his works. The boy was drafted into the Wehrmacht, and at the age of twenty-three he fell near Sebastopol. His last letter read: "Dear parents, don't send me any more food parcels. . . . My hour of death is near. . . . I die for my wife and child, not for the Hitler system." The father's voice trembled as he said to me: "When the news of the boy's death came I said to myself, ten times better that he died that way than that he should have died for fascism." Then he pounded his fist on the table and cried for heaven's vengeance upon Hitler and his fascist gang. During the war this man had worked in a factory making precision instruments for submarines. I asked him what he did to show his resistance to Hitler's "unjust fascist war." "Resist?" he exclaimed; "how could one resist? Es war doch verboten."

The great god Verboten dominated the lives of Hitler's workers. They were told that it was verboten to have anything to do with the foreign slaves—their fellow-proletarians. And it is a tragic commentary upon German laborers that they obeyed orders. In private some German workers bewailed the fate of the miserable wretches who were dragged from their distant homes and deprived of human rights—including the right to marry, the right to speak, the right to enter restaurants or movies, the right to receive wages, the right to buy necessities—but in practice they did little or nothing to help them. As a matter of fact, German workers frequently showed contempt for the "inferior races" who worked beside them in shops and factories.

WHOM ELSE CAN WE TRUST?

It will be asked: If such is the character of German labor, how can we hope for a democratic future in Germany? And is, then, MG not right in treating all Germans more or less alike? The truth is that unless we intend to abandon the Reich entirely to the fascists and their cousins the Pan-Germans, we have no choice but to put our hopes on the workers. This may sound like contradiction of what I have said about them, but an analysis of the German class structure leads to no other conclusion.

Whom else can we work with in Germany? The farmers are stolid and unpolitical, and are inclined to support any regime that does not bother them too much. The upper strata, including industrialists and clericals, are opportunists whose only loyalty is to themselves and whose only interest is self-interest. They supported Hitler because he was successful; now they are collaborating with us because we are victorious. They are not our friends, and they are certainly not the friends of Germany's potential democratic elements. As for the middle class, it is one of Europe's tragedies that the German bourgeoisie was nurtured by autocracy and not by revolution. By and large, the German middle class has no tradition of liberty and no interest in democracy, because it came to power and maintained itself in power through an alliance with the feudal aristocracy. Many of the more intelligent members of the middle class, especially lawyers and business men, are playing with the idea of setting up a corporative state as an answer both to Nazism, which is not popular with the Americans, and to democracy, which is feared by the bourgeoisie. (This experiment, which I hope to describe in a subsequent article, was tried in Aachen under the nose of MG.)

But the German workers, despite their spinelessness, are not wedded to any program of world conquest; they have no vested interest, either emotional or economic, in war or expansion. They are susceptible to democratic ideas, to which so many non-proletarian Germans are so sneeringly hostile, and their leaders, particularly the Social Democrats and the left-wing Catholic Centrists, have a strong pro-Allied orientation. Moreover, in 1919 the German working class—and the fact deserves to be stressed—made a fair effort to establish a democratic republic, a republic which the bourgeoisie never really accepted and which it knifed in favor of a fascist dictatorship in 1933.

Labor's record, since the occupation, has been consistently good. In numerous instances workers hailed us as "liberators" and offered to help us against the Nazis. Frequently they were cold-shouldered by MG, especially when they were Socialists or Communists, but they have permitted no resentment to dampen their desire to cooperate with the occupation. Gradually, as the grip of the Nazi terror vanished from their memories, they began to show a certain amount of political awakening, which took the form, in such cities as Leipzig and Cologne and Munich, of protests against MG's appointments of Hitlerites to office. Elsewhere the more intelligent and politically conscious workers—a minority, to be sure—met in small groups and drew up lists of fascists.

It seems to me to be the height of political shortsightedness to reject, as we do in Germany, actual and potential political allies. German workers, especially the politically experienced Social Democrats, are ready for full cooperation, and with our help they could lay democratic foundations in the Reich. At present they are weak and beaten and humiliated, and they have, of course, a bad conscience. To make them effective allies, we must restore their self-confidence and treat them with respect, not suspicion. It is, furthermore, our plain duty to use this potentially democratic material properly, and teach it our democratic ways. If we do not, if we continue our present policy, we shall ultimately drive these people either into the arms of the Communists or into those of the extreme nationalists.

Some day we shall get out of Germany, and to whom shall we leave the destiny of the country? To the clericals, à la Dollfuss? Or the industrialists? Or the generals? That would be to invite black reaction and, inevitably, war. It is, indeed, strange that the Americans, who profess democracy, have been so timid about encouraging democracy, while the Russians have boldly supported Communist and even other anti-fascist activities in their zone. The German Communists' record of resistance to Nazism was no better than that of the German Social Democrats, but the Russians do not let that consideration interfere with their long-range program. Can it be that we have less confidence in democracy than the Russians have in communism?

[This is the first of a series of articles on Military Government and democracy in Germany.]

The Constitutional Debate in France

BY FREDERIC POTTECHER

(A French journalist who during the German occupation edited a clandestine paper in Corsica. He now broadcasts from the French government's short-wave station in Paris, using the heading "Mot du Jour de Jean des Vosges.")

Paris, September 12 (by cable)

ALTHOUGH the debate is not yet closed, the problems which the French people face in their search for a new and more democratic constitutional framework are now clear. The charter of the Third Republic, framed in 1875, might have been taken as a point of departure, but it is felt, particularly among the newer parties and groups, that the document is outmoded and that its application, even if only temporary, would be dangerous. General de Gaulle and his government have also taken a strong position against a return to 1875. Meanwhile public opinion is divided between two opposing tendencies. All the parties and "movements" which have come out of the Resistance declare themselves in favor of a single, all-powerful Constituent Assembly to which the government should be entirely responsible. The Radical Socialists and some of the Socialists, on the other hand, are against such a radical solution.

The dispute began the day General de Gaulle asserted that a sovereign Constituent Assembly might lead to dictatorship. This is surely true, and if he had stopped there he could probably have avoided the passionate tone which the dispute has since taken on. But he went on to say that pending the formulation of the new constitution—that is, for a period of seven months at most—the government should not be answerable to the Assembly except in matters having to do with the budget, military affairs, structural changes, and the ratification of treaties. Immediately a storm of polemics arose, and the majority of delegates to the Consultative Assembly ranged themselves against General de Gaulle. It is clear, said the delegates, that while the head of the government fears the dictatorship of a sovereign Assembly, he is quite willing to impose upon the country, at least temporarily, the semi-dictatorship of the government. And at once one heard suggestions of a desire for personal power on the part of General de Gaulle.

In the face of this controversy De Gaulle proposed that the will of the people be consulted. The people, he said, can make known their wishes by means of a referendum on two questions which, translated from their legal phraseology, ask, in effect, "Do you want a new constitution rather than the constitution of 1875?" and "Do you want a Constituent Assembly with limited powers rather than a sovereign omnipotent Assembly?" De Gaulle asks for a "yes" answer to both questions, insisting that the extraordinary powers of the government, if granted by the people, need not necessarily last for seven months, for if the Constituent Assembly is "diligent," the new constitution can be drawn up and applied in a much shorter time; and he has reaffirmed his determination to submit to the charter of the Fourth Republic as soon as it is ready. This appeasement was of no avail, at least not with the majority of the delegates, particularly since the idea of a referendum strikes terror into the hearts of such stalwarts as Paul Bastid (Radical Socialist delegate and editor of Aurore), Louis Marin (rightist delegate and editor of Nation), Joseph Denais (also a right-wing delegate), whom a strange hazard has made partner-in-arms of the Communist delegate, Jacques Duclos, Georges Cogniot (Communist delegate and editor of Humanité), and such fellow-travelers as Pierre Hervé (editor of Action).

The argument advanced by the representatives of the Radical Socialist Party and of the Moderates (notably the Republican Federation), enthusiastically seconded by the Communists, is that the referendum proposed by De Gaulle would probably be much more a vote for or against De Gaulle than a really democratic popular consultation. Pierre Hervé, writing in Libération, said: "The referendum under present circumstances—and so long as it has not been previously provided for by an elected Assembly as part of our constitutional structure—could only be a plebiscite endangering the Republic." De Gaulle's left-wing adversaries insist that a sovereign Assembly would not necessarily rule out the principle of two chambers or endanger the stability of the government.

The unicameral principle, dear to the Resistance movement, is proving to be another sticky question. The left-wing Catholic group known as the Mouvement Républicain Populaire (represented by such men as Bidault, Teitgen, De Menthon, Schumann, and by the newspaper Aube) is in favor of a single chamber, and so are most of the other Resistance groups, the Communists, and a good many Socialists. The Radical Socialists and the Moderates, on the other hand, favor a bicameral legislature. The fate of the Senate is at stake.

To understand the problem of the Senate and the hostility which the upper chamber, now in abeyance, is encountering, it must be remembered that the Senators, unlike the Deputies, were not elected by universal suffrage but by the Deputies of each department, the General Councilors, the arrondissement, canton, and municipal Councilors,* and, finally, the Mayors. Thus their electors were themselves elected. The pressure which the government used on occasion to exert on the Senators by bringing into play the power of the Ministry of the Interior over the Prefects and Subprefects, often in league with the Mayors and Deputies, was notorious. Moreover, the Senators were elected for nine years, whereas the Deputies were elected for only four. In consequence, although a third of the Senate was renewed every three years, each Senator held his seat through two legislatures. According to the constitution of the Third Republic a Senator had to be over forty years old. For all these reasons, this highly undemocratic body was able to exercise not only a moderating but often a neutralizing influence. It could even override the will of the Chamber and precipitate the fall of a ministry.

---

* There are in France and Corsica 91 departments, 281 arrondissements, 8,027 cantons, and 38,011 communes.

It is easy to understand, therefore, why the Resistance groups, the Communists, and numerous Socialists, all animated by a revolutionary spirit, are so opposed to a resurrection of the old Senate. And why, for the same reasons, the Moderates and the Radical Socialists—in other words, the conservatives—cling to it. But in fairness it should be added that some of the supporters of a bicameral legislature are motivated by the belief, traditional in French Republican philosophy, that an upper house is a necessary part of the French system of "checks and balances."

Are the two theses irreconcilable? The deadlock seemed almost hopeless until M. Vincent Auriol, former Minister of Finance and a Socialist of great political wisdom, proposed to the Consultative Assembly a middle way which almost won a majority. The Auriol proposal is that there should be a second house but not a Senate. This house, a National Council, would share the legislative powers exercised by the Assembly except those having a political character. It would not have a decisive voice in matters of budget, upon which the Assembly would have final say. The National Councilors would be elected by representatives of production, commercial organizations, professional federations, labor unions, and the like. The universities, bar associations, various fraternal orders, and so on would also elect their Councilors.

M. Auriol's idea is quite new. There is a real possibility that this National Council, more or less modified, may become the second French legislative chamber. Thus the enemies of the Senate would be appeased and the desires of the bicameralists satisfied.

The principles determining the way the French people are to vote on October 21 and be represented in the forthcoming Constituent Assembly have also become a matter of hot political debate. These principles were set forth in an ordinance of August 17. Each of 506 deputies is to represent on the average some 80,000 continental Frenchmen. The old voting list has been discarded in favor of new constituencies based on population according to the following system: each department will get two seats irrespective of its population; one seat will be granted for every hundred thousand above the first hundred thousand and an extra seat for the remainder if this is over 25,000. This system clearly favors the country regions at the expense of the urban centers. An added objection is that the government possesses no up-to-date statistics. The last census was taken in 1936. Since then a noticeable shift in population has taken place from the country to the city. This makes the government's scheme, published in detail only last Friday, doubly unjust. According to present provisions, for instance, the department of Bouches-du-Rhône, including Marseilles, was given one seat for every 89,000 inhabitants in 1936 while neighboring Lozère was given one for every 49,000. The discrepancy, as everybody knows, is actually far greater than this.

Obviously the section of the population which is hit the hardest by the government's scheme is the workers, who must in many cases muster twice as many votes to elect one delegate as the peasants. That is why the plan has provoked criticism from the ranks of the left and among trade unionists, criticism which has not been appeased by De Gaulle's recent admonition to Léon Jouhaux, head of the Confédération Générale du Travail, to keep out of politics. Jouhaux, it will be recalled, headed the delegation representing the C. G. T., the Radicals, the Socialists, the Communists, and the League for the Rights of Man which sought an audience with De Gaulle to protest against the government's action. That protest has now been presented in the form of a memorandum. Since as the result of De Gaulle's earlier bluntness the C. G. T. recommended to its 5,000,000 members that they vote no on the second question, De Gaulle may be impelled to give thought to the protest. The Minister of the Interior, Adrien Tixier, had a long conversation with De Gaulle the night before last, and it is believed several modifications in the voting law were considered, especially plans for increasing the representation of Paris and other large cities. No figures, however, have yet been published*

General de Gaulle

Another controversy has arisen over the methods of voting. The government plan provides for a so-called scrutin de liste by departments. In other words, each party or group of parties must go before the voters of a department with a list containing the candidate for every seat. But the government's proportional-representation scheme, providing for the utilization of the surplus votes to elect minority representatives in each department, means that these lists do not stand or fall together. The system is most complicated, and the result will be that departments where no party's following is overwhelmingly preponderant may have both majority and minority delegates. The left is disgruntled because it feels it may thus be prevented from winning a clear-cut majority as Labor did in the British elections. And many impartial observers, while admitting the theoretical justice of the government's scheme, believe it may have certain practical ill effects, particularly in diminishing the government's working majority in the Chamber and making for general instability, perhaps worse than what prevailed before the war.

---

* On September 12, in reply to the memorandum of the left groups, General de Gaulle sent a letter to Daniel Mayer, secretary-general of the Socialist Party, announcing his refusal to alter the system of proportional representation to be used in the elections. He agreed, however, to increase the representation of some of the densely populated areas.—EDITORS THE NATION.

In short, the new voting law, which is at variance with the Consultative Assembly's recommendations, is meeting with little enthusiasm among Socialists and members of the Resistance. In the same circles, however, not including the Communists and Communist-inspired C. G. T. chieftains, there is a large measure of approval of the government's plan for the Constituent Assembly and governmental continuity. On that most of the people will probably vote yes.

Norsemen's Return

BY H. IRGENS LARSEN

(After Norway was invaded Mr. Larsen crossed the Atlantic in a thirty-foot sailboat, reaching America in fifty-four days. During the war he served with the Norwegian Shipping Commission. He spent last summer in his homeland, returning recently to this country. His last Atlantic crossing—by air—took less than a day.)

WHEN sudden war broke over Norway on April 9, 1940, the nation's leaders managed to do the one thing most needed. In the dramatic meeting of Parliament on April 10 at Elverum, where the government had fled before the German advance, the members made provision for the continuation of democratic government. The King and his ministers were vested with legal authority to direct the fight from abroad during the occupation. Now they have returned, and the threads of government must be taken up where they were broken.

As a first step, and in accordance with its promises, the government in exile resigned upon its return and a new coalition government was formed. The transition went smoothly. The only point of debate was the question whether the returning government ought to be represented in the new government. It was finally decided that the two ablest ministers in the exiled Cabinet, Foreign Minister Lie and Minister of Defense Torp, should continue in their same posts in the new Cabinet. Elections have been called for October of this year, when the new coalition government will have got a good start on reconstruction.

The new Prime Minister, Einar Gerhardsen, was in German prisons in both Norway and Germany for four years, as were most of his Cabinet for shorter or longer periods. It almost seems that a stay in a German jail is now a ticket to prominence in Norway. Mr. Gerhardsen is a member of the Labor Party, which came into power in 1936 and remained in office during the exile, with a token reinforcement from the three other political parties to demonstrate national unity. The Labor Party is expected to gain a majority in the October elections, but conservatives are not dismayed at the prospect since, generally speaking, it stands for the same policies as those followed for a decade.

Collaborationist elements in Norway were not numerous enough in the administration during the war to change materially the democratic setup. The machinery of government continued without interruption and now distributes the supplies which are flowing in. The total supplies at hand are already sufficient to ward off any further threat of starvation. On V-E Day the government in exile immediately translated into action its long-prepared plans, and soon ships of Norway's merchant marine were entering Norwegian ports with cargoes from North and South America and the British Commonwealth—cargoes of wheat and rye, maize for chicken and cattle feed, canned goods, medical supplies, groceries, textiles, leather, and other necessities. Simultaneously the stores that the Norwegian government had built up in Sweden were moved over the border by train and truck. By midwinter a stockpile of the most essential foodstuffs will have been built up. But there are still many holes to fill. No UNRRA supplies are going to Norway, or to any other country of Western Europe; all imports are being paid for by the government in cash. Coal and raw materials for both domestic and export industries are urgently needed.

The acute housing shortage has been handled democratically and efficiently. In Oslo several thousand families were without adequate apartments when liberation came. Overnight, agencies sprang up to assign the apartments released by the departing Germans. Urgency of need decided who should get them; ownership did not count. Furniture which had been used by the Germans was either returned to the old owners or, if Nazi-made, distributed as needed. Other groups of citizens took care of the prisoners released from the German concentration camps. In every field there was a similar response by volunteer organizations.

Though the people were terribly thin and hungry, and lacked consumer goods of all kinds, they had kept up a front of respectability. Suits were pressed and clean even when they had been turned; collars were immaculate, though often enough made out of the tails of the shirt. The women's dresses were made of curtains, tablecloths, and mattress covers. Only paper was available in quantity, which allowed the newspapers to appear quickly in almost normal sizes.

Various essential articles had had to be made out of whatever raw material was obtainable. Timber seemed to be the most versatile material, providing the basis for cattle fodder, edible cellulose, aquavite—from wood alcohol—the only liquor for sale and strictly rationed, and motor fuel; little squares of wood burned in oven-like generators were the only source of power for automobiles and were used in locomotives and coastal steamers instead of coal. The Norwegians kept a certain sense of humor about all these substitutes. The only soap for sale, an indescribable concoction, was advertised as follows: "Buy B soap now—cannot be had after the war."

The government in exile brought home complete blueprints for the control of foreign purchases and for all necessary changes in administration. The new government is now loyally putting them into effect. Business appears resigned to the new restrictions, although it naturally worries about how far they are to be extended. A law has been passed giving wide powers to the Director of Prices, Wilhelm Thagaard, a man who has had long experience in price controls and whose ability is recognized by all parties. He contended that the increasing number of regulations threatened to bury the nation in red tape and that it would be better to give discretionary powers to his agency. The government saw the merits of his proposal, and business men are now watching, not without apprehension, the results of this simplified policy.

The long-awaited money reform, which was imperative to dry up the flood of banknotes left by the occupation government, came into effect on September 10. All paper currency must now be turned in. For the present it is credited to the owner, who receives 100 kroner in new currency, against a punch in his ration book, to tide him over the first week. The principle by which the credits will be adjusted later is not yet known, but the governing idea will be that no one shall keep any undue profits gained during the occupation.

Norway's international currency policy will soon be clarified. The government will probably follow to some extent the example of the other liberated countries and reduce by 20 per cent the international value of the krone, which has been kept virtually at the pre-war level. This may help the export industry to a new start and also support the important shipping industry. There will be no repetition of the error made after the last war, when the value of the krone was maintained at a great sacrifice.

Norway has today a stock of gold and foreign currency—mostly sterling—of about $450,000,000. This includes its pre-war gold, which was saved by being spirited out of Oslo a few hours before the Germans entered and was finally sent to the Western Hemisphere by the government in exile. The country's currency demand for the next five years may perhaps be estimated as about double its liquid funds, and it will be up to the export industry and shipping to provide the difference—probably not an impossible task. Thus a superficial survey indicates that Norway has the necessary funds and earning power to finance the rebuilding of the country and that it firmly intends to depend on its own efforts. It is likely, however, because of the dollar shortage, that international loans will be used to speed up the process; this should be possible without impairing Norway's proverbial credit. New York papers predict that a comparatively large loan will shortly be floated by the Export-Import Bank.

The end of Lend-Lease will not affect reconstruction plans. Even during the war Norway availed itself of Lend-Lease to a very limited extent. The cost of the navy, air force, and army, of government institutions, and of stockpiles of provisions has been paid by the war-time earnings of the merchant marine, although Norwegian ships have generally sailed at lower hire than, for instance, American vessels. Most of the earnings, however, as well as the insurance money for the 750 vessels lost in the war, have been paid in sterling or kroner; so Norway too has an actute dollar problem. Norway's loss of merchant shipping during the war is second only to Great Britain's.

In cleaning out the Nazi traitors the Norwegians have tried to avoid Nazi ruthlessness. Use of the whole apparatus of democratic legal procedure with all the forms of protection it affords even to traitors has meant delay but no dulling of the sting. Capital punishment, which was abolished eighty years ago, has been reintroduced. The two first sentences of death had been given and carried out before the trial of Quisling. In accordance with the new law on capital punishment, which will also be applied to Quisling, the men met their death before a firing squad of ten policemen headed by a police chief. The law calls for executions conducted in strict secrecy, with the public not admitted. People have criticized the prosecution as being too lenient and also as being too severe on the "striped," or border-line, cases; and these diversified opinions probably indicate that a fair middle course has been followed.

When Allied troops entered Norway after Germany's capitulation, they found that the Wehrmacht had already surrendered everywhere to the Norwegian home-front forces. The organization and discipline of the underground militia have amazed the Allies, and there can be no doubt that credit for this is due largely to the old democratic ways of the land and the habit of self-discipline. A photograph which will long be cherished in Norway shows a young bareheaded boy in ski clothes, with the armband of the militia, standing in the Akershus Castle in Oslo and receiving the surrender of the German commander and his aide. When general mobilization was ordered shortly after liberation, the 40,000 home-front fighters turned in their weapons without an incident and were demobilized.

There is a very warm feeling in Norway for the help received from less unfortunate neighbors during the war. The Danes were particularly generous in sending clandestinely, year after year, packages to persons known and unknown in Norway containing butter, eggs, and cheese. The importance of these gifts for the health of the people can hardly be exaggerated, and there is now a touching desire to reciprocate. When a newspaper suggested that people should send part of their scant firewood to the Danes, who will find themselves even shorter of fuel than the Norwegians this winter, wood piled up at the assembly places in greater amounts than the strained transportation could cope with—everybody brought in a few logs in carts, wheelbarrows, and baby carriages. Then another paper got a better idea—to tap Norway's hydroelectric system and make a gift of electric power to the Danes. Whether the idea proves practicable or not, it has the support of the whole population.

The Norwegians also like to demonstrate their gratitude to their liberators. Signs posted all over the city of Oslo in English and Russian say, "Norway Thanks You!" On the Fourth of July the government ordered two minutes of silence in commemoration of Franklin D. Roosevelt, and soldiers in the parade of the American army on that day were almost buried under flowers.

The Russian soldiers are equally popular. Norwegians feel little or no apprehension about the presence of Russia on their northern border, where it liberated and still occupies Kirkenes. Perhaps this is a good omen for the future.

Danger! Venereal Disease

BY ALBERT DEUTSCH

(Author of "The Mentally Ill in America: a History of Their Care and Treatment"; Health and Welfare Columnist for PM*)*

EXPERTS watching the rising curve in the incidence of venereal disease in the armed forces and the civilian population fear that the situation will become extremely grave in the post-war period. The demobilization of soldiers and sailors and the redistribution of displaced war workers will inevitably spread the infection. And the reduction in the number of cases that the use of sulfa drugs was expected to effect has not materialized.

Among our occupation troops in the European theater venereal disease has already reached serious proportions. In August last it was striking American soldiers in Europe at the rate of 150 per 1,000 annually—a figure three times higher than the 1944 rate. An even greater toll has been taken of American troops stationed in the Philippines, where the Japanese occupation left a vast reservoir of civilian infection which the invaders did not bother to treat. In the continental United States, according to Lieutenant Colonel Thomas H. Sternberg, head of the venereal-disease control division of the Army Medical Corps, the rate rose as high as 43 per 1,000 during the first six months of 1945. It was 36 per 1,000 in 1944 and 26 in 1943. The navy's rate has also nearly doubled since 1943.

Military and civilian health officers agree that this sharp rise of infection in the armed forces reflects a corresponding rise among the civilian population. Dr. J. R. Heller, chief of the United States Public Health Service's venereal-disease division, told me recently that reported cases of gonorrhea in the United States had doubled since 1940, although the syphilis rate seems to have remained practically stationary.

One of the most disturbing elements in this picture is the steep rise noted among young persons. The New York City Health Department reports that primary syphilis in the age group from fifteen to nineteen years has risen more than 200 per cent since 1941. Dr. James H. Lade of the New York State Health Department says that in 1944 the rate for early syphilis in the fifteen-to-twenty-year-old group in up-state New York was 114 per cent greater than in 1941. "The urgency of this problem," Dr. Lade adds, "is demonstrated by a review of the course of venereal disease after the last war. It was during the post-war period that the greatest spread was noted. It is apparent that a seeding of the female population has occurred during this war. Unless efforts to find infectious cases are redoubled, a recrudescence of these infections is probable."

The prospect of a post-war epidemic of venereal disease may shock the layman, lulled by tales of the efficacy of the new remedies, but it does not surprise the experts. Military and civilian specialists whom I have consulted tell me that the sulfa drugs, ballyhooed three years ago as sure cures for four out of five cases of gonorrhea, have failed miserably to come up to expectations. Dr. Heller says that the sulfanamides actually cure less than 50 per cent of gonorrhea cases. Many patients have bad reactions when treated with sulfa drugs, and there are many strains of the gonococcus germ which resist sulfa treatment. Penicillin, however, has proved a true wonder drug, and the armed forces are using it instead of sulfa in all gonorrhea cases. Virtually all sulfa-resistant gonorrhea infections can be cleared up by a single dose of penicillin. Most syphilis cases can be successfully treated in eight days. But while penicillin clears up venereal disease with amazing speed, it doesn't prevent it. Ultimately, of course, its expanded use is bound to reduce the rate by eliminating sources of infection, but that time is still well in the future. Moreover, cautious scientists warn us that it is yet too soon to accept penicillin as a sure cure. They recall how the great Paul Ehrlich announced that his salvarsan (606) could cure syphilis in a single massive-dose treatment, only to find his "cured" patients straggling back because the spirochetes had been stunned, not killed. They say it will take several years of observation of persons who have been apparently cured to establish definitely the role of penicillin in the treatment of syphilis.

In the meantime, ironically enough, the publicity given to the penicillin cure is said to have been a factor in the rise of the venereal-disease rate. It is charged that knowledge of the new swift and sure treatment has encouraged sexual promiscuity and carelessness in the use of prophylactic safeguards. People say, "Gonorrhea is no worse than a cold." Unfortunately, gonorrhea and syphilis have in the past often left their victims with serious eye, heart, and nerve ailments, and nobody knows to what extent the danger of such complications has been removed by the new quick cure. Certainly a person who repeatedly gets infected with a venereal disease isn't doing his general health any good, even if the infection is cleared up on each occasion.

We all know that in time of war traditional moral barriers to sex promiscuity are let down. The wonder, say the experts, is not that the venereal-disease rate has risen but that it has not gone much higher under circumstances more favorable to the spread of the infection than have been present at any other time in recent history—millions of men and women in the prime of life leaving home for military service or war work, unprecedented mass migrations with large numbers of people moving from disease-ridden areas of the South to the Northern industrial centers, families broken up, emotional tensions heightened and moral inhibitions weakened by four years of war.

Prostitution, historically the greatest source of war-time venereal infection, was drastically curbed at the beginning of the war by effective federal control and the cooperation of local authorities. Red-light districts were closed down—at least for the duration—in more than six hundred American communities. Many vice rings were broken up. Some prostitutes, attracted by high war-industry wages, deserted their ancient profession for assembly lines. Stiff competition from growing numbers of amateurs discouraged others from plying their trade. Commercialized vice, therefore, has been a negligible factor in the venereal-disease rate among the armed forces. According to Colonel Sternberg, fully 90 per cent of the army's cases in this country are traceable to amateur girls—teen-agers and older women—popularly known as "khaki-wackies," "victory girls," and "good-time Charlottes."

The sharp war-time rise in infection has been world wide. Virtually no country has escaped. In the Scandinavian countries the great gains made against venereal disease in the past generation were wiped out during the Nazi occupation. Dr. Thorstein Guthe, Assistant Surgeon General of the Norwegian Public Health Service, recently reported that syphilis had increased sixfold in Norway and ninefold in Denmark. Neutral Sweden has had a rising rate since 1942.

The wide prevalence of venereal disease in Germany was a major factor in the army's non-fraternization policy. And the policy was abandoned when it was discovered that soldiers were failing to make use of prophylactic stations after trysts with German women and disregarding military orders to report for treatment because of their unwillingness to pay the $65 fine for fraternizing; the result was 13,000 cases of venereal disease among our soldiers in Germany in the first two months after V-E Day. A number of these men, it was found, were treating themselves with the sulfa pills in their first-aid kit. Such self-medication was dangerous because an overdose of sulfa pills might have grave consequences and an underdose might clear up the symptoms of gonorrhea without curing the disease. The army considered the situation so disturbing that it stopped including sulfa pills in the soldiers' emergency kits. Self-treatment with sulfa by civilians is also becoming a serious problem.

Incidentally, there need be no fear that thousands of G. I.'s will return home infected with a venereal disease. Before a soldier is discharged, he receives a thorough physical examination. If he is found to have a venereal infection, he is hospitalized until it is cleared up.

What worries the health officers is the probable resurgence of organized prostitution when war-time emergency controls are lifted. The police, it is feared, may sink back into their pre-war indulgence of the traffic, and unsettled economic conditions may favor its growth. There is also the danger that returning soldiers who have by necessity or choice practiced continence abroad and come back with an idealized vision of American womanhood may neglect prophylactic measures in casual intercourse with pickups. A "let's-bust-loose" spirit after the taut war years is foreseen.

Yet informed persons, while painting a dark picture of the immediate prospect, retain their faith in the ultimate conquest of venereal disease. They are confident that gonorrhea and syphilis can be eliminated as public-health problems within a generation if measures already known are more widely practiced. A severe outbreak of venereal disease is threatened. But it can be combated successfully by the retention of war-time control measures, closer cooperation between military and civilian authorities in a common drive against sources of the infection, teamwork in all agencies of government, and a greater awareness of the danger on the part of citizens.

Question Mark Over London

BY AYLMER VALLANCE

(The Nation's London correspondent)

London, September 13 (by cable)

A QUESTION mark over Lancaster House dominates the London sky. United only by a common desire to avoid publicity on their differences, the Foreign Ministers of the Big Five have gone underground with the prompt decisiveness of Alice's White Rabbit. The only hard news is the provisional adoption of an agenda comprising the questions specifically remitted by the Potsdam conference, namely, the formulation of peace treaties with Italy, Rumania, Bulgaria, Hungary, and Finland, leaving the possible inclusion of other business for later consideration.

Already there are signs of American-British divergence on the first item. It is agreed that Italy's colonial empire, except perhaps Tripoli, shall be liquidated by transference to trustee status. Secretary Byrnes, deprecating any unnecessary humiliation of the Italians, is likely to propose that Italy itself be the mandatory power. Bevin, modifying the original British proposal for the outright cession of Libya to the Senussi, will nevertheless, at the risk of arousing suspicions about British imperialist ambitions, press the claim for Britain to become trustee of Libya, Somaliland, and the coastal area of Eritrea, ceding Eritrea's inhospitable hinterland to Ethiopia. In this controversy Molotov will probably be neutral, but following the traditional lines of Russian bargaining tactics, he may initially support the extreme Yugoslav claims to Trieste, Istria, and Venezia Giulia, in order to make a deal on the basis of Anglo-American non-interference in Hungary, Rumania, and Bulgaria and a free hand for the U. S. S. R.—which Byrnes and Bevin will oppose—to negotiate with Turkey on condominium of the Straits. Since it will also be necessary to consider Greek and Yugoslav claims against Italy for reparations, the Greek claim, disputed by Turkey, to the Dodecanese Islands, and the Austrian demand, which Britain is inclined to support, for the return of South Tyrol, it is manifest that the Italian question by itself presents innumerable snags.

The real obstacles, however, to any progress in the settlement of affairs in Southeastern Europe are the following: First, Bevin's parliamentary statement on foreign policy poisoned the atmosphere and confirmed Russian suspicions that his demand for more representative Balkan governments means that British Labor is Social Democratic in the bad old sense of regarding communism as a worse enemy than reaction. With respect to the British left generally, these suspicions are wholly unjustified. The majority of Laborites recognize that the present shortcomings of Balkan democracy are inherent in the essentially revolutionary situation. Moreover, the Yugoslav, Hungarian, and Rumanian governments are executing admirable land-reform and social measures. Labor also realizes that Anglo-American intervention, however well-intentioned, in behalf of the few undiscredited Social Democrats in those countries is bound, as in Greece, to achieve the unhappy result of intensifying the political division between irreconcilable extremes. Nevertheless, it is essensential to recognize that Moscow shares the belief current in Budapest, Belgrade, and Bucharest that Bevin and Byrnes are maneuvering in preparation for an anti-Bolshevik crusade. Unless these suspicions, however ridiculous, are promptly dissipated, Molotov will stall every Anglo-American proposal for Southeastern Europe.

The second difficulty is found in the big question: Can any finality be reached in the Italian and Balkan settlements isolated from the whole complex problem of European reconstruction? The terms of reference emanating from Potsdam have already been outdated by the overwhelming threat of economic chaos centered in Germany, causing a continent-wide coal famine and a breakdown of transportation. The test of this conference will be its ability to take a last chance to lay the foundations of European cooperation before catastrophe comes, a catastrophe which, according to sober estimates here, would bring more than ten million deaths this winter.

There is a great deal of interest here in the French policy enunciated by De Gaulle in favor of international control of the Ruhr, with allocation of output according to the needs of Germany and the other European countries. De Gaulle's supplementary proposals are not favored by the British left. Except in the improbable event of the French administration creating living conditions superior to those of Germany, permanent French occupation of the west bank of the Rhine would create a German irredentist minority, necessitating the regime of a police state likely to infect the whole of France. The big advance, however, is De Gaulle's recognition that the economy of Europe is essentially dependent on German productivity, which can probably be exploited without risking the reemergence of German domination if Ruhr and also Rhine transport are controlled by an international authority.

If the conference wrangles jealously over the precise administration of the Italian colonies or the niceties of balance among the parties in the Balkan Cabinets while refugee-thronged Central Europe sinks into starvation and pestilence for lack of purposive international economic controls, it will be an indelible crime against humanity.

How St. Louis Got the News

BY WILLARD SHELTON

St. Louis, Mo., September 13

THE bitter three-week showdown fight between half a dozen newspaper unions here and the managements of the Globe-Democrat, Star-Times, and Post-Dispatch was not adequately reported nationally. The unions won—and it is possible that their victory forestalled the outbreak of labor-weakening campaigns by newspaper managements in other cities.

The unions in the fight, most of which were originally innocent bystanders, are not sure that the St. Louis publishers planned an effort to "teach labor its place," but they believe that if they had lost their battle here, the pattern of the St. Louis conflict might have been repeated elsewhere. One of the Newspaper Guild leaders charges that a new "Mohawk Valley formula" might have been created; and he thinks that the unions checkmated such a possibility with a "Mississippi Valley formula" of their own.

The fight began in the troubled area of relations between publishers and the Carriers' Union (A. F. L.), the same area of conflict which recently handicapped New York newspaper deliveries. The Carriers here had been certified as an appropriate bargaining unit by the National Labor Relations Board, and when the managements still refused to bargain collectively, the union struck. The Pressmen's Union, with which the Carriers here are affiliated, refused to cross the picket lines, and that shut the papers. But the most drastic action was the publishers' next step: all three promptly dismissed most of their remaining employees—editorial, commercial, and mechanical—and the fat was in the fire. The Guild (C. I. O.) and the Typographical, Stereotypers', Mailers', and Engravers' unions (A. F. L.) charged "lockout" and organized for cooperative action.

Spokesmen for management deny that in this course they had any intention of union-busting. They base their case against the Carriers' Union on genuine principle; and apparently some managements did not expect a strike.

The St. Louis Carriers were, to a degree, independent merchants. They bought newspapers at wholesale and themselves hired employees to deliver at retail. They bought and sold delivery routes at an average price of about $9,000; this was a developed trade practice, and the publishers had never received any revenue from sales of routes. The managements had merely a practical veto power over such sales by a carrier.

The managements would bargain collectively with the Carriers, they said, if the Carriers wanted to be considered employees in the full sense of the word. But if the Carriers wanted their "property rights" in the routes confirmed, as they did, then the newspapers argued that they were merchants, not employees. The publishers would be liable to state and federal anti-trust prosecutions, their spokesmen said, if they bargained collectively with "merchants" to fix prices. Let the Carriers make up their minds, said the managements, whether to be employees or merchants.

Even after the conflict was settled, the publishers insisted that they had been deprived of a fair test of their position. Under the Wagner Act an employee cannot seek court review of an NLRB certification of a "bargaining unit." The publishers asked the Carriers' Union to file charges of unfair labor practices so that the whole issue could eventually be reviewed in court, but the Carriers refused; after winning the NLRB case they preferred to fight with economic weapons alone.

The locked-out unions kept their heads and rejected rash counsels that they retaliate by calling a strike themselves. Their first step was to set up an Inter-Union Conciliation Committee, which attempted to mediate the dispute between publishers and Carriers. The Guild and the A. F. of L. mechanical unions never declared themselves, in fact, in support of the Carriers' position.

They did, however, take steps to protect themselves. After sitting for fifteen days without jobs, they got out a newspaper themselves. The news-starved people of St. Louis bought it avidly, and as a public service and a source of income for the jobless, the project was a brilliant success.

The St. Louis Daily News ran just five days and will probably never be published again. It operated under handicaps; its wire service was Trans-Radio Press, and it was printed in a commercial plant, with an apartment above the plant serving as "editorial offices." Its daily press run was restricted because of rationing to 100,000 copies, four pages on week days and eight on Sunday, but it printed brief accounts of the essential news. It also gave the locked-out unions a medium of expression, and they did not hesitate to say how they felt at being abruptly laid off their regular jobs. On Wednesday, September 5, the War Production Board allotted sufficient newsprint to the union paper to let it print 300,000 copies of a twelve-page daily. The next day the managements of the regular dailies settled with the Carriers' Union, agreeing to buy out the Carriers' routes and bargain collectively. They settled another protracted dispute with the Typographical Union with retroactive pay increases and agreed to full back pay for all employees laid off during the strike.

What can fairly be charged against the St. Louis managements? The afternoon papers—the Star-Times and the Post-Dispatch—are famous fighting exponents of liberalism. They are not afraid of local commercial and banking pressure, which is a major test of journalistic liberalism. It is difficult to believe that their responsible managements would deliberately embark on a union-weakening campaign.

Yet the fact remains that the controversy was eventually resolved on terms which the Carriers themselves had originally proposed as an acceptable compromise. When the pressmen closed the papers, the managements the same afternoon began sending out telegrams dismissing their remaining staffs, except department heads, "until further notice." Some of these telegrams were delivered late at night to employees who had given twenty to fifty years of loyal service. The haste with which the managements decided on this serious step argues premeditation, and this view is supported by the fact that discussions with the Carriers had proceeded for many months and none of the other unions knew a crisis was approaching or what the managements intended to do. Interestingly enough, a few years ago all St. Louis newspapers purchased strike insurance.

Had the unions been beaten, additional cases might have arisen in which publishers, resisting one union, would adopt the same strategy of a complete shutdown and lockout against other employees. The Mississippi Valley plan, under which the Inter-Union Conciliation Committee issued a newspaper which both served the community and gained revenue, seems likely to discourage such attempts. The elements of the union victory were C. I. O.-A. F. of L. solidarity and brilliant labor leadership.

In the Wind

LAISSEZ FAIRE: Daddy Warbucks has suffered the slings and arrows of reduced fortune during the war. When asked by naive little Orphan Annie why "some papers and commentators" said horrid things about him, Daddy answered, "Oh, I guess it was fashionable to sneer at 'big incomes.' . . . They fail to mention that most of those big incomes go to pay everybody's bills, and make the load lighter for everyone else! I believe that the more a man makes honestly, the more he helps this country and everybody in it. . . . What I think we need is a lot more million-a-year men! Mighty little they can keep anyway. . . ."

DEFINITION: The Texas public was further enlightened by this maxim which appeared in the Austin American on August 2: "Anti-discrimination means you can force somebody to give you a job if you're one of a minority, but otherwise you must take what is left."

V-W DAY: The Wall Street Journal is joyous over the surrender—of the workers. In its issue of August 23 front-page headlines read: "Employers' Turn; Workers Accept End of Coast's War-Boom Employment Gracefully; Firms Revel in Luxury of Insisting on Competence; Youngsters Are Resentful." The article goes on to say: "And except for the tantrums of a few youngsters who never had to hold a job under peace-time conditions, labor is taking its new status gracefully."

CHALLENGE: A note by Walter B. Pitkin in the recent book "Population Roads to Peace and War" says: "While the authors of this book were correcting the galley proofs, in March, 1945, General Charles de Gaulle appointed an eight-man commission to add 12,000,000 babies to the population of France within the next decade."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. We will pay $1 for each item accepted.]

BOOKS and the ARTS

Christianity and Revolution

BY HANNAH ARENDT

WHILE it is already obvious that the Christian churches in Europe have survived fascism, war, and occupation in their religious as well as their organizational aspects, it is still a question whether we shall see a general Christian and especially Catholic revival in French and intellectual life. There is no doubt about the part played by various Catholic movements and individuals in the Resistance or about the impeccable attitude of the greater part of the lower clergy. This does not mean, however, that these Catholics have a political position of their own. At the moment it looks rather as if the old anti-clerical passions are no longer alive in France—in contrast to Spain and probably Italy—and as if one of the most important issues in French domestic politics since the days of the Revolution is about to depart quietly from the political scene.

We have witnessed one wave of neo-Catholic revival after another since the period of fin de siècle decadence by which they were partly engendered. It started at the time of the Dreyfus affair with the famous "Catholics without faith," who later developed into the Action Française, were condemned by the Pope in 1926, and ended by bowing before their real master, Mr. Hitler. With their boundless admiration of organization for organization's sake, they were the degenerated disciples of De Maistre, that great champion of reaction and greater master of French prose. And one must admit that they brought into the dead boredom of reactionary theories the violence of polemic and some passion of argument.

The "Catholics without faith" loved the church—which is still the greatest example of authoritarian organization and as such has withstood two thousand years of history; they had an open contempt for the content of Christian faith precisely because of its inherent democratic elements. They were Catholics because they hated democracy; they were as much attracted by De Maistre's hangman as the most reliable pillar of society and by the possibility of domination through a hierarchy as they were disgusted by the teachings of charity and the equality of man.

But side by side with these dilettantes of fascism there sprang up a very different Catholic revival movement, whose greatest representatives were Péguy and Bernanos in France and Chesterton in England. These too sought escape from the modern world and, therefore, sometimes stumbled into unhappy alliances with the "Catholics without faith," alliances in which they naturally were destined to play the role of suckers. Witness Jacques Maritain's relations with the Action Française—or the strange friendship between G. K. Chesterton and Hilaire Belloc. For what these men hated in the modern world was not democracy but the lack of it. They saw through the appearances of democracies which might be more accurately described as plutocracies and through the trimmings of a republic which was much rather a political machine. What they sought was freedom for the people and reason for the mind. What they started from was a deep hatred of bourgeois society, which they knew was essentially anti-democratic and fundamentally perverted. What they fought against always was the insidious invasion of bourgeois morals and standards into all walks of life and all classes of the people. They were indeed struggling against something very ominous, which scarcely a socialist—whose political party, according to Péguy, "is completely composed of bourgeois intellectuals"—clearly realized, namely, the all-pervading influence of bourgeois mentality in the modern world.

It is a remarkable phenomenon, and something to start our progressives thinking, that as far as polemics go these Catholic converts or neo-Catholics have come out as victors. There are no more devastating, amusing, or better-written polemics against the host of modern superstitions, from Christian Science to gymnastics as a means of salvation, to teetotalism, and Krishnamurti, than Chesterton's essays. It was Péguy who discovered and defined the essential difference between poverty—which was always a virtue, for Roman republicans as well as for Christian medievals—and destitution, which is the modern plague reserved for those who refuse the pursuit of money and the humiliations of success. And it was, finally, Bernanos who wrote the most passionate denunciation of fascism—"Les grands cimetières sous la lune"—a knight without fear or reproach, unhampered by any admiration for "historical greatness" and untouched by any secret desire for the necessity of evil.

On the other hand, it must be admitted that none of these individuals was a great philosopher and that this movement did not produce a single great artist. Although both Chesterton and Péguy wrote good poetry, neither will be remembered primarily for his poems. With the exception of "The Man Who Was Thursday," Chesterton's novels are only another form of the essay, and Bernanos's novels are of little interest. Nor was there among them a great theologian. The only neo-Catholic of importance who ventured into this field was Léon Bloy—with rather crude and absurd results, which, theologically speaking, were always on the border line of heresy and sometimes approached the border line of bohemian Kitsch: he maintained, for instance, that women should be either saints or whores, for while saints may be forced by circumstances to descend to the level of the whore, and whores may always become saints, the honest woman of bourgeois society is lost beyond salvation.

Since the turn of the century these converts, it would seem, have felt that their proper field was politics and their task to become true revolutionaries, that is, more radical than the radicals. And in a sense they were right, right at least as long as they remained in the negative and took the offensive. It certainly was more radical to repeat that "it is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God" than to quote economic laws. When Chesterton describes the rich man who for the pretended sake of humanity has adopted some fancy new vegetarian rule as the man who does not go "without gardens and gorgeous rooms which poor men can't enjoy" but has "abolished meat because poor men like meat," or when he denounces the "modern philanthropist" who does not give up "petrol or . . . servants" but rather "some simple universal things" like "beef or sleep, because these pleasures remind him that he is only a man"—then Chesterton has better described the fundamental ambitions of the ruling classes than have all the academic discussions of the functions of capitalists. And in Péguy's endless repetition, "All evil comes from the bourgeoisie," is more elementary hatred than in the collected speeches of Jaurès.

With the whole of Western culture at stake once bourgeois rule had entered the path of imperialism, it is not surprising that the oldest weapons, the fundamental convictions of Western mankind, sufficed to show at least the extent of the evil. The great advantage of these neo-Catholic writers was that when they went back to Christianity they broke with the standards of their surroundings more radically than any other sect or party. It was their instinct as publicists which pushed them into the church. They were looking for arms, and were ready to take them wherever they found them; and they found better ones in the oldest arsenal than in the half-baked half-truths of modernity. Publicists and journalists are always in a hurry—that is their occupational disease. Here were arms that one could take up in a hurry; had not two thousand years proved their utility? The best among the converts knew from bitter experience how much better it was, how much freer one could remain, and how much more reasonable, if one accepted the single great assumption which Christian faith exacts than if one remained in the turmoil of modernism, which enforces every other day, with a maximum of fanaticism, another absurd doctrine.

There was something more in Christianity than its highly useful denunciation of the rich man as a wicked man. The insistence of the Christian doctrine upon man's limited condition was somehow enough of a philosophy to allow its adherents a very deep insight into the essential inhumanity of all those modern attempts—psychological, technical, biological—to change man into the monster of a superman. They realized that a pursuit of happiness which actually means to wipe away all tears will pretty quickly end by wiping out all laughter. It was again Christianity which taught them that nothing human can exist beyond tears and laughter, except the silence of despair. This is the reason why Chesterton, having once and for all accepted the tears, could put real laughter into his most violent attacks.

If this is the case of the publicists and journalists among the neo-Catholics, the case of the philosophers is slightly different and slightly embarrassing. The point is that philosophers by definition are supposed not to be in a hurry. If one is to judge by the book recently published by Raïssa Maritain,* it was not hatred of bourgeois society which brought the Maritains into the church—although M. Maritain was a socialist in his youth; it was, as Mme Maritain insists time and again, the need for "spiritual guidance." At the time of their conversion it is probable that both of them, and not only Mme Maritain, "had by instinct an insuperable apprehension toward anything concerning political activity, in which I saw—and still do—the domain of what St. Paul calls the evil of time." What separated them from Péguy—a former friendship broke up, strangely enough, because of their conversion—was precisely that they wanted first of all to save their souls, a preoccupation which played no great role in either Péguy's or Chesterton's Catholicism.

The Maritains became converts after having been exposed to the anti-intellectualism of Bergson. It is all to Jacques Maritain's credit that Bergson's attack on reason frightened him so much; the question is only whether a philosopher is allowed to seek shelter so quickly and so desperately. It is true that the teachings of the church still represent a stronghold of human reason, and it is quite understandable that in the day-by-day fight publicists like Péguy and Chesterton took cover as quickly as possible. They were no philosophers, and all they needed was a fighting faith. What Maritain wanted was one certainty which would lead him out of the complexities and confusions of a world that does not even know what a man is talking about if he takes the word truth into his mouth.

But the truth is a rather difficult deity to worship because the only thing she does not allow her worshipers is certainty. Philosophy concerned with truth ever was and probably always will be a kind of docta ignorantia—highly learned and therefore highly ignorant. The certainties of Thomas Aquinas afford excellent spiritual guidance and are still much superior to almost anything in the way of certainties which has been invented in more recent times. But certainty is not truth, and a system of certainties is the end of philosophy. This is the reason why one may be allowed to doubt very strongly that Thomism will ever be able to bring about a revival of philosophy.

BRIEFER COMMENT

A Poet and His Prose

IN HIS EXCELLENT INTRODUCTION to a selection of Whitman's prose and poetry (Viking, $2) Mark Van Doren remarks that some "consider it a special glory to cease being critical as soon as Whitman's poetry heaves in sight." The consequence is that most readers are for or against Whitman as if he were a candidate for public office. And "Leaves of Grass" is regarded as a sacred text or as the shouting and braggadocio of an overwrought barker. In this new edition the editor's commentary and the ample representation of Whitman's prose should help the reader to see how false both these views are. A poet's prose is always likely to provide a fresh light upon his poetry. This is all the more true of Whitman because of the extent to which his poetry is doctrinal and declarative. In prose, doctrine and declaration require the support of fact and argument. In poetry, invocations and exclamation points may often conceal the absence of perception and understanding. For this reason Whitman's prose can give the reader a purified knowledge of his poetry.

---

*"Adventures in Grace." Longmans, Green, and Company. $2.75.

MONEY-SAVING MAGAZINE COMBINATIONS

For Your Convenience

The Nation

☐ with Harpers Magazine . . $6.50
You Save $2.50

☐ with Consumers Union . . $7.00
You Save $1.50

☐ with Harpers Magazine and Consumers Union . $9.00
You Save $3.50

☐ with Free World $7.50
You Save $1.50

☐ with Saturday Review . . $8.50
You Save $1.50

All club combinations listed are for one year, and may be mailed to different individuals and addresses.

THE NATION by itself

☐ One Year $5 ☐ Two Years $8 ☐ Three Years $11

☐ Servicemen's Rate $3 a Year

Canadian and Foreign Postage $1 a year extra

★

SPECIAL NOTICE TO READERS

To Subscribers:

Nation subscribers should give us at least three weeks' notice of a change of address, indicating the old as well as the new address.

Please cooperate by renewing your current subscription on receipt of the first notice of expiration.

To Newsstand Readers:

The only certain way of getting The Nation regularly is to enter a subscription. By doing so you will not only insure prompt receipt of your copy, but you will make a considerable saving in money over the newsstand price.

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

I want to subscribe to The Nation, or the following Nation magazine combinations as listed below:

☐ Remittance enclosed. ☐ Bill me.

NAME
STREET
CITY ZONE STATE
9-22-45

Whitman was in love with experience to the point of morbid infatuation. He was also in love with the idea of experience. The idea of experience is to actual experience as a slick travel folder is to the trip itself; which is to say, there is little resemblance. In "Leaves of Grass" Whitman tried to force his genuine experience to be a kind of witness or proof of his idea of experience, which he further identified with his ideas about America and democracy. In his prose, however, doctrine can be seen apart from observation, and the reader can return to "Leaves of Grass" with an exact measure of Whitman's systematic overestimation of experience. "Democratic Vistas" shows Whitman attempting to justify his idea of democracy against his observation of the degradation and greed of post bellum America. "Speciman Days" records Whitman's daily cultivation of experience, when he did not feel bound to make extraordinary claims for all experience merely because he sometimes had a good time. By confronting the reader with Whitman's prose and poetry in the same volume, this new edition gives the reader the kind of help he really needs.

DELMORE SCHWARTZ

Once Over Lightly

HARVEY WISH'S "Contemporary America: The National Scene Since 1900" (Harper, $4) is the most recent of a number of serious volumes dealing with twentieth-century American history. The book is competently written, mildly liberal in viewpoint, and exploits to good advantage the available secondary sources. It is, moreover, extremely readable and surprisingly free from major errors. Dr. Wish frankly follows the approach of such cultural historians as James Harvey Robinson and Arthur M. Schlesinger, and valiantly attempts to touch upon almost every aspect of American life. Twentieth-century literature, religion, music, architecture, philosophy, education, and psychiatry, among other subjects, receive treatment, together with more formal political and economic history and foreign affairs.

Within the covers of a 650-page book Dr. Wish has attempted to synthesize his material in terms of "the impact of the metropolis and mature capitalism on American behavior," but the resulting pattern is, unhappily, somewhat superficial and glib. While "Contemporary America" will give the reader a nodding acquaintance with many aspects of American society, it will not provide him with the information or the theoretical framework for coming to grips with major historical forces and developments. The means for understanding the structure and changes of the economy, the behavior of the labor movement, and the character of party politics, for example, are lacking. Nor do the progressive movements early in the century and after the First World War, the prosperity of the twenties, the problem of the farmer, and the depression of 1929 receive the depth or even the extent of treatment they deserve.

In the one paragraph devoted to "explaining" the depression of 1929, Dr. Wish stops short with the observation that "World War tax burdens, unprecedented armament costs, insurmountable tariff barriers, and a persistent decline of agricultural prices were among the international factors leading to the crash of 1929. In the United States . . . additional elements of weakness appeared not only in the low purchasing power of our farmers, but especially in the inadequate banking control exercised by local governments and the extraordinary increase of funds which poured into the stock market." This is perhaps the most striking illustration of the one-dimensional character of much of the volume and of the author's caution in rendering judgments.

HENRY DAVID

The New Order in Asia

NOW THAT THE JAPANESE are once more bidding for the sympathies of the world, it is worth remembering the misery which they inflicted on millions of helpless people in Asia. It is easy today to underrate the Japanese. But the record of the Japanese techniques of occupation as presented by Robert S. Ward in "Asia for the Asiatics?" (University of Chicago Press, $3) shows them to have been resourceful as well as ruthless foes. Mr. Ward was in the Foreign Service in Hongkong at the start of the war. He went through the siege, saw the Japanese capture the city psychologically, financially, and economically as well as militarily. The pattern of Japanese rule, which was virtually the same in every city conquered by them throughout Asia, is somewhat confusing to the Western mind, but it was undeniably effective. Under pressure the Chinese, who had been the political and business leaders of the colony under the British, took similar positions under the Japanese. All the movable resources of the colony were seized and, in many instances, transported to Japan. The banking structure was taken over, and by skilful manipulation all money and currency were diverted to Japanese purposes. This looting of the immense resources of the colony often appeared to be uncontrolled; actually it was carried out in accordance with carefully drawn directives from Tokyo. The social and cultural life of the community was also closely regimented. And while the Japanese, to be sure, were never able to win over the minds of the Chinese, they were successful in stirring up a considerable amount of anti-British sentiment and in keeping the people from being aware of the basic issues of the war. The full significance of Tokyo's impact can, of course, only be judged after liberation. But no one can read this book without becoming aware of the immense problems that liberation creates for the peoples of occupied Asia.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

Yankee City

THE THIRD VOLUME of the monumental study of Yankee City, "The Social Systems of American Ethnic Groups," by W. Lloyd Warner and Leo Srole (Yale, $4), deals with the ethnic groups that make up half the population of an industrial New England community of about 17,000 people. They are the Irish, French Canadians, Jews, Italians, Armenians, Greeks, Poles, and Russians—approximately in that order of size and arrival. Using the formidable statistical equipment familiar from the earlier volumes, this study shows how the ethnic groups rise in the Yankee City class system, how their families and churches approximate the native American forms, how they attempt to "become Americans" and at the same time give their children some of the ethnic culture.

A GREAT RALLY—A GREAT CAUSE!

SALUTE TO SPANISH REPUBLICANS

MADISON SQUARE GARDEN

Monday, Sept. 24th, 7:30 P. M.

SPEAKERS

HAROLD LASKI, Chairman British Labor Party
(By radio from London)
ISABEL DE PALENCIA NORMAN CORWIN
BARTLEY CRUM, Chairman
LISA SERGIO JOHANNES STEEL
RICHARD FRANKENSTEEN,
Vice Pres. United Auto Workers of America
EDWIN FRANKO GOLDMAN BAND
Directed by Mr. Goldman

BROADWAY AND HOLLYWOOD TRIBUTE TO SPANISH REPUBLICAN FIGHTERS

TICKETS from $3.60 to $.60 for sale at

Leblang's Ticket Agency, 1476 Broadway
Workers Book Shop, 50 East 13th Street
Book Fair, 133 West 44th Street
Music Room, 129 West 44th Street
Veterans of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade, 13 Astor Place

Sponsored by the

SPANISH REFUGEE APPEAL
192 Lexington Ave., N. Y. 16, N. Y.

Fall Book Number

Reviews of the more important books appearing at the onset of the Fall publishing season will be featured by THE NATION in its regular Fall Book Number, to appear on October 13.

Publishers wishing to utilize the special advantages offered by this feature issue for advertising of better books are urged to make space reservations at once. Deadlines: for space reservations, Oct. 1; for final OK's or complete plates, Oct. 4. Publishers' advertising rate, $200 per page. For information, phone BArclay 7-1066 or write

ADVERTISING DEPARTMENT

THE Nation

20 VESEY STREET NEW YORK 7, N. Y.

The authors conclude their work with a theory of the rate of assimilation of ethnic groups in America. What they choose to call "assimilation," however, seems by their own evidence to be no more than acculturation. Though the American-born generations of ethnic groups reject—the Jews most quickly, the Catholic French Canadians and Irish most slowly—the ethnic language and culture, though they are skilful at learning American culture patterns in public schools and through contact with natives, they still form separate communities. (The crucial data on intermarriage among ethnic groups is unfortunately not given.)

The theory put forth in the last chapter of this book asserts that the rate at which ethnic groups assimilate (the authors mean both assimilate and acculturate) is governed by their likeness, racially and culturally, to the native. The racial or color factor is by far the most important one: thus, Light Caucasoid Protestants (Scandinavians) are assimilated faster than Dark Caucasoid Protestants (Armenians), but these assimilate faster than Dark Caucasoid Catholics (Italians). Thirty categories are thus distinguished—to form a scale which measures the assimilability of ethnic groups in America under present social conditions.

The scale does not seem to me to be a reliable instrument for predicting the ultimate limits of assimilability for ethnic groups, a purpose for which the authors try to use it. Real physical and cultural differences—all that the scale takes into account—are irrelevant to assimilability. American anti-Semites will be as little concerned with niceties of skin-color and dialect among the three kinds of Jews distinguished by the scale as were their German brothers; and the Protestant Negro of Category 25 will not find it less impossible to assimilate than the heathen West African of Category 30. Study of the natives of Yankee City would seem to be more important in ascertaining the limits of assimilability than the present magnificent investigation of the ethnic groups.

NATHAN GLAZER

FICTION IN REVIEW

THIS department has been silent for several weeks now, waiting out what it hoped was only the usual summer doldrums, and looking to September, the reviewer's month. But although September, come and almost gone, has brought the inevitable historical romances, psychological thrillers, and O. Henry Prize Stories, not to mention what seems to be the fiftieth full-length production of Faith Baldwin, it has not brought the anticipated relief from the summer's aridity. Of the new fall books, so far, none comes near providing the mature and integrated experience we want in a novel, and only three are even interesting for the light they throw on the psychological temper of the times, which makes the writing of good fiction so difficult.

The most ambitious of this trio is Kenneth Patchen's "The Memoirs of a Shy Pornographer" (New Directions, $3). Mr. Patchen's novel is written in a manner that is still called, I believe, experimental; which is to say that it conforms to no conventional fictional form except the already well-established convention of no form. It is an account of the adventures of a young man who meets fame through the publication of a book in which so many words are replaced with asterisks that it becomes a pornographic sensation. I found this a very funny point of departure for a satire, and indeed, throughout his book, Mr. Patchen gives proof of marked satiric gifts: he is exceedingly knowing, he has a very fertile imagination, and he would seem to be at ease in the world. And yet "The Memoirs of a Shy Pornographer" never does fulfil the promise of its opening. Both Mr. Patchen's intellect and his fantasy are put at the service of a playful destructiveness; they are the instruments of neither an understanding nor an ordering of Mr. Patchen's world. That is, whatever his apparent ease, Mr. Patchen is far too disconcerted by the complicated society which has educated him, and to which he has access at so many points, to be able to face up to its literary challenge. Even as a satirist he cannot be effectual because he is himself overwhelmed by society's effects.

And in Wilder Hobson's "All Summer Long" (Duell, Sloan, and Pearce, $2.50) one sees something of the same phenomenon. Any resemblance between Mr. Patchen's book and Mr. Hobson's, it must be made clear, is wholly fundamental; on the surface, and even several layers below the surface, no two books could be less alike. Where Mr. Patchen's novel is avant-garde in manner, Mr. Hobson's seems to stem from the tradition of Max Beerbohm and the Yellow Book. Nor do I think Mr. Hobson intended his story of a Brooklyn Heights gambling casino and its habitués to have any satiric value; he would seem to have had in mind only what he accomplished—a mannerly, craftsmanlike job of light fiction on a sophisticated level. But authors of novels say more than they mean to say. Whether they intend it or not, they speak for a culture, and it is the contrast, in "All Summer Long" as in "Memoirs of a Shy Pornographer," between the author's obvious advantages of education and experience, and the distance he keeps between himself and the world—his refusal, that is, to take responsibility for what he sees and knows—that gives Mr. Hobson's book its cultural significance. Mr. Patchen's novel may be in the literary vanguard while Mr. Hobson's is in the literary rearguard, in the sense, I mean, of its turn-of-the-century style. But the two are identically situated in relation to the central literary problem of our time—the problem of how to take hold of life instead of being inundated by it or a spectator at it.

The third novel of my trio, "Rain Before Seven," by Marc Brandel (Harper, $2), is a rather different case. Though there are reasons to see it as a product of the same culture that produced Mr. Patchen's book and Mr. Hobson's, it outsmarts both of them by falling back on a literary orthodoxy. Mr. Brandel has a much better device for remaining on the sidelines—a good artificial plot. If he is no more willing than the author of "Memoirs of a Shy Pornographer" or the author of "All Summer Long" to face up to life, and if he shares their sin of being up on things rather than in them, he at least substitutes for the responsibility of thinking and feeling the full responsibility of story-telling. Well-written, often witty, and, except for a stretch just before the end, very successful in its suspense, "Rain Before Seven" is the tale of a group of people whose fate is involved with a young man who has a torturing presentiment that he will bring them disaster. I mentioned the connection between

Mr. Hobson's style and Max Beerbohm's; the connection between Mr. Brandel's theme and a famous Beerbohm theme will immediately suggest itself. (Mr. Brandel himself acknowledges the "purely satirical" similarity between his narrative and "The Bridge of San Luis Rey.") But dramatic contrivance saves "Rain Before Seven" the subtly archaic Beerbohm-ish tone that pervades Mr. Hobson's novel, just as it saves it the free-wheeling fantasy of Mr. Patchen's novel.

DIANA TRILLING

CONTRIBUTORS

HANNAH ARENDT has recently contributed articles on politics to the Jewish Frontier, Review of Politics, Partisan Review, and other journals. She is at work now on a book on imperialism.

DELMORE SCHWARTZ, teacher of English at Harvard, is the author of "In Dreams Begin Responsibilities," "Shenandoah," and other books of poetry.

HENRY DAVID is professor of history at Queens College and the author of "The Haymarket Affair" and other books.

NATHAN GLAZER has taught Oriental and African languages at the University of Pennsylvania. He is now on the staff of Commentary.

STAGE PLAY

MICHAEL TODD Presents
UP IN CENTRAL PARK
Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS
Lyrics by DOROTHY FIELDS
Music by SIGMUND ROMBERG
BROADWAY THEATRE, Broadway & 53rd Street. Matinees Wed. & Sat.
REALLY AIR-CONDITIONED

SPECIAL
Class Room Rate
only 25¢ monthly per Student for orders of ten or more copies to be sent to one address.
Desk Copy Is Free!
ADDRESS YOUR ORDERS TO
THE Nation
20 VESEY STREET • NEW YORK CITY

MOTION PICTURES

Manhattan
ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st ST.
86th ST.
58th ST. near Lex.
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENT
RIVERSIDE
23rd ST.

Bronx
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL

Westchester
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

RKO NOW
"Great, Good Fun" —Herald-Tribune
"Mirth Runs Wild" —World-Telegram
GARY COOPER
LORETTA YOUNG
in NUNNALLY JOHNSON'S
'Along Came Jones'
From the novel by ALAN LE MAY
— Plus —
'China's Little Devils' with Harry Carey Paul Kelly

Brooklyn
BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYOU Coney Island

Queens
ALDEN Jamaica
Keith's FLUSHING
Keith's RICH. HILL
STRAND Far Rockaway

Gripping Psychological Melodrama!
"Cool and Calculated Shocker."—New York Times
HUMPHREY BOGART
ALEXIS SMITH • SYDNEY GREENSTREET
"CONFLICT"
— Plus —
'MAMMA LOVES PAPA' with LEON ERROLL

Paramount Presents
ED GARDNER'S
"DUFFY'S TAVERN"
FEATURING
32 HOLLYWOOD STARS
IN PERSON
THE ANDREWS SISTERS
Featuring
Tim Herbert
Vic Shoen And His Recording Orchestra
Foy Willing's Riders of the Purple Sage
Pig-Meat Alamo Markham
COOL PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

"It is a brilliantly composed screen tribute to the courage and perseverence of our fighting men. . . ."
—Crowther, N. Y. Times
General Dwight D. Eisenhower's
THE TRUE GLORY
Distributed by COLUMBIA PICTURES
Now Playing VICTORIA B'way & 46th St.

Isabel
de Palencia

author of I Must Have Liberty, tells the dramatic story of the Spanish Republicans in exile and their fight to keep the spirit of Spanish democracy alive.

SMOULDERING FREEDOM

"Isabel de Palencia, except for former Premier Negrin himself, is perhaps the best-known Spanish refugee in America and has sallied forth from her Mexican home a dozen times to plead the cause of Spain in America. Her new book is well-timed, reminding us at the hour of victory over German and Japanese Fascism that a dictator, who gained complete power in 1939 through democratic indifference, still mars the surface of a peaceful world.

"Smouldering Freedom is a healthy manifestation of how deeply democracy had won its way into the Spanish people in the few short years Republican Spain had. It's also a stern reminder of the unfinished war against Fascism—as the Spanish version spreads out through our entire hemisphere through the Falange." —Ralph Peterson, Chicago Sun Book Week

At all bookstores • $3.00

LONGMANS, GREEN & COMPANY
New York Toronto

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

Is This a White Man's Country?

[Sgt. Richard Naito, whose letter is published below, is one of two Japanese Americans who were refused membership in Spokane Post 51 of the Veterans of Foreign Wars. His case was referred to by Carey McWilliams in last week's issue. Sgt. Naito's letter, addressed to the Spokane post, reached us through the courtesy of the American Veterans' Committee Bulletin.]

Dear Sirs: I have received your letter of June 8, 1945, telling me that Post No. 51, V. F. W., has rejected my application for membership. Your letter indicates that the sole reason for the rejection was the fact that I am of Japanese ancestry. It also states that the action does not reflect the opinion of the majority of your membership but was caused by the prejudice of a "few" members, of whom it takes only three to result in rejection of an application.

Twelve months ago on a hot day I was lying in the fields near Pisa, my right leg shattered by a German bullet. Enemy resistance was terrific. Our advance was stopped. I lay there in that field for ten hours, half delirious from pain, almost crazed with fear of enemy artillery that burst around me.

Today on American soil, thousands of miles from Pisa, I have been wounded again by another weapon—hypocrisy, prejudice, call it what you will. Little did I expect as I lay wounded on the battlefield that upon my return home to the people for whom I fought and suffered I would be repudiated!

Like many another American I did not wait for the draft but volunteered to perform what I felt was my duty. The duty to which I refer is the preservation of American democracy. I would like to ask those who rejected me for what principles they fought. Could it be possible that they indorse the statement of a certain California lawyer who defended the burning of a Japanese American's home by saying, "This is a white man's country, let's keep it that way"?

I wonder how the statement of that lawyer would have sounded in the Vosges Mountains, at the moment that the "lost battalion" of white Americans was being rescued by the 442d Infantry Regiment, composed of Japanese Americans. Tears shed by the rescued and by the rescuers on that occasion were not manufactured in Hollywood.

While I keenly feel resentment, I do not seek retaliation. I am satisfied that I have performed fully my silent duty as a soldier of war. I turn now to perform my duty as a soldier of peace, a peace that must mean the pursuit of happiness for all Americans, regardless of race or creed.

At the front lines there is a wholesome lack of prejudice. No G. I. under the pressure of imminent death turns to repudiate his comrades-in-arms because of race or creed. Why then must an organization like the Veterans of Foreign Wars, which is composed of my overseas comrades, shun me and my people on American soil? Such an organization should be the very one to advertise the virtues of the Japanese Americans by accepting them into its fold. If an organization like the V. F. W. is going to reject G. I.'s because of race, then what chance do we have to be treated properly by the rest of society?

We who have shown our unequivocal loyalty by positive action on the battlefield and elsewhere against our fascist enemies have no choice and no desire but to remain Americans. It would be tragedy indeed if we were not accepted as such.

Responsible Americans, Americans who treasure the things for which this terrible war is being fought, must not lose sight of the positive duty which is at hand. Suppression of minorities, no matter how slight or isolated, cannot be ignored. These are the small acorns from which only the diseased oak of fascism can grow. Let once the principle become established that the worth of a man is to be measured by the color of his skin, the shape of his head, his national origin, or his religious beliefs—then, indeed, will our democracy be lost. The Japanese of today will become the Negro of tomorrow, the Jew of the next day, the Catholic of the next, and the Italian American, Irish American, Swedish American, Polish American, or Slavic American of the next.

I ask you, for these reasons, to reconsider the action which resulted in my rejection. I ask it not for myself alone but also for the sake of American democracy. Why should Post 51 help the Japanese fascists put over their false propaganda that this is a war of the white man against the colored people of the world?

SGT. RICHARD H. NAITO
Baxter General Hospital, June 21

The Voice and the Versus

Dear Sirs: One should expect a lengthy discussion of "No Voice Is Wholly Lost" to contain a statement of the book's specific problem. In his article, Our Culture and Its Critics, in your issue of July 28, Mr. Bentley never gets around to that.

The article does make one contribution: it calls the book "Stalinist." (Another Nation reviewer, Mr. Rahv, has judged my Kafka study similarly; in both cases the Nation reviewers stand alone in this judgment.) Now, what does "Stalinism" mean? Mr. Bentley says it does not refer "primarily to Stalin," and defines it as "cultural conformity tinged with political reformism," a definition "told" him "by one who makes free with the term." And then, protected by his anonymous authority, he condemns the book on a number of grounds, most of which have no bearing even on his own concept of "Stalinism." He criticizes me for being a moralist, a secular puritan, a "frightened Philistine," an optimist, etc.

Mr. Bentley's definition of "Stalinism" is obviously so loose that it might as well refer to Rooseveltism, Negrinism, or any ism but that of a partisan anti-Soviet. In any case, it has no relevance to the book, which is not concerned with Soviet or any politics. And when Mr. Bentley writes that I show "an admiration of Soviet Russia and its friends," one wonders whether he is discussing "No Voice Is Wholly Lost" or a notion he has gathered elsewhere about my alleged attitude toward politics. But Mr. Bentley criticizes me on an opposite ground as well: this book, he argues, "does not bring the political discussion out into the open." That is, he complains that I do beat my wife and that I don't beat my wife. The fact is that my book is concerned with the problem of cultural alienation and not with political alignments. Mr. Bentley almost blunders into seeing that the political is not the yardstick when he wonders why more pages are devoted to Werfel than to Shaw. But he does not mention that sections are given to critics of Russia, such as Gide, Silone, Céline, Santayana, Dos Passos, Claudel, in which their political persuasion appears only peripherally.

The discussion proper plainly shows that Mr. Bentley simply lacks the critical equipment to judge this book. He quotes a topical sentence on Dewey and dismisses it as "philosophical cacophony." The terms used do, however, have meaning, at least to philosophers who have commented on the Dewey chapter. If Mr. Bentley does not understand them, that does not render them "cacophonous." I must add that his discussion shows that he does not understand the method of the book as a whole. What he has done is to hit on the more obvious aspects of the conclusions and ignore the process, that is the psychosocial analysis, by which the book struggles to the conclusion. He writes of its optimism as something prearranged. This does violence to the method used: to give "evil" its historic and formal justification. So little is the optimism forced that at times it is precariously balanced by the perennial validity of estrangement. Mr. Bentley misses all this, and misses the implicit consideration of aesthetic form in the analysis. Throughout, there is reference to ironic self-preservation, metaphorical confession, and other formal and structural elements by which writers transcend temporal-political restrictions.

Our problem is to make use of our mixed heritage. The book argues that no truly creative writer is "wholly lost," however tortured his expression may be through compulsive pressures. The book is concerned with revealing the element of validity in such creative minds.

HARRY SLOCHOWER
New York, August 30

Dear Sirs: Mr. Slochower thinks me blindly anti-"Stalinist." Sidney Hook, who roundly condemned me for my own "Stalinism" only a few months ago in The Nation, will smile wryly. But Mr. Slochower — to borrow a phrase — "shows plainly that he simply lacks the critical equipment to judge" my piece, which, in point of fact, protested precisely against political prejudice—"Stalinist" or anti-"Stalinist"—in criticism.

Beyond this there are only two points I would bother to make. First: my article was not supposed to be so much a review of Mr. Slochower as a little essay which took his book as its starting-point. Second: Mr. Slochower thinks his book is very good while I think it not very good. Who is to decide between us? Mr. Slochower himself?

ERIC RUSSELL BENTLEY
Gambier, Ohio, September 6

LANGUAGE IS POWER
. . . Forge ahead, win special assignments, promotion, better job in global peace time opportunities through ability to speak a foreign language.
MASTER A NEW LANGUAGE quickly, easily, correctly by LINGUAPHONE
The world-famous Linguaphone Conversational Method brings voices of native teachers INTO YOUR OWN HOME. You learn the new language by LISTENING. It's amazingly simple; thousands have succeeded. ◆ ◆ 29 LANGUAGES
Send for Free book, Call for Free demonstration
LINGUAPHONE INSTITUTE
81 RCA Bldg., New York 20 • Circle 7-0830

LEARN RUSSIAN
FOR IMMEDIATE APPLICATION
Practical 33-Week Course under the recognized authority.
DR. E. MARKOFF
Classes held Thursdays, beginning October 11. Scientifically planned and tested method in grammar and useful conversation for beginners and advanced students. Also special normal course for teachers of Russian.
AMERICAN RUSSIAN CULTURAL ASS'N
200 W. 57 St., N. Y. 19, N. Y. CI 5-5377

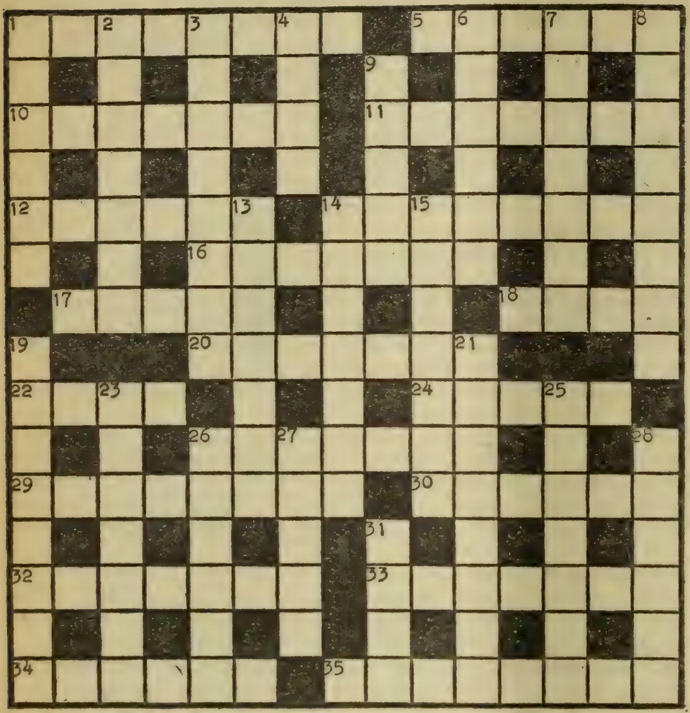
EXECUTIVES!
A novel, personal and confidential publicity service. Terms to suit your needs. Let's talk it over. No obligation.
Y. HASSAN
202 W. 40th St., Room 1407, NYC. BR. 9-7491

BOOKS FOUND FREE!
WHAT BOOKS DO YOU WANT?
We quote lowest market prices. No charge for locating Hard-to-Find and Out-of-Print Books. All books. OLD or NEW, mailed POST-FREE.
SEARCHLIGHT BOOK NATION
22 East 17th Street, New York City

THE BUSINESS SIDE OF THE WORLD'S OLDEST BUSINESS
A. F. Niemoeller's survey of the organization, management, and earnings of prostitution from antiquity to the present.
This 15,000-word book (5½x8½ inches in size, printed in readable type) considers prostitution as a mercantile enterprise, the establishments in which the negotiations take place, their systems of doing business, types of workers, and the remunerations accruing to the workers. This is an original piece of research unlike anything available in print today.
Mr. Niemoeller makes it apparent that prostitution is as much a business as any other commercial endeavor, and as justly so. You will enjoy this examination of the structure, operation, and rewards of this greatest and oldest of human enterprises.
This book not only surveys the subject with historical accuracy and presents a valuable array of data, but approaches this fascinatingly human theme with humor, wit and charm. This book represents literary artistry and scientific scholarship at their best. Our author amuses as he informs. Get ready for a safe and sane good time.
Copies of THE BUSINESS SIDE OF THE WORLD'S OLDEST BUSINESS are available at 25c each, prepaid. Send orders to
E. HALDEMAN-JULIUS • BOX 1826 • GIRARD, KANSAS

Crossword Puzzle No. 127

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 Agreeable
5 It hardly suggests meteorology without tears
10 A horseman puts his foot in it
11 Injuries resulting from upsetting a lioness
12 He planned to murder Orlando indirectly
14 Kind of apple which is half pear
16 A New England state capital
17 Swallows of the sea
18 Hitler's former deputy
20 "--- ----'s punishment is not that he isn't believed, but that he cannot believe anyone else" (two words, 3 and 4)
22 Highway
24 White man's title in India
26 He's generally complaining about something
29 What the conscientious artilleryman does to his gun before abandoning it (two words, 6 and 2)
30 Summer shoe
32 Give a claim to
33 Bids
34 Leading lady in The School for Scandal
35 A place for the protection of game animals

DOWN

1 A pointedly dangerous character in The Merry Wives
2 Large building
3 Estrange (anag.)
4 Scruff of the neck
6 The stars fought against him
7 Silk stuff on which figures are wrought
8 Foolhardiness
9 There are 38 in this puzzle
13 Go-ahead people
14 Extract and depart (two words, 4 and 3)
15 Books of maps
19 Search for what is already before one
21 A rare bird (two words, 4 and 4)
23 A little air
25 Any writer
26 "A veray parfit ------ knight"
27 Spifflicated
28 Yes, Lee is in Paris
31 "When I am dead, no pageant train Shall waste their sorrows at my ----"

* * *

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 126

ACROSS:—1 ELDORADO; 5 STUCCO; 10 TANCRED; 11 NATURAL; 12 CLEF; 13 NESTS; 16 BELL; 17 CERTAIN; 19 ANTIC; 20 NATANT; 22 SKINNER; 23 ALCOTT; 25 WELSH; 27 SIRENES; 31 OARS; 32 EARED; 33 CANE; 36 INVENTS; 37 TRESTLE; 38 ERNEST; 39 CROONERS.

DOWN:—1 ENTICE; 2 DUNGEON; 3 RARE; 4 DODGER; 6 TOTS; 7 CARNERA; 8 OILCLOTH; 9 ANITA; 13 NECKTIE; 14 STUNNER; 15 SINEWED; 17 CISTS; 18 NARES; 21 JACOBITE; 24 CARAVAN; 26 SEATTLE; 28 RAISE; 29 NECTAR; 30 BEVELS; 34 INNS; 35 HERO.

RESORTS

"Fore" the Golfer
Newly Conditioned Course
A Grand "Pro"
New Clubhouse
. . . await your pleasure.

The Glenmere
28 miles of beautiful private trails. Also — excellent tennis, boating and fishing on our private 7½-mile lake, swimming, golf, game rooms, cocktail lounge, dancing, really fine food . . . congenial atmosphere.
Only 51 Miles from New York
CHESTER, N. Y. Chester 200 (N. Y.) RE 2-5047

Birdland
CENTRAL VALLEY, N. Y.
200-ACRE ESTATE 1,000-FT. ELEVATION
Congenial adult resort. All sports. Clay Tennis Courts. Golf, fine food. Only 45 miles from N. Y.
10% DISCOUNT FOR SERVICEMEN
JEWISH HOLIDAY SPECIAL, $15.00—2 DAYS
Highland Mills 7895; N.Y.C.: LO 5-3715, WA 5-4671

Timberland
POTTERSVILLE, N. Y.
AN ADULT CAMP IN THE ADIRONDACKS
LIMITED TO 100
OPEN UNTIL SEPTEMBER 23
ALL SPORTS • PRIVATE LAKE
DANCING • LECTURES • CONCERTS
N. Y. OFFICE: 33 W. 42nd St. LOngacre 5-3674
The Rare Charm of an Intimate Congenial Group

The Fieldstone
On Round Island Lake
A place of unexcelled beauty for rest and relaxation. One hour from New York
ALL SPORTS — OPEN ALL YEAR
MONROE, N. Y. Phone 7965

BREEZEMONT PARK
ARMONK, N. Y.
35 MILES FROM NEW YORK CITY
"A Country Estate in the Scenic Hills of Westchester County"
The nearest of all nearby resorts. Exclusive location. Luxuriously furnished. Dignified. All sport activities. Excellent cuisine
OPEN ALL YEAR Phone Armonk Village 955

The Nation Index

for Volume 160 of The Nation, covering the period from January through June, 1945, is now available. This excellent reference aid may be had for 15 cents.

Send your order for the Index with remittance, to

The Nation
20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

THE Nation
AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865
VOLUME 161 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · SEPTEMBER 29, 1945 NUMBER 13

Behind the MacArthur Row

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, September 23

THREE things make the White House statement on occupation policy in Japan less impressive than it would otherwise be. The first is the long delay in its publication. The document says, "The Japanese people, and the world at large, shall be kept fully informed of the objectives and policies of the occupation and of progress made in their fulfilment." This is important, if the stated objectives are to be realized. The publication of this basic directive in Japan would let democratic and working-class leadership there know that it was our policy "to use the existing form of government in Japan, not to support it"; that we favor changes in the form of that government designed to modify "its feudal and authoritarian tendencies"; that we are not committed to "support the Emperor or any other Japanese governmental authority in opposition to evolutionary changes looking toward the attainment" of those objectives; and that if force proves necessary against recalcitrant and reactionary elements the Allied Supreme Commander is authorized to intervene only where required to insure "the security of his forces and the attainment of all other objectives of the occupation."

An equally important purpose is served by publication of the document in this country: it provides the American people with a clear picture of our post-war program for Japan, a solid basis for judging the necessary duration and extent of occupation, "and a means of checking for ourselves whether MacArthur and his subordinates are or are not carrying out their instructions." Yet despite the pledge of full publicity, the document remained secret until an unusual set of circumstances made its release to the press necessary as a means of defending the State Department, the War Department, and the Administration against a burst of criticism in Congress. The principles embodied in the document were agreed upon by the State, War, and Navy departments and transmitted to MacArthur on August 29; the actual text of the document, after approval by the President, was sent to MacArthur by messenger on September 6. But it was not made public by the White House until September 22, and even then, from all indications, only reluctantly and under pressure from the State and War departments. We still do not know whether the document will be made public in Japan, although it says that "the Japanese people shall be kept fully informed."

To formulate fine principles on paper and forget about them in practice is becoming a characteristic of American occupation policy. German experience provides the second reason for being uneasy about our post-war plans for Japan. The basic directives on German occupation policy are still a secret, but the main outlines of our program are known. The policy laid down for Japan turns out to be much like that laid down for Germany. In Japan as in Germany we seek—in principle, at least—the elimination of war industry, the breaking up of the big monopolies, a wider distribution of ownership and income, encouragement of democratic forces, the elimination of ultra-nationalist and military elements.

Hardly a day passes without new evidence that similar directives are being sabotaged by the military occupation authorities in the Reich. Big American industrial and financial interests interlock with those of Germany as of Japan. Their influence, plus brass-hat mulishness, is enough to nullify the most specific directives. For Germany these are severe and thorough, but that has not kept them from being ignored. Even so conspicuous a malefactor as I. G. Farben is successfully evading the fate decreed for it. I have seen the secret General Order No. 2 on I. G. Farben, issued last July 5 by Military Government authorities. It is very drastic, but it is not being obeyed. Instead of being liquidated in accordance with that order, I. G. is being rebuilt. I am reliably informed that the services of its old American subsidiary, General Aniline and Film, are being enlisted to provide technicians for the reconstruction of the German parent company. Only last Friday the United Press reported from Frankfurt a press conference in which Colonel James Boyd, head of the United States Forces' Industry Branch, declared that I. G. Farben's war industries would be "switched" to peace-time output rather than destroyed. What is to prevent these facilities from being "switched" back again some day to war production? If this can happen in Germany, where the relationship of monopoly and militarism has been much more fully publicized, it can happen in Japan. If I. G. can thus save itself, so can Mitsui.

There is a third and more fundamental reason for not taking the White House program at face value. Its principles and purposes are sound, but the magnitude of the changes they require—and international security requires—in Japanese society calls for a military government of Japan. It takes little reflection to realize that we can hardly hope to break the power of Japan's ruling classes—the aristocracy, the plutocracy, the bureaucracy, and the military—if we confine ourselves to operating through a government which remains their instrument. To do so is to leave in power the very elements we are pledged to eradicate; to leave these elements in position to reassume full control once the occupation is over. The Associated Press reports from Tokyo today, "Japanese prominently associated with the incipient liberal movement say opposition of these strongly intrenched groups already has handicapped attempts toward settlement of the problems of national livelihood as well as social reformation."

From what little I can learn here in this highly secret field of national policy, one faction in Washington, now the dominant faction in the State Department, favored a military government and had plans drawn up for such a government. The decision against a military government of Japan seems to have been made at Potsdam. This is puzzling. The British may well have opposed any drastic policy toward Japan, but it is hard to believe that the Russians did. I cannot find out why plans for a military government were dropped, but my hunch is that they were abandoned because our other Pacific allies—including the Russians—would have had to be represented at the top policy level. I think many in army-navy circles would prefer a soft peace for Japan to Russian participation in the fundamental decisions of the occupation.

Soviet-American relations are the fundamental factor in determining the future of Japan as of Germany. It is worth noting in this connection that Assistant Secretary of War John J. McCloy, top War Department official on German occupation policy, is also the department's representative on the State-War-Navy committee which frames the basic directives for Japan. McCloy has long been regarded in other branches of the government dealing with the Reich as a man who operates on the assumption that we need a strong Germany as a bulwark against the U. S. S. R. and communism. There are some who believe we need a strong Japan and a meek Korea for the same reason, and it is significant that Landon coupled criticism of the Morgenthau plan for Germany with his defense of MacArthur. In Congress and in the press the old pro-Axis and anti-Soviet crowd is taking advantage of the demand for faster demobilization to plead for softer treatment of both Germany and Japan.

The Hearst-Patterson-McCormick press and its friends in Congress are engaged in an attempt to identify advocacy of a hard peace for the Axis countries with communism; this would make "reds" of Wainwright, Chennault, Halsey, Devereaux, and the other military figures who have warned us against a soft peace with the Japanese. The most ludicrous effort in this field was Arthur Krock's attempt today to make it appear that criticism of MacArthur came chiefly from "the pink publications." One of "the pink publications" which have been criticizing MacArthur and insisting on action against "Japan's own special kind of big business, the great industrial and financial concerns of Japan," is Krock's own paper, the New York Times (see its leading editorial, headed Cleaning Up Japan, in the September 13 issue). The poor fellow seems to think he is writing for the Chicago Tribune.

The War Department is not above playing up to these reactionary elements. Last Tuesday, during the interminable debate going on in Congress over demobilization, Lemke of North Dakota told the House that one War Department official was reported to have said it was "all right to discharge the boys if you do not want as large an army as Russia." The War Department's quarrel with MacArthur is not the same as the State Department's. The War Department is angry because MacArthur's sudden statement that he would need only 200,000 soldiers to police Japan upset its plea that occupation needs necessitated a slower rate of demobilization. The War Department is inclined to think of a large army in terms of power politics vis-a-vis the Soviet Union rather than as a means of preventing renewed German and Japanese aggression. The State Department's quarrel with MacArthur has a different basis. There Grew, Dooman, and the Japanophiles are out; Acheson and younger "China hands" are now in charge of Far Eastern policy. They see MacArthur's occupation policies and his talk of a short occupation with comparatively few troops as endangering the hope of a durable peace in the Far East. They are fighting for a complete change in

---

IN THIS ISSUE

EDITORIALS

Behind the MacArthur Row by I. F. Stone 297
The Shape of Things 299
What the London Conference Reveals 302
Words and Deeds 302

ARTICLES

Post-Atomic National Defense by Charles G. Bolté 303
The Prisoners We Forgot by Andrew Roth 305
In the Wind 306
Czechs and Sudetens by Ralph Parker 307
The Legion Looks at Labor by Carey McWilliams 309
No Surrender at All by Tsuyoshi Matsumoto 311

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Mr. Wallace and the Wise Boys by Stuart Chase 313
U. S. S. R.—the Early Days by Joseph Freeman 318
Briefer Comment 318
Films by James Agee 321
Music by B. H. Haggin 321

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 322

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 128 by Jack Barrett 324

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor J. KING GORDON
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Editor Political War Section
J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor J. MITCHELL MORSE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates
LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL
JONATHAN DANIELS
CAREY MCWILLIAMS
REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1945, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

"the present economic and social system of Japan, which makes for a will to war." It was for his courage in saying so that Acheson's confirmation as Under Secretary was held up in the Senate last Thursday. Who would have dreamed that within four years of Pearl Harbor a nominee for high office would be attacked in the Senate of the United States for advocating severe treatment of Japan?

Whatever success we achieve in preventing a renewal of Japanese aggression will depend on the patience and understanding of the American people. Unfortunately, army-navy clumsiness and inefficiency have created so much resentment against demobilization delays as to make it difficult reasonably to argue the need for considerable personnel and extended occupation in both Japan and Germany. The same papers and the same Congressmen who helped lull this country into a false feeling of security before Pearl Harbor are back at work on a repeat performance. MacArthur is playing to the old isolationist and crypto-fascist gallery. He is also playing to the human and understandable desire to "get the boys back" as quickly as possible: Congress is swamped with letters from home on the subject. The Axis thrived once before on democratic unwillingness to make some present sacrifice for the sake of future security, and can thrive on it again. Russell of Georgia, in an able and moving speech to the Senate Tuesday, introduced a resolution for the trial of Hirohito as a war criminal and sought to drive home the future consequences of a soft peace. But the Russells are being drowned out by the Rankins. And the Landons are ready to sacrifice national security to cheap politics. True, MacArthur today told Hugh Baillie of the United Press that Japan would never again be a world power or world menace. But in the fall of 1939 we were assured by as high a military authority that the Philippines were in no danger of attack from Japan. That was Douglas MacArthur, too.

The Shape of Things

IF A DISPATCH BY RAYMOND DANIELL IN THE New York Times last Friday was accurate, then General Patton should be court-martialed. If it was inaccurate, the Times correspondent should be fired; but Mr. Daniell is known as an extremely cautious, meticulous observer. He reported from Wiesbaden, Germany, "a general opposition" on the part of Military Government officers "to the denazification program and a lackadaisical attitude toward its enforcement." And he quoted a "reported remark" of General George S. Patton, Jr., when the general was told that a certain German business man should not be employed because his questionnaire or "Fragenbogen" showed that he had been a member of the Nazi Elite Guard. "What the hell's a Fragenbogen?" shouted the general. "Listen—if you need these men, keep them and don't worry about anything else." It may well be that General Patton never heard of President Roosevelt's pledge to "destroy the fascist tyranny," but it is hard to believe that he missed the explicit instructions of General Eisenhower, issued on July 20 in Berlin. The General of the Army, confronted with evidence from all over the American zone that the Military Government was using Nazis for administrative jobs, large and small, gave flat orders to eliminate Nazis and militarists from all offices and positions of importance in quasi-public and private enterprises. In the light of these orders, General Patton's attitude is one of open insubordination, while the situation it reveals is rapidly developing into a scandal that makes nonsense of all our talk about democracy —and of the war itself. Next week in The Nation Saul K. Padover will discuss in documented detail the problem of American military government in Germany.

*

WHILE THE ANGLO-AMERICAN FINANCIAL TALKS continue without visible progress, the British government has begun to take steps to reduce imports which must be paid for in dollars. Contracts for Lend-Lease goods amounting to $1,500,000,000 on V-J Day have been cut in half by canceling orders for tobacco, raw materials, and manufactured goods. This means more "austerity" for the British consumer but is also bad news for the American farmer, for it implies cultivation by Britain of alternative sources of supply of such commodities as cotton, huge surpluses of which already exist in this country. Administration experts who are conducting the negotiations with Lords Halifax and Keynes understand fully the basic facts of Britain's plight. They know that if we do not help it to its feet, it will have to renounce the ideal of unrestricted international trade or face starvation. But the Administration is timid about putting the facts before the country. It fears that isolationists and Anglophobes, in Congress and elsewhere, will damn any realistic solution to the problem by saying that Uncle Sam is being asked to play Santa Claus for the benefit of British Socialism. Washington's hope, therefore, is to fix up a scheme that will appear tough —a big loan at a commercial rate of interest, for instance— and leave the demonstration of its unworkability to time. The British, however, seem reluctant to cooperate in this deception. They have taken a stand against incurring liabilities they know they will not be able to meet. Rather than that, they will tighten their belts until they can reorganize their trade on a barter basis. If we force them to adopt this alternative, we can say goodby to our hopes of an expanding world market for American surpluses.

*

PROSPECTS FOR SOLVING THE INDIAN PROBLEM were notably advanced by Prime Minister Attlee's and Viceroy Wavell's recent announcements of prompt measures for assuring self-government. After provincial and central elections are held this winter, His Majesty's (Socialist) Government will hold discussions with representatives of the provincial legislative assemblies to ascertain whether the Cripps proposals "are acceptable or whether some alternative or modified scheme is preferable." A Constituent Assembly will then be convened to frame a new constitution. The unfortunate aspect of the elections, of which there is implicit recognition in Wavell's message, is that under the present constitution only a fraction of the population can vote. In 1937, in the last elections for the provincial legislatures, literacy and high property qualifications allowed only about one-fourth of the total adult population to vote. Attlee made it clear in his message that the purpose and intention of the Cripps proposals, which offered India ultimate dominion status, are embodied in the new offer, which similarly envisages "negotiation of a treaty between the British government and the constitution-making body." He stated further that the present government is giving immediate consideration to the contents of such a treaty and that it "shall not seek to provide for anything incompatible with the interests of India." We hope that Indian nationalists, despite the bitter disappointments they have suffered at the hands of previous governments, will not put upon Attlee the onus of his predecessors' crimes. But first reports from India show that they are suspicious of the new plan. The Congress Working Committee is now convening for the first time since 1942. We hope that it decides to use the new offer to India's best advantage. Only a Britain determined to overhaul its own pattern of national economy can afford to give India freedom: We do not doubt that that is the intention of the Labor government.

*

THE CHUNGKING-YENAN NEGOTIATIONS ARE expected to end shortly in a partial accord. This will be widely hailed as a diplomatic triumph for Ambassador Hurley, who has remained in China to supervise the negotiations personally. Actually, the results are disappointing. The settlement envisioned at the time of the Sino-Soviet pact has not materialized. According to the Ta Kung Pao, China's leading newspaper, the Chungking government has agreed to recognize the legal status of all political parties, including the Communist, in advance of summoning the National Assembly, thus making it possible for minority groups to gain some representation in that body. Chungking is also said to be willing to call a conference of representatives of all political and non-partisan groups to work out a satisfactory plan for the participation in the government of "all parties and groups." While these are hopeful steps in the direction of a more democratic regime in Chungking, the protracted negotiations between Mao Tse-tung and Chiang Kai-shek have apparently failed on the essential issues of control of the armed forces and local government reforms, including tax and land reforms. Since the source of political power in China rests with the armed forces rather than the Cabinet or any other constitutional political agency, the Communists have insisted on a more democratic system of military control as a condition for placing their military forces under the direct command of the central government. Until an agreement can be worked out on this issue there can be no basic political settlement and the danger of civil war will persist even though both sides clearly wish to avoid it.

*

REPORTS THAT GENERAL HURLEY WILL RESIGN as ambassador to China provide a ray of hope in the otherwise clouded prospects for Chinese unity. Although Hurley may claim credit for having helped to achieve the limited Kuomintang-Communist agreement, his record on the whole has been a negative one, both with respect to promoting harmony in China and to pursuing unified American policy. It will be recalled that when Hurley arrived in Chungking at the end of last year, the prospects of fundamental Kuomintang-Communist accord were brighter than they had been at any other period. But he quickly alienated the Communists by throwing his support to the Kuomintang and thus stood in the way of an effective war-time coalition. This policy brought Hurley into sharp conflict both with the State Department and the foreign-service officers attached to his embassy. He retaliated by weeding out experienced China personnel not only from his staff but from all government agencies in China, including the army. All dispatches from foreign-service officers to the State Department were subjected to rigorous censorship by the ambassador, thus cutting Washington off from unbiased information from China at one of the most critical periods in history. It is to be hoped that a new ambassador will be chosen who is capable of unifying American policy and of exercising impartial judgment in dealing with the various Chinese factions.

*

THE BELL TOLLED FOR PERON LAST WEEK WHEN about 500,000 Argentines turned out for the "March of Constitution and of Freedom" in Buenos Aires. "God Bless America" was the song they sang most often and applauded most loudly; the popular refrain, "We want no dictatorships or military governments, either," ran a close second. And through it all there were almost incessant cries of "Death to Perón." Men and women of all classes and political beliefs surged forward together in a united front plebiscite demanding Perón's downfall. There at the rally about 100,000 more people were present than voted in the 1940 elections in Buenos Aires. The Argentine people have spoken. But the colonel—who should have been a house painter—won't let go. Faced with the classic dilemma of a dictator's last days, he must either grant concessions or increase repressions; either course will only strengthen the resistance. This is the see-saw of disaster Perón has been riding the past few months. Meanwhile his fantasy life is filled with dreams of being elected President in the long-forthcoming elections. Their date has been not yet been set. Because of last week's events Perón may delay his expected withdrawal from the government in order to announce his candidacy openly. Moreover, a general strike said to be in the offing is further complicating life for the Argentine dictator; and when it comes he will have no road back.

*

THE BRITISH CABINET'S REPORTED STAND ON Palestine is inexplicable unless viewed in the light of the current power conflicts in the Near East and the Mediterranean area. The recent indication that the Arab League will resist Russia's claims to expanded influence in the Mediterranean provides some clue to what appears to be a betrayal of principles long voiced by leading Labor Party members. But no considerations of imperial interest can justify the retention of the iniquitous White Paper—with certain modifications—as a handbook to British Palestine policy. Such a decision would amount to embracing the worst cynicism of Mr. Chamberlain's administration and at the very moment when the Jewish people are in their most desperate plight. Today there are still alive in Hitler's charnel houses some 60,000 Jews whom the United Nations military authorities are unable to release because they have no place to go. The proposed British solution of granting 1,500 visas a month would mean that three and a half years would elapse before the last of this group was rescued—how many would survive that long is hard to say. To a people which in six years has lost almost 6,000,000 out of 8,000,000 to Nazi blood lust Palestine represents justice and security. It is the one country to which the remaining Jews of Europe want to go; it is the one country that will willingly receive them. President Truman's demand, therefore, that the British government open the doors of Palestine to 100,000 Jews will receive the full support of the American people and, we suspect, of the great mass of British people as well. That request—and not the White Paper—must become the basis of an interim policy to meet the desperate situation existing today. But the long-term solution should not wait. The British proposal that the question be referred to the United Nations Organization makes sense provided that it is not simply a means of stalling. The Jewish Commonwealth is guaranteed by international agreement; it represents a solemn pledge embodied in the Balfour declaration; under the United Nations, and with the minimum of delay, it should become a reality.

* * *

L. C. AKINS, A YOUNG NEGRO, IS SENTENCED TO die on October 6. The case was fully analyzed by George Clifton Edwards, an attorney of Dallas, Texas, in The Nation of September 15. The facts presented made it evident that had Akins been white he probably would not have been indicted—certainly he would not have been indicted on a charge of murder with malice. And if he had been brought to trial it is unthinkable that he would have been convicted. The report shows that a white man was killed in a fight with Akins. The white man, a policeman off duty, had attacked Akins as he was boarding a street car, accusing him of having jostled his wife. The policeman wounded Akins with his gun; later Akins secured the gun and shot his assailant. With the exception of one eighty-year-old and almost illiterate Negro—included to meet the technical requirement of "non-discrimination"—the grand jury was entirely white. The trial jury, witnesses, judge, court officials, prosecution were all white. Akins's fate rests in the hands of the Texas Board of Pardons and Paroles. Telegrams should be directed to its chairman, Elster M. Haile, State Capitol, Austin, Texas. There is still a chance that the awakened public conscience, Southern as well as Northern, will save a man's life and remove a stain from the annals of American justice.

* * *

IN REJECTING A STANDARD JOBLESS BENEFIT of $25 a week and voting to return the federal employment offices to the states, the Senate struck a body blow at the prospects for orderly reconversion. Of the two actions the dissolution of the U. S. E. S. promises to cause the most severe headaches in the immediate future. A system of centralized, coordinated employment offices will be urgently needed in the reconversion period. Millions of workers have left their home communities and scattered through the country to do war work. Their employment in peace-time industry will necessitate a new migration, not merely a return to former homes. To achieve this, the employment offices must be equipped with a detailed knowledge of job prospects in all parts of the country, knowledge that can only be acquired and classified by a federal service. Furthermore, most of the state employment offices were so inefficient before the war as a result of political nepotism that they were bypassed by employers and employees alike. Yet the political forces which corrupted the state employment offices proved strong enough, in a Senate showdown, to destroy the relatively efficient U. S. E. S. at the moment it was most needed. These same political machines, intrenched in the state bureaucracy, undoubtedly played an important role in bringing about the rejection of President Truman's plea for a uniform jobless benefit. Since business prospects in the post-reconversion period are seriously jeopardized by both Senate actions, it is to be hoped that progressive business interests will join labor and citizen groups in pressing for a reversal in the House, where state political pressures are not so readily concentrated.

* * *

ON JUNE 18 IN THE FATEFUL SUMMER OF 1940, two men on opposite sides of the Atlantic made crucial speeches. One said: "If we stand up to him, all Europe may be freed and the life of the world move forward into broad sunlit meadows; but if we fail, the whole world, including the United States and all that we have known and cared for, will sink into the abyss of a new dark age made more sinister and perhaps more prolonged by the lights of a perverted science." The other said: "The United States today faces probably the greatest crisis in its history. Not only our own safety but the continuance of the kind of world which we have been trying to create and the methods of freedom and self-government which have been ours since the foundation of our nation are at stake." Winston Churchill was reporting to the British people on Dunkirk and outlining plans for defense against invasion. Henry Stimson was urging that the United States give full support to England and at once institute universal military training. On the following day President Roosevelt appointed Henry Stimson Secretary of War. Probably no Cabinet member, perhaps not President Roosevelt himself, better understood the true nature and menace of fascism. In January, 1939, Mr. Stimson had written a letter to Secretary Hull urging that the embargo on arms to Republican Spain be lifted. Three months later, in a letter to the New York Times, he protested against our continuing isolationist policy, insisting that "in succession the attacks upon Manchuria, North China, South China, Ethiopia, Spain, Austria, Czechoslovakia, have shown us the error of likening modern fascism to a domestic system with which most of the world can live in peace." His own contribution to the military destruction of fascism was great. His successor, Robert Patterson, has proved his competence as Assistant Secretary. It is to be hoped that he will carry over his former chief's awareness of those forces that menace the life of the free peoples of the world.

IN NEXT WEEK'S NATION

SAUL K. PADOVER on American Military Government in Germany

What the London Conference Reveals

BY ALL American reports, London is a city of diplomatic gloom. Only the delegation from Moscow seems to be deriving any satisfaction from the proceedings of the Council of Foreign Ministers; and its complacency obviously doesn't lift the spirits of the capitalist press. There are reasons for concern in the difficulties of the conference itself, but perhaps the unmitigated quality of the correspondents' pessimism is primarily due to their exclusion from authentic news. In any event, we do not share their shocked surprise at the turn the meeting is taking.

The dispatches speak as if the conference had revealed conflicts between the Soviets and the Anglo-American partnership. In reality it has only defined them. Everyone knew that the Soviet Union intended to be the strongest external influence in the Balkans; everyone knew that it meant to have a voice in the disposal of the Italian colonies both in the neighborhood of the Dardanelles and in Africa; everyone knew that it was supporting the Yugoslav demand for Trieste. The claims to a port on the Red Sea and to the administration under United Nations mandate of Tripolitania and possibly Eritrea are only specific and concrete expressions of a general determination to play the role of a super-power and enjoy its perquisites. Some of these demands may be dropped when the major point of free use of the Dardanelles has been conceded, but we should not bank on it.

No one should have been taken by surprise or disillusioned except those who, idealizing the government of Stalin and Molotov, expected it to play a utopian part in international affairs. This was hardly the case with the emissaries of the sophisticated American press. But one depressing factor may have been the continued contrast between Soviet competence and American floundering in the art of diplomacy. Certainly it was too bad that the shift in policy from individual to international administration of the former Italian colonies should have come at the conference itself, for this not only revealed some instability, but also gave the delegation an air of clumsy trickiness.

The fact is that, while the conference couldn't by any stretch of the imagination be called a happy field-day for Anglo-American diplomacy, it was a necessary and useful step toward peace settlements in the Mediterranean and the Balkans. The Foreign Ministers cannot draft a treaty. At best they can only mark out broad lines of agreement and leave the details to be filled in by experts. It is true that the press reports reflect more conflict than agreement; but nothing like the full record is yet available, and in any event it is well to have the differences clearly stated at the earliest possible stage in negotiations. The fact that the Russians are taking positions opposed to those of the United States and Britain does not mean that they have won theirs or that we have lost ours.

The basic conflict is between the Russian way of life and government and ours. Both ways label themselves democracy, but there are profound differences, and both are trying to spread themselves in the world. So long as this is so, there will be perpetual difficulty in establishing compromises short of violence.

Meanwhile, London last week produced one sinister omen whch seems to have escaped notice. While the Foreign Ministers were meeting, the executive committee of the United Nations was also in session. In it raged another hard-fought battle—this one over the dates and agenda for the first meetings of the General Assembly. But the progress it was making towards implementation of the San Francisco Charter was pushed into obscure back columns by the concurrent bickerings of the Big Five. So long as there continue to be supreme councils of three or five powers, so long will it be impossible for the United Nations to win and hold the prestige and authority which alone can render it an effective security system. The small states, in demanding more consultation, are fighting a battle not only for themselves but for the principle of dealing with world problems in a world organization rather than in small conclaves. If the conclaves are permanent, as they purport to be, there will be too many rings in the international circus.

Words and Deeds

MR. TRUMAN'S actions and Mr. Truman's words are not altogether in accord. Philip Murray of the C. I. O. told a New York labor delegation to Washington that three of the leading measures called for in the President's message of September 6 "are threatened by lack of any organized support by the Administration or its supporters inside or outside of Congress." He referred to the full-employment bill, the unemployment-compensation bill, and the 65-cent minimum-wage bill. Murray spoke with restraint when he said that the Administration and Democratic Party leadership had not "shown sufficient exertion" on these measures. The White House did intervene to win Carville of Nevada for the full-employment bill, which was voted out of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee by thirteen to seven. Other Democratic waverers who voted with Carville for the bill were Bankhead of Alabama and Fulbright of Arkansas; Radcliffe of Maryland was the only Democrat who finally went with the Taft leadership against the bill. Two Republicans, Tobey of New Hampshire and Butler of Ohio, joined the majority in favor. But no such last-minute pressure was in evidence in the fight over unemployment compensation; leadership finally fell to La Follette, and Guffey stood alone in submitting a courageous minority report against the emasculated bill as it was submitted to the Senate.

But it is not in Congress alone that Mr. Truman has left an unpleasant impression. The hasty, unkind, unjustified, and cowardly way in which William H. Davis was dismissed as Director of Economic Stabilization does not speak well for the President. The affair seems to have been precipitated by the new Secretary of Labor, Schwellenbach, who went running to the White House in a kind of hysteria and blamed Davis for the strike situation. Davis was the victim of some bad reporting in the New York Herald Tribune and of some dishonest rewriting in the New York Times. Some remarks made at a background press conference by Davis on September 4 were misinterpreted by the former to mean that "the government has undertaken a program to raise the real wages of every worker in this country from 40 to 50 per cent as rapidly as possible." The Times rewrote the opening paragraph of a United Press dispatch on the conference to provide a similar misinterpretation, although its own respected veteran labor reporter, Louis Stark, was present at the Davis interview and filed no such story. The Wall Street Journal, which had had an accurate account from its own reporter, also preferred the misinterpretation and published an editorial declaring, "Davis Must Go." Raymond Moley, Fulton Lewis, Jr., and others joined in, and soon the pack was in full cry. They threw Schwellenbach and Truman into a panic.

There is reason to believe that a good part of the campaign against Davis was whipped up by manufacturers of automobiles and other durable goods, who saw him as an obstacle to higher prices. That they succeeded so well is a sour commentary on the state of the Administration's nerves. It happens that the misinterpretation of what Davis said grew out of his indorsement of a remark made by Secretary of the Treasury Vinson in his final report as Director of War Mobilization and Reconversion. The report declared that the country faced "the pleasant predicament" of increasing its standard of living by 50 per cent. But that has been said in one form or another by many government economists and officials, who recognize that only a 50 per cent rise in living standards can make it possible fully to employ productive facilities expanded 50 per cent by the war. And Truman himself, in his message to Congress, has accepted the view that in order to move toward an increase in living standards, prices should be held while wages wherever possible should be allowed to rise. The President seems to be willing to accept the theory but to balk at its practical application, for that is politically painful.

A tendency to take the line of least resistance and to give in to business pressures seems apparent in the higher levels of the Administration. An outstanding example was provided by the order of Reconversion Director John W. Snyder lifting price controls on housing. The six-point program Snyder promises as replacement is not impressive, least of all the pledge of stronger WPB inventory controls to prevent hoarding of building materials. The laxity of inventory control by WPB is notorious, and since the WPB is being disbanded and its vestigial functions handed over to Snyder's small staff there is even less likelihood of effective supervision. On the contrary, Snyder's weakness in giving in to the greedy real-estate lobby and Truman's weakness in giving in to the anti-Davis campaign in press and radio will encourage inflationary business forces to intensify their efforts. Their next target will undoubtedly be Chester Bowles, head of the OPA, who has shown admirable bravery in the government's hottest job. His recent speech before the National Industrial Conference Board in New York will not make him more popular with the grab boys. If Bowles follows Davis into retirement, consumers will be mulcted and hope of a stable recovery blasted by a short and sharp inflationary boom, followed by a deflationary tailspin.

Post-Atomic National Defense

BY CHARLES G. BOLTE

RECENT pronouncements from Washington and other centers of the higher thinking have left this observer with the dazed feeling that perhaps the atomic bomb was never dropped on Hiroshima at all but was only a horrible figment of our imaginations or a propaganda device to excuse the undignified exit of the Japanese from the war. The nation's political and military leaders, apparently with straight faces, are advancing plans for the future which seem largely to ignore the most revolutionary technological event since the invention of the steam engine. Policy-makers both here and abroad continue their old, tired talk of big navies, big armies, spheres of influence, colonial administrations, and strictly national control of forces which have burst out into the whole domain of the world. (The two generals who were at the head of the project that produced the atomic bomb have, as one might expect, a different point of view. At a War Department press conference on September 19 Major General Leslie Groves and Brigadier General Thomas F. Farrell declared that there is "no conceivable defense" against atomic bombs except to hit your enemy with them before he hits you.) Only occasionally is a public toe dabbled in the icy and forbidding waters of the atomic age, to be hastily withdrawn again to the familiar but—shall we say?—somewhat shifting sands of the old era, where national boundaries could still be discerned.

We have been living in the atomic age for six weeks now. It is time to take a deep breath and plunge into the strange ocean where time and space are so inextricably mixed.

Item: The navy requests post-war appropriations to maintain a fleet equal to the combined present fleets of the world. The atomic bomb is not mentioned.

Item: In defense of this request Secretary Forrestal explains that we need a great navy because airplanes must drop the atomic bomb—which he mentions by name—airplanes can best be stopped far from our borders, and the fleet can best do this stopping.

Item: Admiral McCain's almost-last words, "Give me the fast carrier force and you can have the atomic bomb."

Item: The navy demands that we keep a chain of the major bases we have won in the Pacific, from the Aleutians through the Ryukyus to the Solomons; it makes obvious eyes at an extended chain of bases in the Atlantic.

Item: The army is reported to be still in favor of universal military training.

Item: President Truman proposes control of atomic energy by having the United States government own all uranium-producing ore deposits in the country.

Item: The Council of Foreign Ministers squabbles over who gets the old Italian colonies, and otherwise talks in terms which are even pre-San Francisco.

This is the sort of talk we might logically have expected before the early morning event at Hiroshima. I submit we have grounds to hear something a little more imaginative, a little more realistic, a little more enlightened, after that event—some statement urging a drastic revision of the United Nations organization to make it a world federation of states, to place military power entirely under the control of the central world authority, to substitute the rule of law for the un-rule of national sovereignties clashing in the twentieth-century jungle.

Meanwhile, it is important—though clearly of secondary importance—to discuss and decide upon an interim national-defense policy. For it is clear that we shall not see any major checks put on national sovereignty tomorrow, or next week; it is clear that until we have these checks we must have a national-defense policy; and it is becoming increasingly clear that if citizens do not take a loud and vocal interest in the shaping of this policy, we shall have foisted upon us an anachronistic policy that is positively damaging to the prospects of any future reorganization of the world along lines which will meet the challenge of the atomic age.

Available historical evidence suggests that the most dangerous thing which can happen to a national-defense policy is for the nation to win a war. The defensive outstripped the offensive in the last war; so France and England and the United States planned for another war in which the defensive alone could win. Germany, having lost, simply devised new means of taking the offensive. The items listed above lend weight to the unhappy rule of history. Having won this war after a hard struggle to train troops, many hard fights to seize outlying bases, and employment of a powerful fleet and a great air arm arduously developed, our military leaders are planning to win the next war more easily by having trained reserves, outlying bases, a powerful fleet, and a great air arm all ready for use.

The military employment of atomic fission developed by a few long-haired scientists is dismissed as readily as were the tank and the airplane after 1918.

If our present course is followed, it will prove even more dangerous than our course after 1918. We cannot again expect to use countries across the oceans as buffer states: we would be the first target for any future aggressor with big ideas. The weapons of the future will make us an easy target. Our current mode of military thinking, if continued, will invite attack. Building a large armed force around the weapons and tactical concepts of the recent war is a positive peril in that it tends to discourage research and the development of new weapons and tactics, defensive as well as offensive. This will be recognized and taken advantage of by any potential aggressor, who must plan in terms of the new weapons in order to be successful. New techniques of war, already developed in primitive form and bound to be much more highly developed under the world's accelerating technology, will center in atomic explosives, rocket propulsion, radar, and aerodynamics. It is probable that the chief offensive weapon of the future will be a rocket-propelled pilotless aircraft, loaded with an atom-disintegrating warhead, and guided to its target by radar.

This is, unhappily, anything but fanciful. The scientists can do it, if the military men will let them. Already the United States Army Air Forces have in their possession a rocket drawn to its target by heat, light, or metal in the target area, a bomb guided by television from a plane fifteen miles away from the target, and a bomber with a range of 5,000 miles. The Germans in another six months might have produced a rocket bomb to cross the Atlantic in seventeen minutes. Any nation with competent scientists and adequate material and industrial resources can develop these techniques, as it can develop the atom-splitting technique. Consequently the advantage in another war would go to the nation which pushed its buttons first, launching the long-range explosives in a barrage against the chief cities and industrial centers of its antagonist. Such an initial advantage would be quickly followed up by the air-borne delivery of mechanized ground forces, to seize the key positions left intact.

In these circumstances, the present squabble over outlying bases will seem childish. A large navy would be an interesting target, although the aggressor might simply choose to ignore it. A conscript army could hardly be assembled, and if assembled would hardly find a place where it could fight to any good purpose—I hasten to withdraw my argument in favor of universal military training, advanced in these columns some months ago.

What, then, is needed for our interim national-defense policy? Obviously the drawbacks to our present policy, and the advantages of an alternate policy, can only be suggested in this short article. But it would seem that we must explore very seriously the possibility of unifying our uncoordinated and jealous services into a single Department of National Defense, with under secretaries for the army, navy, and air forces, and perhaps a separate under secretary for research; that we must give every aid to government-controlled research and development of new techniques, weapons, and tactics; that we must establish a national intelligence and information service of sufficient scope to find out and make available the best data on military, scientific, and economic activities in other countries as well as in our own; and that we must facilitate the promotion to responsible commands of the most energetic, talented, and imaginative officers in all branches of the armed forces.

These are not objectives which are likely to be accomplished—or embraced—by senior officers and officials who have just won a war with obsolescent techniques. "This is a big job for big minds," Hanson Baldwin suggests:

> It should be undertaken by the leading citizens of the nation, organized in a commission appointed by the President and/or the Congress. This commission should have technical advisers from the military services and other branches of government, but it should be civilian in composition. . . . It should have full access to the facts of the technological revolution in war. Its comprehensive studies should embrace all aspects of our post-war national-defense problem and should correlate defense policies with foreign policies.

Such a commission could do much to clarify our present confused situation. Unless the situation is clarified, we are likely to find ourselves supporting at great expense an inadequate national-defense policy which would lull us into a sense of false security and which might so mislead us concerning the horror and devastation of another war as to render us less insistent in our demand for an organization of world society which could effectively keep the peace and obviate the need for any national-defense policy.

The Prisoners We Forgot

BY ANDREW ROTH

(Author of "Dilemma in Japan")

WHEN the capitulation of Japan became a reality I began searching the newspapers avidly for news about two groups of prisoners. I was heartened and thrilled to read of the quick succor brought to the first group, American prisoners of war, by the "mercy teams" that parachuted into enemy-held areas and the ships that braved the mined waters. It was a stirring story of American sympathy, ingenuity, and daring. But I noted with increasing alarm that the second group of prisoners was apparently being forgotten, with sickening callousness and typical political myopia. They too had fought the Japanese militarists. They too had been beaten, starved, and fiendishly tortured. Most of them had spent many more years in filthy prisons than the heroes of Bataan, for their war had begun long before December 7, 1941. This second group comprised the political prisoners, the thousands of Japanese democrats, liberals, and leftists who had dared to fight the ruling clique and its ruthless police.

These Japanese political prisoners merit our profound consideration. First of all, they took frightening risks in the fight against military fascism and thus deserve at least the same recognition and assistance as the valiant fighters of the anti-Nazi underground in Europe. But even more important is the fact that the pressing and fundamental task of eliminating the roots of Japanese aggression will be immeasurably more difficult without the cooperation of the experienced and trustworthy anti-fascist leaders who have been imprisoned during the last twenty years.

The liberal press has voiced a good deal of criticism of General MacArthur's reliance upon the authoritarian bureaucrats, the Zaibatsu, the court aristocracy, the Emperor, and even sections of the Japanese military. But altogether too little emphasis has been placed on the existence of anti-militarist leaders to whom the Allies should turn and who thus far have been almost entirely neglected. The present situation in Japan urgently requires an anti-fascist coalition of all groups interested in a democratic political and economic renovation—liberal intellectuals, feminists, Christian humanists, peasants, industrial workers, small business men. Only such a coalition is capable of organizing a movement broad enough to carry through the requisite reforms in industry, agriculture, and government. The leadership of these groups has been decimated by four great waves of arrests—one in the late twenties, one in the early thirties, another in 1937-38, and a major raid on Pearl Harbor Day. Many have been slaughtered by their jailers, but it is conservatively estimated that more than forty thousand of these political offenders are still in prison.

It is particularly interesting to study the wave of repression which marked the winter of 1937-38. At that time about five hundred of the outstanding political, intellectual, and labor leaders who were still at liberty were arrested in an attempt to break up an anti-war and anti-fascist "popular-front" coalition then in process of formation. Among them were noted university professors and writers, members of the Diet and of the local assemblies, some of the more aggressive members of the Social Mass Party, and virtually the entire leadership of the militant National Council of Trade Unions and of the Proletarian Party, which were summarily dissolved. The most important person arrested was Kanju Kato, a leader of both the last-named organizations. A newspaperman and trade unionist of broad experience, Kato was serving his second term in the Diet, to which he had just been elected from a working-class constituency in Tokyo with the largest majority of any candidate in the country. He and the handful of other members of the Proletarian Party in the Diet were sharp thorns in the side of the Konoye government, for they exploited all their very limited opportunities to voice their anti-war sentiments. With Kato were arrested Shigeo Tsubaki, municipal assemblyman from Osaka, Toshio Kurota and Shikaji Shigei, members of the Diet, and Mosaburo Suzuki, former Tokyo assemblyman. Kanju Kato was released from prison, apparently in 1943, on the promise that he would not participate in political activities, but was rearrested last fall and sentenced to three years' imprisonment. The police probably held him partly responsible for the increasing unrest in labor circles, unrest which was sparked by the underground Proletarian and Communist parties.

The industrial plants are the most important breeding grounds in Japan for anti-fascist leaders, and after them come the universities. Every resurgence of democratic or leftist political activity has won recruits among the university students and faculties, despite the extreme penalties for "dangerous thoughts." And every new wave of arrests has deprived the universities of their most courageous and independent thinkers. In the winter of 1937-38 Professor Ouchi of Tokyo Imperial University, author of the well-known "General Outline of Japanese Economics," was arrested with two of his colleagues, Assistant Professors Arisawa and Kakimura; as were Professor Minobe of Hosei University, son of the noted constitutional authority, and Professors Minimi and Abe of the same institution. Kyushu Imperial University and Waseda were also raided by the dreaded Tokko-ka, or secret political police.

Hirohito

Japan, like Spain and other countries in which women suffer feudal subjection, has produced a courageous group of women leaders, many of whom are still in prison. The police have recognized their contribution to the anti-militarist cause by devising special torture instruments for their women prisoners. The Japanese woman leader who is probably best known in this country is Baroness Ishimoto, a courageous and lovely noblewoman who braved the bitter denunciations of the press and the scorn of her own class to lecture and write in favor of democratic rights for women and birth control. She too was arrested in the popular-front arrests of 1937-38, but she was subsequently released to the custody of her family. The police were less considerate of the more militant and not so well-born Sadayo Orimoto, a charming, musical-voiced young woman who attempted to raise the standards of workingwomen by organizing them, forming labor schools, and leading the famous strike of the Tokyo Mousseline Company. Shortly after this strike, in which the rebellious factory girls were forced to battle both the police and the thugs of the jingoist societies, Sadayo Orimoto disappeared, and after considerable investigation it was discovered that she had been arrested by the police as a dangerous enemy of the state. So far as is known, she has remained in prison to this day, although she was arrested more than a dozen years ago.

At the time of Japan's capitulation the walls of its filthy prisons contained many types of political prisoners with many different beliefs. Some were the scions of wealthy and aristocratic families; some were undernourished, semiliterate peasants and workers; Their "crimes" were as old as opposition to the oppressive acts of the Japanese oligarchy in the odious reign of the infamous Baron Tanaka and as recent as agitation against the "transition-to-peace" government of Admiral Suzuki.

We have a tremendous stake in these prisoners. Without them we must rely on the deceitful words and slippery deeds of the fawning opportunists that come crawling to the American authorities. With them we shall be better able to ferret out the war criminals and their collaborators and pin to the wall the men who are planning a resurgence of military fascism in Japan. Some of the prisoners have the education and training to serve as editors, administrators, and teachers; others are fitted to organize mass support for the political, social, and economic reforms required to eliminate the roots of aggression in Japan. The American program for Japan, as made public by President Truman on September 22, called for the freeing of political prisoners, but as yet nothing has been done.

The release of these men and women will have a tremendous effect on the population. It will be a clear indication that we are not the willing dupes of the surviving members of the oligarchy, with whom we have so far dealt. The people of Japan will begin to believe that we really intend to strengthen democratic trends—as we promised at Potsdam—when their champions of democracy are set free and are accorded the sympathy and support they so richly deserve. Then those who want to speak for democracy will not be silenced by the memory of those who spoke out before and were jailed and forgotten. Americans interested in a peaceful and democratic Japan should look to the prisons, not the palaces.

In the Wind

U. S. S. R. ZION: The September 15 bulletin of the Agricultural Committee for American-Soviet Friendship, Inc., reports that "twenty years ago the Soviet government offered the territory around Birobidshan, on the northeast border of Manchuria, to the Jews as an autonomous Jewish region. Gradually about 200 enterprising and hardy settlers moved in. . . . These Jewish farmers have converted their part of the Amur valley . . . into the most homelike place in Russian Asia. Their collective farms compare favorably with any American or European estate."

TOLERANCE: The Gentile League, which lost its charter in July, 1944, because of its anti-Semitism, is seeking for a new license. In an interview with Arthur W. Friede, founder of the league, the Milwaukee Journal of September 16 reports Friede's denial of anti-Semitic charges. "We have to call it the Gentile League," he said, "to let the Jews know we have an organization, too. They have an organization that we can't join, but we won't go that far. If they can qualify, they can join ours. . . . One of the aims of the league is to try to prevent any particular group getting control of [surplus war goods] and gouging the American public. . . . The league emphatically declares that it is not anti-religious."

DEMOCRATIZATION: The September 8 issue of Editor and Publisher mentions that articles from the Chicago Tribune are being sent to the main prisoner-of-war camp at Concordia, Kansas, for use in a German monthly digest, and quotes a letter from the camp's assistant executive officer to the Tribune: "Your newspaper has been coming regularly to this camp and has served a useful purpose indeed in the reeducation of German prisoners."

NOTICE TO THE BIBLE CLASS: A correspondent has sent in a clipping from Variety noting that Frank Ross, who is making a Hollywood spectacle out of "The Robe," has signed a contract to provide color stills from the picture for use as illustrations in an edition of the New Testament to be published after the film is released.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. One dollar will be paid for each item accepted.]

Czechs and Sudetens

BY RALPH PARKER

(Moscow correspondent of the Overseas Press; before the war bureau chief for the New York Times and the London Times in Prague.)

Prague, September 10

"IT MUST be Czechoslovakia. It is so beautiful," said the Prime Minister to the Minister of the Interior as the plane that brought the Czechoslovak government delegation back from Moscow topped the Sudeten Mountains. And if perhaps the Czech statesman's appreciation of his country's loveliness was heightened by the events of the preceding week, in which he had won Soviet support for Czech retention of Tesin (Teschen) but had had to yield Subcarpathian Ukraine, the reaction was natural to anybody who had been flying over war-scarred Russia, obliterated Warsaw, and a Silesia apparently stripped of its population.

Of the two stock phrases usually applied to Bohemia, the cockpit and the crossroads of Europe, the second is again relevant, for never in Czech history have so many foreigners streamed through the capital as during the past three months. In Prague's Alcron Hotel, where Lord Runciman prepared his memorandum on the Sudeten German question and Reichs Protector Baron Otto von Neurath took refuge from the castle ghosts, are gathered former inmates of concentration camps, Russian, British, and American officers, members of the Soviet purchasing commission, UNRRA officials, Slovak factory owners waiting impatiently to know whether their property is going to be nationalized, German anti-fascists collecting sponsors for their applications for Czechoslovak citizenship, Cabinet ministers in London-tailored suits and Cabinet ministers in off-the-peg Moscow suits. Nearly all these people are waiting. They are waiting for the foreign armies to leave Czech soil, for the promised improvement in the food situation, which is as bad as it ever was under the Germans, for trucks and gasoline from Bremen, for the return of their property, for the mass expulsion of the Germans to begin, for the revolution to end.

People say that the revolution is marking time because the political situation has developed in a way that none save perhaps the alert and farseeing President himself had expected. When I spoke to Czech Communists in Moscow at the time the Social Democrat, Zdenek Fierlinger, was forming his provisional government, they estimated the support they were likely to get in the country at 60 per cent. Today they admit that they will be lucky to get 25 per cent of the vote when the elections take place at the year's end. They attribute the decline to the public's realization that the Communists enjoy no monopoly of Russian good-will and to the fact that the Red Army, like any army living off the land it is in, is scarcely a good advertisement for the policy of its government. Within the Czech Communist Party the more experienced leaders from the emigration are striving to convince their followers that loyalty to the treaty of alliance between Czechoslovakia and the Soviet Union does not require a slavish imitation of Soviet methods. Some of them say that when President Benes and most of the present government were in Moscow, Stalin offered the advice that Fierlinger's list was too heavily weighted toward the extreme left. The Communists are vociferous advocates of a close working union between the three socialist parties—their own, the Social Democrats, and the non-Marxist National Socialists. If this so-called National Bloc can hold together until the elections, the gains of the Christian Populists are not likely seriously to menace the emergence of a left-wing coalition government.

Whether such a government would maintain the democratic freedoms so marked in Czechoslovakia during the present interim period is a question. The official newspaper of the Christian Populist Party summed up its view of present political trends in these words:

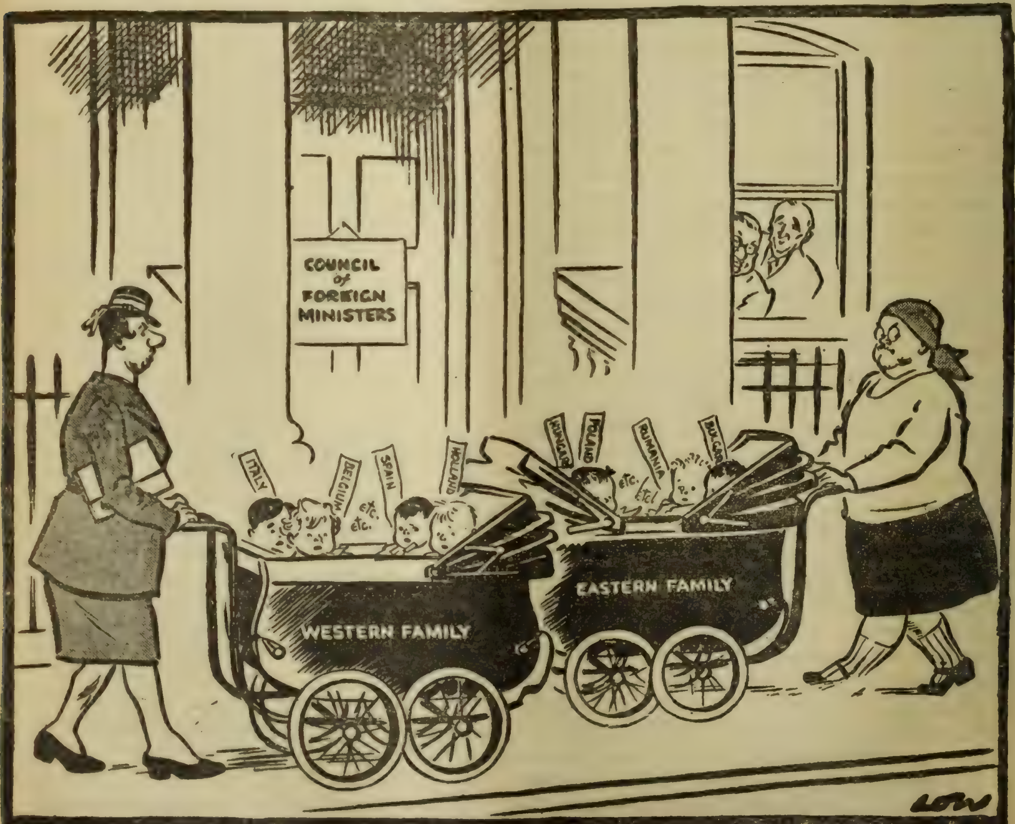
> Liberal democracy should make concessions in the field of economic liberalism, and the new socialist doctrine should continue to make concessions in the direction of political liberalism. The liberal doctrine in its economic form of capitalism is dead, but liberalism as a method, as a habit of decent and reasonable intercourse between people . . . will not cease to exist. . . . The new social organizations carry certain dangers in them. State control over heavy industry, mines, and the like can result under certain conditions in the accumulation of a dangerous amount of political power by an anonymous authority difficult to control—the state. The greatest evil of the twentieth century is the distrust of individual freedom by the state, whose role in modern life should be a regulative and coordinating one. . . . Our state, at the crossroads between the liberal west and the socialist east, possesses all the conditions necessary for carrying out a synthesis of a most reasonable character.

There is no censorship, travel is unrestricted, and people can call public meetings and organize demonstrations to advocate anything except fascism. Nevertheless, there is a good deal of tension in the country. The Czech character has changed deeply since I knew it before the war. The terror peculiar to this region was a cold, scheduled terror designed to affect the greatest number of people. It is now reckoned that about 100,000 Czechs in the "Protectorate," excluding persons murdered on racial grounds, were killed; one-third of the intelligentsia was wiped out. And in other villages than Lidice wheat now grows where houses once stood. As repatriated Czechs from the Reich, over six hundred thousand so far of the million and a quarter deported, stream through Prague, some experience the joys of reunion, but for others there are only memories and pain. In some the experience of terror has left a lassitude which may for a period have serious economic consequences. In others it has created a cruelty that was rare among Czechs. When I visited the Sudeten areas German anti-fascists told me how shocked they were to find Czechs using brutal methods against the German population. "We did not know these Czechs before the war," they said. "They have a hardness that is new to their character." "We have been deeply disappointed," a German Communist said to me in Usti-na-Labem (Aussig), "to find the Czech Socialists have forgotten that we are their comrades." It seemed fitting to remind him that the Czechs had been more than disappointed when the German Socialist vote melted away in 1938 and left Henlein triumphant. "Do you trust German Communists?" I asked Josef Weiner, tight-lipped Communist chairman of a Czech commission at Decin. "Not one of them," he replied.

If one accepts the Czech view that the bulk of the Sudeten Germans must leave Czechoslovakia, the plan by which the evacuation is being carried out is not a cruel one. It is pretty freely admitted that excesses have taken place, that Czech youths do not always differentiate between those who opposed Henlein and those who followed him like sheep. But since the movement of Germans from the Sudeten areas has begun to gain momentum, there has been a slackening of tension. The manufacturing town of Usti provides a fair sample of what is happening all through the Elbe valley in Czechoslovakia. Some thirty thousand Czechs have already returned to Usti, in ships down the swift-flowing river, along the roads in captured German trucks, in crowded trains. The town was severely damaged by air raids last April, and the Czechs believe that the Germans should help to rebuild it before they leave and should continue to man the machines in the big Schicht margarine factory until they can be replaced by Czech labor.

Ten local Germans, Communists and Social Democrats who were in active opposition to Konrad Henlein's Sudeten German Party before Munich, have been permitted to organize an anti-fascist committee of investigation with the right to issue green identification cards to Germans who in their opinion are worthy of being considered potentially loyal Czechoslovak citizens. In theory the possession of this card protects the owner from summary expulsion or loss of personal property. But until the Czechoslovak authorities have completed their inquiries and the process of "opting" is over, it does not confer on the Germans those "human rights" they will enjoy later under the government's Kosice program; for the time being they are obliged to wear the badge of defeat, the white armband, and are barred entry into most public places. They are, in short, Germans with whom the Czechs have agreed to conclude an armistice.

A larger group of Germans in the Usti region have received from the Czech authorities red identification cards that classify them as essential workers to be kept in the region until those among them who are considered disloyal are



"YOU'RE NOT THE ONLY ONE WHO CAN RAISE A FAMILY" replaced by Czech immigrants. As they leave the factories, they come under the jurisdiction of the local labor exchange, which drafts them to work on demolition and rebuilding. At the Schicht works about two thousand Germans of this class are at work; a somewhat smaller number, in a German-built factory at Podmokly lower down the Elbe, where parts of V-2 and V-3 were pressed. They receive pay and rations equal to those of the Czechs and are in general, they told us, unmolested. Yet another group consists of a small number of prisoners who, while awaiting trial by the courts, are put to work under guard. In the Schicht works I saw a detachment of fifty prisoners being marched to a truck. Many wore S. S. uniforms. Their heads were shaven, their clothes hung on them, their cheeks were hollow. A visit to the Terezin fortress, however, revealed that they were provided with three times as much living space as the Jews who preceded them in that notorious prison.

The Czechs intend that all Germans who are neither possible future optants nor essential workers shall leave the country as soon as air-raid damages have been made good and the Russians can accept them in Germany. Several thousand, we were told, had already left Usti. Under the regulations they were allowed to take with them as much personal luggage as they could carry and, if they owned them, a gold watch and wedding ring. Their transportation to the frontier and for about ten miles into Germany is in the hands of the Czechoslovak army.

That this plan is not being strictly adhered to everywhere is largely the fault of the Germans. The Usti anti-fascist committee, for example, has aroused Czech suspicion by issuing three times as many green identification cards as there were anti-Henlein votes cast in Usti in the crucial municipal elections of 1938. A member of the Austrian commission at Most was caught selling Austrian papers to Nazis. In Decin a secret German radio transmitter was broadcasting anti-Czech propaganda the day I visited the town. Czech officers have been killed by "werewolf" detachments in this area, and recently the Germans made an unsuccessful attempt to free prisoners from a Czech internment camp. At Podmokly we were shown cleverly forged Communist Party membership cards.

The political attitude of the German anti-fascists in Usti does not augur well for the future of Czech-German relations. During a talk with the committee in the presence of Czech officials I received an invitation to spend the evening with the Germans alone. I picked my way through a ruined square and entered a comfortably furnished apartment owned by a German doctor, where six or seven members of the German anti-fascist group were gathered. For the next four hours, over several bottles of Kreuznach '38, I heard six or seven different points of view expressed about the future of the Sudeten Germans. The speakers revealed complete bewilderment about the principles on which Germans should take their stand. They seemed unable to decide whether their true home was in the Sudetenland, provided living conditions were tolerable, or whether it was their duty to go to the Reich and work for a new Germany; whether their best hope for the future lay in transfer to Austria or whether they should try to go to Canada. "I will say something that I have never said aloud before," one German who had spent years in a concentration camp confessed at the end of our talk. "We Germans lack civic courage. Our real place is in the Reich. We anti-fascists should be in the van of the movement to lead the Germans back to Germany. Instead of that we are afraid of material conditions in the Reich." "We are a people without a land," he continued. "The Czechs don't want us because, they say, we destroyed their state. The Germans don't want us because, they say, we began the war. But if we are anti-fascists, the Germans of the Reich need us. And there we must go."

The Legion Looks at Labor

BY CAREY McWILLIAMS

FOR two years before he was called into the services, Frank Stolo was employed by the Harvey Machine Company in Los Angeles. He served in the Attu campaign and was wounded; he served in the South Pacific, where he was again wounded, and was awarded the Bronze Star. Receiving an honorable discharge, Stolo—a non-union man—recently returned to his old job. In reemploying Stolo the company ranked him in seniority according to the length of his service with the company before he was inducted, plus the time he had served in the army. The question of his seniority rating is now before the courts in an action brought by the company against the C. I. O. union with which it has a contract.

Similar suits are now pending in a dozen or more states. In Congress the Committee on Veterans' Affairs has favorably reported H. R. 3384, which seeks to exempt veterans from closed-shop contracts and encourages employers to hire them as strike-breakers. Although the favorable report on this measure was sneaked through by Rankin's trickery—an actual majority of the committee later issued a "minority report" opposing the bill—the fact that it is on the calendar serves to point up the danger. In the courts and in Congress the reactionaries are trying to stir up a bogus veterans-vs.-labor dispute for the purpose of undermining the position of both veterans and trade unions. In California a group of ambitious promoters has been offering large sums of money to various veterans' groups in an effort, thus far unsuccessful, to induce them to sponsor an initiative measure patterned after the Rankin bill.

What position is the American Legion likely to take in this rapidly developing controversy? Did Rankin, long known as a spokesman in Congress for the Legion, actually represent it in sponsoring H. R. 3384? In the past the Legion has pretty consistently inclined toward the employer position on all questions of industrial relations. But these are strange times, and a new wind seems to be blowing in Legion affairs.

The first indication that a change was developing on labor issues appeared during the 1938 national convention, when two regularly chartered trade-union posts, Dawn Post and Los Angeles Labor Post, called a meeting of legionnaires who were union members. Out of this initial meeting came the National Conference of Union Labor Legionnaires, which now has permanent headquarters in Chicago, 127 affiliated trade-union posts scattered across the country, and a total labor membership in the Legion of about 25,000. For the current year the conference has submitted a budget of $50,000 to finance its activities. If it succeeds in raising this sum, the conference proposes to conduct an aggressive educational and public-relations campaign, both in and out of the Legion, in an effort to develop better Legion-labor relations. Some of the large international unions, recognizing the importance of the movement, have already pledged financial assistance.

The future role that the conference may play in Legion affairs will be largely determined by the number of new trade-union posts that it is able to form and, less directly, by the number of trade unionists it is able to enrol in the Legion. For despite the fact that the reins of control are tightly held in the Legion, the locally chartered post remains the basic organizational unit. Top officials may stall and equivocate, but eventually they must take cognizance of important changes in the composition of local posts. With this in mind, the conference has been exerting skilful pressure in those cases where state commanderies have been reluctant to charter local trade-union posts. If pressure from the conference has not been sufficient to compel the issuance of charters, members of unions have been urged to join some already existing trade-union post in the same locality.

At the 1941 convention of the Legion, the conference succeeded in securing the adoption of a resolution calling for the establishment of a National Labor Relations Committee. As envisaged by the conference, the committee was to serve as a brake on precipitous action on controversial issues, to tone down ill-considered speeches by top Legion officials, and to be a clearing house, within the Legion, on labor matters. Although the convention voted to establish the committee, successive national commanders refused to put the mandate into effect. In both the national and the state departments of the Legion the judge advocate functions much in the manner of a permanent under secretary in a British ministry. Commanders may come and go, but the judge advocate remains. In this instance, as in most controversial matters, the national judge advocate upheld the action of the national commanders. But the conference refused to give up the fight. Four years later, the National Labor Relations Committee was actually established, with three associate members of the conference among its members. This is the first time in the history of the Legion that labor representatives have served on a standing national committee.

In addition to securing the establishment of this committee, the national conference has been able to exert a quiet but growing influence on questions of Legion policy. For example, it has been leading an important fight on Local Board Memorandum 190-a, under which General Lewis B. Hershey has sought to create a kind of "super-seniority" for veterans under Section 8 of the Selective Service Act. Actually this memorandum is designed to pit veterans of World War I against veterans of World War II, and veterans of World War II against organized labor. In 1943 and again in 1944 national commanders of the Legion indorsed the interpretation of Section 8 embodied in the memorandum. The conference not only opposed this action but proceeded, through a process of education and publicity, to explain the implications and true meaning of the memorandum to Legion posts all over the country. And at a recent annual meeting in Chicago the conference adopted a resolution calling upon the Legion to withdraw its indorsement of the memorandum. Copies are being sent to all member posts with letters asking their support.

At the same Chicago meeting the conference urged the Legion to rescind a resolution adopted at the last annual convention against further immigration; urged modification of another resolution which places the Legion on record in favor of deporting "all aliens in the United States with subversive records" (the conference feels that the records of native American fascists also should be scrutinized); called on the Legion to rescind a resolution favoring "experience rating" in state unemployment-compensation acts; asked for repeal of a resolution attacking American citizens of Japanese descent; deplored the "Rankin type" of inquiry into veterans' affairs; indorsed the issuance of charters to so-called "colored" posts; and went on record in support of many other liberal and progressive measures. Perhaps the most important resolution of the conference was one suggesting the establishment of administrative tribunals to hold hearings on veterans' reinstatement cases.

The conference has also been asking the national officers of the Legion some extremely pertinent questions: "Why the anti-labor cartoons and columns in the Legion magazine, which is sent to some three million men overseas?" "Why did Commander Waring fall for the stupid Guadalcanal story?" "Why did Commander Atherton suggest the electrocution of certain labor-union officials?" Rhetorical as these questions may be, the fact that they have been raised within the Legion, in an official manner, has had important repercussions. Today all portions of official Legion speeches dealing with labor must clear through the National Labor Relations Committee. The establishment of this procedure, in itself, represents a notable victory for the conference.

The success of the conference has now become a matter of national concern. Of the million men who have been discharged from the services in World War II, 560,000 are reported to have joined the American Legion. The success or failure of current efforts to provoke a fake veterans-vs.-labor dispute may therefore hinge upon the question of how successfully the conference can influence Legion policy. The future of the Legion itself may depend upon the same question. For if the Legion permits itself to become the catspaw of reaction in the fight now brewing, it may forfeit its position as the largest veterans' organization in the world. The work of the conference is of national importance for still another reason. Since its members are drawn from the ranks of both A. F. of L. and C. I. O. unions, it can be a powerful force toward eventual unification of the labor movement. Fortunately, the leadership of the conference is in excellent hands. Through such men as Charles Vencill of Los Angeles, Henry Geisz of New York, and Maurice A. Frank of Chicago, ably supported by George C. Danfield, Irvin Kuenzli, George Lindborg, and Joseph Veloskey (director of veterans' affairs for the U. A. W.), the conference is unquestionably developing into a major force within the Legion.

Moreover, its influence on Legion policy is likely to increase rather than to diminish in the future. As in a fraternal organization, new leaders in the Legion must slowly and painfully ascend from local to state to national offices in order to influence effectively major policy decisions. In the Legion, as in the trade unions, seniority seems to be important. Thus about a decade usually must elapse before a new current of opinion can find reflection in Legion policy. From now on the conference should be able to count on a growing opinion within the Legion, and not only among union-labor legionnaires, in support of its policies and program. If the present hierarchy of the Legion can be prevailed upon to listen to the voice of the conference, the pending veteran-labor dispute may be avoided or at least kept within reasonable bounds.

No Surrender at All!

BY TSUYOSHI MATSUMOTO

(After studying at Meji Gakuin, a religious school in Tokyo, and the Union Theological Seminary in New York, Mr. Matsumoto became an instructor in military intelligence, first, at the University of Michigan and then at the University of Chicago. He has contributed articles to Asia.)

WE MUST take a realistic view of Japan's surrender. It has not surrendered its will to conquer; neither has it surrendered its hatred of the victors. During the first week after capitulation, Domei told the world, millions of loyal subjects "with tears of shame" prayed to the Emperor, saying: "Forgive us, Your Majesty, our efforts have not been enough!" Most of the news we have received so far from defeated Japan has been equally if not more disturbing. The militarists and imperialists are still in power; men who ought to be tried as war criminals still rule Japan. They are still telling the people what to think and how to act. They are systematically inoculating the nation against liberation, democracy, and peace. And at the time of writing they are getting away with it. In short, this is no surrender at all.

Let's look at the facts:

1. The historical pattern of surrender. Contrary to the often-repeated statement, Japan was defeated and invaded once before by foreign powers. It was forced to sign humiliating treaties and to grant extra-territoriality and alien control of its imports and exports. On July 8, 1853, when Commodore Perry sailed into the Bay of Tokyo (then Yedo) with a squadron of four "black ships," a state of undeclared war was suddenly thrust upon "isolationist" Japan. There was no shooting, to be sure. But the impact of the "black ships" did to the awestricken Japanese at that time what the atom bombs did in this war. Consequently, when Perry returned seven months later to receive the answer of the Japanese government, this time with seven black ships, the Japanese agreed to the Commodore's terms. Within two years Great Britain, Russia, and Holland had induced the Japanese to sign treaties containing most-favored-nation clauses.

The events that followed are worth recalling as part of the pattern of surrender. Men who had favored the acceptance of the peace terms were regarded as traitors and in some cases assassinated by reactionary patriots. The "peaceful occupation" began smoothly, but when an "arrogant Britisher" named C. L. Richardson was killed for cutting across a procession in honor of the lord of Satsuma, the British sent a squadron to Kagoshima and on the expiration of their ultimatum bombarded the city. While the Richardson incident was being discussed by the Shogun's military government at Yedo, the extreme nationalists of the imperial court, then at Kyoto, got the sanction of the Emperor for the cancelation of all existing peace treaties and the expulsion of the foreigners—effective as of June 5, 1863. Some hotheads in Choshu now took the matter in their own hands and fired upon the American, French, and Dutch ships. In reply, an allied fleet headed by nine British warships and containing one makeshift merchant steamer representing the United States navy bombarded the coast. Overwhelmed by the incomparable superiority of Western weapons, leading nobles of Satsuma and Choshu overthrew the Tokugawa regime and became the rulers of the new Japan under the protective cover of the restoration of the imperial dynasty, in 1867. They then suddenly abandoned their extreme anti-foreign policy and welcomed the presence of the "foreign teachers" as a means of enabling them to gain time and a knowledge of the new methods of war. Thus, historically speaking, Pearl Harbor was a return call of the vengeful successors of the early hotheads of Satsuma and Choshu. Like yesterday's surrender, today's is no surrender, really.

Tojo

2. The atom bomb. The fact is clear: the new weapon overwhelmed the enemy, and not having any counter-measure he stopped fighting—"undefeated" otherwise. Though our army heads called them "military cities," nearly a quarter of a million civilians were massacred at Hiroshima and Nagasaki. We called the Japanese inhuman when they bombed to obliteration Chinese cities containing helpless women and children. With some justification, perhaps, they will make a moral issue of the atom bomb. It will be as hard for them to forget Hiroshima and Nagasaki as it is for us to forget Pearl Harbor, which is sufficient to cause another war. Today's victory and all the sacrifices we have made so far will be utterly wasted unless we can erase the fear and hatred we have planted in the hearts of the Japanese nation and help the Japanese people to see that their dead have died in order that they, the living, might have life, freedom, and peace. We must show them the full meaning of their government's earlier refusal to accept the Potsdam terms, of the atom bombing, and of the final surrender. We must let them know that if the thousands had not died at Hiroshima, many millions of the living would have been sacrificed by the war lords.

3. The unbeaten land armies. Not to mention the proud Kwantung army in Manchuria, which battled for a few days with the Russian army, some 2,000,000 crack troops have been demobilized in the home islands. They never had a chance to meet the Allied invasion armies. Emotionally, they must be suffering from a tremendous "let-down," to say nothing of the humiliation of the surrender. Admittedly the world's greatest underground fighters, they no doubt had built in the mountainous regions extensive underground fortifications which were relatively untouched by our air assaults. They had planned to hold their ground for months against an all-out invasion by at least 5,000,000 men. That means a tremendous stock of arms and provisions stored away somewhere deep underground. We ought to realize that the Japanese militarists, defiant of the victorious Allied powers, defiant even of the imperial wish and of the war-weary people, have undoubtedly made all arrangements for future operations. They will not indulge in any small "incidents" which will betray their larger plans; they will be as harmless as new-born babes from now until they are ready; they will be "peaceful and cooperative" in order to disarm the victors. And they will strike exactly when we shall have decided that the threat of Japanese military aggression is no more—five years from now, perhaps, when the United Nations are tired of maintaining an occupational force in Japan, or perhaps fifty years from now. Waiting is nothing to the patient militarists of Japan.

4. The unknown future strategy of war. Military victory, no matter how complete, is no peace insurance. History has shown us that. No weapon remains a secret and exclusive possession of one military power very long. If anyone thinks that the peace is now assured because only America and England possess the secret of atomic energy, he is a fool. Japanese brains have enough ingenuity, imagination, and intelligence, although most Westerners would not like to admit it, to master any man-made weapons of war. Many people feel we are now safe from the threat of Japanese aggression because Japan has been stripped of arms and war industries and cut off from raw materials. Unfortunately, the situation may be different in the new era of atomic energy which has just been ushered in. Perhaps I am unduly pessimistic, but I believe we cannot afford to think of the future in terms of today's scientific inventions alone. Japan, though deprived of today's essential war industries and today's essential raw materials, can still prepare for tomorrow's war—and right under the nose of the occupation government. Today's unbeatable strategies of war will become in time like those of the British defenders of Singapore.

5. The same old war lords in peacemakers' clothing. In Japan today the same old oligarchy, composed of imperialists, Gumbatsu, and Zaibatsu, is desperately trying to stay in power. Ironically, this oligarchy has many admirers and friends in the United States, persons who seem incapable of distinguishing the real issues from personal sentiment. They are blinded by the gentleness and amiability of individual members of the oligarchy and by their apparent distance from the inhumanities and atrocities committed in their name under their system. Now that the United States has the power to shape tomorrow's Japan, it will be a shame if such Americans are placed in positions of responsibility. They will never know what the common people of Japan think and feel. They will even thwart the will of the common people.

What can we accomplish further by using the same puppet ruler, the same political machinery, the same government system, complete with the police? True, the occupation was carried out smoothly by that method, but we should not therefore feel indebted to any member of the Japanese oligarchy or to the Emperor. To defeat one's opponent by using his power is the secret of Japanese jujutsu. It worked for us. But after the enemy is down, one must "cook his goose," not help him to his feet. What kind of game are we playing with the imperial government of Japan?

6. The attitude of the war lords to the Emperor. They have asked to be allowed to retain the institution of the god-emperor, including his "prerogatives." Obviously, this is a face-saving device, a device for shifting the responsibilities of peace-making to the Emperor. Thus they have actually sold the Emperor to the alien conquerors, forcing him to become a puppet of the foreign occupational government. According to their own code of ethics and the carefully built myth of the inviolable, infallible god-emperor, this constitutes the highest treason. But so far they have managed to withhold the truth from the Japanese people. Their audacity and arrogance are simply amazing. They have said to the people: "Our armed forces are unbeaten; we have only obeyed His Majesty's wish and command in laying down our arms; we have not lost the war but have only accepted the changed situation which makes it necessary for the nation to cooperate with the occupation government, because that is His Majesty's benevolent will for the peace of the world; you must not blame anyone but yourselves for this situation and must ask yourselves whether you did your best to win the war!"

All these facts are most alarming. The only conclusion to be drawn is that Japan surrendered nothing except the now obsolete weapons of war, having been forced by the atom bomb to accept the "changed situation." The Japanese war lords know that this is no surrender at all. And we should know it.

BOOKS and the ARTS

MR. WALLACE AND THE WISE BOYS

BY STUART CHASE

HENRY WALLACE has written a clear, fine book, "Sixty Million Jobs,"* about full employment after the war. Already the air is heavy with attacks upon it, beginning with Senator Taft in the New York Times on September 9. Why is this? We had about 65,000,000 jobs filled on V-J Day. Wouldn't it be a good thing to hold 60,000,000 of them in the peace to come? Do veterans want to start asking brothers for dimes again?

Everybody officially claims to be for full employment, but powerful minority groups are organizing to kill all specific measures leading to that end. Privately they say that it is high time to have a buyers' market in labor once more. They affirm that unemployment is the price we must pay for the blessings of our free-enterprise system. Booms and depressions, they say, are as much a part of the system as the Stock Exchange, and Mr. Wallace and his ilk, wittingly or unwittingly, are taking us right into the Kremlin.

Wittingly or unwittingly, the minority groups are adopting an exceedingly dangerous strategy. It is dangerous not only for the country and for the world at large but for themselves and their properties. The formula seems to be: remove all government controls, decimate the bureaucrats, balance the budget, reduce corporate taxes, and let nature take its course. A better recipe for complete economic disintegration it is difficult to imagine. In a time which demands bold, aggressive action their program is completely negative. It disregards the facts of two world wars, of the super-depression of the '30's, the distortions of our economy under the pressures of the last five years, the coming of the atomic bomb, and above all the temper of the rank and file of our people. It totally disregards the wishes of 15,000,000 service men, now home or coming home.

Mr. Wallace's critics do not see the lesson spelled out in every soldier and civilian opinion poll. Americans quite clearly do not care for any system, however pleasing its name, which puts millions of them on the streets as in 1932. They had all they wanted of the WPA. It is just thirteen years too late to choose between free enterprise as Senator Taft understands it and full employment as Mr. Wallace understands it. The choice in 1946 is between Mr. Wallace's compensatory plan, which reserves great areas for free enterprise, and something much farther to the left—something perhaps like that which the British people voted for; something perhaps stiffer.

Americans, paced by the veterans, are determined to have jobs by one road or another. This, I think, is one of the few things one can be certain of in an uncertain world. So Mr. Wallace's opponents if they kill his plan will find themselves in far worse plight than if they had come to his support. He is their best hope for a middle-of-the-road course, in a world plunging to the left.

II

Mr. Wallace belongs to what I like to call the "give-'em-a-break" school rather than to the "bums-and-loafers" school. He believes in people, in "the fundamental decency of man." He wants to give every child an opportunity to develop the maximum powers its genes and its glands allow. He is not afraid of the mob, as Hamilton was—he welcomes it. To him the mob is "the folks." He is a genuine, corn-fed democrat.

Again and again he returns to the idea of inter-dependence in power-age societies. People must pull together if they are to survive. There is no room in a high-energy culture for anarchists, rugged individualists, or me-first pressure groups. Every man, whether he likes it or not, is now his brother's keeper.

Thus by a curious turn of fate Christian ethics become not only theoretically admirable but exceedingly practical. A citizen can no longer provide his own food, shelter, clothing, transport, education. The machine has collectivized him; if he bursts out of the community he is done for. He must take his food and supplies out of the general pot of production to which millions of his fellows have contributed. Can he flout those millions indefinitely and live? He cannot. That is why we are well into "the century of the common man."

A man without work in the power age is the most miserable of God's creatures. Within memory of people now alive anyone could earn a living on the land when the factories and shops closed. That retreat has long since been cut off. Decade by decade the number of farmers relative to total population grows less; it is now under 20 per cent.

Given full employment, nearly every other economic and social problem becomes manageable. Workers are contented, and so are farmers. Negroes—the first group to be fired and the last to be hired—have a far better time of it. Crime goes down as mental and physical health goes up. Ample funds become available for education, science, research. Taxes are relatively easy to bear when the national gross income hits $200 billion, and the federal debt can be held in line. With a large volume of unemployment a debt of $300 billion will rapidly become unmanageable.

Once we begin believing, says Mr. Wallace, that we can get along indefinitely with five to ten million chronically unemployed, we must then:

> Force our sights down from a $200 billion gross income to perhaps $125 billion, which means

---

* Simon and Schuster and Reynal and Hitchcock, $2 (cloth); Simon and Schuster, $1 (paper).

The purchasing power of consumers drops from $135 billion to $80 billion, and Farm income drops from $22 billion to $7 billion, and Corporation gross profits drop from $25 billion to $5 billion,
While mass unemployment will require huge government expenditures once more for relief, which will Unbalance the federal budget worse than ever.

Thus the more cautious we are in our plans to balance the budget the worse we are likely to unbalance it. If we try to pay off the debt by killing all programs for 60,000,000 jobs, we shall only get a heavier debt. It is like driving in speedway traffic. The slow, cautious driver may get smashed up trying to avoid a smash-up. This is no time in history for timid men.

III

The above are some of the reasons and the philosophies which inspire Mr. Wallace. They also inspire men of goodwill who belong to the "give-'em-a-break" school. They should inspire every canny business man who does not want to be wiped out in a runaway inflation or sunk in a bottomless depression.

Good. What kind of compensatory economy does Mr. Wallace propose? The familiar article. I would guess that the majority of American economists under fifty are for it; and every British economist of any age, except Professor Hayek—who originally came from Austria. Mr. Wallace, however, has some elegant new statistical concepts and figures, produced by the WPB and other agencies in their actual war experience. In 1933 we didn't know the shape of our economy. We have learned it now. We had to, or lose the war.

A compensatory economy can also be called a thermostat economy. When the house gets too hot, the furnace shuts off; when it gets too cold, it speeds up. The thermostatic controls to puncture incipient booms and dissolve incipient depressions include incentive taxation, social-security rates, public works, stimulation to little business, housing development, income-tax rates, open-market operations, Federal Reserve interest rates. When a boom threatens, says Mr. Wallace, raise income-tax rates and pay off some of the debt. When a depression threatens, increase consumers' purchasing power by lowering social-security rates, stimulating business expansion, and, as a last resort, letting contracts to private enterprise for public works. Encourage local communities to cooperate in all such plans, as the TVA now does. Encourage organized business men, workers, and farmers to cooperate with the government in applying these compensatory devices.

If you like Mr. Wallace's proposals you can help them along in a practical way by getting behind S 380, the Murray bill for full employment, shortly to be reported out of committee. It is indorsed by President Truman, by Secretaries Byrnes and Vinson, by Beardsley Ruml, Henry Dennison, and many others. The Committee for Economic Development is mostly for it, and the National Association of Manufacturers against it. All the labor organizations are for it.

Mr. Wallace follows S 380 in proposing that the President give the country and Congress a budget message in January, a budget covering the whole national economy. In this message the President, aided by experts, would estimate the shape of the economy for the coming year—the gross national income, the proportion of savings and investment, the levels of employment. On the basis of this estimate he would recommend certain compensatory measures for Congress to pass in order to keep the national economy on an even keel. It would then be up to Congress. If Congress did nothing, and the economy began to go to pieces, the voters would know exactly whom to blame. Notice how carefully both Mr. Wallace and S 380 preserve our democratic procedures. There is no chance for a dictator to worm his way into economic planning of this kind.

IV

In 1939 we had a gross national income of $89 billion; in 1944, of $199 billion, of which nearly $100 billion was due to war outlays. For 1950, after reconversion is completed, Mr. Wallace advocates the following model, at 1944 prices:

Consumer spending for food, shelter, etc.	$135 billion
Capital formation by business men	30 "
Outlays by government—federal, state, and local	35 "
Total gross national income	$200 billion

Under this arrangement, the federal budget could readily be balanced and some of the debt retired. Meanwhile the 60,000,000 jobs would fall into such patterns as these:

Manufacturing	15,000,000
Trade	9,000,000
Farming	8,000,000
Government and the armed services	7,000,000
Self-employed workers	6,000,000
Finance and miscellaneous	6,000,000
Construction	3,500,000
Transport and utilities	3,500,000
Domestic service	2,000,000
Total	60,000,000

Men	42,000,000	Native white	48,000,000
Women	18,000,000	Foreign-born white	6,000,000
		Negroes	6,000,000
Total	60,000,000	Total	60,000,000

Organized	14,000,000
Unorganized	46,000,000
Total	60,000,000

Mr. Wallace anticipates 1,500,000 workers frictionally unemployed at all times, on the average.

These patterns are impossible without two things:

First, cooperation between government and the Big Three pressure groups that represent labor, business, farming.

Second, an industrial output geared to the formula of high wages, high volume, low overhead costs, and low prices—which means no serious price manipulation by monopolies.

C. E. Wilson of General Electric believes that full employment is possible only if we have the take-home wages of 1944 combined with the prices of 1940. The National Planning Association estimates output at 40 to 50 per cent more

Nation-wide praise for

UPTON SINCLAIR'S

Dragon Harvest

"As the range of the Lanny Budd saga comes closer to the present its interest naturally increases, but at the same time Upton Sinclair himself has steadily refined and sharpened his uncanny talent for interpreting, with courage and perspicacity, the history of our time."
—DAVID APPEL, Chicago Daily News.

"For this great work, as well as for the great body of work which preceded it, a great spirit deserves well of this world. Long live Upton Sinclair!"
—FRED T. MARSH, Herald Tribune Book Review

"He is able to carry the reader along with him through some of the most complex and critical pages of history with a breathlessness increased by a sense of intimacy . . .
—EDWIN BURGUM, New York Times.

"Dragon Harvest is both a liberal education and an education in liberalism."
—CHARLES LEE, Phila. Record.

"With the ease and aplomb of a Tolstoy introducing Napoleon into his War and Peace. Sinclair presents in living, breathing, three-dimensional portraiture the historical giants of our era. The Lanny Budd series will be read and admired when most of the diseased little men who aspired to greatness in our time are as dead as Tourquemada and as dishonored."
—STERLING NORTH, New York Post.

"It's loaded with gossip and color, decorated with mistresses and luxury—but it has an ultimate factual accuracy."
—WILLIAM SOSKIN, New York Herald Tribune.

AND INTERNATIONAL PRAISE FOR ITS PREDECESSOR . . .

PRESIDENTIAL AGENT

"A vast canvas in comparison with which that of War and Peace seems almost provincial . . . a really great work." —Manchester Guardian.

"It reads like an eye-witness account of a true experience . . . more like a supplement to history than a novel." —The Spectator, London.

"He helps you to re-live one of the most momentous epochs of all time." —Aberdeen Press.

"A notable affirmation, not only of the author's consuming passion to seek the light, but also of his literary competence."
—Scotsman, Edinburgh.

"Reporting of the most fascinating kind . . . this is not a book to read solely as fiction; it has a supremely important lesson to teach."
—John O'London's Weekly.

Each novel in the Lanny Budd series $3.00.

THE VIKING PRESS, NEW YORK

Harper Books on Timely Topics

DEMOCRACY against UNEMPLOYMENT

An Analysis of the Major Problem of Post-War Planning

By WILLIAM H. STEAD

Full employment of our peacetime manpower is America's goal. What about a program? What are the obstacles? This penetrating and constructive analysis of the entire problem will be indispensable to every one concerned with a humane and prosperous reconversion. The author's own proposals, written out of long, first hand experience in federal labor and employment services, throw authoritative light on the programs ahead. $3.00

PRIVATE MONOPOLY

The Enemy at Home

By DAVID LASSER

How monopoly at home and abroad presents a tremendous challenge to all lovers of democracy is the theme of this provocative book. "Private Monopoly is a penetrating analysis of the effect of monopolies and cartels in creating the economic conditions which led to the last war. It should be read by all who are interested in the future peace of the world." Former Judge THURMAN ARNOLD. $3.00

AMERICAN
LABOR UNIONS

What They Are and How They Work

By FLORENCE PETERSON

Director, Industrial Relations Division, Bureau of Labor Statistics, U. S. Department of Labor

Here for the first time in some years is an informing and impartial introduction to what A. F. of L., C. I. O. and many other initials and references mean in terms of human activities, interests and aspirations. It fills a long-felt need for a popular but comprehensive statement of how labor organizations operate in this country. $3.00

OURSELVES, INC.

The Story of Consumer Free Enterprise

By LEO R. WARD

An up-to-date picture of the rising tide of consumer cooperation. "So convinced that it is convincing, the book is as lively as the subject."—New York Herald Tribune. Immensely concrete, immediate, real. . . . His book is strong documentation of his faith—a book at once entertaining, extraordinarily informing and heartening."—Chicago Tribune. $2.50

All books available at your bookstore or from

HARPER & BROTHERS 49 East 33rd Street New York 16, N. Y.

than before the war, for full employment—which will put quite a strain on us consumers! But the lower third of the population provides literally a bottomless gulf for more goods.

How else can we knock $70 or $80 billion of war goods out of the picture and still keep everybody busy? Working hours will of course come down, which helps some. But the pre-war wage-price relationship must change too: higher wages relative to prices, as Mr. Wilson says. Management and labor have a stiff assignment here—to increase efficiency. The war-born labor-management committees obviously must go on. If increased efficiency aided by the low overhead of capacity production can hold down unit costs, then wages can rise without taking prices up with them. The vicious circle can be broken. There is no other way to break it. The only other way to full employment is by vast government expenditures for public works, year in and year out—pyramid building.

V

One can find little to criticize in Mr. Wallace's approach, if one really wants full employment, and is shy of government operation of industry. His estimate of 15,000,000 workers in manufacturing may be a bit high. His projected exports of $12 to $14 billion are higher than anything I can figure by 1950. He does not seem to sense the full strength of post-war collectivism all over the world—but perhaps he wrote before the British elections.

One does not need to be quite so enthusiastic over private competitive enterprise, when a glance around the horizon reveals the institution in full retreat. I do not love a private enterpriser any more than I love a cooperative enterpriser, or a state enterpriser. All can be useful under certain conditions and destructive under others. What I try to keep my eye on is the effect these various institutional agencies have on the human beings within them. Are they happy and creative or miserable and apathetic?

Mr. Wallace has given us the handbook for the American road to full employment. The wise boys, as I said earlier, are already beginning to laugh him off. They are the same boys who have been having one good laugh after another for almost twenty years.

In 1927 they laughed off the stock market and said it could not go higher.

In 1929 they said prosperity was here to stay.

In 1930 they said it would be back in sixty days.

In 1935 they said inflation, caused by an unbalanced budget, was about to ruin us.

At the same time they said a national debt of $50 billion would mark the end of the world, that the unemployed were bums and loafers, and that taxes were at a level no man could stand.

In 1940 they said it was ridiculous for Mr. Roosevelt to dream of building 50,000 planes a year.

In 1941 they said the OPA couldn't hold down prices, and free-born Americans would never stand for such regimentation anyway.

And now they say we can't have full employment. The same unreconstructed wise boys—only a little grayer.

Well, we'll see.

THE NEW LEADER

America's Leading Labor-Liberal Weekly

Announces the appointment of two outstanding writers on national and international affairs as

Associate Editors:

WILLIAM HENRY CHAMBERLIN

Former foreign correspondent for the Christian Science Monitor in Russia, Japan and key European cities.

Author of

The Iron Age
History of the Russian Revolution
Confessions of an Individualist
America: Partner in World Rule

DAVID J. DALLIN

Distinguished historian and political analyst.

Author of Soviet Russia's Foreign Policy

Russia and Postwar Europe
The Real Soviet Russia
The Big Three

In line with America's closer participation in world affairs and for a more complete recording, analysis and interpretation of international events, The New Leader inaugurates . . . .

A Monthly Supplement

WORLD AFFAIRS

Edited by WILLIAM HENRY CHAMBERLIN

FEATURE ARTICLES IN FUTURE ISSUES

The Lessons of Appeasement	Norman Angell	Liberal and Vocational Education	Ordway Tead
Idealism in Politics	Andre Visson	Our Insurgent Theater	Bryllion Fagin
The Italian Situation	Guiseppi Modigliani	Race: A Problem Above Politics	Lillian Smith
George Santayana	Horace M. Kallen	Korea's Fight for Freedom	Robert T. Oliver
German Guilt	Ralph Gilbert Ross	Communism in Latin America	Carleton Beals
Cartels and World Trade	Wendell Berge	Hitler's Spirit Survives	Sidney Hook

SPECIAL TRIAL OFFER

Send only $1 for a special 3 months' "get-acquainted" subscription. Yearly subscription $3 . . . a clarifying and stimulating weekly experience in down-to-earth realism and clear thinking.

Use this coupon before it slips your mind.

THE NEW LEADER

7 East 15th Street New York 3, N. Y.

N

THE NEW LEADER,
7 E. 15th St., New York 3

Here's my ☐ $1 for 3 Months' Trial Subscription. ☐ $3 for 1 year . . 52 issues.

Name..

Address..

City...Zone......................

U. S. S. R.—the Early Days

BUILDING LENIN'S RUSSIA. By Simon Liberman. University of Chicago Press. $3.

DESPITE its forbidding title, this is a fascinating, important book. It is at once a personal memoir, an inside story of eight critical years of Soviet life, and an evaluation of Russia today. All three are closely woven into a narrative of restraint and charm, full of new episodes and anecdotes, fair in its judgment of men and events, and often spiced with shrewd humor.

Simon Liberman traveled far from his boyhood on a Ukrainian farm to self-imposed exile in Paris and New York. He took part as a Menshevik in the revolution of 1905; when that failed, he became a successful business man, managing the vast timber estates of several noble families. During the March revolution he offered his services to Kerensky. In 1918 Lenin invited him to work with the Soviet government as an economic spetz. He managed the Soviet lumber industry, helped form the first government trust, and played an important role in shaping the New Economic Policy. He had Lenin's confidence and support, but many Communists suspected his Menshevik and business background, and the Cheka was frequently on his trail. Formally accused by the secret state police of favoring capitalists, he was finally exonerated, but he never felt free from oppressive suspicion and investigation. On completing a mission in Denmark, he severed his connections with the Soviet government, and decided not to return to Russia. He remained in Paris until 1938, then came to the United States, where he now lives.

It would have been easy to over-dramatize this story and to climax it with shallow denunciations. Instead, Mr. Liberman subordinates his personal experience in a modest attempt to understand it and through it to understand Russia yesterday and today. The result is a fresh picture of the years in which the U. S. S. R. built the foundations of its present economic system and first began its business dealings with Western Europe and America. The eyewitness account is focused on a single industry, but in his search for significance the author evokes the general from the particular. Whatever one may think of his interpretations, his facts shed light on such questions as war communism, N. E. P., party and government, foreign recognition, dictatorship, the trials, and the power of personality in history. Everything is telescoped, but the range is wide, from Larin's crackpot schemes to Lenin's genius and the conflicting fateful roles of Stalin, Trotsky, Rykov, and Djerdjinsky. Some biographical details have never been told before.

The author has his prejudices; he is partial to his chief, Krassin, and hard on Krassin's antagonist, Litvinov. But since he is aware of these prejudices at every point, his narrative has a refreshing detachment. This balance springs from a temper which from the beginning tried to find an equilibrium between what ought to be and what is. Mr. Liberman is loyal to the humane principles of Menshevism, respectful toward the power of Bolshevism, profoundly patriotic about Russia. These attitudes form the basis of his continual reflection on the sequence of conflict and development. His rich, original memoir concludes with an analysis of current problems. He acknowledges the harshness of the Soviet regime but defends it for its gigantic achievements, which have transformed a country and a people and defended them victoriously against the greatest invasion in their history. Mr. Liberman is also cautiously optimistic about the future. He believes there need be no conflict between Russia and other countries, above all between Russia and the United States, and that with the defeat of fascism and the elimination of the military danger, Russia is bound to move toward democracy.

JOSEPH FREEMAN

BRIEFER COMMENT

The Ordeal of Spain

ONLY IN SPAIN was the world conflict, whose first major phase has lately ended so inconclusively, sharply defined. After that it was muddied and reduced in significance as it spread in area, corrupted by the limiting self-interest of some of democracy's most ardent defenders. But in the Spanish struggle the moral as well as the political issues were still clear and absolute, unmistakable as the Guadarrama Mountains themselves. The epic story of the Spanish civil war has not yet been told. Meanwhile there have been many books, which is not the same thing.

The facts and feeling are all there in "Smouldering Freedom" (Longmans, Green, $2.50), but the eloquence and shaping hand are lacking. The author, Isabel de Palencia, was the Republican minister plenipotentiary to Sweden and Finland; she is a woman of exceptional endowments and accomplishment. Her book is largely raw material, much of it extremely interesting. There is a brief, lucid account of the civil war, its background and chief protagonists, and of subsequent political developments among the Spanish Republicans in exile. Of special interest are the simple, homely accounts of people Mme de Palencia knows—or knew, for many have been killed. There are also the terribly moving last letters of executed Republicans, which have a typically Spanish dignity, humanity, and lack of heroics. One of these is dated November 9, 1944. It, and indeed the whole of "Smouldering Freedom," is a heart-breaking reminder that the terror which preceded the world holocaust has not abated with it.

VIRGINIA MISHNUN

Escape Story

FROM GERMANY, SPAIN, ITALY, then Austria and Czechoslovakia, thousands of anti-fascist refugees flocked to France in the years between 1933 and the outbreak of the war; with the abrupt end of the war's first phase and the surrender of France they converged on Marseilles in a last desperate attempt to escape the Gestapo again through emigration. When Varian Fry arrived in Marseilles in the summer of 1940 as the representative of the Emergency Rescue Committee of New York, southern France was in a state of chaos, with the Gestapo almost as disorganized as the refugees themselves, and the French police more frequently bewildered than brutal.

In this atmosphere of utter confusion Mr. Fry set up the effective apparatus which in hardly more than a year was to send about a thousand refugees out of France to safety. He gives an account of his activities in "Surrender on Demand" (Random House, $3). Mr. Fry had arrived in Europe with lists of the political and intellectual refugees who most urgently needed help, and whom his committee most wished to aid. Among those he helped to escape were the late Franz Werfel, Heinrich Mann, Lion Feuchtwanger, and outstanding labor leaders of many nationalities. A number of the refugees whose names appeared on his lists were already equipped with American or other visas, but rarely with the necessary papers for travel to Lisbon. Others needed, besides financing, French exit permits, Spanish and Portuguese transit visas, and visas of permanent entry to some country of refuge. These papers were sometimes procured legally, more often not. Before Mr. Fry was finally forced to leave France, he had become an expert in by-passing regulations, cutting red tape, and outwitting both the bureaucrats and the police. Through necessity rather than through choice he found himself living a life of intrigue, in which all the appurtenances of melodrama—from the false passport, the disguise, and the concealed microphone to the chase and the gratifying frequent escape—figured daily.

Mr. Fry's book is frankly a personal history, and as such touches only lightly on the general picture of American activity in behalf of political refugees at that time. Nevertheless, his story is an absorbing chronicle of fascinating adventure, unstinting effort, and a large measure of success.

SHEBA STRUNSKY

Black and White

ALTHOUGH SOME AMERICANS are growing up today in their attitudes toward the Negro problem, the vast majority continue to exhibit their immaturity not only in their attitudes but even in the matter of elementary knowledge about their darker fellow-citizens. It is for this latter group that Bucklin Moon has assembled in a single volume, "Primer for White Folks" (Doubleday, Doran, $3.50), a variety of documents, historical and sociological essays, sketches, and short stories dealing with Negro-white relations. Despite its title, however, this is no book for the simple-minded. Not only do the essays contain sound factual knowledge and the mature reflections of scholars and students of the problem, but the fiction represents sophisticated attitudes and subtle insights.

In Part I, Heritage, the selection by W. E. B. DuBois of material on African culture and the discussion of the Negro problem as a case history by Carey McWilliams are of outstanding value. Black and White Mores are presented in Part II in a number of selections from the works of well-known writers of American fiction. Wendell Willkie's article on Citizens of Negro Blood, which appeared in Collier's, opens the third part, Today and Tomorrow. The selections here cover practically every phase of the Negro problem from the integration of Negroes into American economic life to the Detroit riots and American discrimination against Negro soldiers in England. The editor, a Southerner, who is well known for his sincere desire to see the Negro inte-

"A great lesson and an exciting novel" —FREE WORLD

SOWING THE WIND

FANNY BUTCHER: "One of the best of all of the novels about Nazi Germany, it is more than the story of one 'good' German who became a Nazi . . . No purely factual record could give the reader such a sense of subtly spreading moral corruption in the mind and heart of a once decent man as does this fictional picture of Erich Landt . . . Sowing The Wind is almost uncannily timely in its picture of the psychology of a people as well as of an individual."

JAMES P. WARBURG: "An exciting novel, and one which should be read by any one who thinks that fascism has died with the defeat of Germany and Japan."

N. Y. TIMES: "A contribution toward understanding the Third Reich."

Martha Dodd

who had exceptional opportunity to observe the rise of Nazism from the vantage point of the American Embassy in Berlin, proves dramatically that what happened to the people in Germany can happen to anyone in any country. Sowing The Wind probes the heart of a nation whose men and women are now, and will be for some time, on trial before the world.

HARCOURT, BRACE & COMPANY • $2.50

MOTION PICTURES

NOW RKO

BROOKLYN & QUEENS
BUSHWICK
DYKER
Keith's FLUSHING
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
Keith's RICHMOND HILL
STRAND Far Rockaway
TILYOU

"Great, Good Fun" —Herald-Tribune
"Mirth Runs Wild" —World-Telegram

GARY COOPER
LORETTA YOUNG
in NUNNALLY JOHNSON'S
'Along Came Jones'
From the novel by ALAN LE MAY
— Plus —
'China's Little Devils' with Harry Carey, Paul Kelly
Story of CHINESE BOY GUERRILLAS

RKO ALBEE
FULTON & DE KALB
BROOKLYN

"BRISK FARCE-COMEDY"—N. Y. Times
'Junior Miss'
Starring PEGGY ANN GARNER
FROM THE BROADWAY STAGE HIT
— AND —
"A FIVE-STAR SCREEN SMASH!"—Walter Winchell
GEN. DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER'S
'THE TRUE GLORY'
EPIC STORY OF ALLIED VICTORY IN EUROPE

"The most exciting picture ever! . . . Louis Sobol
20th Century-Fox presents
THE HOUSE ON 92ND STREET
Plus a star-studded stage show
Monte Proser's COPACABANA REVUE
ROSARIO and ANTONIO
Now Playing ROXY 7th Ave. at 50th St.

Paramount Presents
ED GARDNER'S
"DUFFY'S TAVERN"
FEATURING
32 HOLLYWOOD STARS

IN PERSON
THE ANDREWS SISTERS
Featuring
Tim Herbert
Vic Shoen
And His Recording Orchestra
Foy Willing's
Riders of the Purple Sage
Pig-Meat Alamo Markham

COOL PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

grated into American life, has rendered a real service in bringing together in readable form a collection containing fundamental information on so many facets of Negro-white relations.

E. FRANKLIN FRAZIER

Incredible Shanghai

